

Library of The Theological Seminary

PRINCETON · NEW JERSEY

PRESENTED BY

The Rev. Mr. Joel Schevers

BX 945 .P3 1886 v.1

Parsons, Reuben, 1841-1906.

Studies in church history

~~Wm. H. Dancy~~

STUDIES IN CHURCH HISTORY

BY
REV. REUBEN PARSONS, D. D.

VOL. I CENTURIES I-VIII

THIRD EDITION

“That a theologian should be well versed in history, is shown by the fate of those who, through ignorance of history, have fallen into error. Whenever we theologians preach, argue, or explain Holy Writ, we enter the domain of history.”—

MELCHIOR CANUS, Loc. Theol., B. XI., c. ii.

JOHN JOSEPH McVEY
PHILADELPHIA

Imprimatur :

✠ MICHAEL AUGUSTINUS,

Archiepiscopus Neo-Eboracensis.

COPYRIGHT, 1886,
JOHN JOSEPH McVEY

BRIEF OF APPROBATION
FROM HIS HOLINESS, POPE LEO XIII.

Leo P. P. XIII.

DILECTO FILIO, REUBEN PARSONS,
Presbytero Neo-Eboracensi:

DILECTE FILI, SALUTEM ET APOSTOLICAM BENEDICTIONEM!

Senis voluminibus quæ nuper edita ad Nos misisti, duplicem assequutus es laudem, et utramque merito; alteram alacris ingenii magnæque eruditionis, alteram incensi studii ad Catholicum Nomen ab osorum calumniis vindicandum. Menstibi in operoso labore exantlando ea unice fuit, ut, depulsis erroribus ex historia quæsitis, facilius qui dissident ad Catholica Sacra adducantur. Hanc tibi mentem, Dilecte Fili, fortunet Deus! Nihil enim optatius Nobis est quam ut omnes unico Christi ovili, quotquot Ejus Sanguine redempti sunt, contineantur. Quo vero officii gratiam rependamus, Apostolicam Benedictionem Nostram, tibi caritatis testem, amantissime impertimus.

Datum Romæ apud S. Petrum die XX. Maii, Anno MCML., Pontificatus Nostri Anno vicesimo quarto.

Leo 15. 17. 1887:

(TRANSLATION.)

TO OUR BELOVED SON, REUBEN PARSONS, Priest of the Archdiocese of New York:

BELOVED SON: HEALTH AND APOSTOLIC BLESSING!

For the six volumes which you have recently published, and which you have sent to Us, you have received two encomiums, both of which you have deserved; one because of your spirited talent and great erudition, the other because of your fervent zeal in defense of the Catholic cause from audacious calumny. In the execution of your laborious design, you have had only one object in view; namely, such a refutation of historical errors as would impel separatists to enter into the Catholic Fold. May God second your endeavors, dear son! Nothing is nearer to Our heart than the hope that the One Fold of Christ may soon shelter all who have been redeemed by His Blood. And now, mindful of the privilege of Our office in your regard, we accord Our Apostolic Blessing to you most lovingly, as a testimony of our affection for you.

Given at St. Peter's in Rome on the Twentieth Day of May, in the Year MCML., the Twenty-fourth Year of Our Pontificate.

LEO PP. XIII.

APPROBATION OF MT. REV. MICHAEL AUGUSTINE CORRIGAN, D.D.
ARCHBISHOP OF NEW YORK.

ARCHBISHOP'S HOUSE,
NEW YORK, Jan. 22, 1901.

REV. DEAR DOCTOR :

Permit me to congratulate you most sincerely on the successful completion of the Herculean task of publishing your "Studies In Church History." The six ample volumes which, under this modest title, embody the results of your labors, will remain a monument of your zeal, your great learning, and your unflinching perseverance. Improbis labor omnia vincit. In these volumes you offer light and valuable guidance regarding all the knotty questions and controverted points of Church History; and you supply an arsenal whence may be drawn unfailingly ammunition for the defence of the Church against oft-repeated calumnies and misstatements of facts. Moreover, with this wealth of erudition in vindicating the truth, there runs through the entire work a beautiful docility to the See of Peter—in fine, that Roman spirit which is like a sixth sense, instinctively pointing to what is right, and guarding from error. While I felicitate you on the accomplishment of the greatest literary work ever undertaken by a priest of this Diocese, I thank you for the good example which you have thereby given to your Brethren in the Clergy; and I trust that it may stimulate others to devote their talents and their leisure to promoting the greater glory of Him who is the Immortal King of Ages, and the World's Redeemer.

I am, my dear Doctor,

Very faithfully yours,

M. A. Corrigan,

Abp. of New York.

REV. DR. PARSONS,
Yonkers, N. Y.

P R E F A C E .

Of all branches of history, none is so pregnant with matter for controversy as that which treats of the career of the Church ; none excites such wide-spread interest, or causes such intense feeling. "Theological hate" is proverbially strong ; and it influences the person of superior culture as effectively as it does one of ordinary attainments. To all who are animated by this sentiment, ecclesiastical history furnishes keen and powerful weapons. But to those who are actuated by simple yearning for truth, to those who feel that the career of a society must show whether it be of God or of man, this branch of science is of first importance. In our day, especially, appeals to ecclesiastical history are not merely of last resort—certain thinking men are influenced by its lessons when they ignore other authority in religious matters. agreeing with Fenelon that "He is profoundly ignorant of the nature of religion, who does not perceive that she is all historical" (Education c. vi).

In publishing the following dissertations, we are actuated by a desire to supply a want in our English ecclesiastical literature. Histories of the Church we have in abundance, but no one work which treats exhaustively, and nearly exclusively, of the many controverted points which are of interest alike to Catholic, Protestant, and incredulist. We claim no merit for having thrown new light upon subjects, many of which have been fully illustrated by master-minds, whose writings are familiar to the experienced ; but zeal and conscientiousness have united in an endeavor to lessen the labors of the student in a most important branch of ecclesiastical lore. We are not without hope that our pages will be read with interest and profit by many of the Catholic laity, as well as by many of our separated brethren; for while we have not designed to produce a "popular" book, it would have been difficult, in a just treatment of the subject matter, to confine ourselves more carefully to the vernacular, and to avoid more rigidly the technicalities of theologians and canonists. All may not be pleased with the numerous references and quotations, which they may deem an encumbrance to the page; but it seemed injudicious, if not absurd, to expect the reader to receive, on the author's unsupported authority, citations and assertions which might affect, and sometimes wound, one's prejudices. During the course of our disquisitions we are too frequently compelled to rebuke such presumption. Again, the experienced student will appreciate the method adopted, and will not regard it as an affectation of erudition. He knows that by referring to the designated authority, he will derive, in the majority of instances, additional and valuable information concerning the matter treated in the text.

We issue our work as a sincere, albeit inadequate, token of our devotion to that Roman Church which the light of history reveals to us as One, Holy, Catholic, Apostolic; as the True Spouse of Our Lord Jesus Christ, solely intrusted by the Divine Master with the deposit of truth, which she is to guard and communicate until the end of time.

NEW YORK,

Feast of the Chair of St. Peter at Rome, 1886.

STUDIES IN CHURCH HISTORY.

CHAPTER I.

THE ROMAN PONTIFICATE OF SAINT PETER THE APOSTLE.

The occupant of the Papal chair may be regarded in four different ways. He is pastor of the Universal Church, patriarch of the West, bishop of Rome, and a temporal sovereign. As ruler of the Pontifical States, most Protestants would prefer his deposition, simply because they are averse to anything which adds to the dignity of his position. As bishop of Rome, the Schismatics of the East and the Anglicans are willing to recognize him ; dissenting Protestants are willing he should be so styled, so long as his diocesans are content with the episcopal system. As patriarch of the West, the oriental Schismatics readily acknowledge him, while Protestants scarcely know of the title. But when the Pontiff asserts his authority as supreme pastor of Christendom, then all the separatist bodies, schismatical and heretical, prelatie and anti-prelatie, unite in rejecting his words. This office of Head of the Church is claimed by the Pope as the successor of St. Peter. The adversary of the Papacy, who devotes his energies to the undermining of this position, is so far logical, and he manifests an appreciation of the value of time. Could the Pontiff be dislodged from it, there would be left him no vantage-ground, the occupation of which would enable him to retrieve his loss. Now, the simplest way of proving that the bishop of Rome is not the successor of St. Peter, is not by showing that he has no legitimate title of succession, not by contending that the wickedness or even heresy of his predecessors entailed a forfeiture of that succession ; but by establishing, as a stubborn and eloquent fact, that St. Peter himself, the presumed source of the Papal claims, never was bishop of Rome—in fine, that he never was in the Eternal City. In many and various ways, the adversaries of Rome have endeavored to prove this, and the object of the present dissertation is to show that the Prince of the Apostles did proceed to Rome, and that he there founded his Primatial see.

The first to cast doubt upon St. Peter's coming to Rome was Marsilius of Padua, a partisan of Louis the Bavarian, and excommunicated as a schismatic and heretic by an express Bull of Pope John XXII. in 1327. From his time to that of the Lutheran movement we meet no author of note who held such a view. The antiquarian Leland (d. 1557), among his many ways of pleasing his patron, Henry VIII., chose the publication of the adverse opinion. The rank and file of Protestant writers have either absolutely denied the Roman Pontificate of St. Peter, or have affected to regard it as dubious. There are not wanting, however, Protestant authors who defend our thesis, and they are among the most celebrated of their class. Such are Pearson, Usher, Young, Hammond, Blondel, Basnage, J. Scaliger, Grotius, Casaubon, Leclerc, Sir Isaac Newton, Leibnitz, Chamier, Papp, Ittig, Schrökh, Bertholdt, Neander, Gieseler, and even the Centuriators of Magdeburg. The younger Scaliger contradicts himself in this matter, for while in his Annotations to the 18th Chapter of the Apocalypse he asserts that no instructed person will believe in the voyage of St. Peter to Rome, he contends against Eusebius (1) that the Apostle came to Rome, not in the fourth year of Claudius, but in the second. Basnage (2) and Leclerc (3) agree that assent cannot be refused to the testimonies in favor of the Roman voyage, that only some objections of a chronological nature can be presented, and that the martyrdom of Sts. Peter and Paul, in the reign of Nero, is an incontestable fact. But they hold that St. Peter was no more bishop of Rome than of any other place, and that there are stronger reasons for supposing St. Paul to have been bishop of the Eternal City, than there are for St. Peter's having exercised that office. We shall treat of this matter when we have established the reality of the Roman voyage. Hugo Grotius, than whom Protestants can produce few more learned writers, says (1), "As regards Babylon, there is a controversy between the ancient and modern interpreters. By it the ancients understand Rome, where no true Christian will doubt Peter to have been; the moderns hold that by it is meant Babylon of Chaldea. I agree with the ancients." Neander (2) says that it would be "hypercritical to doubt the tradition of Christian antiquity, that Peter was in Rome." Among Catholic authors, Pagi, Papebrock, Baluze, Valois, Calmet, Alexandre, and many others, dispute as to the precise year of St. Peter's arrival in Rome, but all agree that he came there, established there the Primacy, and there suffered martyrdom.

(1) Animadversions on the Chronicle of Eusebius. (2) History, b. 7, c. 3. (3) Year 168, v. 1.

We contend that the following events are asserted and believed to have happened, on as convincing grounds as those upon which rests any undisputed fact in history. After the ascension of our Lord, Simon Bar-Jona (son of John), to whom Christ had given the name of Peter, having preached the Gospel in many places of Judea, Galilee, and Samaria, went to Antioch in the year 36, and there established an episcopal see. In the year 42, the second of Claudius, he came to Rome, and there definitively fixed his Primatial see, suffering martyrdom in the twenty-fifth year of his Roman Pontificate, namely, in the year 66. No one disputes the voyage to Antioch, for nothing is to be gained by so doing. As for the Apostle's presence in Rome, the first witness we call is St. Peter himself. In his first Epistle, chap. 5, he says: "The Church that is in Babylon . . . saluteth you," in which place, we contend, Rome is understood by Babylon, in accordance with that figurative mode of signifying, by that name, any great but wicked city, which is in vogue even in our own day. So this passage of St. Peter was understood by Papias, a disciple of the Apostles, for he says, "Peter mentions this Mark in the first Epistle which he is said to have written at Rome; which Epistle he indeed shows to have been written there, when, by a translation of the word, he calls that city Babylon.”(1) That the Apostles sometimes designated Rome by the name of Babylon, we learn from St. John’s Apocalypse, for, in chap. 17, great Babylon is said to sit upon seven hills, and to hold sway over the kings of the earth. Now, in St. John’s time, no other widely-ruling city than Rome was built upon seven hills. But why did St. Peter call Rome by the name of Babylon? Why does any man use figurative language? we may retort. But there was a reason, in the Apostle’s case, for not mentioning the place of his residence. He had just escaped from his prison in Jerusalem, and it was prudent, lest his letter should fall into the hands of his enemies, to disguise the name of the place whence it went. (2) Again, it was advisable that the quick increase of the Christian numbers in the capital should not be known, lest the emperor Claudius, who studied to please Agrippa, should more severely persecute them. But if, by Babylon, the Apostle did not mean Rome, from what city did he write his letter? Our adversaries answer, the real Babylon. In those days, there were two places of that name, one in Assyria and one in Egypt. Now, the Babylon of the text cannot be the Babylon of the Assyrians, for we know from Josephus (3) that, a few years before this time, the Jews had all—to a man—been either killed, or expelled from the city. Nor could the Babylon of Egypt have been the place of St. Peter’s residence at the time he wrote his Epistle. That Babylon, we learn from Strabo (4), was a small and insignificant place, not worthy the name of town or village, for it is styled a castle. The letter in question speaks of a flourishing church, which would certainly imply a place of some note. (5)

(1) On the 5th Chapter of St. Peter's 1st Epistle.

(2) General History of the Christian Religion and Church, v. 1, p. 1.

(1) In EUSEBIUS: History, b. 2, c. 14. (2) St. Luke used the same economy, when, in the Acts, he said that St. Peter went to another place.

(3) Antiquities, b. 18. (4) Book 17.

(5) During the first five centuries of the Christian era, not one author understands any other place than Rome by the Babylon of the text. Among those who explicitly declare that St. Peter wrote his Epistle at Rome, we cite Tertullian (Against the Jews, c. 9); Clement of Alexandria (Institutions, b. vi., in Eusebius, b. 2, c. 15); Eusebius, ibid; St. Jerome, (Ecclesiastical Writers). Those who believe that St. Peter was bishop of Babylon in Chaldea, should remember that it has always been the tradition of the Chaldeans that their first bishop was St. Thomas the Apostle, who, after six years of administration, was succeeded by Addeus or Thaddeus. In the Catalogue of Chaldean patriarchs, first published in the West by Assemani, and continued to our own days by Guriel (Rome, 1860), we find the name of St. Thomas at the head. We may also cite Martin Luther’s opinion in our favor

St. Paul furnishes us with, if not a positive argument, at least a good reason for supposing the presence of St. Peter in the Eternal City. In his Epistle to the Romans, written, says the Protestant Paley, in the year 53, he speaks of the Church as being in a flourishing condition in Rome. Some one of the Apostles had therefore preached the Gospel there several years before the advent of St. Paul. There are no traces of any other Apostle than Peter having been there, while the Biblical indications point at least to his presence. Again, St. Mark, a disciple of St. Peter, wrote his Gospel at Rome. St. Clement of Alexandria, in his Hypotyposeon, says, "When Peter had publicly preached the word of God in the city of Rome, and, filled with the Holy Ghost, had promulgated the Gospel, many who were present requested Mark, as one who had but lately followed Peter, and had his sayings by memory, that he would write down that which the Apostle had preached." Therefore, St. Peter was at Rome. (1)

Our adversaries particularly insist upon the silence of St. Paul as to St. Peter, when he writes to the Romans. When saluting so many by name, he would not have omitted a remembrance to Peter, had he been in Rome. And nevertheless, when St. Paul wrote to the Ephesians, he did not salute their bishop, Timothy; when he wrote to the Hebrews, he made no mention of St. James, who was bishop of Jerusalem. When Theodoret, a most critical investigator, commented upon this Epistle, far from concluding from it that St. Peter never went to Rome, he noted, in his first chapter, that St. Paul speaks of "confirming" the faith of the Romans, because St. Peter had already preached the Gospel to them. "Because the great Peter," says Theodoret, "had first given them the Gospel, he necessarily said for one of his attacks on the Roman Church is entitled "The Captivity of Babylon." Another reason for refusing to recognize the Chaldean city as the Babylon of the text, may be found in the utter silence of Scripture and of all ecclesiastical writers as to St. Peter's ever having passed the Euphrates.

(1) The following writers also assert that St. Mark was a faithful disciple of St. Peter, and that he wrote his Gospel at Rome, with the approval of the Apostle: Irenaeus (Heresies, b. 3, c. 1), Origen (Commentary on Matthew, in Eusebius, b. 2, c. 25), Tertullian (Marcion, IV., 5), Jerome (Isaias, LXV., 24), Epiphanius (Heresies, 46), Theodoret (Epistle 86, to Flavian).

‘to confirm you.’ For he says, ‘I do not wish to bring you another doctrine, but to confirm that already given, and to water the tree already planted.’” But there was a good reason why St. Paul did not salute the Prince of the Apostles in this Epistle; he was absent from Rome at the time. We know, from Suetonius and Josephus, that in the 9th year of Claudius, that is, in the year of our Lord, 50, the entire Jewish population had been sent into exile. The next year was that of the Council of Jerusalem, at which St. Peter presided. He did not return to Rome until after the death of Claudius, in the year 54. Now, St. Paul’s Epistle was written at Corinth, shortly after the Council, as he passed through that city, on his last visit to Jerusalem (1). Therefore, he, quite naturally, made no allusion to St. Peter. A very interesting argument against the Roman Pontificate of St. Peter is drawn from the Bible, as follows: If Peter was at Rome when St. Paul arrived, the latter was very injurious to the former, or else we must say that St. Peter behaved in a very unchristian-like manner to his co-apostle. For, St. Paul, writing from Rome to the Philippians, says (Chap. 2) that there they all look after their own affairs, not those of Christ; and he says to Timothy that all abandoned him to his own defence when he was arrested. Further, when St. Paul was entering Rome (Acts, 28), the brethren went out to meet him, as far as the Three Taverns, but there was no St. Peter among them. To this reasoning we may say, with Alexandre, that we do not contend that St. Peter was always in Rome, that he was fastened there like Prometheus on Caucasus. His very office entailed upon him the necessity of travelling considerably, leaving the care of the Roman Christians to his vicars, from time to time. But, with regard to the argument taken from Philippians, the context shows that the Apostle only alludes to those whom he could have sent on his errand; certainly, he could not have sent Peter as a messenger: “And I hope in the Lord Jesus to send Timothy unto you shortly, that I also may be of good comfort, when I know the things concerning you. For I have no man so of the same mind, who with sincere affection is solicitous for you." In writing to Timothy, the saint complains of being abandoned by those who might have helped him with Cæsar, and among those St. Peter is not to be counted, for he was placed in the same danger as St. Paul. Another objection is founded on St. Paul's Epistle to the Galatians, 1 and 2, where the Apostle makes no mention of having conversed with St. Peter in Rome, although he tells us of their having met at Jerusalem and at Antioch. But such mention could not be made in an Epistle which was written before St. Paul's visit to Rome. He arrived in Rome in the year 59, and the Epistle to the Galatians was composed at Ephesus in 57, as is shown by the journey of the saint, and by the arguments prefixed to the Epistle in the Latin codices.

(1) That St. Paul’s Epistle to the Romans was written at Corinth, shortly after the Council of Jerusalem (year 51), is proved by Origen with the following arguments. It was sent by the hands of Phoebe, a deaconess of Cenchris, a suburb of Corinth. The Apostle calls Caius, who was living at Corinth, his host. In the salutations of Chap. 16, he speaks of his companions in the Jerusalem journey, who were with him at Corinth.

The silence of St. Luke, in his history of the Apostles, is also adduced by our adversaries to prove that St. Peter was never in Rome. But this silence is easily explained, and in such a way as to show that it in no way favors our opponents. St. Luke's principal object was the narration of the Acts of his preceptor, St. Paul, and not those of the other Apostles. With the exception of those events which happened between the death of Christ and the conversion of St. Paul, which he narrates as a kind of introduction to his main purpose, and Peter's conversion of Cornelius, which was the commencement of the vocation of the Gentiles, to which St. Paul was specially called, St. Luke, in the whole course of his history, makes no mention of any of the other Apostles, unless where St. Paul is concerned. He is silent even as to St. Paul's journey to Jerusalem to see St. Peter; he says nothing of the meeting of the two at Antioch, and nothing of St. Paul's journey to Galatia. When noting this silence of St. Luke, St. Jerome did not regard it as an argument against St. Peter's residence at Rome; on the contrary, he contended that, because it was certain that St. Peter resided both at Antioch and at Rome, therefore it was manifest that the author of the Acts omitted many things

Speaking of the dissension between the two Apostles upon the legal observances, the great doctor says, in his first book on Galatians, treating of the second chapter, "It is not strange that Luke is silent as to this matter, since he used the license of a historiographer to omit many other things which Paul performed; and there is no contradiction, if what one man thinks proper to relate, another leaves aside. We know that Peter was the first bishop of Antioch, and that afterwards he removed to Rome, a fact which Luke altogether omitted."

St. Clement of Rome, who became Pontiff about the year 90, was a disciple of St. Peter. In an epistle which he wrote to the Corinthians shortly after the persecution of Domitian, commemorating the glorious sufferings of the Roman Christians, he says, "Let us place the glorious Apostles before our eyes. Peter did not undergo one or two, but many, sufferings, on account of wicked jealousy; and being made a martyr, he departed to the merited place of glory. Through emulation, Paul obtained the reward of patience . . . and coming to the far West, suffered martyrdom under the princes, and migrated from the world. . . To these heroes, who entered upon divine life, was joined a great multitude of the elect, who, suffering in rivalry many contumelies and many torments, were a beautiful example among us." The authority of St. Clement is of indisputable historical value, and is readily accepted as such by Pearson, Junius, Basnage, and other Protestants. But some regard his testimony as defective, inasmuch as he does not explicitly state that St. Peter died at Rome. But it is certain, in the first place, that St. Clement's letter was written in Rome, for the inscription leaves no doubt on the matter, and as such it was regarded by Dionysius of Corinth, Clement of Alexandria, and Origen. The saint speaks of the great sufferings which had been undergone by his people, and which served as a beautiful example to all; among these sufferings, he places those of Sts. Peter and Paul, and the whole context shows that the "great multitude" and the two Apostles were martyred in the same place and about the same time. He speaks of St. Paul "coming to the far West" to be martyred "under the princes," and in such close connection is this remark with that upon St. Peter, that the latter's presence in the far West, and his suffering under the princes, are fully implied. The "great multitude" of Roman martyrs is "joined" not only to St. Paul, suffering in the far West, but to "these heroes," of whom, he tells us, St. Peter was one. The context seems—to us, at least—so plainly indicative of the martyrdom in Rome of both the Apostles, that an attempt to render it more clear appears as unnecessary as it is futile. (1) We have already read the testimony of Papias, bishop of Hierapolis, in connection with the belief that St. Mark wrote his Gospel at Rome, at the dictation of St. Peter. Papias was a contemporary of St. John the Evangelist, and probably his disciple, and when he tells us that St. Peter wrote his first Epistle in Rome, his assertion should not be rashly contemned.

St. Irenaeus, Bishop of Lyons, was a pupil of St. Polycarp, a disciple of St. John. In his work on Heresies, b. 3, c. 1, he says, "But because it would take too long a time to enumerate, in this volume, the successions of all the churches, we will confound all who, in any way, gather outside the vineyard, by indicating the Apostolic tradition, and the faith preached to men, and handed down to us by the succession of bishops of the greatest, and most ancient, and most noted Church, that one founded and established in Rome by the two most glorious Apostles, Peter and Paul." Caius, a Roman priest who lived at the end of the second, and in the beginning of the third century, is quoted by Eusebius, Hist., b., 2, c. 15, as saying, "I, however, can show the monuments of the Apostles. For, whether you go to the Vatican, or along the Ostian Way, you will meet the monuments of those who founded that Church." The testimony of Tertullian (b. 150) is remarkably clear (1). "Come, then, you who wish to better satisfy your curiosity in the affair of your salvation; look around the Apostolic Church, in which the very chairs of the Apostles yet hold their places, and in which their own authentic letters are yet recited, sounding the voice, and representing the face of each one of them. If Achaia is near you, you have Corinth; if you are not far from Macedonia, you have Philippi and Thessalonica; if you can trip it to Asia, you have Ephesus; if you are in the neighborhood of Italy, you have Rome, whence we, too, have authority in readiness. How happy is that Church upon which the Apostles poured the whole doctrine with their blood; where Peter shared the passion of the Lord, where Paul was crowned!" And (2) "Nero first shed blood upon the growing faith in Rome. Then was Peter led by another, when he was fastened to the cross." Again (3), "Let us hear what the Romans say, they to whom Peter and Paul left the Gospel sealed with their blood." And (4) "Nor does it matter anything to those whom John immersed in the Jordan, and Peter in the Tiber." Eusebius, in B. 2, c. 24, gives us a very clear testimony of Dionysius of Corinth, who died in the second century, and is often confounded with the Areopagite. In an epistle to the Romans, the holy bishop says, "By a certain impulse of prudence, you have placed in one spot Peter and Paul, who first brought the Romans and the Corinthians into the Church of Christ. For both, when they had founded our Church of Corinth, and yours of Rome, and had indoctrinated our souls and yours with the same doctrinal precepts, at the same time suffered martyrdom." Hegesippus, who lived in the first half of the second century, and must have known some of the disciples of the Apostles, says (5), "And returning, he came back to the city, and being taken by the persecutors, was sentenced to the cross. He requested that he might be affixed to the cross head downwards, because he was unworthy to suffer in the same manner as the Son of God; this having been granted, either that the prediction of Christ might be fulfill-

(1) Pearson, Anglican bishop of Chester (d. 1686), answers this objection by asking how Clement could have asserted the martyrdom of St. Peter, if he was ignorant of the place where it occurred, as the objection implies. How did he know that the Apostle suffered on account of his own zeal, and the jealousy of his enemies? Clement therefore knew that the martyrdom took place at Rome, but did not expressly state the fact, as there was no necessity for so doing, it being too notorious to demand mention when the text did not require it. This purely negative argument is so puerile, that a scholar of the calibre of Saumaise (its author) would not be expected to adduce it. Were we to write a eulogy of the late Pope Pius IX., and not state that he died at Rome, it would not be said that we were ignorant of the place of his death.

(1) Prescriptions, c. 26. (2) Scorpiace, c. 15. (3) Marcion, b. 4, c. 5. (4) Baptism.
(5) Destruction of Jerusalem, c. 1.

ed, or because a persecutor is not unwilling to allow an increase of torture, he was killed by the cross, and Paul by the sword." Julian the Apostate may also be cited in favor of our thesis, for St. Cyril of Alexandria tells us, B. 10, that Julian had conjectured that St. John was led to proclaim the Divinity of Jesus "because he found that a large number of persons, in many cities of Greece and Italy" believed in it, and because he had heard "that the monuments of Peter and Paul, though secretly indeed, were venerated." To which assertion of Julian, St. Cyril answers, "John was not led to say that Christ was God by having seen the veneration paid to the monuments of Peter and Paul." St. Jerome (1) tells us, "After his episcopacy of the Church of Antioch, and his preaching to those of the dispersion who were converted from Circumcision, in Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia, Simon Peter came to Rome, in the second year of Claudius, to defeat Simon Magus, and there kept his priestly chair for twenty-five years, until the last year of Nero, that is, until the fourteenth." And again (2), "I am joined in communion with your Blessedness, that is, with the Chair of Peter, following no other, unless Christ, before you. Upon that rock I know the Church is built." Optatus of Milevi (3) says, "There is a unique Chair, the first in prerogatives. In it first sat Peter," etc. St. Cyprian (4) writes to Rome that his opponents "dare to have recourse to the Chair of Peter, to carry to the principal Church, from which sacerdotal unity is derived, letters from schismatics and the profane, not reflecting that there they are Romans (whose faith was praised by the Apostle), to whom deceit can have no approach." St. Augustine (5) thus urges a heretic, "Even though all, throughout the world, were such as you vainly declare, what has been done for you by the Church of Rome, in which Peter sat, and in which Anastasius now presides? Or by Jerusalem, where James sat, and where to-day John rules? We are joined in Catholic unity to these, from whom your nefarious frenzy has separated

(1) Ecclesiastical Writers, art. Peter. (2) Epist. 57.

(3) Against Parmenian, b. 2.

(4) Epist. 55, to Pope St. Cornelius.

(5) Against the Letters of Petilian the Donatist, b. 2, c. 51.

you." St. Prosper (1) sings, "Whatever Rome, the see of Peter, does not hold by arms, she acquires by religion, being made the source of pastoral honor for the world." St. Epiphanius (2) says that "Peter and Paul were the first Bishops and Apostles of Rome." Paul Orosius (3) speaking of Claudius, says that, in the beginning of his reign, "Peter, Apostle of our Lord Jesus Christ, came to Rome.....From that time there began to be Christians in Rome." Lactantius (4) says of Christ and the Apostles, that "they predicted all which Peter and Paul taught in Rome, and that preaching remained fixed in memory. In it, among other wonders, they declared that it would soon come to pass that God would send a ruler who would punish the Jews and level their cities to the ground.....And so, after their demise, Nero having put them to death, Vespasian destroyed the Jewish race and name." St. Athanasius (5) writes that "Peter also, who had lain hidden for fear of the Jews, and the Apostle Paul, who had escaped in a basket, when they understood they were to be martyred at Rome, did not refuse the journey, but rather undertook it with joy." St. Gregory of Nazianzen (6) says that "Peter and Paul gained their victory in Rome." The poet Dracontius (7) tells us, "In order that Rome might not any longer ignore the benefits of Christ, Peter obeyed the divine commands, and, in company with Paul, went thither." These testimonies, none later than the fifth century, and most of them of an earlier date, ought to convince any candid mind of the historical reality of St. Peter's residence in Rome. Scarcely one of the cited authors has not spoken to the same purpose in dozens of other passages, and we have quoted but a few of the many who are available for our thesis. The reader may consult the following, also not later, any of them, than the beginning of the fifth century, and most of them of the fourth. St. Ambrose (Sermon on Basilicas), St. John Chrysostom (2d Homily on the Acts of the Apostles), Prudentius (12th Hymn on the Martyrdom of Sts. Peter and Paul), Sulpicius Severus

(1) Poem on "The Ungrateful," (2) Heresies, 27. (3) B. 7, c. 4.
 (4) Divine Institutions, b. 4, c. 11. (5) Apology for his Flight. (6) Poem XIV.
 (7) On God, b. 3, v. 227, etc.

(History, b. 2, c. 28), St. Paulinus (Poem 19, v. 55, &c.), St. Maximus of Turin (Sermon 61).

We would now draw attention to the ancient Catalogues of the Roman Pontiffs. The first chronologist in the matter of the Roman succession was Hegesippus, a converted Jew, who, about the year 170, came to Rome for instruction, and while there drew up a catalogue of the Popes. "While I was at Rome," he says (1), "I composed a succession down to Anicetus, to whom Eleutherius was deacon. To Anicetus succeeded Soter, and after him came Eleutherius." It was from this Hegesippus that Eusebius derived his catalogue, and at its head we read the name of St. Peter. The Anglican Pearson asks, when speaking of Hegesippus (2), why he arranged this succession, more than that of any other city, unless it meant something. Towards the end of the second century, St. Irenaeus also wrote a catalogue, and in it St. Peter holds the first place. The authority of St. Irenaeus is great indeed, for his preceptor was St. Polycarp, a disciple of St. John. He tells us (3) that "the Blessed Apostles, founding and instructing the Church, delivered the episcopal administration to Linus." The third catalogizer was Tertullian (4), who defied the heretics of his day to prove the Apostolic origin of their sects as did the Roman Church her descent from St. Peter. "Let the heretics," he says, "publish the origins of their churches; let them display the order of their bishops in a flowing succession from the beginning, so that (we may see whether) their first bishop had, for author and predecessor, an Apostle or one of the Apostolic men. For in that manner does the Roman Church show Clement, ordained by Peter." The fourth chronologist was St. Hippolytus, bishop of Porto, at the end of the second, and beginning of the third century (5).

(1) In EUSEBIUS, b. 4, c. 11. (2) Succession of the First Bishops of Rome.

(3) Heretics, b. 3, c. 3. (4) Prescriptions, c. 32.

(5) In the year 1842 there was discovered in the monastery of Mt. Athos an anonymous work entitled Philosophumena, which was declared by Jacobi, Bunsen, and the Anglican canon Wordsworth, to be from the hand of this saint and martyr. The discovery was of importance to the adversaries of Rome, for the Philosophumenist was a bitter enemy of the Roman Pontiffs Zephyrinus and Callixtus. But he was soon proved to have been a very different man from the holy bishop of Porto, and to have been a heretic of the third century. One of the most erudite investigations in the matter was accomplished by Prof. Torquato Armellini, of the Roman College, and published in 1862. We allude to the Philosophumena, because of the following passage in favor of our thesis. In the 6th Book, the author, speaking of Simon Magus, says that he "betook himself to Rome, and opposed himself to the Apostles; he deceived many with his magical arts, but against him Peter made much resistance."

His testimony is found in the catalogue known as the Bucherian, from the name of its first editor, and as the Liberian, from the name of the last Pontiff mentioned in it. This catalogue was composed about the middle of the fourth century, and, according to the Protestant Mommsen, consists of two distinct parts, one ending with Pope Pontianus (y. 235), and another finishing with Liberius. As we know, says Mommsen (1), that the catalogue of St. Hippolytus ended with Pontianus, we may infer that it is the basis of the Liberian. This document begins with these words, "During the reign of Tiberius Cæsar, our Lord Jesus Christ suffered, on the 8th of the Calends of April, in the Consulate of the two Gemini; and after His ascension, the Most Blessed Peter assumed the episcopacy. From that time, is shown by succession who was bishop, how many years he ruled, and under what emperor." After the Liberian catalogue comes that of Eusebius, in the Chronicle and in the History; then that of Optatus, ending with Pope Siricius; that of St. Jerome, as a continuation of Eusebius; that of St. Augustine, terminating with Anastasius; that of Victor, edited by Scaliger; that of St. Prosper, published by Labbe; that of Marcellin; that of the time of St. Sylvester; that of Felix IV.; that of the Vatican, in the time of St. Gregory the Great. The more modern ones we may omit. In all of these documents, authentic as any ever handled by historian or critic, the name of St. Peter invariably heads the list of Roman Pontiffs.

The traveller who has visited Rome with an eye, not bent upon mere sources of pleasure or of distraction, but directed to what can instruct and improve the intellectual man, must have been impressed with the tradition, so vivid, universal, and absolutely held by the people, of the Roman Pontificate of St. Peter. In a dissertation of this kind, we can do no more, at best, than allude to the monuments of the Eternal City, which, from the earliest days of Christianity, have attested and perpetuated this tradition (2).

(1) Historico-Philological Dissertations of the Royal Saxon Society of Sciences, vol. 1.

(2) In 1864, the learned Jesuit theologian, the late Prof. John Perrone, published a little book designed for popular, rather than for learned people's use, entitled "St. Peter in Rome," Although meant merely as an antidote to the poisons, then as now, being disseminated in Christian Rome has ever been an intellectual, as well as a religious, city. Nor has its intellectual culture been confined to the ecclesiastical element of its population; its literary and artistic history—and it is fuller than that of any other city in the world—shows that the Roman laity, even though guided and encouraged by the clergy, have ever been capable of, as they were always inclined to, independent investigation. And yet this Roman laity, fully as firmly as any of the clergy could wish, have always believed in the authenticity of the traditions connected with their “holy places,” as they call, by excellence, the spots sanctified by the blood of the Apostles. Commencing at our own day, and going back to the time when Constantine gave freedom to the church, we find a constant succession of Roman writers proclaiming this belief. Nay, further back than that happy day, even in the midst of the persecutions of the second century, we hear Caius praising the glories of the Vatican and the Ostian Way. Nor are the Romans ever disturbed in their proud confidence of possessing the relics of the Apostles, in the glory that the Roman soil was moistened with their blood. No other place ever claims to have been the site of their martyrdom; no other place boasts of guarding their bodies. On the contrary, from all lands there is a constant succession of pilgrimages, on the part of priest and layman, king and peasant, the learned and the illiterate, to the tombs of the Apostles. In the second century, we behold Polycarp, Hegesippus, Justin, Irenaeus; in the third, Origen, Tertullian, Peter of Alexandria. The writings of the first three centuries, Pagan as well as Christian, frequently attest the seizure of persons known as Christians from the fact of their being seen at prayer in the holy places. There was Maurus, an African, who, under Numerian, was taken “at the tombs of the Apostles” in the year 184, as we read in the ancient Martyrology. Sts. Marius and Martha, with their sons, Audifax and Abacus, Persians, the fair land of Italy, there is much in it to repay the student for its perusal. The author devotes considerable space to the archaeological proofs of St. Peter's presence in Rome, and draws particular attention to the sarcophagi, cemeterial vials, inscriptions, &c., which may be studied in the catacombs and various museums. These objects have an eloquence peculiar to themselves, and while primarily serving to confirm the faith of the devout Catholic, necessarily command the notice of the archæologist, and the student of history.

were captured while "at prayer," and when interrogated by Claudius, they declared that they had "come to pray to the servants and Apostles of Jesus Christ." St. Paternus, coming from Alexandria, was arrested by the tribune under the same circumstances (1). So were Sts. Tranquillinus and Zoe (2). And this devotion to the tombs of the Apostles has never grown torpid in the course of time. While in the early ages, we discover an emulation in the work of praising the Apostles. Read the words of Athanasius, Gregory, Chrysostom, Germanus, in the East, and of Cyprian, Augustine, Fulgentius, Hilary, Prudentius, Isidore, in the West; we find that the succeeding centuries are no less fervent in the task. It was this firm persuasion that the Roman Pontiff was the successor of St. Peter, that caused Constantine, Theodosius, Gratian, and Valentinian, to give such splendid proofs of affectionate veneration for the Holy See. Equally devoted to Rome, because equally persuaded of her splendid prerogatives, were Clodoveus, Pepin, and Charlemagne, of the Franks; Otho and Henry in the new Empire; Ina, Offa, and Aidulphus, among the Saxons; Demetrius of Russia; Bertrand of Provence; Alphonsus of Portugal. It would be superfluous to enumerate the more modern sovereigns who distinguished themselves by their veneration for the "Confession of St. Peter." And as for pilgrimages to the Roman shrines, their antiquity and universality are too well known to need more than allusion (3).

It has been asserted that the ambition of the Roman See gave rise to the opinion that St. Peter was its founder. In that case, the ambition is certainly as old as the See itself, as is shown by the testimonies already adduced. But, if Rome propagated and nourished that opinion, when there was no historical foundation for it, how comes it that, in the olden times, there was no one to rebuke such audacity? Not one of the ancient heretics, so hotly pressed by the authority and prestige of the name of St. Peter, ever alleged that Rome had no right to invoke that name. Not one of the ancient patriarchates ever presumed to dispute Rome's

(1) BOLLANDISTS; v. 4, August.

(2) Idem, v. 2, July.

(3) The old Saxon Chronicle remarks, as an extraordinary fact, that, in the year 889, no pilgrims went to Rome, and Alfred's letters had to be sent by messengers.

precedence on the ground that her Pontiff was not the successor of St. Peter. Even the proud church of Constantinople, in her most arrogant moments, never contested the historical claims of Rome, as deduced from the Prince of the Apostles. In the height of their frenzy, some of the Byzantine schismatics held that Rome had lost her supremacy on account of the "heresy" touching the Holy Ghost; certain others claimed that Rome's jurisdiction had accrued to the "New Rome," on the transfer thereto of the imperial government. But none of the would-be "œcumenicals" ever alleged that Rome had falsely presented herself as heiress of St. Peter's authority. Again, it is a noteworthy fact that, of all the noted writers of the first three centuries, who attest St. Peter's coming to Rome, nearly all are Orientals; very few belong to the West, still fewer are Romans. Orientals were Ignatius, Papias, the Author of the "Apostolic Constitutions," Dionysius of Corinth, Hegesippus, Irenaeus, Clement of Alexandria, Caius, Origen, Firmilian, Eusebius of Caesarea, Athanasius, Cyril of Jerusalem. Of the Western testimonies, Tertullian, Cyprian, Arnobius, and Optatus, were Africans; Lactantius may have been an Italian, but he was certainly no Roman; Philaster of Brescia was probably a Spaniard. There remains then, among all these witnesses, only one who was certainly a Roman, Pope Clement I. This preponderance of foreign testimony would certainly indicate some other origin than Roman ambition for the assertion we defend.

Many historical writers have lamented the fact of their being so frequently obliged to wrestle with difficulties of chronology. Few suffer so much from this matter as he who devotes himself to ecclesiastical history. To say nothing of the chronological mysteries of the Old Dispensation, one is taken aback on being confronted by such, at the very outset of one's investigations into the history of the New. And yet, because learned critics cannot satisfy him as to the precise year in which Christ was born, the student does not rush to the conclusion that the Word did not become man. So, in the matter of the present question of St. Peter's Roman Pontificate, our adversaries should not claim a verdict because our witnesses differ as to the date of St. Peter's arrival in the Eternal City. It is true that Lactantius asserts that the Apostle entered Rome "during the reign of Nero;" that Orosius assigns as the date, "the beginning of the reign of Claudius;" that St. Jerome puts it down as "the second year of Claudius;" that the Book of Dates ascribes it to the fourth year of the same. But the dissension among these authors, Lactantius excepted, is more apparent than real. Is not the "second year of Claudius" of St. Jerome very easily reconciled with the "beginning of the reign" assigned by Orosius (1)? The erudite have no confidence in the chronological authority of the Book of Dates. As for Lactantius, he is alone in his opinion, but he is as firm as any other author in the assertion that St. Peter was martyred at Rome. His words are (2), "During the reign of Nero, Peter came to Rome, and having performed, by the power of God, certain miracles, he converted many to justice, and established for God a faithful and permanent temple. When Nero heard of this, and learned that, not only at Rome, but everywhere, multitudes were abandoning the worship of the idols and, despising antiquity, were passing to the new religion, execrable and cruel tyrant as he was, he rushed to the destruction of the heavenly temple, and to the abolition of justice, and becoming the first persecutor of the servants of God, he fastened Peter to the cross, and also killed Paul."

Claude de Saumaise (3) contended that St. Peter could never have been in Rome, because St. Paul declares that he himself was the Apostle of the Gentiles, while St. Peter was accredited to the children of the Circumcision. Alexandre allows St. Jerome to answer this difficulty. Commenting upon the text, Gal., c. 2, v. 7, 8, and 9, the holy doctor says, "Did Peter therefore, when he met any Gentiles, not lead them to the faith? And if Paul encountered any of these

(1) The arrival of St. Peter in Rome during the second year of Claudius, is asserted by Eusebius (Chronicle), St. Jerome (Church Writers), Ado of Vienne (Martyrology), with them agree those who say the Apostle was martyred in Nero's 14th year, after ruling for 25 years, viz., Damasus, Isidore, Bede, and others.

(2) Deaths of the Persecutors.

(3) A famous French Protestant scholar of the 17th century. His "Defense of Charles I.," written to please Charles II., then a refugee in Holland, was the occasion of Milton's issuing his "Defence of the English People."

of the Circumcision, did he not impel them to the Baptism of Christ? This question is answered, if we say that each (Apostle) received a principal commission in regard to the Jews and Gentiles; so that they who defended the Law might have one to follow, and they who preferred Grace to the Law, might not want a teacher, and a forerunner. However, they had this in common, that they should establish a Church for Christ from among all peoples. For we read that the Gentile Cornelius was baptized by St. Peter, and that Christ was very often preached by Paul in the synagogue of the Jews." And does not St. Peter himself answer the objection of Saumaise when he tells his colleagues in the Council of Jerusalem that God had decreed that the Gentiles should hear the Gospel by his mouth (1)? And even though St. Peter had been commissioned to preach only to the Jews, it by no means follows that he did not go to Rome. We know that the Eternal City contained, at that time, a large Jewish population (2); why should not St. Peter have gone there to evangelize it? But the special credential to the Jews given to St. Peter cannot be understood as implying an exclusion of jurisdiction over the Gentiles. However, as this matter does not, properly speaking, pertain to the historical domain, we shall dismiss it with the remark that no Christian denies the universal jurisdiction of our Lord, and yet He is specially designated as "Minister of the Circumcision."

We come now to the nature of the office exercised by our Apostle at Rome. Samuel Basnage, Leclerc, and very many other Protestant authors, contend that, while it is certain that St. Peter died at Rome, it cannot be shown that he was bishop of that city. Some indeed hold that he exercised episcopal authority, but they uphold, on the part of St. Paul, a joint jurisdiction. Others go so far as to assert the incompatibility of the Apostolate with a tenure of a particular episcopal see. There would be some truth in this last assertion, if we did not know that when St. Peter's Apostolic duties called him from his special diocese, he left its care to a vicar (1). In order to prove the Roman episcopacy of St. Peter, it is not necessary to go beyond the testimonies already adduced to prove his residence in Rome, for they nearly all speak of him as Rome's first bishop. But with regard to the joint jurisdiction claimed for St. Paul, the assertion merits special consideration. Many of the fathers seem to regard St. Paul as the equal of St. Peter; and, to this day, the Roman Pontiff issues his decrees, indulgences, &c., "By the authority of the Blessed Apostles Peter and Paul, and our own." Again, on the seals of the Pontifical Diplomas, we always find the effigies of the two Apostles, with no discrimination as to the post of honor; sometimes one is on the right, sometimes the other. All these things appear to show a perfect equality between Sts. Peter and Paul. Indeed, there have been Catholic writers who contended that St. Paul was a colleague of St. Peter in the Roman Episcopacy. We remark, before we proceed to an analysis of these objections, that while some Catholic authors have held that St. Paul exercised in Rome a co-jurisdiction with St. Peter, all agree in the teaching of Pope Innocent X., when, in 1647, he condemned as heretical the proposition asserting "a perfect equality between St. Peter and St. Paul, without a subordination and subjection of St. Paul to St. Peter, in the supreme power and government of the Universal Church" (2). If we carefully attend to the manifest sense of the passages of the fathers which are alleged to assert the equality of the two Apostles, we shall find that they do not militate for our opponents.

(1) Acts, 15, 7.

(2) Josephus tells us, b. 17, c. 13, that after the death of Herod, when an embassy of the "Libertine" synagogue at Jerusalem was sent to Rome, "more than eight thousand of the Jews in the city received them." Philo, in his Legation to Caligula, testifies that Augustus allowed the Jews to exclusively occupy a large quarter in the city. Tacitus says that, in the sixth year of Tiberius, four thousand Jews were carried to the island of Sardinia, and the rest ordered to leave Italy unless, by a certain day, they abandoned their religion. After this expulsion, the Jews soon returned to Rome, for after the death of Sejanus, their enemy, Tiberius favored them. Under Claudius, they were so numerous that Dio says the emperor feared to use force against them; he finally did expel them, but the edict was revoked, perhaps by himself, perhaps by Nero, and under the latter emperor, they were so secure and happy, that they could publicly celebrate their festivals. See Persius; Satire 5.

(1) EPIPHANIUS: Heresies, 27.

(2) The First declaration of St. Paul's entire equality with St. Peter seems to have been made by Claude of Turin, a Spaniard, seated in that episcopal chair in 823, by Louis the Compliant. This prelate is praised by Basnage and Mosheim as one of the forerunners of Protestantism, and is called by them the founder of the Waldenses of Piedmont. But if Claude left any followers in the Piedmontese valleys, history makes no mention of them until 1185. Again, when Pope Lucius III. condemned the Waldensian errors, he made no mention of the chief doctrines of Claude, Nestorianism, and Adoptianism. However, we do not deny that Claude was a heretic; for, besides these two errors, he made war on devotion to the Saints and declared that only a virtuous priest could validly officiate.

Thus St. Irenaeus (1) is introduced, saying that "The Roman Church was instituted and founded by the holy Apostles Peter and Paul." But how does it follow from this that St. Paul was a co-governor of that church, and much less of the Church Universal? St. Epiphanius (2) tells us that "at Rome Peter and Paul were the first Apostles, as well as Bishops." Alexandre concedes the truth of this assertion, if it be taken as regarding the local episcopacy of Rome, and that Epiphanius spoke only of that, and not of the government of the whole Church, is evident from the saint's object at the time he wrote the words. He wished to show that the particular Church of Rome had always preserved the purity of doctrine, and that, to learn what was sound teaching, it was only necessary to recur to Rome, which had been indoctrinated by Sts. Peter and Paul. St. Paul may have been a co-bishop in Rome with St. Peter, on account of his Apostolate, which certainly gave episcopal right and power, but there is nothing in the quoted passage of Epiphanius to show that St. Paul was ordinary in Rome, much less that he shared the supreme Pontificate. Nay, the context shows that he regarded St. Peter as the ordinary, for he particularly notes that St. Clement was consecrated by St. Peter. And in another place (3), Epiphanius deems St. Paul deserving of eulogy, since "Peter, the prince of the Apostles, who was worthy of receiving the keys of the Kingdom, gave him the right hand." And the holy father must have been conversant with the history of Novatianism and Donatism, and one of the most salient facts in the annals of these heresies, is the persuasion of the Romans that no diocese could have two ordinaries. St. Cyril of Jerusalem has also been cited in favor of St. Paul's co-papacy, it being alleged that he always speaks of the two apostles as "Heads" of the Church. This is not correct. The saint uses the word prostata, "prelate"; and when he speaks of St. Peter by himself, he terms him protoprostata, "first prelate." St. John Chrysostom (4) is also brought forward, since he styles both Apostles the "eyes of Rome," and the "leaders of the saints." But certainly there is here no implication of equal authority. We might call St. Gregory VII. and St. Peter Damian the "eyes of Rome" in their day, or St. Francis de Sales and St. Jane de Chantal the "eyes of Savoy," but no one would accuse us of investing St. Damian with the tiara, or of making the holy Chantal bishop of Annecy. Pope St. Leo I. (1) calls Sts. Peter and Paul "the fathers and pastors of the Roman city," and rightly, but that he did not recognize them as equals, he proves in the same sermon, when he says that Rome "has been made head of the world through the see of Blessed Peter."

(1) Heresies, c. 3. (2) Heresies, 27. (3) Ancorato. (4) Homily 32, on Epist. Rom.

The attempt to make the Roman Pontiffs testify to the equality of authority in Sts. Peter and Paul is no more successful than the torturing of the fathers to that end. It is true that the Popes style themselves "successors of the Blessed Peter and Paul," but St. Bernard, when addressing his quondam disciple, Eugene III., understood the sense of this expression, when he said "Thou art the Prince of Bishops; thou art the heir of the Apostles." When the Pontiff uses this phrase, he means not a personal succession, which is derived only from St. Peter, but a succession to all the rights and privileges of the Apostles, in which sense he is sometimes called the successor of all the Apostles.

The Pontiffs certainly invoke the "authority of Sts. Peter and Paul," when issuing decrees, etc., but they also invoke that "of all the saints;" in some decrees, the authority "of the Blessed Virgin" is mentioned in the same preamble. Patronage, and intercessory power, is here indicated; not any office of authority. In an epistle of Alexander II. (1061-1073), all of these invocations occur; and, in the decrees, etc., of the more modern Popes, they are all very frequently read. It is plain then that all, that of God, of Mary, of Peter, of Paul, and of all the saints, cannot be adopted as indicating the same authority. Had the Pontiffs ever regarded themselves as the successors of St. Paul in the same sense as they were of St. Peter, they would have treated the former with the same respect that they gave the latter, that is, not one of them would have presumed to take his name. There have been five Popes called Paul, only one Peter. Again, if the Popes are successors of St. Paul, or thought themselves such, the last Pope Paul would have been called not Paul V., but Paul VI.

(1) Sermon I. on the Feast of the Apostles.

The argument drawn from the seals of Pontifical documents proves nothing against the undivided Roman episcopacy of St. Peter. In the first place, the more important documents are sealed with the "ring of the fisherman," which bears only the image of St. Peter. Again, even if the Pontifical seal were always engraved with the image of each Apostle, and with St. Paul always at the right, there could be no conclusion in the premises, for the right is not necessarily the post of honor in the Church (1).

Before bringing this dissertation to an end, we would draw attention to some events, in the early history of the Church, which certainly show that our ancestors in the faith were fully persuaded that the Bishops of Rome were the successors of St. Peter. The first event is the famous Paschal controversy which agitated the Church from the days of Pope Anicetus, culminated under Pope Victor I., (193-202), and was finally settled by the Council of Nice. We shall treat this matter in detail in its proper place; for our present purpose it is sufficient to note that the Roman Pontiffs, following the tradition received from St. Peter, wished that the entire Church should celebrate Easter on the Sunday after the 14th moon of the Spring equinox, whereas the churches of Asia Minor, following, they alleged, the instructions of St. John, ate the Paschal lamb on the evening of the fourteenth day, and kept the feast of the Resurrection three days afterwards. Hence, it came to pass that, when the fourteenth happened to fall on any other day than Thursday, Easter could not be celebrated on Sunday the proper day. The want of uniformity was productive of scandal, for while one church was feasting, another was clad in the habiliments of woe. The controversy, as we shall see, soon approached the region of dogma, and it became necessary that Rome should interfere in the interests, not only of uniformity, but of truth. Pope Victor ordered Polycrates, Bishop of Ephesus, to convene a Synod of all the bishops of Asia Minor, and to inform them of the Pontifical resolve to excommunicate all recalcitrants in the Paschal matter. Polycrates obeyed. Now, in the supposition of our adversaries, that the Roman Pontiff is not the successor of St. Peter, that, in fine, his authority is no greater than that of any other bishop, Polycrates, deeply attached to the Asiatic tradition, would not have obeyed. Who is this foreigner, he would have properly demanded, in his indignation, that he should dictate to us? Neither he, nor one of his Synodals, protested against an innovation, a usurpation. Some certainly yielded, in their bitterness of regret at being obliged to abandon their traditions, to human passion, and upbraided the Pontiff, not one contested Rome's primacy of jurisdiction.

(1) For proofs of this non-discrimination of right and left, in matter of precedence in the Church, as well as for St. Peter Damian's opinion as to why St. Paul is often placed at the right, see ALEXANDRE, 1st Cent., Dissert. IV., Prop. 4.

Another event in the history of the early Church, which admirably illustrates our thesis, is the dispute between Pope St. Stephen (253-257) and St. Cyprian, as to the rebaptism of those baptized by heretics. St. Cyprian, as we shall see, when we come to treat of this subject, was supported in his opinion and practice, by the African and Asiatic prelates, and the controversy was extremely bitter. Yet, when the Pontiff decreed the validity of baptism conferred by heretics, provided that the proper form had been used, not one of these bishops told him to attend to his diocese of Rome, and to leave Africa and Asia in peace. They recognized Pope Stephen as the successor of St. Peter; they felt with their leader, when he wrote of that Apostle (1), "Upon him alone He built His Church, and ordered him to feed His sheep. And although, after his resurrection, He gave similar power to all the Apostles, and said, 'As the Father sent me, so I send you. Receive ye the Holy Ghost; whose sins you forgive, they are forgiven them,' etc.; nevertheless, that He might manifest unity, He established one Chair, and, by His authority, disposed that the origin of that unity should be derived from one. The other Apostles were certainly that which Peter was, united in an equal society of honor and power. But the beginning takes its course from unity. The Primacy is given to Peter, that the Church of Christ may be shown one, and the Chair one. They are all shepherds ; but the flock is shown to be one, which is fed, with unanimous consent, by all the Apostles. . . Does he believe that he holds the faith, who does not hold to this unity of the Church ? Does he believe that he is in the Church, who withstands and resists the Church, who deserts the Chair of Peter, upon which the Church is founded ? ” These fathers of Africa and Asia, who so sympathized with the theory of St. Cyprian, like those who had fought so strenuously for the perpetuation of their Paschal tradition, never for a moment dreamed of contesting the authority of the Roman Pontiff, because they recognized him as the occupant of “ that Chair so celebrated by the Fathers, who have rivalled each other in exalting ‘ the principality of the Apostolic Chair, the chief principality, the source of unity, and in the place of Peter, the eminent grandeur of the sacerdotal Chair ; the mother-Church, holding in her hand the guidance of all others ; the source of the episcopacy, from which proceeds the ray of government ; the principal Chair, the unique Chair, in which alone all preserve their unity.’ You hear, in these words St. Optatus, St. Augustine, St. Cyprian, St. Irenaeus, St. Prosper, St. Avitus, Theodoret, the Council of Chalcedon and others, Africa, Gaul, Greece, Asia, the East and the West united together.” (1)

(1) ST. CYPRIAN; Unity of the Church.

(1) BOSSUET; Sermon on the Unity of the Church

CHAPTER II.

HERESIES OF THE FIRST THREE CENTURIES.

The Church had much to suffer, as we have seen, from the Pagan governments of the earth, and from the ignorant hatred of the Pagan peoples, during the first three centuries of her existence. This suffering was terminated, so far as the Roman Empire was concerned, by the conversion of Constantine. There was also another source of trouble which did not terminate with the active influence of Roman Paganism, and which, since God has irrevocably given to man a free will, will not terminate until the end of time. The Pagan persecutors of the early time killed the bodies of our ancestors in the faith, but the persecutors, of whom we are now about to speak, were killers, says Tertullian, of the truth itself. Heresy is one of those scandals which must of necessity cross the path of the children of light. So true is this, that the very first generation of Christians found themselves face to face with this far greater agony than any caused them by the Pagan torturer of the body.

SIMON, called Magus, from his profession of the art of magic, is the first heretic of whom history makes mention. He was a Goth by blood, but was probably born at Samaria. The people of this town had already begun to venerate him, when he professed the Christian faith, and received baptism at the hands of Philip the Deacon. Having tried to purchase the gifts of the Holy Ghost, as we are told in Acts, 8, he became the cause of the Church's introduction of a new term into her vocabulary—the word “Simony,” which, unfortunately, is often met with in her history. The doctrines of Simon so teem with absurdities, that we would be tempted to deny that any person could have accepted them, were it not for the authority of Irenaeus, (1); Epiphanius, (2); Cyril of Jerusalem, (3); and Theodoret, (4). Thus, he was always accompanied by a Tyrian woman named Helen, who had been a common prostitute, and his followers must have been especially interested in her when they were informed that she was the same Helen who had caused the siege of Troy. They seem, however, to have been prepared to swallow anything offered by Simon, for they believed him when he declared that it was he who had some years before appeared to the Jews in the guise of the Son of God; that he had descended at Samaria as the Father; and that the other peoples knew him as the Holy Ghost. He also declared that his Helen was the first conception of his divine mind, and the mother of all men; that the love of the fallen angels for her kept her upon earth, and that to seek her—the wandering sheep—he had come upon earth. He erected his own image to be adored under the name of Jupiter; that of Helen under the name of Minerva. According to Simon, the Mosaic Law came not from God, but from some evil Intelligence, and all who adhered to it would eternally perish. These who trusted in him and his Helen might do what they pleased and yet be saved. Men were to be saved, not by good works, but by his grace. He not only allowed all sorts of obscenity, but taught certain mysteries of impurity, which he designated as the mysteries of perfect knowledge, without which no man could be saved.

With regard to the origin of the world and of man, he taught that it was through his Helen that he first conceived the idea of creating the angels, and that they afterwards created the world and mankind. The idea of the necessity of good works was suggested to man by the angels, that they might keep him in slavery to themselves. Although Simon pretended to despise the angels, yet he taught his disciples to mollify them by certain mysterious rites, lest they should seize and detain the soul when it left the body.

Simon must have been a master in the magic art, or he would not have succeeded so well in deceiving men. Nero

(1) Against Heresies b, 5, c. 20.

(2) Heresies, 21.

(3) Catechism No. 6.

(4) Fables of the Heretics, c. 1.

and some of the first people of Rome succumbed to his illusions, and he was only convicted of imposture, when, having attempted to show his divinity by flying in the air, the prayers of St. Peter caused him to perish miserably (1). Simon Magus was recognized by St. Irenaeus as the head and front of Gnosticism. But the term Gnostic is applied by the olden authors to many different sects. As all heresiarchs necessarily vaunt themselves as possessing more or less of knowledge superior to that of their fellow Christians, and this arrogance is shared by their followers, so the term Gnostic, "knowing one," came to be given to, and readily accepted by, most of the early heresies. The word fastened itself, however, in a peculiar manner, to the disciples of Carpocrates, of whom we shall speak in their proper place. Properly speaking, Simon Magus, as well as his disciple Menander, should be placed among the false Messiahs of the world, rather than among the heretics, for they both declared that they were sent by the invisible powers to operate the salvation of mankind; they both claimed to be the Holy One hitherto unknown to men.

MENANDER was a Samaritan, and a disciple of Simon. He commenced to propagate his errors in the year 74. He taught that he was the saviour of men, come down from heaven. No man could be saved from the tyranny of the angelic creators of the world unless he was initiated in the mysteries of magic and had received his baptism. This baptism would secure the recipient not only from death, but from the miseries of old age.

SATURNINE was an Antiochian, and though his heresy did not flourish until about the year 120, yet it should be treated of in this place, as the author was a disciple of Menander. Accepting Simon's doctrine as to the angelic creators of man, he taught that when the angels had succeeded in producing the body of the first man, they were unable to give it life, but that God sent the vital spark from heaven, which spark, after death, returns to its source. The God of the Jews was one of the angels, and the Saviour was sent on earth to keep this deity in order, and to save those who would believe in himself. Christ was incorporeal, and appeared to men only as a phantasm; all His actions, His suffering, death, &c., were purely phantastic, in no sense real. Nuptials and carnal generation were of Satanic origin. When the angels created men they established two orders, one of the good, and the other of the bad.

(1) ARNOBIUS, Against the Gentiles, b. 2; ST. CYRIL OF JERUSALEM, cat. 6; EUSEBIUS, Hist., b. 2, c. 12; ST. EPIPHANIUS, Heresies 21; ST. AUGUSTINE, Heresies; THEODORET, Fables; ST. MAXIMUS OF TURIN, serm. 5.

BASILIDES, a companion of Saturnine in the school of Menander, was an Alexandrian by birth. He wrote a gospel, and about forty books of commentaries on the Scriptures. He held that there was one Principle, the creator of Mind, in its turn the producer of the Word. From the Word, Prudence had origin; from Prudence came Virtue and Wisdom. These two created the Powers and the Angels, who in turn, created the highest heaven and other angels; these last produced another heaven, and still more angels, and so on continued the productive process until there were 365 heavens, each with its own order of spirits. The lowest order created the earth, and their prince created man. It was this angelic chief whom the Jews knew and worshipped, and who sent his Mind in the form of Christ to free man from the dominion of his angelic tyrants. When Christ was being led to death, He changed bodies with the Cyrenian; then Simon was crucified, and the Saviour stood by unknown.

The human body does not rise from the grave. Our souls have sinned in another life, and are punished here. Voluntary sins are not forgiven, but the only punishment of sin is in the nature of the transmigration to which all souls are subject. In time of persecution it is proper to deny God before the enemy, because only the just are men, the others being as hogs and dogs; we are obliged to confess God only before men. Like his predecessors, Basilides taught his followers the most revolting obscenities. Against his doctrines wrote St. Ignatius, Martyr; Castor Agrippa, and Sts. Clement of Alexandria and Epiphanius.

CERINTHUS is said to have moved the question as to the observances of the Jewish law, which caused the Council of Jerusalem (1). His fundamental errors were the following — There is but one God, but He did not directly create the world; He produced certain distinct Powers, who altogether ignore Him. The Mosaic law is binding upon man, equally with the Gospel. When the man Jesus became an adult, the Christ descended upon Him, and after the crucifixion returned to Heaven. Cerinthus mutilated the gospel of St. Matthew, and rejected much of St. Paul's Epistles, and all of the Acts. He seems to have had a special affection for Judas. His followers used to receive baptism in the name of those who had died without it. After the final resurrection the earthly kingdom of Christ is to come, and for a thousand years men are to live in Jerusalem in the enjoyment of carnal pleasure.

EBION taught that God gave to Satan power over the present world, and to Christ the future. Christ was a mere man, born of Joseph and Mary. Some of his followers, we learn from Tertullian (2), held that Mary conceived of the Holy Ghost, but denied that Christ was the Eternal Word. Ebion inculcated an equal respect for the Mosaic and Christian laws. He admitted as a gospel, only that of St. Matthew; he expunged from the Pentateuch all that permitted the eating of once animated things. Jesus was no more than a successor of Moses, but He was the prophet of truth, while the other prophets were only of intelligence. Ebion excogitated a book of Acts of the Apostles, in which he represented St. Paul as having been of Pagan parents, as having become a Jew for love of the pontiff's daughter, and as revolting from Judaism because he could not receive her in marriage.

NICHOLAS was one of the seven deacons of whom we read in Acts, c. 7, v. 5, but we do not know for certain how his name came to be given to a heresy. Some of the ancient writers hold that he had married a very beautiful woman, but had not the strength to leave her. St. Clement of Alexandria (3) says that, being accused of an excessive attachment for this woman, he offered to cede her to whoever would marry her. St. Clement adds that Nicholas was very chaste, but that wicked men had misinterpreted his maxim that "we shall exercise the flesh," by which he meant to signify that we should rule it. Many authors hold that a Gnostic sect took their name from Nicholas without warrant, simply to feign a respectable parentage. Their principal errors were those of the Cerinthians. They especially venerated a fictitious female called Prunicus, a personification of voluptuousness. This heresy is mentioned by name in the Apocalypse, c. 2.

(1) EPIPHANIUS, Heresies, 28.

(2) The Flesh of Christ, c. 18.

(3) Stromaton, b. 3, c. 4

SAMPSEANS, or Schamseans, is the name given to a sect which arose in the second century, and is supposed to be identical with the Helcesites, founded by a false prophet called Elxai. According to St. Epiphanius, their doctrines were a mixture of Paganism, Judaism, and Christianity. Their name is derived from the Hebrew schemesch, the sun, they being supposed to have worshipped that planet; that they did so, is doubted by some (1). They held that Christ was a creature; that the Holy Ghost was of the feminine sex, and sister to Christ. They despised virginity, and commanded marriage. They rejected the Epistles of St. Paul. In the time of St. Epiphanius, this sect greatly vaunted the sanctity of two of their women, named Martha and Marthanna; they collected the dust from their sandals, and their spittle, that they might form amulets from them (2).

CARPOCRATES, an Alexandrian by birth, held that corporeal creatures were the work of the angels. Jesus was born of Joseph and Mary, and many of these sectaries were equal to Him in virtue and wisdom. Nothing is evil in itself; the distinction of good and evil subsists only in the minds of men. Every species of voluptuousness is permissible. Souls transmigrate from body to body, according to Matth. 5, v. 25 and 26. These heretics placed the picture of Christ along with those of Pythagoras, Plato, &c., and venerated all alike with Pagan rites. In the time of Pope Anicetus, a female Carpocratian named Marcellina made a great many perverts in Rome itself.

The GNOSTICS, of the origin of whose name we have already spoken, held all the errors, with some changes, which we have mentioned in the preceding paragraphs. Each of the 365 heavens of Basilides had its presiding deity, so that, with Virtue and Prudence, the offspring of the Word, son of Mind, and finally, Mind itself, there were, subject to the One Great Principle, 369 minor gods. Christ was not born of Mary, unless in appearance. As to the turpitudes of the Gnostics, we decline to go into particulars, for, as Tertullian says, they were monstrosities rather than crimes. It is better, if we may use the words of St. Epiphanius, to consign the putrid corpse to the grave. This saint had learned the mysteries of the Gnostics from certain of their women, who, while he was a mere boy, had laid snares to his virtue, and were necessity to arise for the divulgence of their nefarious practices, the student would find them accurately, though hesitatingly, narrated in his book On Heresy, num. 26. One of the greatest evils accruing to the Church from Gnosticism was the evil repute into which its immoralities brought the Christian name among the Pagans. St. Justin Martyr, Tertullian, and other apologists, spent a great part of their time in clearing Christianity from the imputation of responsibility for Gnostic wickedness.

(1) BEAUSOBRE, History of the Manicheans, v. 2, b. 9. (2) EPIPHANIUS, Heresies, 50.

CERDO was a Syrian who came to Rome during the Pontificate of Hyginus. According to St. Irenaeus, he again and again apostatized, and again and again did public penance and was absolved. His principal error was that the God of the Prophets was not the Father of our Lord. The God of the Jews was just and severe, while the Father of Jesus was good and benign. Christ was not born of Mary, and was man only in appearance. Of the New Testament, he rejected some of the Epistles of St. Paul, the Acts, the Apocalypse, and all the Gospels excepting a portion of St. Luke's. Cerdo was condemned by St. Apollonius of Corinth in a Synod of oriental bishops.

MARCION came from the neighborhood of the Black Sea. After a terrible picture of that region, worse in his day than in our own, Tertullian (1) says, "But the most barbarous and sorrowful thing about Pontus is that there was born Marcion, more loathsome than a Scythian, more unstable than a Hamaxobian, more cruel than a Massagetan, more brazen than an Amazon, . . . more deceitful than the Danube, more refractory than Caucasus. Why not, when the true Prometheus, God Almighty, is wounded by his blasphemies ? For Marcion is more unsparing than were the beasts of that barbarity. What beaver is such a castrator of the flesh as he who abolishes nuptials ? What ermine is such a devourer as he who eats into the gospels ? Thou, O Euxine, hast produced a beast no more acceptable to philosophers than to Christians. That little dog, Diogenes, carrying a lantern in mid-day, tried to find a man ; Marcion, having put out the light of faith, lost the God he had found." This heresiarch was the son of a pious bishop, and his father was compelled to excommunicate him for the crime of rape. Going to Rome after the death of Pope Hyginus, he in vain applied to the Roman clergy for restoration to communion, and then joined the disciples of Cerdo. He first attracted notice about the year 144, in the Pontificate of Pius I. He tried to solve the question of the origin of evil by admitting a good and evil Principle. According to him, Christ did not assume true flesh. Marcion denied the resurrection of the body, and taught metempsychosis. Cain, Dathan, Esau, the Sodomites, and all the nations who did not know the God of the Jews, were saved by Jesus ; Abel, Enoch, and the Patriarchs, were not then saved, because they acknowledged said God, when they ought rather to have turned to the other God, who cannot be seen with eyes, but they will yet be saved by another Christ. Marcion rejected the Old Testament, because produced by the evil God ; as for the New, he admitted only the gospel of St. Luke, and portions of some of St. Paul's writings. He taught that man could attain salvation, only by abstaining from all pleasure not purely spiritual. Hence, he condemned marriage, and made of continence a rigid obligation, though he had himself grossly failed in its regard (1). Baptism could be given only to the continent, but, to more and more purify one's self, it could be received three times. According to Tertullian, in his Prescriptions, c. 30, Marcion finally repented of his apostacy, and implored to be allowed to enter upon a course of public penance; his request was granted, on condition that he would restore to the Church those whom he had allured from her, but he was soon overtaken by death.

(1) Against Marcion, b. 1, c. 1.

(1) The reason of Marcion's strictness in matter of continence is found in his theory that the human race owes its origin to the evil principle. It became a duty therefore to abstain from the propagation of the human family. This contempt for the carnal part of man caused the Marcionites to rush blindly into martyrdom, but history mentions only three who suffered with the Catholics.

VALENTINE, chief of the heresy known by his name, was born in Egypt, shortly after the death of the last of the Apostles. Being ambitious of the episcopacy, and having been disappointed, he turned his attention to heresy as another avenue of fame. Rome was a wider theatre than Alexandria, but he tried in vain to obtain followers there; expelled from that church, he settled in Cyprus, where he had better success, and soon his disciples began to spread his ideas in a part of Europe, and in Asia and Africa. He admitted a Divinity sojourning from eternity in a pleroma, plenitude, of light; there were also there thirty Æons, immortal intelligences, male and female, born of the union of Bythos, (depth), the first father, with Enncea or Sige (silence), and from their offspring. The first progeny of Bythos and Enncea were Intellect and Truth; these also produced two Æons, &c. The last of the thirty were Christ and the Holy Ghost (1). According to Valentine, there are three species of men; the earthly, animal, and spiritual. Cain was the source from which springs the earthly man, and that race is dissolved in corruption. Abel was the father of the animal men, and if they conduct themselves well, they will rest in a middle region; if not, they will pass into a similar animal state. Seth gave origin to the spiritual man, and he will be married to an angel of the Saviour. Catholics, said Valentine, are animal persons, and for their attainment of salvation, good works are necessary; the Valentinians, on the contrary, are spiritual, and for their salvation knowledge is sufficient. Hence, those among these secta-

(1) Heretics always find apologists, no matter how absurd may be their teachings. If the absurdities are too patent for excuse, then it is claimed that the doctrine must not be taken too literally. So it has been with these theories of Valentine, which, by the way, were taught by many before him, though in a different form. It has been contended that Valentine only used a mystic method of explaining the operations of God; that his notions are, in the main, those of Pythagoras and Plato, who probably derived them from the Chaldeans. For an excellent, though brief, treatise on this subject, see Bergier's Dictionary of Theology, art. Valentinians.

ries who thought themselves perfect, ignored even the divine law, perpetrating any foul deeds to which they were tempted. Valentine explained the mortal birth of the Saviour by saying that Christ took His body from Heaven, not from the womb of Mary; that He passed through Mary, Valentine admitted; as Tertullian expresses the idea, "He issued through the Virgin, not from the Virgin."

TATIAN was a celebrated Syrian philosopher, and after embracing Christianity he became a disciple of St. Justin. After the martyrdom of his master he returned to his own land, and fell into error. Like Marcion, he taught the two Principles, good and evil. The latter, he said, was the author of the Old, the former of the New Testament. He condemned the use of marriage, meat, and wine, as all equally the work of the evil Principle. According to him, Christ had only the appearance of a human body. Tatian composed a gospel called Diatessaron, that is, a union of the original four; in it he excluded all the texts which showed that the human genealogy of Christ was from David. The followers of Tatian were called Encratites, or Continentals. One of these, a certain Severus, not to be confounded with the Eutychian patriarch, Severus, of the sixth century, held that, after the creation of man by God, Satan felt the need of some help on earth, and hence created woman.

MONTANUS was a Phrygian eunuch, and commenced to teach his heresy during the reign of Antoninus Pius (138-161). He was greatly aided by two abandoned women named Priscilla and Maximilla, who went about in the most free and easy manner, giving utterance to prophecies which time proved empty. Montanus and his women were especially noted for greed of money, which, says Apollonius, who wrote against them, of itself proved the falsity of their prophetic claims, since the Scriptures forbid the prophets to receive money. The errors of Montanus may be summed up as follows. In His revelations to man, God has proportioned his lessons to the capacity of man at the time. Thus, those given to the Jews were fuller than those given to the patriarchs, while those given by Christ were still more extensive and satisfactory. Montanus was the Paraclete promised by Jesus as the teacher of all things. A hundred years after Montanus, Manes, and in the seventh century, Mohammed, preached a similar doctrine; all three forgetting that the Paraclete had been promised to the Apostles, and that it was therefore absurd to expect another, for whom there was no necessity. The first Montanists made no alterations in the Creed, but they claimed a system of morality more perfect than that of the Apostles. That it was certainly more austere, is seen from the fact that they denied to the priesthood the power of absolving from the greater crimes; that they kept three Lents, during which they ate nothing containing juice; that they regarded second nuptials as adulteries; that they said that we cannot fly from persecution, or purchase the leniency of the tyrant. Anything approaching taste and care in the toilet of females they regarded as diabolic; the arts and sciences, the study of philosophy and literature, were unworthy of Christians (1). Condemned by the synod of Hierapolis, they made their headquarters at Pepuzium in Phrygia, whence their other names of Pepuzians, Phrygians, and Cataphrygians. They established a hierarchy, into which they admitted women, saying that in Christ there is neither masculine nor feminine, Gal. 3. Their doctrines soon spread over Phrygia, Galatia, and Lydia, made some impression at Constantinople, but failed in Rome. Penetrating into Africa, they seduced, by their severe morality, the harsh and austere Tertullian. While in this heresy, Tertullian composed most of his moral treatises, and his books on Fasting, Chastity, Monogamy, and Flight from Persecution. Whether Tertullian finally returned to the bosom of the Church, is doubtful. The remaining heresies of the second century are of slight importance; therefore, we shall pass to the principal ones of the third century. Some of these are of such importance, that we shall treat of each in a special chapter; they are Novatianism, the error of the Re-baptizers, and the heresy of Paul of Samosata.

(1) Sts. Augustine, Cyril of Jerusalem, and Epiphanius, attribute certain terrible rites to the Montanists, especially to the Pepuzian faction. Thus they are said to have had a rite in which an infant was punctured by needles in the entire body, and the blood, being mixed with flour, was used for the Eucharist. If the child died, he was a martyr; if he recovered, he would be a holy priest. Tertullian denies this; St. Jerome says he would rather not believe it.

SABELLIUS was born at Ptolemais, in Libya. He commenced to spread his errors about the year 260. According to him, the Father is the only Person in God, the Son and the Holy Ghost being attributes, emanations, or operations, not subsisting Persons. The Father may be likened unto the sun; the Son unto its light, and the Holy Ghost unto its heat. The Word emanated from the Father like a divine ray, and, united with Jesus, operated the redemption of man; then, the Word ascended to the Father, as the ray to its source. The divine warmth of the Father was communicated to the Apostles under the name of the Holy Ghost. Christ, therefore, was not God, nor the Son of God, in the true sense of the terms; if Sabellius admitted an Incarnation, it was of the Father, and hence the fathers who wrote against him placed him in the ranks of the Patripassians, founded by Praxeas, in the second century. This heresy made some progress in Asia Minor, and even at Rome. In the fourth century it was revived by Photin, and in more modern times by the Socinians.

MANES, whose name has been perpetuated in the Manichæan system, was not its founder; for, according to Plutarch, its doctrines were held among many nations of antiquity. Manes, born in Persia in the year 240, was bought as a slave, when quite young, by an aged widow, who, a short time before, had become the heir of a rich magician named Terbinthus, who had met the fate of Simon Magus. Terbinthus himself had been the disciple and heir of a certain Eastern prestidigitator and sorcerer, called Scythian, who also fell from the roof of a temple in Jerusalem while engaged in incantations. The wealthy widow gave a fine education to her favorite slave, and having manumitted him, adopted him as her heir. Among the treasures originally accumulated by the unlucky magician were four of his books, which, on the death of the old lady, fell, with the rest, into the hands of Manes. The contents of these books, mixed with adulterated Christian doctrine, formed the system which Manes now presented to the world. He was obliged to flee from Persia soon after receiving his inheritance, having escaped from the prison into which he had been thrown on account of the death of the prince royal under his spells. Arriving at Mesopotamia, he announced himself as the Apostle of Jesus Christ (1), and commenced to preach his doctrines. In the year 277, he held a dispute with Archelaus, Bishop of Cascar, who proved, to the satisfaction of all, that Manes was an impostor. The Acts of this conference are yet extant (2), and are the source of whatever information Socrates gives as to this heresiarch. Manes now returned to Persia, but falling into the hands of the king, he expiated the death of the prince royal by being flayed alive. His disciples carried his doctrines throughout the East, and finally they entered Europe. At the end of the fourth century they were well known in Africa and in Spain. Down to the time of the Emperor Anastasius they were under the ban of the empire, but, in the year 491, under the influence of his Manichaean mother, that sovereign gave them some rest. Justin and his successors returned to the old rigor. Manicheism, though divided into numerous sects, was quite powerful in the East until the end of the ninth century, when, having joined the Saracen invaders, its professors were defeated in several campaigns, and finally dispersed. Some penetrated into Bulgaria, others into Lombardy, and in the beginning of the eleventh century we find them strong in France, especially in Provence and Languedoc. In the diocese of Albi they were particularly numerous, whence their name of Albigenses. During the last years of their existence, the Manicheans had abandoned the fundamental hypothesis of two Principles; they spoke of the evil Principle as we do of Satan. But they clung to their errors as to the Incarnation and the Sacraments, to their hatred of the Catholic hierarchy, and to that refined libertinage which often accompanies false spirituality.

With regard to the errors of Manicheism, it must be observed that its leaders did not follow Manes in everything; each one arranged his doctrines so as to best suit the time and circumstances. Theodoret counted seventy sects of Manicheans, who were united in the avowal of belief in two Principles, but who differed as to their nature and operations, as well as to the speculative and moral consequences to be drawn therefrom. But the following points were of general acceptance among them. Starting with the idea of a good and an evil Principle, they declared that flesh being material, and matter being the work of the evil Principle, the flesh of Christ was not real, but simulated (1). They condemned generation, and impeded it; the priests instructing the married, according to the ideas of the time, how to effect the nefarious design (2). Our bodies, they said, will not arise from the grave, for the simple reason that they come from the evil one (3). They rejected the Old Testament, asserting that the God of Moses was one of the princes of darkness; as for the New, some admitted this portion, some not (4). Each man has two souls, one of which is a part of God, and the other from the evil one; every good deed is to be attributed to the good soul, every evil one to the bad (5). In man there is no free will; if there were, God would be to blame for sin (6). Baptism is not necessary for salvation, and hence they baptized none of their number (7). Souls transmigrate; the souls of Manicheans are assumed by the more perfect of the sect in their food, and being thus purified, return to the good Principle (8). Some of the customs, of the Manicheans were strange, and some detestable. Some again were simply horrible, and like those of the Gnostics, are better left unnoticed (9).

(1) Some authors have held that Manes was a Christian priest; St. Cyril of Jerusalem asserts that he never embraced the faith.

(2) Collection of Ancient Monuments of the Greek and Latin Churches, Rome, 1696.

Before closing this chapter upon the heretics of the first three centuries, we would say something upon the doctrines of Origen, if it were certain that this great writer was guilty of heresy. This great man, says Tillemont, "was banished from his country, deposed from the priesthood, excommunicated by his own bishop and by others, at the same time that great saints were defending his cause, and when God seemed to have declared for him, by bringing into the Church,

1) AUGUSTINE, Heresies, 46; EPIPHANIUS, Heresies, 66.

(2) Idem, Customs of the Manicheans, c. 18.

(3) Idem, Against Faust, c. 2.

(4) Idem, ibidem, c. 3.

(5) Idem, On the Two Souls, c. 1.

(6) Idem, On Free Will, passim.

(7) AUGUSTINE, Heresies, passim.

(8) Ibidem.

(9) AUGUSTINE, Customs of the Manicheans, c. 18, 19, 20.

through him, many men whom she regards as her brightest ornaments. After his death, his lot is what it was while he lived. Saints are opposed to each other in his regard. Martyrs have written his apology, and martyrs have written his condemnation. Some have looked upon him as the greatest master the Church has possessed since the Apostles; others have detested him as the parent of all the heresies born since his time." It is not within the scope of our work to enter upon a question which the reader can better settle, at least to his own satisfaction, by comparing the arguments of the many learned men who have discussed the matter. That Origen was not an obstinate heretic, to say the least, would appear from the following passage cited by St. Jerome, and taken from a letter written after his excommunication at Alexandria. Complaining that his writings have been mutilated and corrupted, and that many have been ascribed to him which he never wrote, he says, "I am content to leave my enemies and my calumniators to the judgments of God; I think that I am obliged to pity them more than to hate them, and I would rather pray God to have mercy on them than wish them any evil, for we are born to pronounce blessings and not malediction." (1)

(1) "The olden enemies of this father," says Bergier, "carried their obstinacy to the point of accusing him of approving of illicit magic, and of finding no crime in it. Beausobre, in his History of Manichæism, v. 2, b. 9, c. 13, refutes this accusation Some authors have asserted that Origen succumbed during the persecution of Decius, and that he threw incense into a sacrificial fire, in order to escape an infamous treatment with which he was threatened. But it is not credible that so courageous a man as Origen would have thus contradicted the lessons given by himself to so many martyrs; and that the many enemies who attacked him, after his death, would not have mentioned so odious a charge. So true is it that a great reputation is frequently a very great misfortune." Daniel Huet, bishop of Avranches, was the first to publish the exegetic works of Origen (1668-1679), in 2 v., fol., with a learned monograph entitled Origeniana. The learned Benedictine of St. Maur, La Rue, published, in 1733, the complete works; and the reader will find all that we have from the pen of Origen, together with a Latin translation, in Migne's Patrology.

CHAPTER III.

FIRST PERSECUTIONS OF THE CHURCH.

Authors differ as to the number of the persecutions which the Church underwent before the time of Constantine. St. Augustine, in his beautiful work on the City of God, book 18, c. 52, gives us many opinions, and declares his own inability to solve the question. Paulus Orosius thought there were ten, but only because he regarded the ten plagues of Egypt as prophetic of the Pagan onslaughts on the early faithful. Sulpicius Severus numbered nine; Lactantius five, but he only enumerates those the instigators of which met a violent death; Prudentius devotes all his energy to a description of the sufferings of the Christians under Nero and Decius. But, be the number ten or less, it is certain that there were many severe persecutions, and that the number of martyrs was large. Reflections upon the fearful sufferings of their ancestors in the faith have ever been the source of triumph, rather than of melancholy, to the more modern Christians, and their polemicists have drawn from these persecutions one of their most stringent arguments wherewith to prove the divinity of the Christian religion. It is not strange, therefore, that writers of the Gibbon stamp should endeavor to belittle the extent of these dire visitations of brute force, and to palliate in every way the cruelties by which they were accompanied. Among the many men of note who have bent themselves to this melancholy and ungracious task, sad pre-eminence is claimed by Voltaire; but in the contest of bad faith and sophistry, distinction should also be awarded to Basnage, John Leclerc, Gibbon, and Henry Dodwell. The last named, an Irish author of the seventeenth century, has presented his arguments more fully than any of his brethren, and hence against him have principally been directed the efforts of most Catholic writers who have treated of this subject. Of these, the most satisfactory are Rinaldi, on the Persecutions of the First and Second Centuries; Ruinart, in his Preface to the Acts of the Martyrs; F. Luchini, in a preface to his Italian translation of the work of Ruinart; and Palma, in his Historical Lectures.

Although it is our main purpose to treat of those persecutions which were visited upon the early Christians by the Pagans, yet we cannot omit, at the commencement, a mention of the uprising against the disciples of the Lord, excited by the Scribes and Pharisees in the year following His death (1). It was then that suffered St. Stephen, the first martyr, and, according to some writers, two thousand others. Nor should we forget the outburst of Herod Agrippa at Jerusalem, in the eleventh year after the crucifixion of Christ, when St. Peter was put in chains, and, in all probability (2), St. James the Greater put to death. Some also regard as a persecution of Christians that edict of Claudius by which all "Jews" were expelled from Rome, because, as Suetonius says, "at the instigation of Chrest, they were guilty of tumults." Many authors exclude this action of Claudius from the list of persecutions, on account of the use of the term "Jews," and because of the name Chrest being assigned to the Jewish leader. But we know that in those days the Pagan writers often spoke of the Christians as Jews. As for the name Chrest, it was in familiar use among the Romans, as appears from many inscriptions, and from Cicero, book 2d of Epistles, Epist. 8, ad Fam. Very easily indeed might the Pagans have confounded the name of Christ with that of Chrest, with which they were more familiar. Palma is of opinion that this ejection of the "Jews" should not be classed among the Christian persecutions, because the alleged cause of the edict was the tumultuousness of the victims, not their religion. But very

(1) Petau, Usher, and Tillemont assign this persecution to the year of our Lord's death: Baronio places it in the year 35.

(2) It has always been a Spanish tradition that St. James preached in Spain, but there is no solid foundation for it.

frequently the Pagan authorities, in assigning a reason for their assaults upon the Christians, made no mention of religion; nay, they not seldom put forth purely political motives as an excuse. And if, as seems probable, by the Chrest of Suetonius was meant the Lord of the Christians, the religious motive is plainly indicated.

To the emperor Nero (37-68) is to be assigned the first open persecution of Christianity by Rome. The precise year of his first outburst is a subject of dispute among critics. Baronio regards the year 66 as the date, Eusebius the year 70, and others go back as far as the year 58. The probable date is that assigned by Pagi, namely, the month of August of the year 64, in the consulate of Licinius Bassus and Marcus Lic. Crassus. As for the cause of the persecution, authors differ. Hegesippus and Nicephorus Calixtus ascribe it to the destruction of the impious Simon Magus, brought about by the prayers of St. Peter. Others find the cause in the rage of Nero, on account of St. Paul's having restored to life one Patroclus, whom the emperor had put to death. Another reason is traced by some to the corrupt habits of the heretics of that day, which had brought the Christian name into terrible disrepute (1). Some again assign the reason of the outbreak to the ancient law of the Roman Senate prohibiting the adoration of any deity not approved of by that body. While each and every one of these causes may have either influenced the emperor, or persuaded the people to acquiesce in the decree, the real motive of the persecution seems to be given by the Pagan historian, Tacitus (2). In the year 64, the city of Rome was visited by a terrible conflagration, which, according to this author (3), lasted for six days. It was bruited around that no less a personage than the young emperor was the incendiary, and so firm a hold did the idea take on the minds of the people, that Nero was forced to seek some means of diverting the imminent fury of the Romans from himself. The necessary scapegoat was found in the rapidly growing sect of the Christians. This body of religionists were in bad odor among the Romans. They were popularly supposed to be guilty of secret and atrocious crimes; to be animated by a most ferocious hatred towards the rest of mankind. Against them, therefore, was the indignation of the mob directed. In a few days Rome was illuminated by an unwonted light. Torches were made of the quivering bodies of thousands of innocents of both sexes and of every age, while daily use was made of every torture which imagination could invent for the amusement of a cruel people. Dodwell (1) asserts that this persecution was confined to the city of Rome, but there is abundant proof that it extended throughout the empire. Tacitus assigns as a reason for it that the Christians were accused "not so much of the crime of incendiarism, as of a hatred of the human race," which charge would certainly apply equally well to all of them. Again, we learn from an epistle of the younger Pliny to Trajan (2) that while he was pro-praetor of Bithynia, many Christians having been sentenced to death, he asked the emperor Trajan what course he should pursue in their regard, and that he was answered that only those Christians should be prosecuted whom some one should accuse by name. Now, the laws in accordance with which Pliny and Trajan thus acted were not laws made by Trajan, for Tertullian and other ancient writers, while they admit that many Christians suffered death during his reign, deny that he was a persecutor. Nor could they have been the laws promulgated by Domitian, for, according to Tertullian, they were repealed by that emperor himself; according to Eusebius, they were abrogated by the Senate or by Nerva. And they could not have been laws of the old republic; for while we know from Cicero (3) that no new gods were to be received without the approbation of the Senate, yet capital punishment was not the penalty for a violation of the decree. It follows then that the laws under which Pliny condemned the Bithynian Christians were laws of Nero, which had not been cancelled by his successors. Therefore the persecution decreed by that emperor was not restricted to the capital.

(1) Justin Martyr and Eusebius. (2) Annals, book 15, c. 44. (3) According to an ancient monumental slab, preserved in St. Peter's at Rome, the fire lasted nine days.

(1) Cyprianic Dissertations, no. XI. (2) Book 10, epist. 97. (3) On Laws, book 2, c. 2.

Next in order to that of Nero comes the persecution of Domitian, who mounted the throne in the year 81. Baronio assigns its commencement to the year 90; Pagi prefers the year 93; Rinaldi agrees with St. Jerome in placing it in the year 94. Some writers have interpreted the first epistle of St. Clement to the Corinthians as indicating that the cause of the eruption is to be found in the dissensions which existed in the Christian ranks. But it is more likely that its origin must be ascribed to the virulent hatred of the populace towards the new religion. It was during the first year of this persecution, according to Tertullian, that the Apostle St. John was plunged into a caldron of boiling oil, and, emerging intact, was exiled to Patmos. After St. John, the most distinguished victim of this persecution was Flavius Clement (1), who was of consular rank, and, although a cousin of the emperor, was executed for impiety towards the gods. The universality and cruelty of this persecution is impugned by Dodwell and his imitators, but the testimony of ancient and reliable authors proves that it was general and terrific. Dio Cassius says, "In the same year Domitian put to death, among many others, Flavius Clement, although he was his own cousin, and had for wife Flavia Domitilla, a relative of his; both were charged with impiety towards the gods, and many others. . . . were condemned for this crime, some being executed, and some despoiled of their goods. Domitilla was merely exiled to Padetaria, but he ordered Glabrio, who had been a magistrate under Trajan, to be killed." Brutius, a Pagan author of the second century, is authority to Eusebius for asserting that under Domitian many Christians were put to death. It is true that we have but comparatively few authentic records of martyrdoms in this and previous reigns, but that want does not necessarily bring comfort to those who would palliate the cruelty of the persecutors. At this time there was a dearth of writers among the Christians, not because they were at all lacking in men or culture, but because, as Papebroch observes, in the midst of consternation people are not likely to make formal records of events. The ecclesiastical notaries, one of whose duties it was to put on record the important events of their churches, were certainly not established before the time of Domitian, and probably afterwards. And we know that in the Calendars, Festa, Diptychs, and other monuments of the time, it was not the custom to insert any but the names of those martyrs who were venerated in the particular church owning the document. Sometimes only those were recorded whose "natal days" were celebrated in pomp and by public sacrifice. Had the persecution of Domitian been comparatively light, as Dodwell contends, the Christians would scarcely have styled him "another Nero;" Lactantius would not have called him "no less a tyrant;" Tertullian would not have applied to him the phrase, "heir to a portion of Nero's cruelty."

(1) Baronio seems to doubt as to his martyrdom, on account of the silence of the ancient Martyrologies. In the year 1725, the body of this martyr was found in the ancient basilica of St. Clement at Rome. Traces of blood were found in the leaden case, as well as the glass bottle usually and only placed with the body of a martyr. On the case were inscribed the words, "Here is happily buried the martyr, Flavius Clement."

After the death of Domitian, in the year 96, the Christians experienced a little rest, although isolated cases of martyrdom were of not unfrequent occurrence (1). Nerva rescinded the cruel decrees of his predecessor, allowed the exiles to return, and ordered that hereafter no one should prosecute the "Jewish sect" for impiety. But with the reign of Trajan (y. 98) terror again visited the Christian communities. This persecution is styled the third by Sulpicius Severus, St. Augustine, and Orosius. As to the precise date of its beginning critics are again at fault. Baronio assigns it to the first year of the new reign; Pagi places it in the year 111; Usher, with more plausibility, names the year 106 (2). Tertullian and Eusebius show that Trajan issued no new decrees against the Christians, and he is generally regarded as one of those "good princes" under whom, as the ancient author of "Deaths of the Persecutors" says, "the Church suffered no assault from the enemy." But even if Trajan merely executed the old decrees of Nero, he no less merits the name of persecutor. During his reign happened the martyrdom of St. Ignatius, bishop of Antioch, in the year

(1) If we accept as true the narrative of Polycrates, which is defended by the Bollandists and by Tillemont, St. Timothy suffered at this time. However, some hold that he was killed during a popular tumult.

(2) Notes to Martyrdom of St. Ignatius.

107. In the very beginning of this reign, according to Pearson, was crucified the bishop of Jerusalem, Simeon, the son of Cleophas. Under Trajan also suffered the Supreme Pontiffs, St. Clement (Romanus), Evarist, and Alexander; the martyrs, Nereus, Achilleus, Sulpitius, Severianus, and Cesareus. That this persecution was widespread and virulent appears from the following words of the author of the Acts of St. Ignatius of Antioch, the authenticity and value of which work are readily admitted by such Protestant critics as Usher and Pearson. "In the ninth year of his reign, waxing arrogant on account of his victories over the Scythians and Dacians and many other peoples, and deeming only wanting to his universal domination the religious body of Christians, Trajan compelled all the pious livers to either sacrifice or die, threatening them with persecution unless they would join in the worship of the demons along with the rest of the people." The same fact is shown by St. Polycarp, who, in his epistle to the Philippians, besought them to imitate the patience of Ignatius, Zosimus, and Rufus (martyrs). And Tertullian, speaking to the proconsul Scapula, narrates the cruelties of Arrius Antoninus, Trajan's lieutenant in proconsular Asia. But no other authority need be adduced than that which we have already read in the younger Pliny, and for which Tertullian bitterly upbraids the emperor as cruelly inconsistent: "He orders them to be left undisturbed, as innocent; he commands them to be punished as guilty. He spares, and he is cruel; he dissimulates, and takes cognizance. Why dost thou subject thyself to censure? If thou condemnest, why dost thou not investigate? If thou dost not inquire, why not acquit?" Although he promulgated no new laws against the Christians, he left the persecution to the discretion of the prefects, and it is not likely that Pliny was the most cruel or corrupt of those satraps.

The persecution under Adrian was called by Eusebius an appendix of that of Trajan; Sulpicius Severus styles it the fourth of the list. According to Tertullian and Melito of Sardis, this emperor issued no edicts against the Christians; but as the present question is one of fact, and not of name, we cannot admit with Dodwell that under his rule there were no persecutions. St. Jerome tells us Adrian was a devotee of Paganism ; Spartianus lauds him as most careful in fulfilling his duties as Pontiff ; Tertullian calls him an untiring seeker into curious things, and says that he followed all sorts of magical arts. With such dispositions, one would at least suspect him of being unlikely to leave the path of his predecessors. Baronio assigns as a reason for this fourth persecution the tumultuousness of the Jews. Some writers find its occasion in the abominable habits of the Carpocratian heretics, which caused the people to rage against all Christians. At any rate, the persecution took place, as we shall show. Tillemont adduces the Acts of St. Eustachius, who perished during the reign of Adrian, but more severe critics reject the documents. But there is no doubt of the authenticity of the Acts of St. Symphorosa and her Seven Sons, put to death by Adrian at his beautiful villa at Tivoli, after he had already destroyed her husband and his brother. From these Acts we learn that, about the same time, a very large number of martyrs were destroyed. Dodwell asserts that, with the exception of Pope St. Telesphorus, no martyr fell under Adrian. But we have an inscription from the catacombs of St. Callixtus published by Arringhi, in his Subterranean Rome, which proves the contrary. It reads as follows: "In the time of the emperor Adrian, at length rested in peace the youth Marius, an officer of the army, who lived long enough, since he yielded with his blood his life for Christ. His well wishers placed this with tears and fear." The word "fear" would certainly indicate some anticipation of future trouble to the survivors. The testimony of St. Justin Martyr may be adduced as proving the existence of persecution, probably under Adrian, and if not, certainly since the time of Domitian, for he was born in the year 105, and speaks of what he saw. "While I was yet a follower of the Platonic philosophy, and heard the Christians pursued by calumny, and saw them stand intrepid before death and all formidable things, I thought to myself that such persons could not be given to vice and voluptuousness." Dodwell and his imitators tell us that Adrian gave rescripts of exemption in favor of Christians. This is true; but if persecution had not been going on, where would have been any occasion for the exemption? The facts are these. Adrian was passing the winter, probably of the year 126, at Jerusalem, and, initiating himself into the Eleusinian mysteries, his Pagan zeal was redoubled, and the Christians felt its effects. At this juncture, a petition was presented to him by Quadratus, a disciple of the Lord, (1) and Aristedes, an Athenian philosopher, begging for indulgence to the Christians. On account of these supplications, and because of a letter of Serenus Granius (or Grani-anus), an Asiatic proconsul, urging that it was ill-seeming to condemn Christians merely on account of popular clamor, a decree was issued to Minucius Fundanus, successor to Granius, stopping the persecution. This rescript of Adrian was sent, according to Eusebius, not only to Fundanus, but to many other prefects, and was afterwards quoted by Melito of Sardis, in his Apology to Marcus Aurelius.

Antoninus Pius reigned from the year 138 to the year 161. He was singularly clement, and of very affable manners. Nevertheless, that his Christian subjects had no reason to revere his memory, we must judge from the following inscription (2) found in the Callixtan catacombs, and dedicated to the memory of a martyr named Alexander, who was killed under Antonine. "Oh! unhappy times, when, in the midst of sacred things, and occupied with our prayers, we cannot be safe even in the bowels of the earth; what more miserable than life, and what more miserable than death, when we cannot be buried by our friends?" And Justin Martyr, in his Apology, No. 1, expressly charges Antonine with a persecution of the Christians.

Marcus Aurelius succeeded his father-in-law Antoninus Pius in the year 161, and reigned until the year 180. He was quite a philosopher, having donned the mantle of the Stoics when but eleven years of age. A good warrior when necessary, he was yet a lover of peace, and his general course was more beneficial to his subjects than that of most Roman emperors. Some authors have scented the odor of a Christian spirit in his Meditations, but that he persecuted the Christians, is beyond the possibility of a doubt. After the martyrdom of St. Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna, and disciple of St. John, the widowed church sent to all the other churches of Asia an epistle describing the sufferings of the holy bishop and of his twelve companions. He had been burnt at the stake in the year 169, and the fathers allude to many other martyrdoms which happened about the same time. Eusebius, in his Book 4, c. 26, gives many passages from an apology which Melito of Sardis presented to Aurelius, interceding for the Christians, and we find him insisting that no more cruel punishment could be visited upon them if they were enemies of the state. St. Irenaeus is supposed to be the author of an epistle which, during this reign, the churches of Lyons and Vienne sent to those of Asia and Phrygia, and in it we find a graphic description of the persecutions in Gaul. And if the sufferings of the Christians at this time were not great and widespread, why so much anxiety and eloquence as are displayed in the Apologies of Apollinaris, Athenagoras, and Miltiades, all written at this period?

(1) Halloix thinks that this Quadratus is the "Angel of Philadelphia" to whom the Lord speaks in the Apocalypse.

(2) ARRIGHI, Subterranean Rome, book 3, c. 22.

From the death of Marcus Aurelius, in the year 180, until the year 197, the Church of God enjoyed a spell of tranquillity. Outbursts of popular hatred certainly occurred now and then, but no new law was enacted against the Christians, and the old laws fell into desuetude. But in the year 197, Septimius Severus was induced to shake the dust from the old edicts, and five years afterwards he promulgated a new one of the severest nature. The following passages of Eusebius would sufficiently indicate the quality of this persecution. In Book 6, c. 1, he says "when Severus had excited a persecution against the Church, throughout all the churches of the world were perfected illustrious martyrdoms on the part of athletes contesting for piety." And in c. 2, "Therefore in the tenth year of the reign of Severus, when there burst forth a most devastating fire of persecution, and innumerable martyrs were crowned." Finally, in c. 7, "He thought that then was imminent the coming of Antichrist, so vehemently were the souls of many affected by this persecution against our people." The words of Dion Cassius are clear, "He visited with death a great number of men who were of equal nobility and honor with himself." Equally plain is the saying of Clement of Alexandria, in the 2d Book of his Stromaton, "For us are daily redundant the fountains of martyrdom; with our eyes we see those who are roasted, who are broken apart, who are beheaded." And in Book 4, he says that they are so treated merely "because they are Christians." These testimonies are enough to show that the persecution of Severus was bloody indeed; as to its length, there is no doubt that Dodwell errs when he states that it was a temporary storm. In his address to Scapula, who had been sent as proconsul into Africa towards the end of the persecution, Tertullian describes the course of procedure of no less than six successive proconsuls, which certainly proves that the attack was not a passing one.

The next open persecution was that of the emperor Maximin; but before we enter upon any account of it, we must say a few words in regard to the reign of Alexander Severus (222-235). This sovereign always manifested a kind of benevolence towards the Christians; his household was filled with them; his mother was "a good woman," and associated familiarly with the new religionists. Upon these slight foundations, some critics have built a theory that Alexander was a Christian. As for Julia Mamaea, the mother of the emperor, we have the testimony of St. Jerome and Eusebius that she was given to devotion, and they tell us that she once invited Origen to the palace, and that she listened to his doctrinal explanations. But they do not say that she was convinced of the truth of Christianity; on the contrary, Eusebius insinuates that the Egyptian doctor left immediately for home; so we may suppose that the fair Julia found his maxims too uncompromisingly severe for her delicate constitution. Nor does the testimony of Lampridius, in his Life of Alexander, go to show that Julia embraced Christianity, for while he certainly styles her a holy woman, he speaks in a manner which plainly proves that he uses the term "holy" in anything but a Christian sense. He says she was "a holy woman, but miserly—fond of gold and silver." Such was not a characteristic of Christian sanctity, especially in the primitive ages. As to Alexander himself, we learn from Lampridius that he "conceded privileges to the Jews, and allowed the Christians to exist," which was very much from a Roman emperor, but was not equivalent to becoming a Christian. If this passage is conclusive for any theory of conversion, it proves that Alexander became a Jew rather than a Christian. And if the emperor really revered our religion, why was he content with simply permitting its votaries "to exist"? Why did he not abrogate the cruel laws against them which were exposing them to the uncertain disposition of each individual prefect? Nor must we forget that one of Alexander's most trusted administrators was Domitius Ulpianus, a man who used his power to the utmost to gratify his hatred towards the Christians, and who, we learn from Lactantius (1), "compiled a collection of the nefarious rescripts of the emperors in regard to the duties of a proconsul, that he might show what punishments ought to be inflicted upon the adorers of God." Had Alexander been a Christian, he would have removed from this and similar men the temptation and power to persecute. Of no value whatever is the argument drawn from the fact, narrated by Lampridius, that the emperor preserved in the oratory, where he made his matutinal devotions, an image of Christ. This image he cherished, but among those of Apollonius, Abraham, Orpheus, "and such like Gods." Nor were all the images in Alexander's oratory those of revered personages, for we know from the same Lampridius that he kept therein the image of Alexander the Great, whose drunkenness and cruelty he condemned. The other arguments adduced by those who have alleged the Christianity of Alexander Severus are of no moment whatever.

After the assassination of Alexander Severus in Gaul, in the year 235, the troops proclaimed as emperor the burly Maximin. The son of a Goth, his only staff in the struggle of life the possession of herculean strength, he was the right material for the forces of hell at a time when they relied upon brute force more than upon the depraved reason of man. His first move against Christianity appears to have been instigated by a spirit of intense personal hatred against the family of his easy-going predecessor. The household was filled with Christians, and its heads were favorably disposed towards the new religion; that was sufficient to unleash the hounds of prey. His first step was to pounce upon the ministers of religion: the shepherds removed, the flock would soon succumb. Before long the persecution spread throughout the length and breadth of the empire, and was felt the more terribly, says Firmilian of Cappadocia, because several years of comparative peace had unaccustomed the victims to such danger. For three years Maximin reigned, and wielded his bloody scourge, and during that time the Martyrology received many of its noblest additions.

(1) Inst. Div., book 5, c. XI.

The poet Prudentius (1) immediately connects the Decian with the Neronian persecution, saying nothing of the intervening ones we have noticed. But this by no means favors the theory of Dodwell as to the lightness of these afflictions. He was a poet, and in accordance with poetic license, chose what he deemed the fitter subject for his verse, even though he sinned against the canons of chronological criticism. The persecutors whom he omitted did not furnish the material to his taste, for Prudentius seems to gloat in a picture of bloody horror. The emperors intervening between Decius and Domitian preserved the forms of law in their trials, and did not adopt those terrific and exquisite tortures, to a description of which he owes his reputation. Hence he slighted them, and jumped at once to the more congenial task of drawing the horrors of Decius. As for Domitian, he very likely excused him from special reproach, because he had finally stopped the persecution. It is a remarkable fact that many ancient writers (Tertullian, for instance) seem to have regarded as comparatively "good" those emperors who restricted their lieutenants in persecution to due process of law, and who tolerated only the prescribed punishments; while they almost confine their invectives to those who allowed full vent to individual hate, cupidity, and superstition. With this remark as to the silence of Prudentius, we take up the persecution of Decius, who mounted the imperial throne in the year 249, and reigned for two years. He affected, or perhaps really felt, great zeal for a reformation of Roman habits and for a restoration of the primitive "virtues" of the ancient republic. To bring about this end, he fancied a persecution of the new and foreign religion would tend. The text of his edict has perished, but we know from Dionysius of Alexandria (in Eusebius, b. 6, c. 41) that it was "horrible and terrific enough to frighten the elect." In his life of the holy Thaumaturge, St. Gregory of Nyssa is very explicit on this subject. We learn that "the emperor ordered the prefects and magistrates to force the Christians by terror and by every kind of torture, to the worship of the gods." He threatened his subordinates with severe punishment for any remissness in their task, and hence they neglected every duty of their positions to devote their time to the extirpation of Christianity. Forms of torture hitherto unknown were adopted, and the terrible engines were kept ever exposed to view, as an earnest of the power and will of the authorities. It was during this persecution that certain magistrates, moved by greed or by pity, devised the system of certificates of sacrifice (libelli), by means of which any unfortunate recusant could escape from both death and open denial of his faith. We shall have occasion to treat of these backsliders in an apposite dissertation. Suffice it now to remark that by this cunning device the persecution of Decius became noted as the first, if not the only one, in which any large number of the baptized failed to confess God before men.

(1) Against Symmachus, book II.

The emperor Valerian ascended the throne in the year 255, and associated with himself as Cæsar his son Gallienus. For two years he showed himself kind to the Christians, but he finally allowed himself to be persuaded into persecution by his favorite, Macrianus the Praetorian. His first efforts were restricted to the exiling of the clergy and the prohibition of Christian assemblies, but he soon let loose the full force of persecution throughout the empire. In the Acts of St. Cyprian, we find the proconsul Paternus thus addressing the holy prelate: "The most sacred emperors Valerianus and Gallienus have deigned to write to me, ordering that those who do not follow the Roman religion, should at least acknowledge the Roman ceremonies." St. Cyprian refusing, he is condemned to exile, and Paternus continues, "They have also commanded that assemblies be held in no places, and that no one enter the cemeteries; if any one violates this salutary precept, he shall be beheaded." Dionysius of Alexandria (in Eusebius, b. 7, c. XI.) narrates the experience of himself and companions. The prefect Æmilian said to them, "You will be sent into the Libyan region, to the place called Cephro; you will not be allowed to hold meetings, or to enter the places you call cemeteries." In St. Cyprian's 77th epistle, to the confessors in the mines, we are informed how a great part of his flock had already flown to heaven; how numbers of others lay in loathsome dungeons, lacerated by scourgings; how many more were dragging out a painful existence in the mines, and all simply because they were Christians. "And a large part of the people," he tells the confessors, "following your example, have also confessed the faith, and have been crowned; they are united with you by the ties of a strong charity, nor are they separated from their prelates by prisons or by mines. Nor are virgins absent from this number. And even among the boys, there is a virtue greater than their age, which exceeds their years in the glory of their confession." After a life of incredible labor and fortitude, St. Cyprian consummated his victory by a bloody death during this persecution, in the year 258. At this time also suffered Pope St. Sixtus II. and St. Lawrence the deacon. Finally, towards the end of the year 260, while warring with the Persian monarch Sapor, Valerian was taken prisoner. Gallienus paid no heed to his father's plight, but at once seized the throne, and one of his first acts was to order a cessation of the persecution.

In the next ebullition of Pagan hate against the growing Church, though it is generally styled the persecution of Diocletian, there figure two emperors and three Cæsars. After the assassination of Numerian in the year 284, the army, which was marching home from Persia, proclaimed Diocletian emperor. Two years afterwards, this prince chose as colleague his old companion in arms, Maximian Hercules; while in the year 292, he appointed as Cæsars Constantius Chlorus and Galerius Maximian. Deciding then to divide the empire, he made the following partition. He reserved to himself the provinces located beyond the Ægean; to Galerius Maximian, he assigned Thrace and Illyria; to Maximian Hercules, he gave Italy, Africa, and their islands; to Constantius Chlorus he presented Gaul, and this prince soon added Britain and Spain. Of very different characters were these princes whom Diocletian thus raised to power. Galerius, according to the author of the "Deaths of the Persecutors," was "more wicked than any evil man who ever lived," but he seems to have been possessed of military talent. Maximian Hercules was ferocious and depraved, but was a brave combatant, and nothing better. Constantius Chlorus was praised by both Christians and Pagans as an "amiable and venerable man;" although not a Christian, he adored one only God. The prime cause of Diocletian's persecution was Galerius; critics dispute as to the precise date of its beginning, but the best arguments assign it to the year 303. It did not end until long after the abdication of Diocletian, which happened in the year 305. After this event, the western Christians enjoyed some tranquillity, but Galerius continued the bloody work in the east until the year 311, when, feeling himself at the point of death, he issued an edict for its cessation. Peace was not everywhere restored until the year 313, in the third consulate of Constantine and Licinius.

As in the case of the previous persecutions, so in this one of Diocletian, the belittlers of Christianity endeavor to show that it was of small account, and that very little damage was effected. To this, more than palliation of the imperial butchers, let the first answer be given by Eusebius. In book 1, c. 13, of his Life of Constantine, he says of Diocletian and his companion princes, "They polluted, as with civil war, their subject provinces with the slaughter of women as well as of men." Lactantius thought differently from Dodwell, Voltaire, and Gibbon, upon this matter, for he thus descants upon the imperial cruelty. "If it ever pleased victors to be so furious towards the conquered, they did no more than to kill them, or to lead them into slavery. But this is unspeakable, that they should so treat those who can do no harm Then, they torture them with the most exquisite kinds of punishments; they bend over them with all the powers of their slaughter-house, as though they thirst for blood, . . . and what Caucasus, what India, ever raised such bloody and ruthless beasts? That person is a beast, by whose single wish everywhere flows the purple gore; everywhere cruel tears, everywhere panic, and the multiplied image of death. No one can rightly describe the ferocity of this animal, which, though it crouches in one spot, nevertheless grinds its iron teeth through the universe, and not only consumes the entrails of men, but crunches their very bones, and even rages against their ashes, lest they should have a place of burial." Lactantius (260-325) was an eye-witness of what he describes, and he certainly does not mince matters as Gibbon would do. The ancient author of the Deaths of the Persecutors has the following, "Diocletian, who always wished to pass for intelligent and astute, inflamed with anger, immediately began to cut his familiars to pieces. He sat in judgment, and burned the innocents with fire . . .; the emperor became infuriated, not only against his familiars, but at every one, and, first of all, he compelled his daughter Valeria and his wife Prisca to sacrificial pollution . . . Persons of every age and sex were thrust into the flames, not merely one at a time, for so great was the multitude that they were collected into a heap, and fire built around them . . .; no less violently did the persecutions fall upon other people." If such was the course of Diocletian, who preferred to avoid slaughter, we can imagine what must have been the conduct of the ferocious Maximian Hercules in his dominions. The last quoted author tells us that he "willingly obeyed" when Diocletian wrote to him to follow his example in his treatment of the Christians. That Galerius did not show himself far behind in anti-Christian zeal, goes without saying, for he was the prime mover of the persecution. Shortly after the partition of the empire, Galerius had induced Diocletian to give the rank of Cæsar to Maximin Daza, his nephew, who afterwards donned the purple. In regard to this prince's mode of procedure, Eusebius, in Book 8, c. 14, says that he gave the Christians "fire and sword, piercings with nails, wild beasts, deep pools, burnings, cutting off of limbs, perforations, boring of eyes, mutilations of the whole body; add to these, starvation, the mines, chains." As to Severus, another nephew of Galerius, and also appointed Cæsar, he afterwards obtained Italy and Africa, and there thoroughly carried out the ideas of his uncle. When Maxentius, the son of Maximian Hercules, gained a footing in these countries, he so conducted himself as to be styled, by Lucifer Calaritanus, "another Nero." But we have said enough to show that in this persecution of Diocletian, as in all the previous ones, there was sufficient misery to warrant a Christian in believing that only the hand of God could have sustained our ancestors in the faith in their fearful trial. (1)

(1) The apologists of Paganism declare that the Romans were justified in regarding the Christian Church as a dangerous association, since the new religionists were almost entirely separated from the rest of society, and were submissive only to their pastors, the only judges whom they acknowledged. This objection was answered by Tertullian, when he declared to the magistrates that the Christians were separated from the rest of society, only in the exercises of religion; in everything else, they conducted themselves as did other citizens. Our adversaries also accuse the Christians of having insulted the magistrates in their tribunals, and of thus provoking their cruelty. If there were such cases of misguided zeal, the Church did not approve of such conduct. In the Council of Elvira, held about the year 300, it was decreed that he should not be enrolled among the martyrs who ~~was~~ put to death, merely for breaking the idols.

CHAPTER IV.

THE RAPID PROPAGATION OF CHRISTIANITY A PROOF OF ITS DIVINITY.

In the preceding chapter we have seen what terrible struggles the early Church was compelled to undergo. But these were not the only obstacles to her rapid development; humanly speaking, the severity of her doctrine, and the love of pleasure which was fostered by Paganism, should have contributed more to retard her advancement than was contributed by mere brute force. Christian writers have always adduced her quick and marvellous acquirement of the hearts of men as a proof of her divine origin, while men of the school of Gibbon and Voltaire have endeavored to show that there is nothing in her development which cannot be accounted for by purely human reasons. The object of this chapter is to show that the history of the early propagation of our religion is such as to demand, from a candid reader, an acknowledgment of a divine guidance, as the only possible reason for that propagation. We shall merely condense the arguments of the learned Valsecchi (1).

When Augustus wielded the sceptre of the Roman empire, the whole world, with the exception of Palestine, was gentile; when Nero mounted the throne, an immense multitude of Christians, according to Tacitus (2), was to be found, even within the walls of the capital. Under Domitian, the new faith penetrated into the Imperial palace, and claimed its converts among those raised in the purple. Flavius Clement, and his wife Domitilla, were among those put to death by this emperor on account of Christianity. While Trajan ruled, the younger Pliny (3) found the new religion

(1) Sources of Religion and of Impiety, b. 2, c. 14.

(2) Annals, b. 15, c. 44.

(3) Book 10, epist. 97 to Trajan.

"in the cities, in the villages, throughout the country places; professed by persons of both sexes, of every order and every age, even to the point of death; so that the temples are desolate, and the sacrifices for a long time stopped." St. Ignatius suffered under Trajan, and he wrote to the Philadelphians that the "Church founded in the Blood of Christ was spread from one end of the earth to the other." In the days of the Antonines, St. Justin, Martyr, asserted (1) that "there is not one nation of men, be it Greek or barbarian, or called by any name you will, whether it lives in the swamps and wants a roof, or lives in tents and feeds the flocks, from the midst of which do not ascend prayers and thanks to the Father and Creator of the universe, in the name of Jesus Crucified." St. Irenæus (d. 202) shows us the hierarchy of the Church in full working order throughout the empire. Speaking of Rome (2), he says that "To this Church, because of its preëminent principality, all churches must have recourse, that is, the faithful wherever they are, because in it is ever preserved the Apostolic tradition." Tertullian (d. 230) says, (3), "Only yesterday were we born, and we have filled all your places, the cities, the islands, the fortresses, municipalities, the councils, the camps, the palace, the senate, the forum; we leave you only the temples." In the book which the learned African wrote to the prefect Scapula, he draws a terrible picture of the wholesale desolation which would ensue if the Christians of Carthage were only decimated. And disputing with the Jews, he asks (4), "And in whom besides Christ, who has already come, have all the gentiles believed? there are the Getuli, the Moors, the Spaniards, the Gauls, the Britons—not yet subdued by the Romans, but conquered by Christ—Sarmatians, the Dacians, the Germans, the Scythians, and many other races and countries and islands unknown to us, and which cannot be enumerated, in all of which places reigns the name of Christ." Tertullian was certainly a Christian, but not for that reason is his testimony as to the spread of his religion to be questioned. He would not have dared, especially in a polemical work, to risk an assertion which, if false, could easily be refuted. And we possess documents of certain authenticity, which go to prove that long before the cessation of persecution, the faith was propagated throughout the empire. The immense number of martyrs who yielded up their lives for Christ, and whose Acts, for the greater part authentic, have reached us, furnish an indisputable argument for our position. The Irish critic, Dodwell, in vain tries to reduce the number of martyrs to a trivialty; let the student consult Ruinart, in his Preface to the Acts of the Martyrs, and he will find that our writers have by no means exaggerated in their accounts. The following passage of Prudentius, who wrote in the fourth century, is pertinent to the question, (1). "We have seen in Rome the ashes of innumerable saints. Do you ask me to give the names and titles of each, as they are cut on their tombs? It would be difficult to grant your request, for the number of the just destroyed by impious fury was as great as the number of gods worshipped by Trojan Rome. Many sepulchres speak in minute accents of the name, some others bear an epigram upon the martyr. But there are many silent marbles, containing taciturn cohorts of victims, which record only the number within; how many bodies there are, you are told, but the names you do not find. From under one only slab, I remember were taken the remains of sixty heroes, whose names are known to Christ alone, as of those now united to Him in friendship." If such was the state of affairs in the capital, what must it have been throughout the empire?

(1) Dialogue with Trypho, n. 117.(2) Book 3, c. 3.(3) Apology, 37.(4) Against the Jews, c. 7.

And what result was obtained by the three hundred years of persecution? Simply the verification of Tertullian's saying (2) that the "blood of martyrs is the seed of the Church." When the advent of Constantine gave peace to the fold, and the fathers met in general Council for the first time since the Council of Jerusalem, it was found that they numbered 318, and most of them were from the East; and this, in spite of the slaughters of Diocletian and Maximian, only twelve years previous. In Rome, the cross was now publicly revered ; it shone upon the flags of the army, and upon the crown of the sovereign. And to what was due the wonderful vitality and progress of the Church which then astonished the world ? We shall prove that such progress was impossible to human means, that to God alone it must be attributed. Firstly, what was the character of the age during which this progress was attained ?

(1) On the Crown, Hymn XI.

(2) Apology, last chap.

From the time of Augustus, when Christianity first appeared, Rome was the mistress of the world. Her victories in the East had brought to her immense wealth and this wealth entailed a luxury, a refinement of vice, which made Juvenal sigh for the days of Roman poverty (1). It is difficult for us to believe all that incontestable evidence reveals of the corruption of all classes under the Pagan Cæsars. An avaricious and cruel aristocracy, a brutal and gluttonous people ; men without honor, and women who had not even the knowledge of what modesty should be. If scarcely one of the many Roman empresses was an ordinarily decent woman, it would be hard to draw an exaggerated picture of general society. The philosophy which Rome received from Greece helped on the infection. Whether Stoic, and puffed up with arrogance, or Epicurean, and given to voluptuousness, the average Roman was a thorough philosophaster. Rome was filled with the dilettanti of letters ; her schools, rostrums, and palaces, resounded with the grandiloquent precepts of teachers who only added to the general corruption. Adrian philosophized to-day, to-morrow he will weep for Antinous like a school-girl. In matter of religion, the Rome of the Cæsars was superstitious, but religion was respected. Everything was acceptable to the religion of the empire ; Christ would have been enrolled among the divinities had the Christians consented. Religion was a vast machine. At its head was the sovereign as Supreme Pontiff ; the temples and their furniture were magnificent in the extreme. Foolish and impious as it was, the Roman religious system powerfully influenced all classes ; both public and private life were permeated by it, either from policy or superstition. Such was the Rome

(1) 6th Satire, v. 292.

of Augustus and his successors ; cultivated to excess, in matter of art and science, but immersed in luxury and parade ; dominated by a religion which attracted men because it favored every depraved appetite, and checked no raging passion. Now, looking at the matter from a human point of view, was it likely that success would crown the effort of a system like Christianity to obtain the mastery in such a society ? When Sts. Peter and Paul entered the Eternal City they declared implacable war upon all the deities under whose care the little hamlet of Romulus had become the mistress of the nations. Capitoline Jove, before whom the conquerors of the earth bent the knee after a triumph, was spoken of by these despised Jews as a nobody. All the other deities were also nobodies, or perhaps demons. The temples were sublime follies ; the priests, vile impostors ; the Supreme Pontiff, at best a stage manager. From Cæsar on his throne, down to the veriest slave, how would the Romans naturally receive such teachings, and from such men ? And if the proud Quirites consented to put out their sacred fires, what kind of a worship did these Jews propose to substitute for that of majestic Jupiter and lovely Venus ? A few years before there had lived in pitiful Judea a man called Jesus, a man of no wealth or of what the Roman would call "standing ;" this obscure Jew had styled himself the Son of God, and, at the request of his countrymen, had been crucified by the Roman governor, and between two thieves. What a god to propose to the philosophy of Rome ! And what was the system of morality inculcated by these foreign adventurers ? A people who made a virtue of love of glory were to embrace instead the practice of humility. They were to cherish purity, to whom lechery was as the breath of their nostrils, and whose gods were its prime promoters. Forgiveness of injury was to be the ordinary thing among those who regarded revenge as oftentimes a sacred duty. And so on through the whole catalogue of precepts. As Valsecchi well says, "It was as little to be expected that such a law would be received in Rome during the time of the Cæsars, as it was natural to see the carnal and bloody religion of the impostor Mohammed accepted by the Saracens of Asia. . . . This latter system was in unison with the brutal propensities of those peoples, and therefore it was received; the former was entirely opposed to the disposition of the Romans, therefore, humanly speaking, it was not to be established." And what consequences accrued to the profession of Christianity in those days? In the first place, the convert was proclaimed by all as impious, as an enemy of Cæsar and of society, as the vilest of the vile. Listen to Tacitus: "He (Nero) punished, in a most curious manner, those hated malefactors whom the vulgar call Christians repressed for a while, the pestiferous superstition broke out again even in the city, where everything atrocious and shameful flows, and is cultivated. First were taken the professing Christians, then a great number of those who were named, not as guilty of firing the city, but as enemies of the human race" (1). Suetonius (2) says, "Torments were visited upon the Christians, a set of men belonging to a new and pernicious superstition." Juvenal thinks he is very just when he styles the Christians cerdones, "vile mechanics." Cecilius (3) deemed them "uncivilized, and without culture, the vilest scum of the earth." Lucian regarded them as "idiots." A long string of like compliments may be found in the erudite work of Mamachi on Christian Antiquities, vol. 1, c. 2 and 3, but these will suffice to show what the refined gentleman and delicate lady convert had to anticipate in those days from their former associates. Tertullian tells us (4) that in consequence of Pagan calumnies, "Every public calamity and every popular trouble was attributed to the Christians. If the Tiber rises above its banks, if the Nile does not overflow, if the skies are not clear, if the earth quakes, if famine or pestilence come, up goes the cry, 'The Christians to the Lions.'" Now, does the reader think it likely, humanly speaking, that people of every condition, age, and sex, in so brilliant and refined an age, would have rushed to join a sect so vilified and persecuted, and that too for the sake of a doctrine contrary to their secret and dearest inclinations? And remember, a few may be guilty of gross extravagance, and of transcendent fanaticism, but here it is a question of millions of all classes, nobles and commoners, rough soldiers and delicate women, the philosophers and the ignorant octogenarians and tender children.

(1) Annals, B. 15, c. 41.(2) Nero, 16.(3) MINUTIUS FELIX, Octav., c. 24.(4) Apology, c. 30.

Had the first apostles of Christianity been helped by military force, or by the allurements of an easy and self-petting religion, or even by an extraordinary eloquence of their own, they might possibly have been expected, humanly speaking, to succeed. But God wished to take from them even these human aids. Origen makes a remark very apposite to this point (1). "It seems to me that if Jesus had chosen for the work of teaching, those who, in the opinion of the vulgar, were wise, and fit by knowledge and speech to captivate the good graces of the multitude, He would not have escaped the suspicion of instituting a new school, like the philosophers, for his own reputation." The twelve apostles chosen by Christ were men possessed of not even the first rudiments of education; this fact was so well known to the Pagans that Origen says that Celsus conceded it without hesitation (2). They were Jews, and therefore hated; fishermen, and therefore poor; foreign plebeians, and therefore lacking in Latin and Greek culture. Yet they go into the most cultivated, as well as into the most barbarous places of the earth, and without art or metaphor preach a new and difficult doctrine, which is accepted by millions. They teach what the world's philosophy must regard as folly, but their folly conquers philosophy. The first argument of their every discourse is the cross,—the scandal of the Hebrews and the foolishness of the Gentiles. They fail, indeed, but their doctrine triumphs.

The rapid propagation of Christianity is an historical fact which no one denies. The resistance of the Pagan world was the greatest possible, on account of the natural opposition between its genius and that of the new system; it was exercised too in the most ferociously determined manner, as we know from the consequences entailed by conversion to Christianity. Now, the force opposed by the Church to this Pagan resistance was, humanly speaking, the smallest possible, for her doctrines were not alluring to human nature, and her apostles were absolutely deficient in all human aids to success. Therefore, to conclude with Valsecchi, whose argument we have appropriated, since it is an axiom that the effect must be zero where the force is at the minimum, and the resistance at the maximum, we must admit that according to all human ideas the Christian religion should have been, from the outset, a failure. But it was nevertheless successfully propagated, therefore it was the work of God. We may well use the words of Richard of St. Victor: "If, O Lord, my faith were an error—which is an impossibility—Thou art the deceiver, for Thou hast permitted that Christianity should be marked by signs which plainly show the imprint of Thy omnipotent hand." (1)

(1) Against Celsus, b. 1.

(2) Ibid.

(1) St. Augustine, in his City of God, b. 22, c. 5, makes these apposite remarks: "Here we notice three incredible things. It is incredible that Christ rose from the dead; that the world should have believed in His resurrection; that a small number of men, and men, too, from the dregs of the people, should have persuaded, even wise persons, of the fact. Of these three incredible things, our adversaries refuse to believe the first. They see the second with their own eyes, and they can only account for it by admitting the third. The resurrection of Christ is published and believed in the entire world. If it is incredible, why does the universe credit it? Had a large number of learned and distinguished men testified to this miracle, asserting that they had beheld it, it would not have been wonderful, had the world believed in it; but when we know that the world has credited it, on the testimony of a few obscure and ignorant persons, how is it that there are yet found men so obstinate as to discredit that which has been received by an entire world? If people will not believe that the Apostles performed miracles in testimony of the resurrection of Christ, they ask us to believe in a greater miracle, namely, that the whole world did believe without a miracle."

Cantù says that while we cannot accept as absolutely true the remark of Justin Martyr (Dial. Trypho, n. 117) as to the universal spread of Christianity in his day, yet: "It is certain that Christianity spread with a rapidity, which, considering the obstacles that it encountered, proves its divinity. Besides Judea, Italy, Greece, and Egypt, the provinces between the Euphrates and the Ionian were cultivated by Paul; the Apocalypse speaks of the seven Asiatic churches of Ephesus, Smyrna, Pergamus, Thyatira, Sardis, Laodicea, and Philadelphia: in Syria, the churches of Damascus, Berea (Aleppo), and Antioch, were illustrious; Cyprus, Crete, Thrace, and Macedonia received the Apostles who spread the truth in the ancient republics of Corinth, Sparta, and Athens. From Edessa, where many embraced it, Christianity was propagated in the Greek and Syriac cities which obeyed the successors of Artaxerxes, in spite of the solid hierarchy, and the exclusiveness of the Persian system. The Great Armenia received it very early from the neighboring Syria, although the kingdom was not entirely converted until the fourth century. The Synagogue, the emperors, the proconsuls, persecute them? If weak, they fly; if not, they suffer, but they do not yield. . . . It is true that the Romans were used to daily executions, to gladiatorial combats, to Stoical suicides; but the victims of all these either were forced to die, or they threw down life as an insupportable burden—at least they died with indifference, being satiated with life. Among the Christians, on the contrary, death was met by women, children, and old men, not with the haughty dignity of the schools, but with simplicity, and without ostentation."—Univ. Hist., b. 6, c. 26.

CHAPTER V.

ECCLESIASTICAL WRITERS OF THE FIRST CENTURY.

Some of the writings which have come down to us as of the first century (1) are clearly of a later date; others again have been proved to be forgeries; some, however, are undoubtedly authentic. We shall briefly treat of those which are the most frequently quoted or consulted, either by Catholic authors or their opponents, as fountains of history. First in order of importance, if it were authentic, comes the letter said to have been written by our Lord to Abgar, king of Edessa, in Mesopotamia. Eusebius (2) tells us that this prince addressed an epistle to Christ, begging him to come to him and cure him of a malady; that the Saviour replied, promising to send one of his disciples; that, after the Ascension, St. Thomas sent St. Thaddeus, who performed the cure and converted the people of Edessa. The historian gives the whole letter of Christ, and says that he found it in the ancient annals of Edessa. St. Ephrem, who was a deacon of Edessa, also speaks of the epistle. Count Darius, writing to St. Augustine; Evagrius (3), St. John Damascene (4), and the 7th General Council (5), are cited by the friends of the epistle, as mentioning it and regarding it as authentic.

Tillemont, the Anglican Cave, and a few other critics, accept it. But, as Bergier well remarks (6), the authenticity of this letter need not give much concern to a theologian,

(1) Besides the books of the New Testament, we have the following: A letter of Christ to Abgar, king of Edessa, and one of that prince to our Lord; Liturgies ascribed to Sts. Peter, James, Matthew, and Mark; Acts of Sts. Paul and Thecla; The Apocryphal Gospels according to the Egyptians, Hebrews, Sts. Peter, James, Thomas, and Matthias; Acts of Sts. Peter and Paul, Andrew, John, Philip, and Thomas; Revelations of Sts. Paul and Thomas; Apocalypse of St. Peter; Epistle of St. Paul to Seneca; and of Seneca to St. Paul; Epistle of St. Paul to the Laodiceans; Writings of Prochorus (one of the seven deacons), Linus, and Abdias; Epistle of St. Barnabas; Book of the Pastor; Passion of St. Andrew by the Clergy of Achaia; Epistles of St. Martial; Epistles of Pope St. Clement, and of other Pontiffs; Book of Recognitions, ascribed to St. Clement; Epistle of St. Polycarp; Encyclical Epistle of the Church of Smyrna; Writings of St. Dionysius the Areopagite; Epistles of St. Ignatius, Martyr; Canons of the Apostles; Apostolic Constitutions; Canons of the Apostolic Council of Antioch.

(2) Book 1, c. 13.

(3) Book 4, c. 26.

(4) Orthodox Faith, b. 4, c. 17.

(5) Action 5.

(6) Art. Abgar

“for upon it depends no fact, no dogma, no point of morality.” Pope Gelasius, in a Synod of 70 Bishops, held at Rome in 494, pronounced the correspondence apocryphal, and certainly if the letter of Christ is authentic, it is difficult to understand why it has not been included in the Canon of Scripture. Alexandre uses this argument, and adds, among others, the following. None of the Gospels were written during the sojourn of Christ upon earth, and yet, in His alleged letter to Abgar, He is represented as quoting the Gospel. Again, Abgar writes to our Lord that His fame has reached Edessa; now, the letter bears date of the 430th year of the Edessenes, which was the 15th of Tiberius, the year in which St. John commenced his mission, and at that period fame had not yet become occupied with the name of Jesus. Finally, if the early fathers had regarded this correspondence as authentic, they would not have omitted, as they did, to adduce it against the Arians; for in it the divinity of Christ is explicitly asserted. As for the testimony of Sts. Ephrem and John Damascene, of Evagrius, and of the 7th Council, we can only say that these fathers were mistaken in their judgment. St. Jerome, in his Catalogue of Ecclesiastical Writers, makes no allusion whatever to the Abgar correspondence. And it is to be noted that Count Darius, writing to St. Augustine, speaks of these letters as of dubious authenticity; that St. John Damascene does not allude to any letter of Christ to Abgar, but to a portrait of our Lord sent to the prince (1); that the same is to be observed as to the testimony of the 7th Council.

The Canons of the Apostles purport to be disciplinary regulations of the primitive Church, and are 85 in number. Torriani, in a book written against the Centuriators of Magdeburg, ascribes them all to the Apostles. Bellarmine, Baronio, and Possevin, hold that the first 50 are authentic. Bini accepts all but the 65th and 84th. Daillé (2), and many other Protestant authors, contend that all these Canons are supposititious, and that they were not known before the fourth, and perhaps the fifth, century. Protestant writers would naturally be hostile to them, for they are manifestly opposed to many Protestant doctrines. In them we discover that the early Church believed in preëminence of bishops; we read of "altars" and of "sacrifice"; we observe that regulations were made for the administration of the Eucharist, for Penance, &c

(1) “History tells us that when Abgar, king of Edessa, sent a painter to take a portrait of our Lord, the artist could not fulfil the task on account of the effulgence of His face; that our Lord Himself then pressed his garment to His divine and life-giving countenance, thereby affixing His likeness upon it, which He sent to Abgar.”

(2) Apostolic Pseudopigraphs, b. 3.

The Anglican Beveridge (1), holds, however, that these Canons were established by bishops and synods in the 2nd and 3rd centuries. Alexandre (2) contends that the eastern churches accepted them in the beginning of the sixth century; that the western churches received the first 50 at the same period; that the entire collection is supposititious; that, nevertheless, they are very ancient, and were in great part drawn up in 258, by the Synod of Iconium, over which Firmilian presided. Those who hold that the Apostles and the Apostolic fathers had no part in the framing of these Canons, rely upon the following arguments. Pope Gelasius I. declared them apocryphal. Cardinal Hubert, legate of Pope Leo IX. to Constantinople, rejected them when Nicetas cited them in support of his opposition to the Saturday fast. "We disdain," says Hubert, "to listen to these fabulous traditions." Had the early Church regarded these Canons as authentic, contends Alexandre, they would have been inserted in the Canon of Scripture. The Ecclesiastical authors of the first four centuries are silent as to these documents, even in circumstances in which their existence would have been very beneficial to the cause of truth. Words occur in these Canons which are utterly foreign to the style of the Apostles, e. g., Cleric, Lector, Chanter, Priest (Sacerdos), Laic, First among Bishops (for a Metropolitan), the Hyperberetean Month (for October) (3). In Canons 46, 47, and 67, we find a denial of the validity of Baptism conferred by heretics. Canon 7 prohibits the celebration of a Pasch "with the Jews," and yet the conduct of the bishops of Asia Minor in the Paschal Controversy implies utter ignorance of this ordinance. And why did not Pope Victor cite this canon, when these prelates defended their course as upheld by Apostolic tradition? Canon 65 deposes any cleric, and excommunicates any layman, who fasts on Saturday; yet it is certain that in the very city of Rome, at least in the fourth century, Saturday was a fast-day (1), and that St. Augustine doubted whether or not it was so observed by the Apostles. In Canon 84, the Books of Scripture are mentioned, and among them, we find three Books of Macchabees, two Epistles of Clement, and eight Books of Constitutions; there are wanting in the list, Wisdom, Tobias, Judith, Ecclesiastes, Esdras, and the Apocalypse. In Canons 21, 22, and 23, no one is allowed admission to the ranks of the clergy who has been guilty of self-mutilation; a cleric who is thus guilty, after admission, is deposed; a layman is excluded from communion for three years. It is very unlikely that this crime was committed in the time of the Apostles; we certainly know of no instance. And in after years, when the indiscreet zeal of a few impelled them to it, and the ecclesiastical authorities forbade it, we find no citation of an Apostolic canon in defence of the prohibition (2). To these arguments against the authenticity of the Apostolic Canons, Torriani, Bellarmine, and Baronio, respond in some instances, with considerable plausibility (3). It is very improbable, says Bergier (4), that Sts. Peter, John, James, and Mark made no regulations for the government of their respective dioceses of Rome, Ephesus, Jerusalem, and Alexandria. And in these cities, synods were held during the second and third centuries; the attending prelates would naturally follow the Apostolic regulations, and having embodied them, they soon styled them Apostolic Canons. They are apocryphal, inasmuch as they were drawn up, neither by the Apostles, nor by St. Clement, whose name they bear. But they are

(1) Canons of the Early Church. (2) History; Cent. I., Diss. 18, prop. 1, 2, and 3.

(3) This was the Syro-Macedonic word for October.

(1) ST. AUGUSTINE; Epist. 36 to Casulanus. CASSIAN; Monasteries, b. 3, c. 10. SOCRATES; b. 5, c. 2.

(2) The instance of Origen, thanks to Demetrius, was made notorious, but he was not deposed. Theortistus, Alexander, "and the bishops of the whole world," who, according to Eusebius, knew of Origen's fault, would certainly have obeyed an Apostolic canon.

(3) See ALEXANDER, loc. cit.

(4) Art. Canons.

authoritative, inasmuch as they present us the discipline, which, in the second and third centuries, was believed to have been established by the Apostles.

The Apostolic Constitutions are a collection of regulations bearing the name of Pope St. Clement. Nearly all critics agree that they are supposititious, that they were unknown before the fourth or fifth century. Bellarmine says (1) that "In them there are many useful things, and by the olden Greeks they were highly esteemed. But in the Latin Church they are almost of no account, and even the later Greeks, in the Trullan synod, can. 2, rejected them as corrupted by heretics I understand that the Ethiopians use these Constitutions as though they were really Apostolic, and that, for that very reason, they err in their observance of Saturday and Sunday, in regard to the minister of the Sacrament of Baptism, and in certain other doctrines In these same Constitutions there are not a few things contrary to truth." The erudite Christian Lupus (2) reminds us that "the Catalogue of St. Jerome makes no mention of them, and St. Gelasius, in his Roman synod, rejects them as apocryphal; the whole Latin Church has always held the same opinion. In our own times, Cardinals Baronio, Bellarmine, Perron; Gabriel d'Aubespine (Albaspinaeus), the learned bishop of Orleans, believe the same. Charles Bovius, therefore, and Francis Torriani might have used their time to better advantage than in an attempt to vindicate them. Thomas Stapleton wrongly declares them to be full of the Apostolic spirit, and worthy of a place in the Scriptural Canon The book was issued by some unknown Arian of the 4th century, and it errs in dogma and in liturgy." However, in spite of the Arianism, anachronisms, and other faults of these Constitutions, they are valuable as sources of information on many disciplinary and liturgical points. Such is the judgment of Grabe, Beveridge, and other Protestant authors. Mosheim holds, in one place, that they are the works of the 3d century; in another, he assigns their origin to the second

(1) Ecclesiastical Writers, art. Clement.

(2) Notes to the 2nd Canon of the Trullan Synod.

Whiston (1) employs much erudition in trying to prove them the work of St. Clement, at the dictation of the Apostles. Alexandre (2) contends that they are apocryphal, and at variance with the teachings of the Church. Bergier believes that the first books were compiled some centuries before the 8th. Roncaglia thinks that at the time of St. Epiphanius, who praises the Constitutions, they were incorrupted, but that, soon afterwards, they were vitiated (3).

The Epistles of St. Clement (4) come next in order of importance. Some of these are unanimously rejected by all critics, both Catholic and Protestant, but the two Epistles to the Corinthians are undoubtedly authentic. The first has come down to us entire, while we have only a fragment of the second. With regard to the first, St. Dionysius of Corinth, only seventy years after it was written, tells the Romans that, from time immemorial, it was customary to read it in his church (5), Sts. Irenaeus (6), Clement of Alexandria (7), Cyril of Jerusalem (8), Epiphanius (9), and Jerome (10), cite it and praise it. Origen (11) also speaks of it. Eusebius (12) says that it is approved by the judgment of all. The learned Presbyterian, Nathaniel Lardner (13), thinks it was written about the year 96, immediately after the persecution of Domitian. Alexandre assigns the same date, noting that the author, in chapters 1, 5, and 6, alludes to a persecution other than that of Nero, which must have been that of Domitian. It has been asserted that Eusebius in his Book 3, c. 36, St. Jerome, and Photius, absolutely rejected the 2nd Epistle; that the first betrays an ignorance unworthy of St. Clement. Eusebius does not reject the 2nd Epistle; he simply says that it is "less known" than the first.

(1) This author, now best known by his translation of Josephus, was the successor of Newton at Cambridge. Becoming an Arian in 1710, he was deprived of his chair, and finally joined the Baptists.

(2) Cent. I., Diss. XIX.

(3) There are several instances of inconsistency in the Constitutions, which would indicate the presence of a tampering hand. Thus, they sometimes permit the observance of the Pasch with the Jews, and sometimes prohibit it.

(4) The Epistles of the other Pontiffs, down to Siricius, will receive attention in the chapter devoted to the False Decretals of Isidore Mercator.

(5) EUSEBIUS; b. 4, c. 14.

(6) Heresies, 5, 3, c. 3.

(7) Stromaton, b. i, 4, 6.

(8) Catechism, 18.

(9) Heresy, 27, n. 6.

(10) Ecclesiastical Writers, art. Clement.

(11) Princip., b. 2, c. 3.

(12) B. 3, c. 12.

(13) Credibility of the Gospel History, v. 3.

Photius, in his Codex, 113, and St. Jerome, in his Catalogue, both seem to discredit its authenticity, but they do not there give their own opinion, but that which Eusebius appears to favor. When, indeed, they speak for themselves, as Photius does in Codex, 126, and St. Jerome, against Jovin., b. 1, c. 7, they both acknowledge the 2nd Epistle as genuine. The charge of ignorance is hinted by Photius, in his Codex, 126, saying, "Some may blame him because he admits the existence of other worlds beyond the ocean; because he adduces the story of the phoenix as a certain fact; because he gives to Jesus Christ merely the title of high-priest and ruler, not using the more eminent titles which belong to His divinity." As for the admission of "other worlds," this is only another argument against those who assert that the Fathers deny the existence of the antipodes. Origen (1) interprets St. Clement as meaning regions beyond the ocean, and agrees with him. St. Hilary does the same (2). As to the fable of the phoenix, its mention by the author of the Epistles is no proof that he regarded it as a fact, or used it in any other sense than as an illustration of our resurrection, as did Origen, Tertullian, St. Cyril of Jerusalem, Lactantius, St. Gregory of Nazianzen, and many other Fathers. The insinuation that the writer did not believe in the divinity of Christ is shown to be unfounded by the commencement of the second letter, where our Saviour is called God, the Judge of the living and the dead.

The book of Recognitions, ascribed to St. Clement, is cited by Origen (3) and by several early writers; nevertheless, it must be classed among the apocryphal. St. Epiphanius (4) is of opinion that St. Clement wrote these Recognitions and other works ascribed to him, but that they were corrupted by the Ebionites. Rufinus, in his book on the corruption of the works of Origen, forms the same judgment. Eusebius, and Sts. Jerome and Athanasius also reject them. Two entire pages of the Recognitions, observes Alexandre, are taken, word for word, from the book on Fate, written by Bardesanes the Syrian, who flourished under Marcus Anto-

(1) Princip., b. 2, c. 3.
(2) Psalms II., n. 23.

(3) Tract 35, on Matthew.
(4) Heresics, 30.

ninus (161–180), certainly sixty years after the death of St. Clement.

The Epistle of St. Polycarp to the Philippians is a valuable document. Its author was a disciple of St. John the Evangelist, was made bishop of Smyrna, and was martyred about the year 169. The doctrine of the Real Presence and that of Holy Orders are plainly presented, and hence Protestants would gladly show it to be spurious. But even Le Clerc (1) entertains no doubt as to its authenticity. Daillé, in his anxiety to discredit the authority of the letters of St. Ignatius, which Polycarp sustains, alleges some flimsy arguments against it, which are refuted by Pearson, in his Vindication of Ignatius, chap. 5. Mosheim (2) thinks it is not easy to decide whether or not the Epistle is authentic. The following words of St. Irenaeus (3) speak well for its genuineness. "And Polycarp, not only instructed by the Apostles, and associated with many of those who saw our Lord, but also made bishop of Smyrna in Asia, by the Apostles, whom we ourselves saw, in our early age. There exists a most perfect Epistle of Polycarp, written to the Philippians, from which those who wish, and who have regard for their salvation, may learn the quality of his faith and the preaching of truth." Eusebius (4) and St. Jerome (5) also praise this letter. Some have impugned its authority, because it seems to be guilty of inconsistency; in one place, they say St. Ignatius is mentioned as living, while again he is spoken of as "in his due place, with God." But the holy martyr is not spoken of as still living; at least, that is not necessarily the sense of the passage. St. Polycarp requests the Philippians "to inform him of what they know for certain about Ignatius, and those who are with him." The Acts of the martyr tell us that he passed through Philippi on his way to death, and that the Philippians, as was customary in such cases, sent messengers to honor and console him. When these returned to their companions, they certainly had much to narrate, and St. Polycarp wished to be informed of everything. The knowledge of the saint's

(1) History, y. 117.

(2) Hist., Cent. I., p. 2, c. 2, § 21.

(3) Heresies, b. 3, c. 3.

(4) B. 3, c. 20, and b. 4, c. 13.

(5) Eccles. Writers, art. Polycarp.

last moments, of the disposition of his body, etc., reached Macedonia before it did Smyrna; it was natural then for St. Polycarp to apply to the Philippians for information. The authority of Nicephorus of Constantinople and of Anastasius the Librarian is also adduced against our Epistle. But the opinion of Anastasius, who flourished in the ninth century, is not of first importance, when contrary to that of Irenaeus, Eusebius, Jerome, Bede, and of all the Asiatic churches, who, for many centuries, solemnly read this Epistle in their services. As for Nicephorus, his judgment was not so good as that of his contemporary, the learned Photius, who, though he rejected the letter of St. Clement, had nothing to allege against that of St. Polycarp. Again, the Stichometria of Nicephorus, cited against us, does not speak of the Epistle, but of the Didaschalia of St. Polycarp. Finally, even though the Epistle were quoted by the author of the Stichometria, no argument can be drawn therefrom, for the writer does not pronounce the document spurious; he merely says that it is to be placed among the apocrypha of the Bible, that is, to be excluded from the Canon of Scripture, which is very different from banishing it from the company of authentic works (1).

The Encyclical Epistle of the Church of Smyrna inserted by Cotelier among the Works of the Apostolic Fathers, was written after the martyrdom of St. Polycarp, and is not impugned by any author of note. It is valuable for the testimony it bears to the veneration of martyrs and their relics on the part of the primitive Church.

St. Dionysius (Denis), the Areopagite, is believed by many to have been the author of the following works: The Celestial Hierarchy, The Ecclesiastical Hierarchy, The Divine Names, Mystic Theology, and ten Epistles. The state of the question in regard to these books is well explained by Alexandre (2), at the beginning of his apposite dissertation: "It is certain that no one has spoken of these works as

(1) It may be observed, with Alexandre, that the cited Stichometria was not written by the patriarch Nicephorus, nor by any author of the 9th century. At that time, the Greeks did not doubt of the canonicity of the books of Esther, Judith, and Wisdom, as does the writer of this book.

(2) Cent. I., Diss. XXII.

written, either by Dionysius or by any other Father, before the beginning of the fifth century. Secondly, it is certain that, in the following centuries, the Fathers, the Councils, the Pontiffs, and all the Ecclesiastical writers, down to Erasmus (one alone, an anonymous, excepted), ascribed them to Dionysius the Areopagite. Thirdly, it is certain that there are grave reasons for denying that they are by Dionysius the Areopagite, and for assigning them to an author of the fifth century; by which reasons Launoy and Morin were persuaded to adopt that opinion. However, though it is fortified so strongly, I would rather defend the contrary opinion, which declares St. Dionysius the Areopagite to be the legitimate parent of these books; it has so many arguments in its favor, that I deem it not less probable than the other, and would prefer to defend it, with the Œcumenical Councils and the Holy Fathers on my side, than to embrace the other, under the leadership of the doubtful Erasmus, and Daillé, Blondel, and other heterodox authors, together with the most learned Morin and Launoy." Nothing will better show the diversity of opinion among Catholic critics, concerning these writings, than a comparison of this passage of the great historian and critic with one of Bergier (1). "It is certain that the works, which bear the name of St. Dionysius the Areopagite, are not those of the holy bishop of Athens, but the real author is unknown. Critics differ as to the period when they first appeared. The first authentic mention of them is at the conference held in 532, in the palace of the emperor Justinian, between the Catholics and the Severians; the latter quoted them in their own favor, the former upheld their orthodoxy, and from that time many Fathers of the Church have sustained their authoritativeness. Mosheim and Brucher deem the Mystic Theology the work of a fanatical Platonist, who, in place of the reasonable religion of the Gospel, substitutes a chimerical devotion, consisting of prayers, vigils, and macerations of the body; making lazy contemplation the perfection of Christianity—an absurd doctrine, which has produced great abuses in the Church"(1). The book on the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy is also displeasing to Protestants, for it bears witness to the ancient use of rites and ceremonies, and to the "Discipline of the Secret." So grave are the authorities adduced by both parties to this controversy, and so weighty are some of the arguments used by each, that we can do no better than summarize their respective reasons, leaving the student to his own good judgment thereon. In the first place, thirteen centuries of possession, during which time these books have been ascribed to the Areopagite, by Fathers, by Pontiffs, and by Councils, no other author being put forward as claimant, militate for their authenticity. They are cited as works of our Dionysius by Juvenal of Jerusalem (2), who lived in the fifth century; by Leontius (3), when combating the Aphthartocetes, or asserters of the incorruptibility of the flesh of Christ; by the Monothelites, with no contradiction on the part of the Catholics (4); by Sophronius of Jerusalem, the first opponent of the Monothelites (5); by Pope St. Martin I. in the Council of Lateran (6); by St. Maximus, disputing with the Monothelite, Pyrrhus; by the 6th General Council, in Action 8; by Pope Agatho, writing to Constantine Pogonatus; by St. Gregory the Great (7); by Pope Adrian I., in his letter to Charlemagne on the Seventh Council; by Pope Nicholas I., addressing the emperor Michael; by Hincmar of Rheims and Anastasius, writing to Charles the Bald; by Photius, one of the most rigid, as well as one of the most learned of critics (8); by St. John Damascene (9); by St. Thomas of Aquin (10); by the erudite Cardinal Bessarion (11). Secondly, the author of these books speaks of himself in a way that indicates him to have been a contemporary of the Apostles. Thus (12) he calls himself a disciple of St. Paul; he declares that he was present at the obsequies of the Blessed Virgin, together with Sts. Peter and James (13); he says he witnessed the disappearance of the sun on the death of Christ (1). Finally, the great Erasmus, the leader of the opponents of the Dionysian claims, could adduce, in favor of his theory, only the names of Lorenzo Valla and William Grocinius. Against the authenticity of these works, Theodore, an author much praised by Photius, proposes four questions, and answers them. First, why do none of the Fathers quote the works of the Areopagite? This is answered by a denial of the supposition. Second, how is it that Eusebius, enumerating the writings of the Fathers, does not mention those of Dionysius? St. Maximus Martyr replies that Eusebius tells us that many of such writings had not reached him, and Alexandre observes that Eusebius makes no mention of the works of Athenagoras, which are celebrated, and of undoubted authenticity. Third, how is it that, while Dionysius was a contemporary of the Apostles, he alludes to traditions which arose in after times? To this the friends of the Dionysian claims reply that it is false that said traditions were not from Apostolic days; that the persecutions of the early days had prevented the use of much of the ceremonial, which was nevertheless of Apostolic origin, and they cite St. Basil (2), saying, "We bless the water of Baptism, and the oil of Unction, and also him who is baptized; but on (the authority of) what writings? Is it not from silent and secret tradition? Where is the triple immersion found in Scripture? And the other things performed in Baptism, such as the renunciation of Satan and his angels, from what Scripture do we drive them? Is it not from this unpublished and hidden tradition? In this manner, the Apostles and the Fathers, who, in the first days of the Church, prescribed certain rites, preserved in silence the dignity of the Mysteries." Fourth, how is it that St. Dionysius cites the Epistle of St. Ignatius to the Romans, when the former was martyred under Domitian, and the latter suffered under Trajan, and wrote his Epistle just before his death? Alexandre believes that this citation is an interpolation, but it is unnecessary to recur to such a supposition, as St. Dionysius did not suffer under Domitian, but in the last year of Trajan, or the first of Adrian (1). It is also urged against the authenticity of these works that the author styles St. Timothy his son, an implication of superiority of which the holy Areopagite would not have been guilty. The reply to this objection is that there was no undue assumption, on the part of Dionysius, in so speaking of Timothy. St. Timothy was much younger than the Areopagite; St. Paul himself alludes to his extreme youth. A third objection is founded upon the mention, in the book on The Ecclesiastical Hierarchy, of the monastic institution as already established, while, it is alleged, the ecclesiastical writers of the first two centuries do not speak of monks. Alexandre (2) replies at some length to this argument, and shows, that while the monastic state, as we now have it, did not exist for some time after St. Dionysius, yet, from Apostolic times, there were such monks as the Areopagite depicts; who were regarded as laics, and were subject to the bishops, and even to the priests; who, devoted to God, and free from earthly cares, lived, sometimes at home, often in community; to whom, immediately after the clergy, place was accorded in the sacred services (3). Morin urges, as against the authorship of St. Dionysius, that, in the book on the Celestial Hierarchy, the word hypostasis is used to signify "person," as distinct from essence; while we know, he says, that this term began to be so used, only after the synod of Alexandria of 362. To this may be answered that, nevertheless, the Areopagite may have so used it. There was certainly a first to adopt the term in the new sense; why should not he have been the one? He certainly understood the force of the word, and knowing that it admirably indicated those substances, which, in intelligent natures, we designate as "persons," it was quite natural for him, a sublime philosopher, to apply the term to the three Divine Persons, and style God, Trishypostatos, that is, a Being subsisting in Three Persons. But it is not true that the word hypostasis received its new signification after the synod of Alexandria in 362. St. Dionysius of Alexandria, in response to the fourth proposition of Paul of Samosata, says of the Persons of the Father and the Son, "They are two inseparable hypostases." St. Alexander, also of Alexandria, in a letter to Alexander of Constantinople (1), declares that "of the Father and the Son, there are two natures in hypostasi." And, according to St. Basil the Great (2), the Council of Nice (325) used the word hypostasis for "person" when, in its Exposition of Faith, it condemned those who asserted that the word "was made from another subsistence or substance." According to St. Gregory of Nyssa (3), when St. Paul, in Hebrews, I, speaks of "the figure of His substance" (in the Greek, character tis hypostaseos), he used the word hypostasis for "person." Finally, as a member of the Areopagus, St. Dionysius was certainly well versed in the works of Aristotle, and that philosopher, in his work on The World, uses hypostasis in another sense than that of "essence." He says, "of those things which we observe in the air, some only appear, others are;" the Greek text has "are kath' hypostasin." In the supposition that St. Dionysius was not the author of the works bearing his name, critics are at an utter loss to whom to ascribe them. The famous Dominican, Le Quien, in his edition of the writings of St. John Damascene, endeavors to prove that the unknown was a Monophysite heretic (4).

(1) Art. Dionysius.

(1) Ibi. (2) NICEPHORUS CALLISTUS; History, b. 15, c. 14. (3) Against Nestorius and Eutyches, b. 2. (4) Gen. Council of Constantinople (3rd), Action 2. (5) Epistle to Sergius. (6) Sec. 1 and 3. (7) Homily 34, on St. Luke's Gospel. (8) Coder, 231. (9) Orthodox Faith, b. 1, c. 15. (10) Seutences II., dist. 10, q. 1, art. 12. (11) Platonic Defence, b. 2, c. 3. (12) Divine Names, c. 2. (13) Ibi, c. 3.

(1) Epist. 7, to Polycarp.(2) Holy Ghost, c. 27.

(1) Conf. SUIDAS, Roman Martyrology; Bede; Ado of Vienne.

(2) Cent. I., diss. 22.

(3) See the Epistle of Dionysius to Demophilus.

St. Ignatius, Martyr, a disciple of St. John the Evangelist, and third bishop of Antioch, called by the olden Greeks Theophorus, because they believed him to have been the child embraced by the Saviour, Matt., 18, 3, has been reputed the author of many works which are undoubtedly spurious. Thus, the Epistles addressed to the Blessed Virgin, and the two inscribed to St. John, those to Mary Cussaboline, to the Tarsians, to the Antiochenes, to Hero, and to the Philippians, give intrinsic evidence of their worthlessness, and are defended by none. But there are seven other Epistles

(1) THEODORET: History, b. 1, c. 3. (2) Epistle 78. (3) Difference of Essence and Hypostasis, written to Peter.

(4) Roncaglia, in his 2d Animadversion to Alexander's dissertation on this subject, gives several additional reasons why these works should be deemed spurious. The most conclusive are 1st, the author explains the mystery of the Trinity even more clearly than is done by Athanasius; 2d, he alludes to no persecution of the Church; 3d, he quotes the Gospel and Apocalypse of St. John, which were composed in the old age of the Apostle, while the Areopagite tells us that his own works were of his younger days.

of St. Ignatius, addressed to the Ephesians, to the Magnesians, to the Trallians, to the Romans, to the Philadelphians, to the Smyrniotes, and to St. Polycarp. These seven, as they are presented, according to the common Greek-Latin edition, in all but the very latest Patrologies, are interpolated and corrupted. This is shown by the fact that the passages of the Epistles, quoted by the ancient Fathers, are either not found in this edition, or are given in very different language; again, because there are many things therein foreign to the age of the reputed author. These same seven Epistles, however, as they are read in the editions formed from the Greek codex discovered by Isaac Voss in the Medicean Library, and from the two Latin MSS. found in England by Usher, are regarded as authentic by the best Protestant critics. De Saumaise, Daillé, Blondel, and some others, reject them. They certainly agree with the character of their reputed author, and with the genius of the age in which he lived; which is no slight argument in favor of their authenticity. They refute the heresies of his day; they use no testimony but that of Scripture; they speak of the Apostolic gifts yet flourishing in the Church; they are redolent of the simplicity of the Apostolic age, and betray an irrepressible yearning for the martyr's crown. These characteristics of the Epistles powerfully impressed the Anglican Pearson in their favor, and he devoted much of his diligence to their vindication. But there are not wanting more positive arguments for their authenticity. Many of the Fathers, and ancient Ecclesiastical writers, quote them as by Ignatius, and many speak of Ignatius' writings as showing the very characteristics which we observe in those before us. Thus, St. Polycarp (1) praises them as conducive to the spiritual profit of the reader; St. Irenaeus, according to Eusebius (2), quotes them several times; Origen (3), St. Athanasius (4), St. Jerome (5), Theodoret (6), and many others, mention one or more of them. Daillé objects that the Epistles of Ignatius were unknown to ecclesiastical writers before the time of Eusebius; that even St. Chrysos-

(1) Epist. to Philippians.(2) Hist., b. 5, c. 8, and b. 3, c. 36(3) Homily 6, on Luke.(4) Epist. on Synods of Rimini and Seleucia.(5) Eccles. Writers.(6) Dialogue: Inmutabilis.

tom, an Antiochian, ignored them; that the same may be said of Tertullian, who teaches things contrary to these writings; of St. Clement of Alexandria, who not only does not mention them, but even holds different opinions, on certain matters, from those expressed herein; of St. Epiphanius, who would have cited them against Aërius, a bitter enemy of the episcopal dignity, had he deemed them authentic. But because certain authors seem to ignore these Epistles, it by no means follows that all did so, and we know that the contemporaneous Polycarp and Irenæus approved of them. Again, how can Daillé, or any other critic, prove that the cited fathers ignored the Epistles of Ignatius? Their silence shows nothing, since we do not possess all of their works, and in those which have perished, there may have been some mention of these documents. As for the argument deduced from Tertullian's contrary teaching, if it avails anything, it shows equally well that he was unacquainted with the Gospels and Apostolic writings, for he sometimes contradicts even them (1). With regard to St. Clement of Alexandria, Daillé's reasoning is ineffective, for in none of his works does the holy bishop mention any author of the second century; not even Polycarp, Justin, Athenagoras, Dionysius, Hippolyte, Hegesippus, or Irenæus, of whose works Daillé certainly did not believe him ignorant or suspicious (2). To prove St. Clement's opinions diverse from those of St. Ignatius, Daillé adduces the former's assertion that the preaching of Christ lasted but one year, while the latter represents our Lord's mission as extending through three years. But this assertion of St. Ignatius is not found in the only reliable codices, viz., the Medicean and the Anglican. As to St. Epiphanius, Daillé can draw very little comfort from his silence, for he does not mention Papias, Hegesippus, Theophilus, Athenagoras, Agrippa, Caius, Dionysius, Miltiades, whose writings he must have read; and when he does cite an author, he never quotes his words in confutation of a heretic's doctrine, but rather uses him as an historian of that particular heresy. No wonder then that he does not adopt the Epistle of St. Ignatius against the teaching of Acrius. St. John Chrysostom gives no assistance to Daillé for though he does not expressly cite the Epistles, he quotes the words of the Epistles to the Romans, where the future martyr expresses his yearning for the crown (1).

(1) Thus, in his book entitled an Exhortation to Chastity, he condemns second marriages as lecheries.

(2) In his Stromata, St. Clement Alex. only cites Barnabas, Clement of Rome, Hermes and Tatian.

The book entitled The Pastor seems to be authentic, and to have been written by Hermas, a disciple of St. Paul. It is divided into three parts, Visions, Commandments, and Similitudes. The edition of Cotelier, inserted in his Apostolic Fathers, and learnedly annotated, is by far the best we possess. Many Protestant critics dispute the genuineness of this work. In it we find an assertion of the free will of man, the doctrine of purgatory, and other Catholic dogmas. The authorship of The Pastor was ascribed to Hermas, a brother of Pope Pius I., by the unknown poet who wrote under the name of Tertullian, Against Marcion, b. 3; by the author of the Epistles assigned to Pope Pius I.; by Venerable Bede, and by Ado of Vienne. But a book, written by a brother of a Roman Pontiff, would scarcely have been almost unknown in the Western Church, as St. Jerome (2) says was the case with The Pastor; indeed, it would have acquired a greater notoriety in the West than in the East. (3). Brucker holds that The Pastor is the work of a fanatic, indoctrinated with the Platonic and Egyptian philosophies, and he bases his assertion upon the fact that Hermas teaches that each individual is attended by a good and an evil genius. Mosheim accuses this author of a pious fraud, in saying that he was instructed by an angel, and of declaring himself inspired, because he desired his book to be read in the churches—accusations certainly not sustained by the allegations. Le Clerc is more moderate in his opinion of Hermas, and even pretends to excuse some alleged errors. Origen identified this author with the person

(1) Oration on the Martyrdom of St. Ignatius.

(2) Eccles. Writers, art. Hermas.

(3) Mosheim contends that the identity of Hermas with the brother of Pope Pius I. is proved beyond doubt, by a fragment on the Scripture Canon published by Louis Anthony Muratori in his Italian Antiquities of the Middle Ages, and which he found in the Library of Milan.

spoken of by St. Paul, Rom., xvi, 14, saying, "salute Her-mas." His work is cited with respect by Sts. Irenaeus, Clement of Alexandria, Athanasius, and by Tertullian and Eusebius.

Some of these authors, influenced, in all probability, by the purity of morals found in The Pastor, and by its simplicity of style, regard it as equal in authority to the writings of the Apostles, but Sts. Jerome and Prosper did not esteem it as valuable. Pope Gelasius, in 496, placed it among the apocrypha, but such a decision, of course, does not condemn the book as unworthy of respect; it simply means that it does not belong to the Canon of Scripture. Bergier thus repels the charge of pious cheating brought by Mosheim against Hermas: "Without any imposture, Hermas may have believed that his interlocutor was an angel; he may have believed, without wishing to claim any inspiration, that it was an angel who instructed him. He could have wished his book to be read in the churches, even though he did not place it on an equality with the Scriptures; for we know from the ancients that the first epistle of St. Clement was read there. The consequences which Mos-heim draws from these facts are false, and only show his malignity." With regard to Brucker's opinion, Bergier asks: "What would this critic reply, if he were told that his patriarch, Luther, derived from the Orientals the opinion that man is like a horse, who goes where his rider directs? If he carries God, he goes where God wishes; if he carries Satan, he goes as Satan desires. Cotelier and Le Nourry have shown that this passage of Hermas is only an allegory, and that the basis of the idea may have been drawn from Scripture."

CHAPTER VI

CONVERSION OF GAUL AND QUESTION OF THE AREOPAGITE.

It is certain that the Gospel was preached in Gaul during the lifetime of the Apostles, although critics dispute as to whom should be awarded the merit of having first brought the saving tidings to the favored land which was destined to be the "eldest daughter of the Church." Some have thought that St. Philip the Apostle, St. Lazarus, and St. Denis the Areopagite, were the first evangelizers of Gaul. Others, however, relying on the testimony of Gregory of Tours, have contended that no churches were founded there before the third century; that then the see of Tours was established by Gratian, that of Arles by Trophimus, that of Narbonne by Paul, Limoge by Martial, Paris by Denis, Toulouse by Saturnine, Auvergne by Stremonius. The voyage of Lazarus and of St. Mary Magdalen is contested by many of the erudite, and that of the Areopagite is upheld by few modern writers. It is evident that the faith made little progress before the mission of St. Pothinus and his companions, which occurred in 177. From the acts of these Lyonesse martyrs, taken from the letter (supposed to have been written by St. Irenæus) of the churches of Lyons and Vienne to the faithful of Asia and Phrygia, we learn that about that time there were a great many Christians in those two cities. In this chapter we propose to show, first, that the French church was established in the first century; secondly, that a St. Denis the Areopagite was not the founder of the see of Paris.

St. Irenæus (d. 202), enumerating the churches which preserved that unity of tradition which furnishes so many proofs of the truth of our religion, has the following (1): "Although there are many different languages in the world, yet the power of Tradition is one and the same. There is no difference of belief or of Tradition in those churches which have been founded in Germany or in Spain, or among the Celts, or in the East, or in Egypt; neither is there among those established in Libya, or in the middle of the world." In the time of St. Irenaeus, the inhabitants of Gaul were often called "Celts;" therefore, at that period there were Christian churches in Gaul. The same is proved by Tertullian (b. 150), speaking of the "various Getuli and many lands of the Moors, all the regions of Spain, and the different nations of Gaul," who had received the Gospel (1). Again, unless the Gospel had been successfully preached in Gaul before the third century, St. Justin (b. 103), in the Dialogue with Trypho, written about 139, would not have confidently asserted that there "was not one race of mortals, whether Barbarian or Greek, or called by any other name, among whom, through the name of Jesus crucified, are not offered prayers and thanksgiving to the Father and Maker of all things." Finally, we know that Trophimus was a disciple of St. Paul (Acts, and 2 Tim., 4); that Crescens was the same (Eusebius, b. 3, c. 4); that Paul was a "disciple of the Apostles" (St. Gregory the Great, b. 7, epist. 29); that Martial was ordained and commissioned by St. Peter (Old Martyrologies); and that these saintly missionaries respectively founded the churches of Arles, Vienne, Narbonne, and Limoges. The authority of St. Gregory of Tours is adduced by some to show that these prelates were sent to Gaul just before the Consulate of Decius and Gratus, that is, about the year 250. But this writer proves himself unreliable in many instances. Thus, among seven missionaries whom he represents as preaching the faith in Gaul in the third century, he places Saturninus of Toulouse, and notwithstanding this, he says (Miracles, b. 1, c. 48) that this bishop was "ordained by the disciples of the Apostles." Gregory also tells us (Glory of the Confessors, c. 8) that St. Ursinus was ordained by the same disciples, and that he established the church of Biturica; and it is exceedingly improbable that the more celebrated cities would have been neglected. Gregory accounts for this tardy third century mission by the slow and limited propagation of the faith, which is certainly repugnant to the testimony of Scripture, as well as to the evidence of Irenaeus and Tertullian. Dismissing, therefore, the objection founded on the allegations of Gregory as of no weight, we adduce in favor of the first century mission of Trophimus of Arles, the action of the bishops of the province of Vienne, in 450, in reference to the metropolitane claims of the church of Arles. This latter church had been deprived of its metropolitan privileges on account of the contumacy of Bishop Hilarius, who refused to obey the decree of Pope Boniface, restricting his jurisdiction within the province of Vienne. In a suppliant missive to Pope St. Leo I., the Viennese prelates requested the Pontiff to restore to the church of Arles the jurisdiction over both Narbonnes which, out of reverence to Trophimus, Pope Zosimus had conferred upon it. "It is known," they said, "to all the regions of Gaul, and it is not unknown to the Holy Roman Church, that, in all Gaul, the city of Arles first merited to have from the blessed Apostle Peter its priest St. Trophimus; and from it did the other Gallic countries derive the benefits of faith and religion." Had these bishops not been assured of the solidity of their position, they would not have used this argument with St. Leo. Had the church of Arles received the faith only in the third century, as Gregory of Tours asserts, the fraudulent claim, based on the first episcopacy of St. Trophimus, would have been repelled by Rome.

(1) Heresies, b. i. c. 2.

(1) Against the Jews, c. 7.

That St. Crescens preached the Gospel in Gaul during the first century, is also shown by excellent authority. Eusebius (1) writes: "Among the other disciples of Paul, Crescens is said to have been sent by him into Gaul." St. Epiphanius (2), speaking of St. Luke, says: "To him was entrusted the privilege of preaching the Gospel, which he exercised first in Dalmatia, Gaul, Italy, and Macedonia; but in Gaul first, as attests Paul in his Epistles in reference to some of his companions: 'Crescens,' he says, 'into Gaul;' we should not read 'into Galatia,' as some have im-

(1) History, b. 3, c. 4. The version of Christopherson has "in Gallatia," but the Greek text, as derived from the best codices, and from Rufinus, has epi tas Gallias—"into the Gauls." The latter reading is defended by Valois, On Timothy, chap. 4.

(2) Heresies, no. 51.

properly done, but 'into Gaul.' Theodoret (1) says: "Crescens into Galatia;" for thus he named the Gauls. Thus they were anciently designated. Sophronius (2) tells us that "Crescens preached the Gospel in the Gauls." The Alexandrian Chronicle, 220th Olympiad, records: "Having promulgated the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ, Crescens died under Nero, and was buried." Ado of Vienne writes in his Martyrology, under date of the 5th calends of July, "Into Galatia, the Blessed Crescens, disciple of St. Paul the Apostle; who, passing into the Gauls, converted many by the word of preaching. For some years he sat in Vienne, a city of the Gauls, and there ordained, as bishop for himself, his disciple Zachary. Returning however to the Galatians, the people to whom he had been especially given as bishop, he comforted them in the work of the Lord, unto the blessed end of his life." The same testimony is given in the Roman Martyrology, and in that of Usuardus (3).

The Gallic mission of St. Martial in the first century is proved by the authentic Tabularia and Offices of the Church of Limoges. That the tradition to this effect was regarded, from the earliest times, as well founded, is evinced from the epistle of Pope John XX., read in 1302 in a synod of Limoges, and which rebuked those who had erased the name of St. Martial from the list of apostles. It is also shown by Pope St. Innocent III., who, in an Extravagans: On Extreme Unction, makes mention of the miracle performed by St. Martial during his Gallic mission, in raising a man from the dead by the touch of St. Peter's crozier (4). In the ancient Martyrology of Corbie, we read under the date of the day before the calends of July: "Of St. Martial, bishop, who, having been ordained at Rome by the Blessed Apostles, was sent as first bishop of Limoges, where, illustrious for many virtues, he rested in peace." Similar evidences

(1) On the Epist. to Tim., c. 4.

(2) Writers.

(3) This Martyrology of Usuard, a French monk, was compiled by order of Charles the Bald (823-877), and was the one ordinarily used at Rome before that of Sixtus V. The Martyrology of Ado was made up from the Lesser Roman, itself drawn from the Great Roman of St. Jerome, and that of Bede, as augmented by Florus a subdeacon of the church of Lyons. Ado compiled it after his return from Rome, in 858. It served as a basis for the Martyrology of Notker, a Swiss monk of the monastery of St. Gall, issued in 894.

(4) It is in remembrance of this event that to this day, the Pope alone, of all bishops, carries no crozier; St. Peter having sent his to St. Martial.

can be adduced for the mission of St. Paul of Narbonne (1).

That the first bishop of Paris was a St. Denis seems to be certain, but the ancient and once almost universally received theory that this saint was no other than the Areopagite philosopher, is now rejected by the best critics. In the beginning of the ninth century, Hilduin, abbot of St. Denis, offered to the emperor Louis the Pious some writings on this subject, in which he cited some Acts of St. Denis composed by Visbius, a presumed eye-witness of the martyr's passion. In these Acts, it was recorded that Denis, the Areopagite, having been converted by St. Paul, was sent by Pope St. Clement into Gaul, that he founded the see of Paris, and was there martyred. Mosheim and others accuse Hilduin of having forged these Acts in the interest of the celebrity of his monastery. This allegation is contradicted by the reputation the abbot enjoyed among his contemporaries (2), and by the centuries during which many of the learned gave credence to the Acts. But although Hilduin did not wish to deceive others, he was himself deceived, as we shall see, by a similarity of name, which caused him to confound two different personages. Those who identify the Areopagite, with St. Denis of Paris base their assertion, secondly, upon the ancient Life of St. Genevieve (3), written, says its author, eighteen years after the virgin's death (512). Here we also read that St. Denis was sent to Gaul by Pope St. Clement, and, triumphantly asks Alexandre (4), "Who else can that be, than the Areopagite?" A third argument is found in a Hymn in honor of St. Denis by Fortunatus of Poitiers, which tells us that "he was sent to Gaul by Clement of Rome, to sow the seed of the word." Passing some other arguments of minor importance (5) which are adduced to show the identity of the Areopagite and the bishop of Paris, we come to one upon which Alexandre greatly relies.

(1) Martyrology of Rossveyd. USUARD; Day before the Ides of December. ADO; Feasts of the Apostles, 11th of calends of April.

(2) Lupus, abbot of Ferrières (epist. 110) styles Hilduin "conspicuous for his nobility, dignity, and moderation: a master of ecclesiastics."

(3) This Life is found in Surius, Jan. 3rd, and in the MSS. codices of St. Remigius of Rheims, formerly preserved in the monastery of Compiègne.

(4) Cent. I., dissert. XVI., prop. II.

(5) Eugenius of Toledo (v. 650) distinctly says that the Areopagite went to Gaul. Simeon Metaphrastes, who lived during the reign of Heraclius, asserts the same. Pope Stephen III., having been cured by the intercession of St. Denis while in France, erected a monastery in Rome, which he assigned to some Greek monks.

St. Methodius, patriarch of Constantinople and martyr, in the year 818, came to Rome as an imperial legate, and brought with him a Life of St. Denis the Areopagite, in which we read: "Then this Blessed Denis, ploughing the sea with the cross, came from Athens to Rome, led on the way by the divine will, as one beloved by God. Having entered the city, and found the Blessed Clement, who occupied the Apostolic Chair, he was received with such honor as circumstances allowed. St. Antonine being sent into the regions of Aquitaine, he himself, with Sts. Lucian, Rusticus, and Eleutherius, proceeded to the city of Paris. . . . St. Denis himself remained in Paris." Anastasius the Librarian tells us that Methodius drew his materials for this book from many old Greek writings.

The testimony of St. Methodius would certainly be of great value, if there were not good reasons for supposing that he did not write his Life of St. Denis before he came to Rome in 818; that hence he derived his opinions from Hilduin, who published his book about the year 834. In this chronological question lies the difficulty we experience in accepting the authority of St. Methodius. Anastasius certainly says that he brought the book to Rome, and that he derived it from old Greek sources. Nevertheless, we agree with Roncaglia (1), that St. Methodius derived from Hilduin the theory of the identity of the bishops of Athens and Paris. Hilduin says that "the Greeks have written nothing about the death of Denis the Areopagite, because, on account of the distance, they knew nothing about it." But if St. Methodius had already, sixteen years before Hilduin wrote, published his theory, and one founded, too, "upon old Greek writings," the abbot of St. Denis, a learned and well-informed man, would not have made this assertion. And Hincmar, in an Epistle to Charles the Bald, tells us that he had read the work of St. Methodius, and found it conformable to what he had learned in his childhood about St. Denis. "which information the Greeks had derived from the Romans." We therefore deem it more than probable that the argument derived from St. Methodius should be regarded as of no more weight than the one drawn from the Acts presented by Hilduin to Louis the Pious. What value that possesses, we now proceed to examine.

(1) Animadversion III., on Alexandre's Diss. XVI., cent. I., prop. II.

From Hilduin to Alexandre, with very few exceptions, those who hold that the Areopagite was the first bishop of Paris, base their argument merely upon the constant tradition that Pope St. Clement sent a certain St. Denis to Gaul. They conclude that this personage must have been the Areopagite, simply because he was still living during the Pontificate of St. Clement. None of the ancient writers assert that our St. Denis the Areopagite was made bishop of Paris, or even went into Gaul. On the contrary, the old Martyrologies make an explicit distinction between the two saints, the one of Athens, and the other of Paris. Adrian Valois says: "After Sirmond, Launoy treats this question, adducing all the ancient MSS. Martyrologies of the French church, in which each Denis is located in the month of October, but on separate days; in which they are distinguished, one from the other, by different sees, and different kinds of death; in which one (the elder, and the Athenian) is called bishop of Athens, and is said to have there perished by fire, while the other (that is, ours) is styled bishop of Paris, and declared to have been beheaded near the city. All the Gauls, all the Franks, in fine all Christians, down to the ninth century, that is, to the time of Louis the Pious, son of Charlemagne, always distinguished, as I do, two Denises. Then the legates of the Constantinopolitan emperor, often coming into France, and understanding that the first bishop and martyr of Paris was called Denis, they brought forth the writings (as was pretended) of Denis the Areopagite; and persuaded Hilduin, abbot of St. Denis, that this author was the bishop of Paris and the patron of that monastery. Most willingly believing this, he composed a book of Areopagitics, full of fables, to persuade people that our first bishop and martyr was also the Athenian Areopagite. So much availed vanity, wishing to claim an Apostolic origin for our first bishops, preferring a fable and an imposture to solid and incontestable truth" (1). And in another place: "I must give you the words of Usuard, a grave, erudite, and exact author, who did not wish to follow his contemporary Hilduin, but, in the Martyrology dedicated to Charles the Bald, made a sacrifice to truth, first, by writing under date of the Fifth of October: 'Fifth of the Nones of October. At Athens, the natal day of St. Denis, who, after a brilliant confession of faith, and most terrible torments, was crowned with a most glorious martyrdom,' as attests Aristides of Athens, a man of great faith and wisdom, in his work on the Christian Religion. Behold Denis of Athens, or the Areopagite. Then follows the other under date of the Ninth of October, thus: 'Sixth of the Ides of October. In Paris, the natal day of the holy martyrs, the bishop Denis, the priest Rusticus, and the deacon Eleutherius. The said blessed bishop, directed by the Roman Pontiff to preach the Gospel in Gaul, came to the aforesaid city, where for some years he fulfilled his allotted task, and at length, being seized by the prefect Fescenninus, completed, together with his companions, his martyrdom by the sword" (1). The learned Bollandist, Sollier, commenting on the text of Usuard, under date of Oct. 9, when is recalled the memory of St. Denis of Paris, has the following: "Restricted within the limits of the Martyrologies, we shall only allege such reasons as can be defended by their authority. Behold the words of Jeromian of Corbie: 'At Paris, the natal day of Sts. Denis, bishop; Rusticus, priest; and Eleutherius, deacon.' Bede agrees with this: 'At Paris, the natal day of the holy Martyrs, the bishop Denis, Rusticus, and Eleutherius.' You have also the Lesser Roman: 'At Paris, the bishop Denis with his companions, punished with the sword by Fescenninus.' The same is the opinion of Ado. . . . Now compare these with the words under date of Oct. 3d, related by the Lesser Roman, Ado, Usuard, and Notker, and you will clearly see that in their mind the Denis of this day is very different from the Areopagite. The Denis, whose feast is this day celebrated, is called bishop of Paris, as to whose century, country, mission, companions, and deeds, there have been many controversies, especially during the last century." Pagi observes that Hilduin did not succeed in convincing the minds of the Martyrologists of his own Benedictine order, who were really or nearly his contemporaries. Thus, as we have seen, Ado, Usuard, and Notker are plainly averse to his theory. Alexandre uses the testimony of John Scotus Erigena, who, however, militates rather against his theory, for, in the cited passage of his letter to Charles the Bald, he clearly says that only the more recent writers assign the Gallic mission to the Areopagite (1). Alexandre endeavors to elude the force of the argument taken from the Martyrologies by asserting that it merely proves that St. Denis, at different periods, occupied the episcopal chairs of Athens and Paris; that in the Greek Menology, we find the names of Sts. Eustathius and Alexander in two different places for a like reason. But in all such cases, says Roncaglia, the Martyrology obviates danger of error by noting the place of death; and in the case of St. Denis, wherever the Areopagite is clearly mentioned, Athens is the place assigned. Again, nearly all the ancient Martyrologies, when speaking of the St. Denis of Oct. 3d, call him the Areopagite; they never so style the St. Denis of the 9th. Sirmond (2) says of the opinion of the Holy See on this point: "What Roman Pontiff ever thought of styling Denis of Paris the Areopagite, or of saying that the Areopagite ever filled an episcopal chair other than that of Athens? Stephen III., it is said, was cured of a disease by Denis of Paris. Who denies it? Grateful for the favor, the same Pontiff decreed a temple in Rome in his honor, and it being built, Paul, brother of Stephen, and his successor, dedicated it. But what then? Did either Stephen or Paul call this Denis the Areopagite? Let the partisans of St. Denis (the Abbey of) open their archives, and examine the Diplomas of the Pontiffs, all that they have, from Zachary down to Innocent III.; they will never read otherwise than of St. Denis Martyr, of the Monastery of St. Denis Martyr, of the Abbots of St. Denis Martyr. Let them turn to the Roman archives, and

(1) In Papebrock, in Answer to exhibition of errors, &c., art. 11, § 4, epist. 1

(1) Idem, epist. 2.

(1) Erigena rejects the theory only on account of its newness, and Pagl ascribes this to his wish not to contradict Hincmar, who favored Hilduin's idea, and had much influence with king Charles, to whom Erigena was writing.

(2) Dissertation on the Two Denises, c. 6.

what we have lately observed of the Greek writers, they will find in Martin, Agatho, Adrian, viz., that whenever they cite the words of Denis the Areopagite, they always designate him as bishop of Athens, never of Paris, which they would have done, had he migrated from Athens to Paris."

Alexandre urges against the argument, derived from the constant naming of the Areopagite as bishop of Athens, certain instances to prove that not always, in ecclesiastical history, does a translated bishop derive his title from his new see. It is the general rule, however; and of all the instances cited by the great Dominican, there is but one which Pagi does not refute. Thus, in the case of Eusebius of Nicomedia, who was made bishop of Constantinople after Alexander, and who continued to be called bishop of Nicomedia (1), this designation was his only legal one, for he had usurped the chair of Paul, and after his death, Paul was restored. The second instance cited by Alexandre is of Theodore of Perinthium, who, being at first bishop of Heraclea in Thrace, was made, under Valens, patriarch of Antioch, succeeding Euzoius, and was styled, nevertheless, Heracleotes (2). But this example proves nothing, since Philostorgius (3) tells us that Dorotheus, not Theodore, succeeded Euzoius at Antioch. Alexandre also adduces the instance of St. Gregory of Nazianzen, who was transferred from the coadjutorship to his father, in that city, to the see of Constantinople, but was always called Nazianzen. This argument is certainly unworthy of Alexandre, for he could not have forgotten, even though Homer sometimes sleeps, that St. Gregory, for love of peace, soon resigned the see of Constantinople, returned to Nazianzen, and there ruled until his death. There remains the case of St. Methodius, who was transferred from Patara in Lycia to Tyre, but continued to be called bishop of Patara (4). To this instance Pagi well observes that Leontius, who alone styles Methodius bishop of Patara, does not destroy the force of a rule, nor does one exception much injure its application. Again, Methodius was better known as bishop of Patara, for, while in that see, he wrote

(1) PHILOSTORGIVS : b. 2, c. 17.

(2) THEODORET : b. 2, c. 3.

(3) Ibid. b. 9, c. 14.

(4) LEONTIVS : Sects. act. 3.

his books. Before we leave this topic of episcopal translation, we may remark, with Sirmond, Pagi, and Roncaglia, that, if St. Denis the Areopagite had been transferred from Athens to Paris, it is strange that such translation has never been cited by those olden writers who have defended the occasional usefulness of such procedure. Other instances they have gladly mentioned, but in regard to this early example they have been silent (1). We shall conclude our reflections on this subject by remarking that both the Acts of St. Denis of Paris, and the Life of St. Genevieve, cited by Alexandre, assert that St. Denis was ordained by St. Clement and sent into Gaul. Now if he was ordained by St. Clement, he was not the Areopagite, for the Apostolic Constitutions (2) and the Latin and Greek Martyrologies inform us that the latter was ordained by St. Paul.

By the middle of the fourth century, Christianity had conquered the south and east of Gaul, but in the far north and in the west, St. Martin (316-400) found Paganism yet flourishing. In the year 314, a Council of Western bishops was held at Arles, but we do not know how many Gallic prelates were present. At the Council of Nice, in 325, only one Gallic bishop is recorded as subscribing. Arianism did not make much progress in Gaul, although Constantius, its protector, caused a second council of Arles, in 353, to condemn St. Athanasius. Thanks principally to the learning and courage of St. Hilary of Poitiers, the faith of Nice stood firm; only Saturnine of Arles, among the bishops, remained obstinate, and the synods of Beziers, in 356, and of Paris, in 360, suspended all communion with the Arians. In 384, the heresy of the Priscillianists, which made some progress in Spain, was condemned by a synod at Bordeaux. But in the beginning of the fifth century, the Goths and Vandals, infected with Arianism, burst into Gaul, and the churches and clergy suffered much at their hands. The Franks, however, under the glorious rule of their kings, remained faithful to the Church, and when the storm passed, religion continued to develop.

(1) Auxilius, in his book to Leo of Nola, defending Pope Formosus because he had left the see of Porto for that of Rome, cites many instances, but says nothing of St. Denis. In the ninth century, Popes Adrian II. (epist. 57) and Stephen VI. (epist. 1) both justify the translation of bishops by early precedents, but are silent in the matter of St. Denis.

(2) Book 7, c. 46.

CHAPTER VII.

THE DISCIPLINE OF THE SECRET.

From the fact that in the very early days of the Christian Church there seems to have prevailed a deep silence in regard to certain doctrines, Protestant writers contend that such teachings were unknown to our ancestors in the faith. While this silence is by no means so profound as our opponents declare it to be, and while so purely negative an argument would not be very weakening to the Catholic system, yet it behooves the student to examine the bearings of the adverse position, and to form a judgment as to its strength. When this is done, it will be found that out of that very silence, from which much is hoped, there comes a voice proclaiming, in no dubious accents, the antiquity of the doctrines in question. It will be seen that the first Christian pastors enjoined upon the faithful the observance of a certain Disciplina Arcani, or Discipline of the Secret, according to which the knowledge of certain doctrines was jealously withheld, not only from Pagans and Jews, but even from the postulants preparing for baptism. So convincing are the proofs of the existence of some such rule on the part of the early Christians, that Protestant historians (1) readily admit them, but endeavor to attenuate their influence by assigning the introduction of the discipline to the end of the second century, and by confining its objects to the inhibition of certain rites to the Jews and Pagans. Matthew Pfaff, also a Protestant, agrees with Catholic authors in asserting that the rule in question was established in the days of the Apostles, and that it prohibited not only a participation in certain ceremonies, but even the very knowledge of certain dogmas. (2)

St. Basil the Great, in his book on the Holy Ghost, chap. 27, speaking of the Secret, says: "The Apostles and fathers, who in the beginning arranged ecclesiastical affairs, in silence and in secrecy preserved the dignity of the mysteries. For that is not a mystery which is wafted to the imprudent and popular ear." The testimony of St. Basil is certainly of great weight with one who wishes to form an idea of the opinions of that day, and he lived from 328 to 379. But Tertullian, who goes further back, (150-230) tells us of the heretics of his time, (1) "I must not omit a description of the heretical customs; how futile, how earthly, how human they are; without gravity, without authority, without discipline; in fine, fitting to their faith. Firstly, it is uncertain who is a catechumen and who a believer. Alike they approach, alike they hear, alike they pray. Even when the Pagans come in, the holy things and pearls, albeit false ones, are flung to the dogs." Scarcely a century had passed since the Apostles made their regulations, when these words were written, and here we find accused of acting without authority and discipline, those who presumed to manifest certain doctrines to the Gentiles. Had such a custom not been antagonistic to primitive law, even the impetuous Tertullian would scarcely have made such an ebullition. But in his Apology, chap. 7, this father affords us perhaps a better argument. The Pagans had charged the Christians with secretly celebrating the Thyestean banquets. (2) Refuting the calumny, Tertullian brings forward the discipline of the Secret, declaring that even if the Christians were guilty of such atrocities, the crimes could not be discovered, as no strangers were admitted to the reunions, and the participants were prohibited to reveal any of the proceedings. He says: "If we always lie hidden, when was revealed what we perform? And by whom could it be revealed? Not by the guilty parties, for silence is imposed in regard to all the mysteries . . . If they have not betrayed themselves, then the revelation came from strangers. But whence did the strangers receive the information, when reverent efforts always keep the profane at a distance?" According to Tertullian, therefore, the secret discipline was

(1) Cassaubon, Basnage, Tentzel, Le Clerc. (2) Last diss. on theological prejudices, § 13.

(1) Præscript., chap. 41.

(2) Thyestes, son of Pelops and brother of Atreus, committed adultery with the latter's wife, and to revenge himself, Atreus caused him to eat the flesh of his own son.

in full vigor, not only in his time, but had come down from the days of Tiberius—Apostolic times.

An objection against the existence of the Secret, regarded as a concealment of certain doctrines, is adduced from the command of Christ to preach the new Gospel from the house-tops. But nothing can be found in this command which can militate either for or against the system. As the context shows, our Lord wished to show that in matters of faith the injunctions and threats of men were to be of no weight in the scale of our duty. He immediately adds that we should not fear those who can kill the body, but cannot kill the soul. And we read in Matth., c. 7, that we should not throw holy things to dogs, nor pearls to swine. Both commands were admirably reconciled by the Church when on the one hand she sent her martyrs to painful death, and on the other, in her Secret Discipline, she kept the unbaptized in ignorance of certain doctrines which as yet they "could not bear."

The Apology of St. Justin is sometimes adduced to show that, in the time of that father, the secret system was not yet in vogue. This document was presented by the martyr to Antoninus Pius, who reigned 138–161, and in it we find a plain, though succinct, account of the doctrines of Baptism and the Eucharist, and also a narrative of the doings of the Christians in their hidden assemblies. It is strange, we are told, that St. Justin would so violate an important law of the Church. But from the contents of this Apology we must logically conclude neither that there was a disobedience on the part of St. Justin, nor that, as is urged, the law did not exist. The Church has always varied her discipline according to the adjuncts of time, place, and circumstances; now mitigating it, now rendering it more severe, in order that, without a sacrifice of essentials, she might be all things to all men. The circumstances of the Christians in the days of St. Justin were peculiar. Fearful rumors of Christian wickedness were rampant; it was even believed that in their secret meetings, new-born infants were slain, their blood imbibed, and their flesh devoured. It became necessary then that some responsible person should be permitted, nay, probably enjoined, to inform the Pagan world as to what was promulgated and what done in those mysterious conclaves about which gossip so wildly raved. Hence St. Justin addressed the emperor and the senate, informing them especially of the nature of the Eucharistic sacrifices, between which and the fearful rites of the Thyeſtean banquets there was no real analogy. And the very fact of the spread of this terrible accusation conclusively proves that the real nature of the Eucharistic mystery must have been hitherto carefully hidden from the Gentiles, or, in other words, it shows the preceding existence of the Secret Discipline.

Let us now approach the subject matter of the system. Protestant critics generally hold that it embraced merely certain rites of worship, and not certain heads of doctrine. As has been already hinted, the elucidation of this point is of importance, since Protestants found an argument against the antiquity of some Catholic teachings, upon the silence thereon of the fathers. Now Origen (185-254) alludes to this silence, and gives a reason for it. His antagonist Celsus, having designated Christian doctrine as clancularia, he presses him as follows, "Since he often calls our doctrine a secret one, he must be refuted, for our teachings are better known to the entire world, than are the whims of the philosophers. Who knows not that Jesus was born of the Virgin, affixed to the cross, and risen from the dead; that there is to come a judgment by which the unjust will be visited with merited suffering and punishment? Is not the mystery of the resurrection on the tongue of the infidels, so that their ignorance is ridiculous? Certainly, then, he is silly who calls our doctrine a hidden one. Of course there are certain more recondite teachings, not manifested to all, and this method is common to Christianity and philosophy, for this latter has some things acroamatic and some things exoteric (1). To some of the disciples of Pythagoras, it was more than sufficient to hear that he had "so said." Anything stronger than the above can scarcely be desired for the defence of our position,

(1) The doctrines openly taught were called Exoteric; those manifested to a favored few, were styled acroamatic or Esoteric.

but it may be well to enter a little into detail, and see whether the olden writers allude by name to any of the aëroamatic doctrines. The most sublime of all Christian dogmas is that of the Unity and Trinity in God. Facing an idolatrous world with the fundamental teaching that there is but one God, the Church felt it to be more prudent to withhold the companion doctrine of a Trinity of Persons from her catechumens until their minds had been prepared by grace and discipline to properly, albeit inadequately, understand it. When this time arrived, that is, a few days before the reception of baptism, the appointed catechist unfolded the tremendous article of divine faith. In his sixth Catechism, no. 29, St. Cyril of Jerusalem plainly shows us both the fact and the economy of the Church in this matter. Addressing the candidate, he says: "To thee who art come forth from the ranks of catechumens, the Church now manifests these mysteries which it is not the custom to lay open to the Gentiles; for we do not show the infidel what pertains to the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, nor even to the catechumens do we speak openly about the mysteries; and this in order that the informed faithful may understand, and the uninformed may not be injured." St. Cyril was born in the year 315, and it may be alleged that such testimony does not affect the Protestant assertion that the concealment of certain dogmas was introduced only towards the close of the second century. But the holy bishop expressly states the reasons of such concealment, and they are such as to apply slightly indeed to the circumstances of his time, but with overwhelming force to the adjuncts of the primitive Church. St. Cyril wrote at a time when Christianity was comparatively triumphant, while Paganism was relegated to the nooks of the empire. People were better instructed as to truth than they were in the days when a monument was erected in Portugal, thanking Nero "for having purged the province of robbers and of those who were teaching the human race a new superstition." A Tacitus could not at that time accuse the followers of the Lamb of God of cherishing an insatiable hatred against humanity (1), nor would a Suetonius have numbered among the meritorious works of a sovereign, the persecution of Christians as a superstitious and malefic sect" (1). There was then comparatively little reason for a continuance of the Secret Discipline in the time of St. Cyril, and it was probably kept in force because of the conservative instincts of the Church which render her slow to change without necessity, and because of the deep impression produced upon her catechumens by the practised reticence. We must in conclusion suppose that, if the system was carried out when there was no apparent necessity for it, it was obligatory when both moral and physical circumstances would have prompted its adoption. The saintly and eloquent prelate of Milan, Ambrose, (340—397) tells us, in his twentieth epistle, to his sister, that he was accustomed to dismiss the catechumens, and to then explain the Creed to the competent.

(1) Annals, b. 15, c. 44.

As for a reticence in regard to the Eucharistic doctrine, we find an argument for it in an epistle of Pope St. Julius I., who was elected in 337. In his letter to the Eusebians, he gravely rebukes them for having spoken of the Blessed Sacrament in the presence of Jews and Pagans. His words are: "Before the prefect and his followers, and in the presence of Jews and Pagans, a question was put, concerning the chalice and the table. This would have been incredible, had it not been proved by documents. That which caused us to wonder, will, I think, produce the same effect upon you: that a question upon the Body and Blood of Christ. . . before an outside judge (2), in the presence of catechumens, and what was more unworthy, before Pagans and Jews. . . was held."

St. Augustine tells us (3), that in his day, if catechumens were asked if they were fed with the Body of Christ and if they drank His Blood, they would not know what was meant by the question; which certainly shows that at that time the doctrine of the Real Presence was limited to the baptized, for whatever interpretation Protestants may give to that doctrine, they must admit that when the holy bishop of Hippo uses the phrase above given, he alludes to the Holy

(1) Life of Nero, c. 16.(2) "Externum."(3) Tract 11th on John, No. 3.

Communion, understood in some way or another. Thus speaks St. Augustine : "If we ask a catechumen, 'Dost thou believe in Christ?' he will answer 'I believe,' and will sign himself. Now he carries on his forehead the cross of his Lord, and is not ashamed of it—behold he believes in His name. If then we ask him, 'Dost thou eat the Flesh of the Son of Man, and dost thou drink His Blood?' he knows not what we say, for Jesus has not given Himself to him."

Before demonstrating the usefulness of the Discipline of the Secret, we must remark that the existence of this system does not at all weaken the argument for the divinity of Christianity, which is drawn from the difficulties attending its propagation. One of the greatest of these difficulties is formed by the dogmas of the Trinity and the Eucharist—the one so imperative in its demands upon faith, and in its apparent contradictions of sense; and the other so apparently antagonistic to the fundamental idea of Divine Unity, and so incomprehensible in its presentation of the personal relations in the Divinity. It may seem that if these great obstacles to conversion were removed from sight, there would be nothing so wonderful in the quick propagation of the faith, as to necessitate the supposition of a divine intervention as a means of accounting for it. But we must remember that these doctrines were kept hidden only for a time, and then, with their presentation to the neophyte, the difficulties in question would arise. And there were other doctrines and duties which were inculcated at once, and which of themselves were well calculated to give birth to difficulty. Such were the necessity of curbing the depraved instincts of unbridled passion, and the many logical consequences of such restraint. Then, above all, there was the law of divine charity, with its manifold permeations through the chain of human obligations; and to this law, unless enlightened and strengthened by divine grace, no self-sufficient Pagan would have bent his stubborn neck.

And now for the usefulness of the Secret Discipline. But little need be said on this point, as from the preceding remarks sufficient may be gathered to show that the Church displayed no puerility in the premises. As for the charges of inhumanity, we fail to see how the most extravagant hyper-criticism can discover any foundation for it. And where was the silliness in preparing a weak mind for the reception of difficult truth? Is the physician silly who, though he knows his patient to be in need of nourishment, causes him to abstain from the more solid food until his stomach is in a condition to bear it? St. Cyril of Jerusalem (1) illustrates the economy of the Church in these words, "When the instruction is delivered, if a catechumen asks you what the teachers have been saying, answer him not, for we have taught thee a mystery and the hope of the world to come. Keep the secret for Him who will give the reward. Let no one perchance say to thee, 'what harm will there be if I also learn?' Sick persons often ask for wine, and if it is unseasonably given them, it produces frenzy. Then two evils arise—the patient dies, and the physician is blamed. So it happens if a catechumen learns a mystery from a believer; for the catechumen suffers from frenzy. He understands not what he hears, disparages the whole matter, and receives it with sneers; at the same time the believer is condemned as a traitor." St. Augustine (2) assigns another motive for this treatment of postulants. The Church, he supposes, wished to inflame their zeal of knowledge, to excite them to a desire of receiving baptism, by presenting to them that sacrament as a portal, through which alone they could pass into the coveted regions of mystery.

And now we approach the real centre of interest excited by the ancient Discipline of the Secret. Protestant critics would scarcely have tried to disprove its existence, and that failing, to discredit its Apostolic origin, had they not discovered in it a most convincing proof of the antiquity of the Catholic doctrine of Transubstantiation. And certainly the Eucharistic theories of Calvin, Zwingli, &c., could but produce little impression upon men who saw, in the history of the first Christian centuries, undoubted evidence that their ancestors in the faith believed the Blessed Sacrament to be precisely that which it was held to be by the obedient children of Leo X.; namely, truly and indeed the Body and Blood of Jesus Christ, present therein, not in any figurative or spiritual manner, but in reality, and by a Transubstantiation of the elements. Besides the testimonies we have adduced to show the care exercised by the Church of the first centuries in shielding the dignity of the mysteries, not only from any approach of Jews and Pagans, but even of her own postulants, we might fortify our position by quotations from Athenagoras, Minucius Felix, the author of the Recognitions attributed to Pope St. Clement, and many others, but enough has been brought forth to convince a candid mind that the diligence displayed would have had no reason of existence had the early Christians regarded the consecrated elements as being still in substance mere bread and wine. On the contrary, in the supposition that the Catholic position is correct, we at once perceive a reasonableness in the Arcanum. The mystery was sublime, to a degree beyond any conception of the human imagination; the minds of the catechumens were as yet "of the earth, earthly" and comparatively imbecile as to the things of God; well might the Church refuse to lift the veil of the Secret until the weak candidate had made progress in humility, and until he had become convinced of the truth of divine revelation; well might she prefer to first familiarize the postulant with the prodigies performed by Christ and His saints, ere she demanded from him the prostration of his intellect, and the abdication of his senses in so recondite and tremendous a dogma. But why should she consult the imbecility of the human mind, why respect so assiduously the dignity of the mysteries, if Christ were only figuratively present, if that dignity were such as arose only from bread and wine? Had the Eucharistic teaching of the Church been of so easy an interpretation as the Protestant theory would imply, then indeed the drawing over it a mystic veil would have been silly and puerile. Nay, when we reflect upon the terrible calumnies which the Pagans put forth as to the cannibalistic practices of the Christians in their secret assemblies, we must say that it would have been the imperative duty of the Church to lift a curtain, for which there was no necessity.

(1) Pro-cat., No. 12.(2) Traet 96 on John.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE EASTER CONTROVERSY.

In the second century of the Christian era, there was a great difference among the churches, as to the time for the celebration of Easter. Those of Asia Minor, following, they said, the instructions of St. John the Evangelist and St. Philip, celebrated the Pasch, as did the Jews, on the fourteenth day of the March moon; while the other churches, following that of Rome, and relying upon the authority of Sts. Peter and Paul, postponed the celebration until the following Sunday. Imitating the example of our Lord, the Asiatics ate the paschal lamb on the evening of the fourteenth day; some of them then terminated the lenten fast, others observed it for two days more. As with us now, so then, the Resurrection was celebrated by the Asiatics on the third day after the paschal meal; hence, when the fourteenth day fell at any other time than Thursday, the feast of the Resurrection could not be kept on the proper day, Sunday. But outside of Asia Minor, the paschal lamb was not eaten until the night of Saturday, and the Easter was always kept on a Sunday (1). This diversity of rite caused no little scandal, and might well be regarded by the infidels as indicative of a kind of schism. It certainly appeared strange that one church should be buried in grief and wrapped in mourning, while another was filled with joy. And this diversity bore its fruit through the entire ecclesiastical year, for upon the date of Easter depended the dates of all the movable feasts. It is not strange, then, that there arose a controversy, which owing to the unwillingness of Rome to enforce her discipline, where faith was not concerned, and where greater evils were to be apprehended, was not ended until the time of the Council of Nice ; indeed, among the Britons and Scots, the seventh century had closed before the Roman discipline was thoroughly adopted. The dispute commenced about the year 160, when St. Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna, came to Rome and consulted with Pope Anicetus on the matter. Eusebius tells us (1) that, "while Anicetus governed the Roman church, Irenaeus commemorates that Polycarp, who was yet alive, came to Rome, and had a colloquy with Anicetus about the controversy as to what day the Pasch should be celebrated." But the Pontiff could not prevail upon Polycarp to give up what was already an old custom. However, as we learn from St. Irenaeus (2), "they parted in peace, and all the churches, those who kept the Pasch on the fourteenth day, and those who did not, continued to enjoy tranquillity among themselves." But about the year 194, in the Pontificate of Victor, the dispute became more vivid. The Montanists were asserting (and with them a Roman priest, named Blastus) that Christians are obliged, by divine law, to celebrate the Pasch with the Jews, and the Pontiff feared that any further delay in settling the controversy would result in the Asiatics becoming infected with this error. Accordingly he ordered the metropolitans, throughout the Church, to hold synods in their respective provinces, to consult as to the Paschal discipline, and to report to the Holy See their conclusions. Among the letters which came to Rome in answer to the Pontifical command, were some from the bishops of Palestine, declaring that the Asiatic abuse was now entrenching upon matters of faith. This made Pope Victor the more determined, and he wrote to Polycrates, bishop of Ephesus, commanding him to convoke a synod of all the bishops of Asia Minor, and communicate to them the Pontifical resolve to excommunicate all who would continue to keep the Pasch on the fourteenth day. Eusebius (3) tells us the result. "For this reason are collected the bishops in synods and assemblies ; and all are of one mind, issuing ecclesiastical decrees to all the churches, to the effect that the Resurrection of the Lord be celebrated

(1) When it is said that the Asiatics kept the Pasch on the fourteenth of the March moon, it is not meant that on that day they celebrated the Resurrection, but that then they ate the paschal lamb. This has been proved by the erudite Jesuit, DANIEL, in an apposite dissertation, and by MOSHEIM, Hist., 2d cent., § 71.

(1) History, i., 4, c. 13.

(2) Epist. to Pope Victor, in EUSEBIUS, b. 5, c. 24.

(3) History, b. 5, c. 23.

only on Sunday. We have even now the rescript of those who met for this reason in Palestine, over whom presided Theophilus of Caesarea, and Narcissus, bishop of Jerusalem. At Rome also a synod was held under the presidency of Victor. And another, of the bishops of Pontus, under the venerable Palma. Also, one of the dioceses of Gaul, which Irenaeus governed. And another, of the prelates of Isrlcena, and the cities therein; especially one of Branchillus, bishop of Corinth. And all of these issue the same decree. However, over the bishops of Asia Minor, who declared that they must cling to the custom handed down to them of old, presided Polycrates, who, in a letter sent to Victor and the Roman Church, explains the tradition observed down to his time, in these words: 'We celebrate the Paschal day inviolate; great luminaries have died in Asia—Philip, one of the twelve Apostles, and John, who reclined on the breast of the Lord, Polycarp, &c.—these all observed the day of Pasch on the fourteenth day of the month, according to the Gospel, preserving the rule of faith in everything.'" The bishops of Asia Minor gained their point, for, as we shall see, Pope Victor did not carry out his threat of excommunication. The affair remained as a bone of contention, though it never culminated into anything like schism, until the year 325, when the first general Council of Nice decided that throughout the world, the feast of Easter should be celebrated on the Sunday following the fourteenth moon, after the vernal equinox. The Britons and Scots, from the year 566, for about a century, labored under an error in this matter which was peculiar to themselves, and of which we shall speak at the close of the chapter.

Concerning the action of Pope Victor in this Paschal controversy, there are several points to be elucidated. Learned men have differed as to whether Pope Victor really excommunicated the Asiatics. Protestants have asserted that he did fulminate his censure. but that the prelates laughed at it; the best of Catholic critics generally hold that the Pontiff was content with a threat; that such was the sense of the phrase used by Eusebius, "he tried to cut them off from the community of the Church (1)." Mosheim

(1) Ibi, b. 5, c. 24.

(1), Potter (2), and Le Clerc (3) agree in holding that at that time the Roman Pontiff had no jurisdiction over Asia, and that the action of Victor was one of the first instances of Papal attempts at usurpation. The limits of our work do not permit of any extended defence of Pope Victor, nor, indeed, does his conduct, so far as history presents it, need any patronage. We shall merely observe that he did not act merely upon his own impulse ; long before he proceeded against the Asiatics, he took the opinions of the bishops of Palestine, Pontus, Mesopotamia, Corinth, and Gaul ; when he finally did act, he spoke at the head of a Roman synod. Neither St. Irenaeus nor Polycrates accuse the Pontiff of arrogating to himself any undue authority, and one great proof that his action was justifiable, is found in its confirmation by the Council of Nice. St. Irenaeus certainly “decently admonished” Victor, as Eusebius has it, lest he should cut off from communion so many bishops, but he agreed as to the Paschal decree. Polycrates certainly resisted the Pontiff ; and there have ever been, are, and ever will be, men to do likewise ; but that is no argument against the legitimacy of the Papal authority. We now proceed to the solution of various questions arising from the Paschal controversy.

Did this controversy regard a matter of faith, or one of discipline ? We must reply that it was a dispute as to a more disciplinary matter, although, at the time that Pope Victor took his decisive stand, the question bade fair to yet encroach upon the domain of faith. Certainly there was in the Church a difference of opinion, and a difference of practice, as to the Paschal time, and that variety had been expressly tolerated by the Holy See. In matters of faith, however, there can be no room for doubt, no scope for variety. Therefore, Pope Victor, Irenaeus, Polycrates, and all those connected with the controversy, must have looked upon it as one of discipline. Had it been regarded by St. Irenaeus as a question of faith, he would not have deterred the Pontiff from anathematizing the recusants. Nor can it be urged that the rebellious in this matter were afterwards condemned as heretics, and styled Quatuordecimani, or "devotees of the fourteenth," and that as such they are numbered among heretics by Sts. Epiphanius and Augustine, and by Theodoret. They were not condemned as heretics before the Council of Nice, and then it was because they were reviving, so far as in them lay, the Mosaic Law, by joining its observances to the Gospel; they were not condemned as heretics, merely because they kept the Pasch on the fourteenth day of the March moon. The Church looked upon them as heretics because, as St. Epiphanius says (1). "They taught certain things which are not consonant with her institutions and doctrine, for they clung to Jewish fables." Before the Council of Nice, one could apply to the Asiatics of this question the words which St. Augustine afterwards applied to the Donatists, in the matter of rebaptizing heretics (2), "The obscurity of this opinion forced great men, and bishops endowed with great charity, so to contend among themselves, communion unbroken, that for a long time synods established a diversity of statutes in their respective regions, until at last a General Council, removing all doubt, decided what was, with safety, to be held."

(1) Christianity before Constantine, 2d cent., § 72.

(2) Spirit of the Church, v. 2.

(3) History, years 194 and 196.

Now we come to the question whether Pope Victor reduced to action his threat to excommunicate the recusant prelates of Asia Minor. We cannot arrive at certainty in this matter, but the probabilities would seem to demand a negative response. Eusebius (3) says, "Influenced by these things, Victor, who then governed the Roman Church, tried to cut off from the common unity of the Church all the churches of Asia and other neighboring ones, as being of another faith and opinion, and inveighed strongly against them by letter; and he decreed that all the brethren inhabiting that region should be entirely excluded from communion." We gather from these words that the mind of the Pontiff was resolved upon a future excommunication, but from the next words of the historian it seems plain that the sentence was never pronounced. "But this did not please the other bishops. They therefore earnestly exhorted him to the contrary, that he might keep a diligent care for peace, charity, and concord with his neighbors. Their words, sharply and bitterly reproaching Victor, are yet extant. Among them, Irenaeus, though he wrote in the name of the Gallic brethren whom he governed, declaring indeed that the feast of the Lord's Resurrection should be kept only on Sunday, nevertheless admonished Victor not to cut off from the body of the Church of Christ so many churches because of an observance of an ancient tradition received among them." It is not probable that St. Irenaeus would have so spoken, had the anathema been already proclaimed. Eusebius gives a fragment of the letter of Irenaeus (1), in which the saint quotes the course pursued by the predecessors of Victor, and it is quite probable that the Pontiff concluded to follow in the path they had marked out. It is objected that as Pope Victor excommunicated the Roman priest Blastus for celebrating the Pasch on the fourteenth day, so it is not probable that he made an exception in favor of the Asiatics. But it should be noted that Blastus was bound to follow the discipline of his diocese; by abandoning it, he subjected himself to censure. Again, Blastus was not anathematized because of his opinion as to the date of the Pasch, but on account of his conjunction of Mosaicism with Christianity (2), and because he had become a Valentinian (3). There is a passage in the works of St. Epiphanius (4), in which it is asserted that the Eastern and Western Churches were so divided on this question, as to cease from any pacific interchange of letters, but this would only indicate a bitter feeling, not necessarily a rupture of communion. Sozomenus was well acquainted with the writings of St. Epiphanius, and yet he tells us (5), "I think that the controversy on this matter was most wisely settled by Victor, then bishop of Rome, and by Polycarp of Smyrna. For when the priests of the West deemed that the tradition of Peter and Paul was not to be contemned, and the Asiatics declared

(1) Heresies, 50.(2) On Baptism, against the Donatists, b. 7, c. 7.(3) History, b. 5, c. 24.

(1) Ibid., c. 25.

(2) See the Supplement to Tertullian's Prescriptions, c. 53.

(3) THEODORET, Fables, b. 1, c. 23.

(4) Heresies, 70.

(5) History, b. 7, c. 19.

that they followed John, a common decree was sanctioned, whereby, each one celebrating the feast (as they had been accustomed to do), they did not dissolve the mutual communion. For they considered it frivolous, and rightly, to segregate, for the sake of a custom, those who agreed on the principal points of religion." With regard to this question of Pope Victor's excommunication of the Asiatics, several erudite writers, men of excellent judgment in matters of criticism, have held that the sentence was pronounced (1). Their chief arguments are as follows: First, they insist upon the positive language of Eusebius, and hold that it implies far more than a mere threat upon the part of the Pontiff. One passage of the historian is certainly very favorable to their theory (2). "Having sent letters to all the brethren who were there (Asia), he proscribed them, and pronounced them entirely foreign from the unity of the Church." As for the intercession of St. Irenaeus, that occurred, say some, between the utterance of the threat and the fulfilment of the sentence; it is believed by Tillemont to have been made after the promulgation of the excommunication, and to have been a prayer for its abrogation. These authors rely considerably on the testimony of the historian Socrates (3), which is strong in their favor. When they are told that this writer's testimony is of dubious value in the premises, since, as a Novatian, it was his interest to depreciate Pope Victor, and since, also, whenever he is actuated by party spirit, he is an unmitigated liar (4), they answer that Socrates is not unsupported. Baronio and Scheelestrate hold that Pope Victor excommunicated the Asiatics because they contended that the Pasch should necessarily be celebrated on the fourteenth day; to

(1) SCHEELESTRATE: Antiquities of the Church, p. 2, PAGI; on Baronio, year 196. TILLEMONT; vol. 3. MASSIET, Dissert. præf. on St. Irenaeus. RONCAGLIA, note to Alexandre's Dissert. V. in 2nd Cent.

(2) History, b. 5, c. 24.

(3) History, b. 5 c. 21.

(4) The following instances of mendacity on the part of Socrates are noted by Alexandre. In the cited chapter, he asserts that the Roman Church observes only three weeks of Lent, while his contemporary, Pope St. Leo, is a witness (Sermon 4, on Lent) to the fact that throughout the West, the full Lenten fast was respected. In the same place he says that Rome allowed the Lenten fast to be suspended on Saturday, just as on Sundays, while we know that the fast was unbroken, from Augustine's Epistle to Casulanus, 86. In his book 6, chap. 3, he says that St. John Chrysostom "was given rather to anger, than to observance," that in his conversations he was "insolent," and that he was justly deposed "because he had deprived the Novatians and Quartodecimans of their churches."

this Roncaglia sensibly replies that if they had gone so far, no Catholic would have communicated with them, even before the sentence of the Pontiff; no Irenaeus would have interceded for them, and certainly the Pope would not have restored them to communion.

The Gallican school, now happily relegated to the realms of history, was fond of citing this controversy on the Pasch as furnishing an argument against Papal infallibility. Had the Christians of those days believed in the inerrability of the Pontifical teachings, neither the Asiatics nor St. Irenaeus, it said, would have acted as they did. But, as we have seen, throughout the whole dispute between Victor and the Asiatics, there was not for a moment a question of faith. And had the bishops of Asia Minor resisted the Pontiff because they thought that he erred in a matter of faith, they must also have denied the infallibility of the Universal Church, for it is certain that, with the exception of themselves, the whole Church held that the Pasch should be celebrated on the Sunday following the fourteenth day of the March moon.

The Council of Nice finally put an end to this famous dispute. In the Synodical Epistle to the church of Alexandria (1), the fathers say, "As for our unanimous consent as to the celebration of the Paschal Feast, know that through your prayers the controversy, held on that matter, has been prudently and conveniently settled; so that all the brethren who live in the East, and who hitherto have been used to imitate the custom of the Jews in the observance of that Feast, will hereafter follow, with consenting minds as to its celebration, us Romans, and all of you, who have from the earliest times clung to our method of keeping it." In the Epistle sent by the emperor Constantine to all the churches, he gives the following reasons why the fathers of Nice issued the decree (2): "It seemed unworthy that we should celebrate that most holy festival with a copy of the Jewish rites and customs (copying those, that is), who are properly held in the blind error of their souls because they polluted their hands with a horrible wickedness. . . . there are those who celebrate a second Pasch in the same year. And why should we imitate those, who are certainly afflicted with the malady of error? Those who celebrated the Pasch on the fourteenth moon, caring nothing for the equinox, sometimes did so after the equinox, sometimes before it, because the fourteenth moon rose at that time. And it is a great shame that there should reign dissension in regard to so solemn a feast of our religion; it is indecorous that on the same day some should be fasting, and some banqueting; that after the Pasch, some should be fasting because of the remission of their sins, and others be yet in the prescribed fasts. I myself thought that your Wisdom would easily assent, that what is unanimously observed in the city of Rome, in Italy, in all Africa, in Egypt, Spain, Gaul, Britain, Libya, throughout Greece, in the Asiatic diocese, in Pontus and Cilicia, should be willingly observed by you. . . . Since things are so, accept this decree as a gift of God, and a command truly sent down from Heaven; for whatever is agreed upon in the holy Councils of the bishops, must be attributed to the Divine Will." The reader will observe that Constantine here places Britain among the countries which followed the Roman tradition as to the celebration of Easter. This fact is worthy of note, as the Centuriators of Magdeburg, and other Protestant critics, have asserted that Britain received her first Christian instruction, not from Rome, but from the East. Constantine was born and bred in Britain (1), and probably knew of what he was talking. Had the Britons received their religion from the East, it is improbable that they would have held the Roman discipline as to the Pasch. This remark brings us to a very interesting phase of the Paschal controversy, namely, that which was presented by the British Isles, when, for more than a century, they followed a custom, in this matter, peculiar to themselves.

(1) THEODORET; History, b. 1, c. 2.

(2) Ibid., c. 10.

We would draw the reader's attention to the following remarks of the erudite Dr. Moran, now archbishop of Sydney (2): "Some reader, unacquainted with the records of

(1) BEDE: Eccles. Hist. of the Angles, b. 1, c. 8.

(2) Origin, Doctrines, and Discipline of the Early Irish Church, c. 1.

Ireland in her first ages of faith, may be surprised at seeing Scotia marked by St. Prosper as the field of Palladius' apostolate. However, in the fifth century Ireland was the only country known by the name of Scotia. This was at one time a matter of angry discussion; but at length all controversy has ceased. The researches of the Scottish antiquaries themselves, and their open acknowledgment of the fallacy of the opinion which referred that name to modern Scotland, have set this question at rest for ever. We shall, therefore, on this head, merely remark with Dr. Todd, that 'Whoever reads the works of Bede and Adamnan, will not need to be informed that, even in their times, Scotia meant no country but Ireland, and Scots no people but the inhabitants of Ireland' "(1).

The Scots, or, to use the more modern name, the Irish, received the Christian faith at the hands of St. Patrick in the year 432. The Britons may have received some knowledge of the faith before the second century, but positive evidence can be adduced for such reception only in the Pontificate of Pope Eleutherius in 182. The British church was driven to the mountains of Wales by the Saxon conquest in 454; the conversion of the Saxons was commenced in 596, and consummated in about eighty years. The Christians of Britain and Scotia were preserved by their isolated position from the heresies which agitated the East, and with the exception of a short inroad from Pelagianism, they preserved the purity of the faith. But the Paschal controversy was destined to cause trouble in both countries. At the Council of Nice it had been determined that, since the date of Easter depended on astronomical observations, and the Egyptians excelled in such, the patriarch of Alexandria should annually communicate to the Roman See the proper time, to be made known to the distant churches. But again disputes arose, for the Roman and Alexandrian methods of computation were different; the cycle of Rome contained eighty-four years, that of Alexandria nineteen. About the middle of the sixth century, the

(1) The first author to apply the name Scotia to Scotland was Marianus Scotus, who died in 1086. The olden name was Alba, also Caledonia. The first Scotch settlement in Caledonia was made from "Greater" Scotia, or Hibernia, in 503.

Holy See adopted a new cycle of ninety-five years, or five Egyptian cycles. But the Britons and Scots, almost cut off from communication with Rome, continued the ancient manner of calculation. Originally, then, there was no difference between the Roman Church, on the one side, and the British and Scotch Christians on the other, with regard to the Easter question. We learn from Comm. de Rossi's work on Roman Inscriptions, that at the Council of Arles (314), where the cycle of eighty-four years was adopted for the computation of the Paschal time, there were British bishops present, and "it requires little sagacity to perceive that these prelates received their cycle, and the manner of computing Easter, from Pope Sylvester, and the corrections and changes which were subsequently made did not reach them, as they were so much separated from the continent of Europe as to be considered at the end of the earth. . . . Hence, we understand the origin of the famous controversies about the manner of keeping Easter in the British Churches; thus the fable of the Eastern origin of these churches, and of their peculiar Paschal rite, is exploded, and the union of the ancient British church with that of Rome is proved by a new argument." In the year 630, the bishops of Munster and Leinster celebrated a synod at Magh-lene to promote a settlement of the controversy. One of its most distinguished members was St. Cummian. He was deeply attached to the old traditions, and fully appreciated the fact that the Irish Easter method had been derived from St. Patrick. We shall allow him to speak his own sentiments, for they serve to confute those who hold that the early Irish were not united with Rome. "'An old authority,' says Jerome, 'rises up against me. In the meantime, I cry out, whosoever is joined to the chair of St. Peter, that man is mine.' What more? I turn to the words of the bishop of Rome, Pope Gregory, gifted with the appellation of the Golden Mouth, who, though he wrote after all, is deservedly preferred before all; and I find him thus writing on this passage of Job—Gold hath a place where it is melted, etc. 'The gold is the great body of the saints; the place of melting is the unity of the Church; the fire the sufferings of martyrdom ; he, therefore, who is tried by fire, and is outside of the Church, may be melted, but cannot be cleansed.' What can be deemed more injurious to Mother Church than to say, Rome errs, Jerusalem errs, Alexandria errs, Antioch errs, the whole world is in error ; only the Scots and Britons know what is right ? . . . Having, therefore, studied the matter for a year, I asked my fathers to declare to me, my elders to tell me (the successors, forsooth, of our first holy fathers, bishop Ailbe, Kieran of Clonmacnoise, Brendan, Nesson, Lugid) what they thought of our being separated from the above-mentioned Apostolic sees. And having met all together in the plain of Magh-lene, some in person, some by legates sent in their stead, they decreed that 'our predecessors, through meet witnesses, of whom some are yet living, while others sleep in peace, commanded us to humbly receive, without hesitation, whatever things were better and more estimable, whensoever they were approved of by the source of our baptism and wisdom, and brought to us from the successors of the Apostles of the Lord.' Afterwards they, of one accord, set forth to us, according to custom, a mandate upon this matter, to keep Easter, the coming year, in unison with the whole Church" (1). In accordance with the decree mentioned by St. Cumminian, legates were sent to Rome. They returned in 633 with the news that their Easter method was wrong. In the following year, a letter arrived from Pope Honorius. Ven. Bede tells us (2), "Pope Honorius sent letters to the Irish people, whom he found to err in the calculation of the Easter time, and he exhorted them not to regard their own small population, dwelling at the extreme end of the inhabited earth, as wiser than the churches of Christ, both ancient and modern, throughout the world ; and not to persist in keeping a Pasch different from their Pasch, and opposed by the Easter computations and synodical decrees of the bishops of the entire world." This letter was read in the synod of Lethglin in 635, and it settled forever the Paschal controversy in the south of Ireland. In the north, however, the old state of affairs lasted some time longer. The archbishop of Armagh wrote to Pope Severinus in 640, but the letter arrived after that Pontiff's death. The Roman clergy replied, censuring the Quartodecimans, but as the Irish protested their rite was simply the ancient rite of Rome, and that they also opposed the Quartodecimans, they believed themselves justified in holding on their course. As Dr. Moran says (1), "The Roman Church was subsequently too much distracted by other cares, and we find no decision on record regarding the Paschal controversy which was agitated in our island."

(1) Letter to Segienus, Abbot of Hy. See also Irish Glosses by STOKES.

(2) History, b. 2, c. 19.

The merit of putting an end to this dispute among the Saxons belongs to King Oswin. Among the many Irish monasteries celebrated, during the sixth and seventh centuries, as centres of learning, none were more distinguished than those of Hy and Lindisfarne. From them the Britons, Saxons, and Picts, drew treasures of religion and literature. St. Aidan, the founder of Lindisfarne, converted the Northumbrians, and became archbishop of North England. His second successor was Colman, who had been a monk of Hy, and was sent from there, according to Bede, to instruct the Angles. For a long time after the conversion of the Northumbrians, the Irish missionaries were all-powerful with prince and people; but when King Oswin married Eanfled, who had been educated in Kent, under Roman teachers, the Paschal difference drew his attention (2). To procure uniformity, he invited the two contending parties, in 664, to meet him at Whitby, and there dispute the question. The champion of the Roman computation was St. Wilfrid, at this time abbot of Ripon. He had been educated at Lindisfarne, but had acquired in Rome the new computation. Associated with Wilfrid was Agilbert, a Frenchman, who had studied in Ireland, and was then bishop of the West Saxons. The defence of the Irish cause was entrusted to St. Colman, and in his argument, he did not censure those who used the Roman cycle, but claimed the right to retain a custom founded by so many holy men. To this St. Wilfrid replied, "I believe that had they been rightly informed on the subject, they, too, would have conformed to the universal usage. You and your associates certainly commit sin if, after hearing the decrees of the Apostolic See, nay, of the Universal Church, and these confirmed by the holy Scriptures, you disdain to follow them. For although your fathers were saints, yet in their small number, in the very extremity of the world, they must not be preferred to the whole Church. And however holy and illustrious a performer of miracles your Columba was, is he to be preferred to the most blessed Prince of the Apostles?" The end of the discussion was that Oswin declared he would "not oppose the heavenly gate-keeper," so Wilfrid's side gained the day. We will dismiss this subject with the following quotation from Dr. Moran's valuable work (1): "One happy result, at least, followed from the conference at Whitby, that, forsooth, it preserved an indubious record of how the Irish and Roman clergy, even in the warmth of their controversy, were found of one accord asserting the prerogatives and supreme authority of St. Peter. St. Wilfrid and Agilbert were themselves, indeed, witnesses as to the teaching of the Irish schools, whilst Colman combined in himself the doctrine of Lindisfarne and Iona, nay more, of the whole Irish Church; for, on being expelled from his monastery by King Oswin, he retired to Ireland and founded there the monasteries of Inisbofin and Mayo, being venerated by all for his learning and sanctity. The learned Protestant dean of Ardagh (2), to whose singular opinions we have more than once referred in the preceding pages, thus comments on the Whitby conference:—Colman, when he found his opinions rejected, resigned his see of Lindisfarne, rather than submit to this decision of the king, thus furnishing us with a remarkable proof that the Irish bishops in the seventh century rejected the authority of the Pope. This, indeed, is singularly strange reasoning. His logical conclusions should rather have been—1. That as there was no exercise of the Pope's authority, St. Colman could not have resisted it. 2. That he even openly and expressly acknowledged the authority of Rome. 3. That he moreover furnishes us with a most striking proof of the opinion of the Irish church in the seventh century, that the judgment of the court or crown was very far from being decisive on matters of ecclesiastical discipline; and hence—4. That St. Colman would deem it strange, indeed, to be classed by the worthy dean amongst the members or abettors of the Anglican church.” (1)

(1) Loc. cit., p. 158.

(2) LINGARD; Antiquities of the Anglo-Saxon Church, c. 1.

(1) P. 3, c. 1.

(2) Dr. R. Murray. The book alluded to by Dr. Moran is entitled Ireland and her Church, London, 1845.

(1) Speaking of this difference of discipline prevalent, at one time, in the Roman and British churches, Lingard says: “On this circumstance the prejudice of party has endeavored to build a wild and extravagant system. Because the British Christians of the seventh century differed from the Roman Church in the time of celebrating Easter, it has been gratuitously asserted that they were Quartodecimans; that of consequence their fathers were of the same persuasion; and ultimately that the faith was planted in Britain by missionaries who were not sent from Rome, but from some of the Asiatic churches. The truth or falsehood of the latter hypothesis is of little consequence; yet it is certain that the Britons, in the time of St. Augustine, were not Quartodecimans, as they observed Easter on the fourteenth day of the moon, only when that day happened to be a Sunday; (Bede, b. III., c. 4) and that their ancestors were not Quartodecimans, is no less certain, if any credit be due to Eusebius (Hist., b. 5, c. 23), to Socrates (b. 5, c. 21), to Constantine, in his letter to the bishops (Euseb., b. 3, c. 14) and to the subscriptions of the British prelates to the Council of Arles (Spel. Conc., p. 40). I should not omit that Goodall (Introd. to Hist. Scot., Keith’s Catal. of Scottish Bishops, preface) asserts that the Scots employed the same cycle, and observed Easter on the same day as was customary in the Roman Church, previous to the Council of Nice. He founds his opinion on the ancient Paschal Table published by Bucher, in which the festival is fixed on the fourteenth day of the moon for the years 316 and 320.” Antiquities of the Anglo-Saxon Church, c. I.

“It is quite commonly believed that there is a law prohibiting Christians from celebrating the pasch on the same day with the Jews, and its existence is asserted in various works. But no such law exists, and it was never enforced. Pope Victor simply decreed that the pasch should not be celebrated, as is done by the Jews, on any day whatever of the week, but only on a Sunday. In fact, in the year following that of the Council of Nice, that is, 326, the Christian pasch coincided with that of the Jews, and it was so celebrated without any difficulty being raised. The same coincidence occurred in 1602, 1609, 1805, 1825, and in the next century, it will happen in 1903, 1923, 1954, 1981. In these years the pasch falls on a Sunday, and precisely on a day of full-moon. Therefore it is an error to suppose, as some do, that when the moon becomes full on a Sunday, the pasch is to be postponed to the following Sunday. On the contrary, the Council of Nice declares that, in such a case, the Sunday is especially opportune for the solemnity. And indeed, a postponement would carry the pasch to the 22nd day of the moon, that is, into its last quarter, which would be a direct contradiction of the will of the Council. . . . It would certainly be an improvement if Easter were made an immovable feast, and the Church ‘exercising her right, could freely do so’ (Explanation of the Roman Calendar, as restored by Pope Gregory XIII.; by Christopher Clavius, Rome, 1603). But the Church has preferred to retain the present system, both because of its antiquity—a great obstacle to any innovation—and because of ‘the recondite mysteries included in it.’” CANTU; Univ. Hist., Documents: art. Chronology, § 25.

CHAPTER IX.

CONTROVERSY REGARDING "THE FALLEN" UNDER PERSECUTION.

The constancy which our ancestors in the faith, generally speaking, exhibited under persecution, is so remarkable, that we rightly look upon it as one of the many proofs of the divinity of our holy religion. Their constancy was so different from the perseverance sometimes shown by the votaries of other creeds in similar circumstances, so void of obstinacy, petulancy, fanaticism, or fatalism, that the rationalist tries in vain to account for it on purely natural grounds. But there were some exceptions to this rule of constancy, in all of the persecutions, just as there was one in the very first assemblage of Christians that the world beheld. Especially, during the persecution of Decius, the number who denied their faith, directly or indirectly, was large. This persecution was far more ferocious, as we have seen, than any of the preceding ones, and it came upon the faithful with multiplied force, because they were comparatively enervated by a long period of rest. We have said that the number of the "fallen" was large in this persecution; we mean, not that a great many openly denied the One God, and sacrificed to the false deities of Paganism, but that many shrank from an open avowal, and availed themselves of an unworthy and cowardly scheme to escape from the consequences of unshaken fidelity. For the fallen must be divided into two classes, the "thurificators," or offerers of incense, and the libellatici, or those who took out pretended certificates of sacrifice. The name of the first class sufficiently indicates the status of its members, but an explanation is necessary to a full understanding of the meaning of the third term. Many of the magistrates, whom Decius ordered, under threat of condign punishment, to enforce his edict, were approachable by bribes; some also were of a clement disposition. Whether influenced by love of money or by sentiments of pity, these officers devised a means of avoiding the commanded act of sacrifice, which proved acceptable to many of the weaker Christians. This means consisted in taking from the official a certificate (libellus), which stated that the bearer had offered sacrifice to the gods. And as it was not necessary for the recipient to appear in person before the judge, since he could receive the saving document through an agent, he the more easily satisfied his conscience that he had not even seemed to deny Christ before the world. Had such persons simply bribed the judges to leave them in peace, to abstain from citing them before the tribunals, they would merely have manifested a weakness; but in the case of the certified, in the Decian persecution, their fellow citizens were led to believe that they had denied their God. And even though the giving of false certificates were so common and notorious, that it would always be doubtful whether, in this or that particular instance, the denial had really been pronounced, yet the certificated person was subject to the imputation, and therefore gave reason for grave scandal to his brethren. Hence the Church regarded the certified as ranking in guilt next to the sacrificers. St. Cyprian says, in his fifteenth epistle to the clergy of Rome, "When I found those who had tainted their hands and mouths with sacrilegious contracts, or had polluted their consciences with the execrable certificates, going around among the martyrs and confessors, importuning them for intercessory letters, without any discrimination or examination of each case, I wrote to those martyrs and confessors, that, so far as in me lay, I might recall them to the observance of the Lord's precepts." In another place (1), the saint compares the weakness of the certified with the conduct of Eleazar, as narrated in March. II., c. 6. "And lest any one take advantage of the wicked offer of the deceivers, in the shape of a certificate, or any other deception, let Eleazar not be forgotten, who, when the royal ministers offered him food which he was allowed to eat, that he might deceive the king by appearing to eat the illicit food of sacrifice, would not consent to the fraud, saying that it was not fitting to his age or station to feign what would scandalize others, and lead them into error. God, who is the judge of our consciences, and alone to be feared, cannot be mocked or deceived."

(1) Exhortation to Martyrdom, c. XI.

In the first quotation from St. Cyprian, we learn that the fallen used to beg from the martyrs intercessory letters, or petitions to the Church, that the bishops would shorten their public penance. The reverence of the faithful for those who had suffered, or were about to suffer, for the faith, was very great, and the Church encouraged that reverence, even to the point of granting to the prayers of the confessors what would otherwise never have been conceded. Hence, those who had unfortunately become either sacrificers or certificated, thronged around the expectant sufferers, beseeching them to request, through the Church's appreciation of their coming trial, a remission of the punishment due to their own pusillanimity. This custom was greatly abused, and many of the fallen insisted upon the bishops accepting the "letters of peace" in lieu of any public penance. "Some of these turbulent spirits," says St. Cyprian, "who, even in the past, were with difficulty ruled by us, and in our very presence were disputatious, now became, through these letters, as fiery as though a torch had been applied to them, and tried to extort the peace promised them" (1). And again, "After I had written to you about the temerity of certain persons who refused to perform penance and satisfy God, they applied to me, saying that peace was not to be given them, for it had already been given to them by Paul (a certain martyr)." This demand of the fallen was most presumptuous, and of itself proved that they were in bad disposition for communion, for the Church had always insisted upon satisfaction for sin. The Church had always striven against the abuse of the martyrs' letters of peace. From the most ancient times, the deacons were in the habit of visiting the prisons to moderate the zeal of the confessors in granting such letters. And it was always understood that the peace of the Church was not attained by the mere reception of such a letter; that the martyrs merely besought the peace for the recipient, as a favor to themselves. Again, in granting the letter, the martyr was obliged to name the person in whose interest the favor was asked ; it was therefore an inexcusable abuse to extend the favor to one's friends, as many tried to do. St. Cyprian speaks of this attempt as follows (1) : " You ought to correct this thing diligently, and designate by name those to whom you wish peace to be conceded. For I hear that letters are given by some, saying, ' Let so and so communicate, and also his friends,' and hitherto that has never been done by the martyrs. . . . I therefore ask that you designate by name, and give letters, consonant to faith and discipline, only to those whom you yourselves see and know, and whose penance you know to be nearly completed."

(1) Letter to the Roman Clergy, No. 15.

This abuse of the letters of peace, and especially the claim that they were of themselves sufficient to entitle the recipient to communion, was resisted to the utmost by St. Cyprian, in whose jurisdiction most of the trouble happened. He was obliged to contend, not only against the audacity of the fallen, but even against many of the martyrs, who insisted upon the conciliatory nature of their letters as being independent of any episcopal decision. Thus, a practice which had come in vogue through the Church's veneration for those who had shed, or were about to shed, their blood for Christ, now threatened not only the right of the pastors to control their own discipline, but that humility and simplicity of motive which were, under God, the surest force of the martyr. In the midst of his anxiety, St. Cyprian be-thought himself of the Apostolic See, but the chair of Peter was then vacant, and so disturbed were the clergy of Rome by the fierceness of the persecution of Decius, that it was as yet impossible to fill the vacancy. However, the holy bishop of Carthage besought the advice of the Roman clergy, and the result was the issue of a provisory decree to the effect that the owners of letters of peace were to be reconciled to the Church, if they were in danger of death ; the others were to await the pleasure of their bishops, to be announced when the cessation of the persecution would admit of an examination of the respective cases. With regard to this decision, St. Cyprian wrote to Antonianus (1) "I wrote most fully to the Roman clergy, then without a bishop, and to the priest Maximus and other confessors then in prison, but now joined with Cornelius to the Church. What I wrote, you can know from their answers, for in their epistles they thus replied, 'What you have done in this important affair is pleasing to us, that the peace of the Church be first consulted; that then there be held a comparison of opinions, of the bishops, priests, deacons, and also the confessors, the laity being witnesses, to treat the cause of the fallen.' It was then added, that peace should be accorded to the fallen who were sick, or in danger of death. Novatian also subscribing to this, and reciting his subscription with his own voice; the priest Moses, then a confessor and now a martyr, also subscribing. These letters were sent through the entire world, and given to the knowledge of all the churches, and of all the brethren." The council which the Roman clergy recommended in their letter to St. Cyprian was held immediately after the death of Decius had given some peace to the Church, and a peremptory decree was issued, of which the saint thus speaks(2): "As had been already decided, when the cessation of persecution allowed us to meet, a large number of bishops came together, and the protection of the Lord and our own faith preserving us, the Scriptures were consulted by both sides, and we weighed the matter with saving moderation, that all hope of communion might not be denied to the fallen, and thus they be driven by desperation, if the Church were closed to them, to follow the world and live like gentiles. Nor should the ecclesiastical censure be disregarded, by our rashly admitting them to communion; so penance was continued, and paternal clemency was to be contritely sought after, and each case was to be examined, with the disposition and necessity of each person."

(1) Epist. 2, to Martyrs and Confessors.

Finally, St. Cornelius having been elevated to the Papacy, a synod was held in Rome in the year 254, in which it was decreed that those of the fallen, who had really sacrificed to the gods, should do full penance before restoration to communion, unless they were in danger of death. Such of this class as were priests, were reduced to the rank of laymen, and as such, after penance, admitted to communion. The libellatici, or certificated, were received into the peace of the faithful without any penance, other than that they had themselves voluntarily undertaken. The Church was naturally much more lenient with the certificated than with the sacrificers. "There is a great difference," says St. Cyprian (1), "even among those who have sacrificed; what cruelty, then, what fearful acerbity, it would be, to join the merely certificated with the sacrificers! He, who has accepted the certificate, says, 'I had read, and I had known from the bishop, speaking on this matter, that I should not sacrifice to the idols, and that a servant of God should not adore at their altars; and therefore, when the occasion was offered to obtain a certificate, I went to the magistrate, or sent another—lest I might do that which is not permitted—and said that I was a Christian, that I could not sacrifice, that I could not approach the altar of the devil, and that therefore he should, in return for a sum of money, free me from doing what I was not allowed to do.' Now, however, this man, who is contaminated by his certificate, after he has understood from our rebukes that this thing should not have been done; that, even if his hands be pure, and his mouth tainted by no contact with forbidden food, yet his conscience is polluted; having heard all this, he stands and laments, &c."

(1) Epist., 52.(2) Idem.

If, at first sight, the Church's treatment of the sacrificers seems too harsh, it is well to know that, under certain circumstances, she tempered her severity. Thus, if a persecution were imminent, she conceded them immediate absolution. Under such circumstances, St. Cyprian wrote to Pope Cornelius, epist. 54, "Peace is now necessary, not to the weak, but to the strong; not for the dying, but for the healthy. We must now concede communion, that those, whom we exhort to battle, be not left helpless, but be fortified with the protection of the Body and Blood of Christ."

(1) Epist. to Antonian, 52.

Again, immediate absolution was granted to those of the fallen who suffered anything for the honor of Christ, or who did anything difficult which redounded to the good of the Church. This is proved by a letter of Caldonius, an African bishop, to St. Cyprian (1), asking his advice about restoring to communion some of the fallen ones who had just proved their sincere repentance by submitting to exile rather than to a denial of Christ. "You have judged correctly," answered the saint, "as to the granting of peace to our brethren, for they have brought it to themselves by true penance, and by a glorious avowal of the Lord." Further, if delay would have caused danger of schism, absolution was immediately granted to the fallen. This is shown by the rule laid down by St. Augustine (2): "I assert nothing new or unaccustomed, but what the health of the Church requires, that when any one of the Christian brethren, constituted in the society of the Church, is found guilty of such a sin, he be held worthy of anathema; let this be done where there is no danger of schism He who diligently considers this, will not neglect the severity of discipline in the preservation of unity, nor will he rupture the tie of community by immoderate coercion." Finally, immediate absolution was conceded to the excommunicated, when any great good would thereby accrue to the Church, such as the extinction or diminution of a schism, or the conversion of many to the fold. We learn this from the action of Pope Cornelius in the case of several Novatian converts, and in the case of the priest Trophimus, who had wandered from the Church. In the first instance. Maximus, Urban, Sidon, Macarius, and several others, who had been deceived by the wiles of Novatian, begged to be restored to communion, and as the petitioners were leaders in the schism, the Pontiff hoped that their example would encourage the rank and file to return to unity. The priest Maximus was fully restored to his sacerdotal privileges; and full forgiveness, with no penance whatever, was accorded to the rest. The case of Trophimus is narrated by St. Cyprian in his 52nd epistle, to Antonian, and is of the same nature as the preceding, with the difference that Trophimus was reduced to lay communion.

(1) Epistles of Cyprian, No. 19.(2) Against the Epistle of Parmenian, b. 3, c. 2,

In concluding this dissertation, we would observe that the enemies of Christianity do not seem to have perceived that the proceedings of the immense majority of the early apostates afford a good proof of the truth and sanctity of our religion. When the persecutions ceased, nearly all the "fallen" returned to their allegiance. And it is a remarkable fact that no one of these unfortunates, so far as we can gather from history, ever traduced the faith he had abandoned. Pliny declares, in his letter to Trajan, that he interrogated many of them, and was led to believe that Christianity was merely an excess of superstition.

CHAPTER X.

THE NOVATIAN HERESY.

The distinction of having been the first of the few Anti-Popes who have troubled the Church, belongs to Novatian, a Roman priest, born at the commencement of the third century. He had been a Pagan, and addicted to the Stoic philosophy, but being seized by sickness, he became a Christian. Baptized in his bed, he neglected to have the accustomed ceremonies supplied, and hence became irregular for the priesthood. His bishop, however, dispensed with the irregularity, and he received Holy Orders. When persecution became the order of the day, Novatian shut himself up in his house; his deacons endeavored to prevail upon him to go out and encourage the faithful, but he declared that he was tired of the priesthood, and would return to philosophy (1). This was the man who presumed to dispute the Papacy with St. Cornelius, after the election in the year 251. He had already sworn that he entertained no ambition for the Pontificate, but, scarcely had Cornelius been installed, when Novatian, by the connivance of three bishops (1), received episcopal consecration, and was proclaimed by a few partisans as head of the Church. His principal assistant, and probably the instigator of his schism, was Novatus (2), a Carthaginian priest, who, having revolted against St. Cyprian (3), had fled to Rome. He was, according to the testimony of the saint (4), "Always desirous of new things, furious with the insatiable rapacity of avarice, puffed up with arrogance and pride, always in bad odor with the bishops of these parts, condemned by the unanimous voice of the priests as a heretic; he was ever curious, that he might betray, and ever a flatterer, that he might deceive, but never faithful, that he might cherish. He was a torch for the starting of the fires of sedition, a whirlwind of tempest to make shipwreck of faith, an enemy of quiet, the adversary of tranquillity, the foe of peace. . . . The orphans whom he has defrauded, the widows whom he has robbed, the churches which he has despoiled, all demand his punishment. . . . His father died in the street, of starvation, and he would not bury the body. He kicked his wife in the abdomen, and through the miscarriage became a murderer. And now he dares to condemn the hands which sacrificed, when his feet are more guilty, since they killed his son." With the aid of this worthy coadjutor, Novatian soon secured a sufficient number of followers to cause a great amount of anxiety to the legitimate Pontiff. One of his first acts was to bind his partisans by oath never to return to the communion of Cornelius (5). He then sent legates to Carthage, bearing letters justifying his own usurpation, and calumniating St. Cornelius, but St. Cyprian refused to communicate with them. Through all Africa the faithful primate sent letters, exhorting all the bishops to remain true to the Papacy, "the root and matrix of the Catholic Church," and received answers confirming the "necessary origin and just reason" of the election of

(1) St. Cornelius, Epist. to Fabius of Antioch.

(1) St. Cornelius says that they were "uncultivated and ignorant men, from the most insignificant and contemptible quarter in Italy." Ibi.

(2) St. Epiphanius, Eusebius, and Theodoret, confound the two men; Sts. Cornelius and Cyprian, and Pacian, clearly distinguish them.

(3) He accused the holy bishop of too great leniency in his treatment of those who fell, during persecution, and was destined himself to rush into the other extreme.

(4) Epist. 49, to Cornelius.

(5) Each one received the Holy Eucharist, and instead of replying "Amen" to the words of the communicator, said, "I shall never return to Cornelius."

Cornelius, and his "glorious innocence" (1). Novatian made great efforts to draw the confessors and expectant martyrs to his side, knowing well how much prestige would be gained by such success. Hearing of this attempt, and learning that it had not been entirely unsuccessful, St. Cyprian sent letters, to be first submitted to the Pontiff, exhorting the candidates for martyrdom to remain faithful to unity, and his zeal resulted in the return of many perverts. Novatian endeavored to win over Dionysius, bishop of Alexandria, declaring to him that he had with great unwillingness accepted the Pontificate. Dionysius answered him thus: 'If you did this unwillingly, as you say, you will easily prove it, by renouncing the position. For one should suffer anything, rather than impair the concord of the Church of God. That martyrdom which is sustained for the sake of the unity of the Church, is not only not less commendable, but is even more so than that which one would undergo rather than sacrifice to idols. In this, one suffers for his own soul; in the other, for the whole Church.'

The Novatians were, in the beginning, schismatics, but like most separatists, they soon joined heresy to their other crimes. Their first error was the denial of the Church's power to forgive those who had sacrificed to the idols, or even those who had taken out "certificates." St. Cyprian says that while he was suffering great anxiety as to what course to pursue with regard to these penitents, "behold, there arises on the other side an enemy, the adversary of any paternal clemency, the heretic Novatian, who does not merely imitate the priests and levite of the Gospel by passing the wounded man, but even kills him, by taking away all hope of salvation" (2). Novatian went so far as to deny the power of the Church to forgive any sin committed after baptism, although, in after times, his followers so far tempered the doctrine as to acknowledge the Church's power over venial sin. So we learn from St. Ambrose (3) and St. Pacianus (4). Another error of the Novatians was the re-baptism of their converts. They also condemned second nuptials.

(1) Epist. 45, to Cornelius.
 (2) On the Fallen.

(3) On Penance, b. 1.
 (4) Epist. 3, to Sympronianus.

The legitimate Pontiff, St. Cornelius, held a Council at Rome in the year 253, in which Novatian and his followers were anathematized. They had already been condemned in synods held at Carthage in 251, and in Antioch in 252. How Novatian terminated his career, we do not know. His followers asserted that he died a martyr. After denying the truth of this boast, St. Pacian (1) says, "And even if Novatian did suffer, he received no crown for his agonies. And why not? Outside the peace of the Church, outside of unity, away from that mother to whom must pertain every one who is a martyr, hear the Apostle saying of him, 'Even though I deliver up my body to be burned, and have not charity, it profiteth me nothing.' " Though divided into numerous sects, the Novatians did not vanish in the East until the seventh century; in the West, not before the eighth.

With regard to the cruelty of the Novatians toward the "fallen," it may appear that they were not any more rigid than were some of the early synods held by the orthodox; that some of the canons of the Spanish council of Elvira (2) seem nearly as rigorous as the Novatian practice. But it must be remembered that the Church holds and ever has held, that she has received from her Divine Founder the power to forgive all sin; that in the council of Elvira and similar synods this power was always asserted, though, owing to circumstances, the bishops deemed it necessary to exact in certain cases a long and severe penance before the concession of absolution. We have already seen, when treating of the discipline in regard to the fallen, that there were several circumstances in which the Church held her rigor in abeyance. But Novatian, or his adherents, denied the power itself, just as do the heretics of modern times. Socrates tells us, in b. 7, chap. 25, that Asclapiades, a Novatian bishop, said to a patriarch of Constantinople, "We cannot communicate with great sinners, but leave to God alone the power of forgiving them." And Sts. Pacian and Augustine ascribe this doctrine to Novatian again and again.

(1) Idem, Epist. 2.

(2) Held at the commencement of the fourth century. The precise date is controverted but most probably it was just before the persecution of Maximian.

In the days of Novatian there was more at stake than the mere policy or duty of pardoning the unfortunate fallen; there had arisen a question as to the power of the Church to forgive all sin. In the interest of his own sect, Mosheim says that the Novatians should not be reproached for corrupting Christian doctrine, as their opinions did not much differ from those of their fellow Christians (1). How far this assertion is true, we have seen. It may be painful for a Protestant to hear one of his favorite opinions condemned by the Church of the third century, but nevertheless the fact remains. The following passage from the letter sent by St. Cyprian to Pope St. Cornelius, after the celebration of the Council of Carthage of 251, furnishes an excellent summary of the question at issue with the Novatians, and of the action of the African fathers thereupon. "We had already decreed, after mutual consultation, that those who had been overthrown by the adversary in the heat of persecution, or had so fallen as to stain themselves with illicit sacrifice, should, for a long time, perform full penance; or, if there were danger of weakness, that they should receive peace when threatened by death. For it was not right, nor did paternal devotion or divine clemency allow, that the Church should be closed to those who applied for admission; or that those who were contrite, and sought the aid of salutary hope, should be denied it, and sent out of the world without the communion and peace of the Lord; when He Himself, who gave the law, had permitted that what was bound on earth, should be bound in Heaven, and what was loosed on earth, should also be loosed in Heaven. For when we perceived that another period of persecution was approaching, and by frequent and constant signs we were shown that we should be armed and prepared for the fight offered by the enemy; that we should get ready the people entrusted to us by the divine mercy; that we should bring into the camp of the Lord every one of the soldiers of Christ who call for arms and cry for battle; we deemed ourselves compelled by necessity to concede peace to those who had not left the Church of God, and who had not ceased from the first day of their fall, to do penance and to lament and to beseech the Lord." And in his 52nd epistle to Antonianus, the holy primate says, "We do not anticipate the judgment of God, who will ratify what we have done, if He finds that their repentance was sincere and entire. If we were deceived by false appearances, He will correct the sentence which we have pronounced Since we know that no one should be debarred from doing penance, and that, by the mercy of God, peace can be accorded by the priests, we must have regard for the groans of our penitents, and not refuse them their reward."

(1) Eccles. Hist., 3rd cent., p. 2, c. 5; Hist. Christ., 3rd cent., in notes.

CHAPTER XI.

CONTROVERSY ON THE REPETITION OF BAPTISM.

We now approach one of the most important controversies ever developed in the Church—important not only on account of the sanctity and eminent position of the parties to the agitation, but because of the vital nature of the principle involved. At the commencement of the third century, an opinion began to be ventilated that the validity of Baptism depended upon the orthodoxy of the minister. Such an idea was a natural outgrowth from a state of society intensely hostile to schism or heresy, if the members listened rather to their prejudices than to the calmly logical and unerring voice of the proper magistracy. The first promulgator of this opinion seems to have been Agrippinus, bishop of Carthage, who, in a synod of his suffragans, held in the year 215, declared, says St. Cyprian (1), that "He who comes from heretics, and has not been already baptized in the Church, but comes as a profane one and an entire stranger, is to be baptized, that he may become one of the sheep, for there is but one water in the Church for the making of sheep. We also have followed this doctrine, as religious, legitimate, salutary, and agreeing with that of the Catholic Church." The new doctrine soon spread into the East, and acquired zealous defenders in St. Dionysius of Alexandria and Firmilian of Caesarea in Cappadocia. But its principal support was found in St. Cyprian. In the year 256, a synod was held at Carthage, in which the doctrine was so plainly asserted, that the fathers would not deign to use the word "rebaptize," but substituted "baptize," for, says St. Cyprian (1), "they do not receive anything where there is nothing; but they come to us, with whom are grace and all truth, for grace and truth are one." In the same year, another synod was celebrated at Carthage, and 71 bishops signed the synodical letter sent to Pope Stephen, begging his confirmation of their decrees. The following passage of this letter is interesting: "Many things were transacted, but we thought to write to you, and to consult your Gravity and Wisdom principally upon a thing greatly affecting the sacerdotal authority, and the unity and dignity of the Catholic Church, derived from the providence of God; namely, that those should be baptized, who come to us and the one Church, after having been tainted by profane water among the heretical schismatics." When Pope Stephen had read this synodical epistle, he vehemently reproved the errors it contained. His letter has not come down to us, but it must have been very firm, and very pointed in its terms. to cause St. Cyprian to speak of it as follows (2): "Among other haughty, or not pertinent, or contradictory things which he unlearnedly and improvidently wrote, he said, 'If, therefore, any one comes to us from any heresy whatever, let there be no innovation beyond what has been handed down to us, namely, that hands be laid upon him in penance.'" Baronio, and some others, hold that Pope Stephen excommunicated St. Cyprian and his brother bishops for their persistency in this matter, but the probabilities are in favor of the opinion that no such decree was issued. We shall speak more fully on this point, when we come to treat the various questions arising out of the controversy. Whether St. Cyprian abandoned his error or not, we have no means of ascertaining, but it is certain that, through the entire controversy, he and his friends regarded the question as one, not of faith, but of discipline.

(1) Epist. 71, to Quintus.

(1) Ibi.(2) Epist. 74, to Pompeius.

There are several knotty points in this controversy upon the Repetition of Baptism, and it would be very convenient, if we could dismiss the whole question as a work of the imagination, as lacking any historical foundation. But though there would then be no necessity for grappling with some apparent and some real difficulties, truth will not allow us to imitate those authors who have seen fit to reject as unauthentic the documents bearing upon the controversy (1). It is asserted by these writers that we ought not to credit the testimony of Eusebius in this matter; that he invented the whole history in the interests of the Donatists; and that, again, the Donatists themselves interpolated many of the passages of Eusebius referring to it. As for Eusebius' working in the interests of Donatism, merely because he was an Arian, that is pure conjecture, and not a solid one; again, we know that he really condemned rebaptism, from his book 7, c. 2, &c. As for the Donatist interpolations, we cannot acknowledge them, unless we are prepared to admit that a comparatively weak sect succeeded, in the face of powerful opponents, in vitiating all the codices of Eusebius' history. St. Augustine appears to speak very clearly upon all matters concerning the controversy, but his testimony is rejected by those who relegate the story to the realms of imagination. They contend that the holy doctor only speaks hypothetically of the matter, that is, that he supposes, merely for the sake of argument, that this history, adduced by the Donatists, is true, wishing to present to them (who were so rebellious) the picture of Cyprian, who differed in opinion from the head of the Church, but yet did not rush into schism. This theory is specious, but whenever St. Augustine treats of this subject, he seems to feel that it is a fact, one which, for Cyprian's sake, he would like to excuse. And in his book 7, on Baptism, c. 20, he says that "Peter, the first of the Apostles, might have thought otherwise than truth demanded ; which happened to Cyprian, as all of us, who love him, believe, without any reproach to him." Those who banish this controversy from the domain of history hold that the quality of authenticity is wanting in many of the documents upon which we rely to prove its reality ; for instance, in the epistles of St. Cyprian to the bishops of Numidia, to Quintus, to Jubajan, to Pompeius, and to Magnus ; in the Acts of the 3rd Council of Carthage, and in the epistle of Firmilian to Cyprian. The works of St. Augustine are full of passages which show that he regarded the cited letters of Cyprian as authentic, nor do they at all support the supposition of hypothesis alleged by the disbelievers in the controversy. The following, taken from his work on Baptism, b. 1, c. 18, would alone sufficiently show his mind : "Great proofs are extant in the letters of the blessed martyr . . . for in those days it appeared to him, and to nearly eighty of his bishops of the African Church, that a man who had been baptized outside the communion of the Catholic Church, ought to be again baptized on his return to the Church." As for the celebration of the 3rd synod of Carthage, the friends of the imagination theory would find it difficult to prove that such synod was not held. In addition to the testimony of St. Augustine just quoted, we have, in the 3rd book on Baptism, "I would never believe that in a holy synod of his colleagues, Cyprian would utter with his mouth what he did not feel in his heart," and the context shows he speaks of the 3rd synod. And St. Jerome, speaking of Dionysius of Alexandria, says (1), "Consenting to the teaching of Cyprian and the African synod, he sent many letters to various persons in regard to the rebaptism of heretics." As for the authenticity of Firmilian's letter to St. Cyprian, only negative arguments can be adduced against it, and for it we have the positive evidence of Eusebius, Dionysius of Alexandria, and St. Basil the Great (2).

(1) Among these the best is John Alberi, of the Pious Schools, professor in the university of Pesth, who published, in 1820, a fine work on Select Topics of Church History.

The first question arising from the controversy on rebaptism is about the threat of excommunication said to have been made by Pope Stephen against St. Cyprian.

(1) Ecclesiastical Writers.

(2) For a full defence of the authenticity of all these documents, consult PALMA ; Lectures, vol. 1, c. 23.

Was such a threat really made, and if so, was it put into execution? The saint insinuates, at least, that the threat was uttered, when, in his 74th letter, to Pompeius, he asks concerning Stephen, "Does he give honor to God, who communicates with the baptism of Marcion? Does he give honor to God, who asserts that remission of sin is given, among those who blaspheme God? Does he give honor to God, who declares that sons can be born to God outside, from an adulterous and fornicating one? Does he give honor to God, who, not regarding the unity and truth derived from divine law, defends heresy against the Church? Does he give honor to God, who, a friend to heretics, and an enemy of Christians, declares that the priests of God, who defend the truth of Christ and the unity of the Church, should be shunned?" St. Dionysius of Alexandria (1) says that Pope Stephen wrote a letter "concerning Helenus, Firmilian, and all the bishops of Cilicia, Cappadocia, Galatia, and the neighboring countries; saying that, for that reason, he would not wish to communicate with them. 'For,' said he, 'they rebaptize heretics.'" And St. Augustine speaks more strongly (2): "When, therefore, Stephen not only did not rebaptize heretics, but even thought that they should be excommunicated, who did so or allowed it to be done; nevertheless, Cyprian remained with him in the peace of unity." These authors certainly say that Pope Stephen threatened the rebaptizers with severance from the communion of the Church, but there is good reason for concluding that such a decree was not issued. The last clause of St. Augustine's testimony, just quoted, is explicit. Again, an excommunication of the rebaptizers by Pope Stephen would have furnished Augustine with a fine argument against the Donatists, but in none of his writings against them, do we find a hint of such a thing. On the contrary, in the book on Baptism which he wrote against those sectaries, we find, b. 5, c. 25, "Stephen had thought that they should be avoided who tried to destroy the ancient manner of receiving heretics. However, moved by the difficulty of the question, and being largely gifted with the bowels

(1) Epist. to Sirtus, in Eusebius, b. 7, c. 5.(2) On One Baptism, against Petilian, 14

of charity, he decided to remain in unity with those who thought differently. . . . the peace of Christ conquered in their hearts, so that the evil of schism did not arise between them." St. Cyprian himself, in his letter to Jubajan, declares that he has always been in peace with his colleagues, and this would not be true, had he been excommunicated by the Pontiff. Those who believe that St. Cyprian and his fellows were really excommunicated, rely greatly upon a passage of Firmilian, in which he says to Cyprian, "In many other provinces, there is great diversity of opinion, and yet on this account, the peace and unity of the Catholic Church were not broken. Stephen has now dared to do this, breaking that peace with you, which his predecessors always preserved with you in love and mutual honor." But these and similar words, with which the letter of Firmilian abounds, do not necessarily imply an issue of a formal decree; they might well refer to a mere threat, especially when we consider that they were used by an angry man. "It is natural to angry men," says Alexandre, in treating of this objection, "to speak or write of their real or fancied injuries as far greater than they really are. Hence the tragic poet sang, 'The angry man utters only monstrosities.'" The whole tenor of Firmilian's epistle is one of impotent rage and disappointment; he does not hesitate to compare the Pontiff to Judas, to accuse him of manifest foolishness, to charge him with designating St. Cyprian as a "pseudo-Christ," and an "unfaithful laborer." No matter how holy the former and after life of Firmilian may have been, in this letter he certainly abandoned the ways of truth, moderation, and charity, and we may reasonably suppose that his anger led him into exaggeration. When we compare his assertion (if taken literally) with the positive testimonies of Augustine and Cyprian himself, we are forced to deny it credence. Roncaglia, in an endeavor to prove that St. Cyprian was really excommunicated, thinks that Firmilian's declaration may be reconciled with these testimonies by supposing that the excommunication was withdrawn by Pope Stephen, or by his successor, Sixtus. Before passing to other questions, it is well to observe here that St. Cyprian never incurred the stain of heresy, although he erred exceedingly. He was always ready to bow to the decisions of the Church, and again, as we shall soon see, he regarded the question at issue as one of discipline rather than of faith. The following passage of St. Augustine well shows the sincere yearning of Cyprian for truth, and his solicitude for unity (1): "Very often a little loss is revealed to the Doctors, that their patient and humble charity, in which there is greater fruit, may be tried; either as to the way of preserving unity, when they think variously on the more obscure matters, or as to their reception of the truth, when they see it declared in a sense contrary to what they thought. Of these two, we have one manifested in Blessed Cyprian, that is, how he preserved unity with those from whom he differed. For he says, 'judging no one, or removing no one from the right of communion, if he thinks otherwise.' And the other, that is, how he received the truth, when found contrary to what he had deemed it. If his letters do not record it, his merits proclaim it; if the epistle is not found, the crown (of martyrdom) attests it; if a council of bishops does not announce it, it is indicated by his being in the company of the angels. For it is no small proof of a most pacific soul, to have merited martyrdom in that unity, from which, though thinking differently, he would not separate. For we are men. Hence to relish a thing, when its nature prohibits it, is a trial to men. But to love one's own opinion excessively, or to grudge their ideas to the more justly thinking, to the point of breaking off communion and founding a schism, or to the point of committing the sacrilege of heresy, is diabolic presumption. . . . Having shed his blood, but shed it in unity, (Cyprian) attained angelic light through the confession of martyrdom, so that, if he did not know before what had been revealed, he knew it then, because he preferred the tie of unity to the assertion of his own opinion."

The question now arises as to the light in which the controversy was viewed by St. Cyprian, Firmilian, and the other rebaptizers of the time, who were in communion with them. Did they regard the question as one of faith, or of discipline? That they looked upon it as a mere matter of discipline, is easily proved. In the epistle sent by St. Cyprian and his brethren of the council of Carthage to Pope Stephen, we read, "We know that some do not wish to lay aside what they have once learned; that they do not easily change their minds, but wish, saving the tie of peace and concord with their colleagues, to retain what has been practiced among them. In which matter, we do violence or lay down a law to no one, since each bishop exercises his free will in the administration of his church, for which he will render an account to the Lord." But no bishop is free to act, according to his own opinion, in matters of faith; the fathers of Carthage, therefore, regarded the controversy as one of discipline. St. Jerome says that St. Cyprian never anathematized, but rather always communicated with, those who regarded his opinion as an error; if, however, the saint had thought his practice to be of faith, he could not have pursued such a course. These are the words of the great doctor (1): "However, if these do not wish. . . . to adduce from the Scriptures those texts which Blessed Cyprian has left in his epistles, concerning the rebaptism of heretics, let them know that he never proffered such sayings together with an anathema on those who would not agree with him. . . . And he finished the address, which he sent to Pope Stephen on the matter, with these words: 'We have proffered these things to your conscience, both for our common honor and for pure love, believing that what is religious and true will be also acceptable to you, for the sake of your own religion and faith'" (2).

(1) Baptism, against the Donatists., b. 2, c. 5.

Blondel and other Protestant writers, and in their day,

(1) Dialogue against the Luciferians, c. 9.

(2) If St. Cyprian believed that the question was one of faith, the definition of the African synod would certainly have made him a schismatic, which is not to be supposed possible, if we read his works. He could not be defended because of an example given by previous councils, for these did not judge of matters of faith, unless with the antecedent consent of the Church, or with the will to subject their decisions to the Church's judgment. In his epistle to Jubajan, St. Cyprian does not exclude a converted heretic from salvation, even though he be not "rebaptized;" he therefore must have regarded the effects of the old baptism as yet surviving, and therefore he must have looked upon the new baptism, for which he contended, as merely a disciplinary practice. It is certain that St. Cyprian did not hold as invalid a baptism conferred by a sinner; therefore, we may reasonably conclude that he regarded as valid that given by a heretic. See Triumph of the Holy See, by Cappellari (Pope Gregory XVI), chap. 20.

some Gallican authors, have contended that, in his condemnation of St. Cyprian's error, Pope Stephen rushed into the extreme opposite one of approving every heretical baptism. How false this accusation is, we can very easily show. In his epistle to St. Cyprian, Firmilian says, "It is quite absurd for them to deem it unnecessary to inquire as to who baptized the person, saying that the grace can be attained by the invocation of the Trinity by name, that is, of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost." Firmilian therefore supposes that Stephen insisted upon a certainty as to the use of the proper form, ere he would declare the validity of a baptism. Again, we know from Eusebius that the Pontiff defended the ancient practice of the Church, and the ancient practice was to insist upon the use of proper form and matter (1). Again, had Pope Stephen fallen into any error in his treatment of the question, Vincent of Lerins could not have said that he "crushed the novelty, and sustained the practice of antiquity" (2). And it is very unlikely, if Stephen had so erred, that the Council of Arles, when it issued a special canon against the rebaptizers, would have omitted to notice the opposite, and far more dangerous, heresy. Finally, if the Pontiff fell into such error, then the Church had erred through her entire extent, and therefore disappeared from the earth, which no Gallican, even in the palmiest days of his school, would admit to be possible. Certainly, at the time of the controversy as to rebaptism, the entire episcopacy received either the definition of Pope Stephen or the doctrine of St. Cyprian, and both, in the supposition of Stephen's fall, had wandered from the truth. The temerarious Launoy, in accordance with his system, which gained for him the title of "un-nicher of the saints" (3), drew up a series of what seemed to him terrible objections to the sanctity of Pope Stephen, and proofs that he had erred in the matter of St. Cyprian. Thus, he said, the Church always thought much more of Cyprian than of Stephen. Hear the praises which the fathers lavish upon Cyprian, and note how

(1) History, b. 7, c. 3.(2) Commonitory.

(3) The pastor of the church of St. Roch, at Paris, used to say, "Whenever I meet M. Launoy, I make him a profound bow, for fear that he will yet deprive me of my dear St. Roch."

seldom they speak of the Pontiff. In the Canon of the Mass, we have the name of Cyprian, not the other. In the ancient Litanies of the Roman Ordo and of the Rituals of the Churches of Gaul, Cyprian's name occurs, but never Stephen's. In the Sacramentary of St. Gregory and the olden Missals, we read a proper Preface for the Feast of Sts. Cornelius and Cyprian, but there is none for the Feast of St. Stephen. Anastasius, the Librarian, in his Life of Stephen, mentioning the Constitutions of the Pontiff, is silent as to the baptismal decree, as though, at Rome, where he wrote, they were ashamed of the Pope's course of action. All these allegations of Launoy simply show that St. Cyprian was more venerated than St. Stephen was; how a man of Launoy's acumen could draw from them any argument against the Pontiff's faith, is one of the many mysteries furnished by the devotees of Gallicanism and by those of many other "isms."

It has been also asserted that Pope St. Stephen decreed that baptism was valid when conferred only in the name of Christ. We must at once observe that both ancient and modern writers very frequently use the phrase "in the name of Christ," when they really mean to signify the names of the three Divine Persons; and the context, either direct or remote, will always show, if they are treating of sacramental forms, that the names of the Father and Holy Ghost are understood. To prove that Pope Stephen erred in this matter, it must be shown that he allowed the names of the Father and Holy Ghost to be omitted from the baptismal form, and that is impossible. It is true that a testimony to this effect can be adduced, which at first sight may seem conclusive, but, as we shall show, it must be rejected. St. Cyprian received from Jubajan an epistle said to have been written by Pope Stephen. In his 73rd letter, Cyprian declares that he had read in that epistle a definition to the effect that baptism in the sole name of Christ was valid, and he refutes the assertion. In answering this objection, we might say, with Alexandre, that the holy bishop of Carthage did not "penetrate the mind" of the Pontiff; that Stephen by the phrase "in the name of Christ" meant baptism as instituted by Christ, and therefore conferred in the proper way. But it is difficult to believe that so perspicacious a mind as that of Cyprian would not have been able to penetrate the meaning of the Pope, or that so good a theologian would not have recognized the true meaning, if it were couched under a common form of expression. The most conclusive reply is that the epistle read by St. Cyprian was not written by St. Stephen. The Pontiff wrote indeed to the Primate of Africa, but it is unlikely that he would have written, in such unsettled and difficult times, to the bishop of an obscure place in the remote wilds, and there is no record of such an epistle. St. Cyprian does not ascribe it to Stephen, nor say anything which would indicate that he regarded him as its author, which he would have scarcely omitted to do, had there been any foundation for such a belief.

The opponents of Papal infallibility used to cite this difference of opinion between Sts. Stephen and Cyprian as favorable to their theory, but how they could derive any advantage from it we cannot perceive, since it is evident that both parties regarded the question as pertaining, not to faith, but to discipline. We may observe, however, that before the question of rebaptism arose, St. Cyprian often acknowledged the rights and prerogatives of the Apostolic See in explicit and reverential terms. Thus, when writing to Pope Cornelius against the schismatic Felicissimus, who had opposed his elevation to the see of Carthage, he said, "They dare to approach the chair of Peter, and to bear, from schismatics and the profane, letters to the principal Church, from which is derived the sacerdotal dignity; not thinking that they (the Roman clergy) are those Romans whose faith the Apostle praised, and to whom perfidy can have no access." And in his letter to Antonianus, "You asked me to send a copy of your letter to our colleague Cornelius. that, all anxiety laid aside, he might know that you communicate with him, that is, with the Catholic Church." Speaking to Pope Cornelius, he says, "We exhorted them to acknowledge and hold to the root and matrix of the Catholic Church that all our colleagues should cling to thee and thy communion, that is, to the unity and charity of the Catholic Church." In his epistle, he requests Pope Stephen to use his authority against Marcian, bishop of Arles, who had become a Novatian. And in the entire controversy on rebaptism, he never calls the authority of the Pontiff into question, although he laments the injustice of the decision. If Cyprian was afterwards guilty of disobedience, we can only say that God permitted it for his correction. That he afterwards came to his senses is more than probable, although no documents give us the particulars of his recantation. The constant devotion of the Roman Church to his memory, and his own sacrifice of life for the faith, would prove that when he died, he was not at variance with the chief pastor of the fold.

CHAPTER XII.

THE SAMOSATIAN HERESY, AND THE COUNCIL OF ANTIOCH.

Paul, called Samosatenus, from his native place, Samosata, a village of the Euphratesian Syria, was made bishop of Antioch about the year 262, during the reign of the emperors Valerian and Galienus. Before his elevation he was poor, even to mendicancy, but he soon acquired immense wealth by means of oppression, sacrilege, and other wickedness. The fathers of the Council of Antioch, before whom he was accused of heresy in the year 264, say that he was exceedingly fond of parade. "Carried away, beyond all measure, by love of parade, and by his arrogance, he bore secular dignities, and preferred to be styled a ducenturion (1) rather than a bishop. He pompously strutted through the forum, openly and publicly reading, and dictating his correspondence as he promenaded, preceded and followed by an immense retinue; thus, through his luxury and haughtiness, the envy and hatred of many were excited against our faith " (1). His sermons were calculated solely to win glory and fame for the orator; hence, continue his fellow-bishops, "He scolded and insulted those who listened with the gravity and modesty which be seem the house of God, and who did not loudly applaud, as they do in the theatres, nor imitate his friends of both sexes in their shouts and leapings." After this, we need not be surprised to learn that "He picked to pieces the dead doctors of our law, but spoke of himself in grandiloquent terms, not as a bishop ought to speak, but like a sophist and an impostor. He abolished the singing of the Psalms which were always sung in honor of the Lord Jesus Christ, and placed a band of women in the middle of the church to sing certain Psalms in his own praise. And these persons who sing Psalms in his honor, . . . call him an angel, come down from heaven " His morals could not have been of a very ascetic nature, for the Antiochian prelates tell us that he was always accompanied by two beautiful women, and that he allowed his clergy, if they desired it, the constant society of certain females whom they called "Sisters." It would seem that Paul's heresy, like many others, could not come into the world without the connivance or prompting of some members of the fair sex, for it was to please no less a personage than the celebrated "queen of the East," Zenobia, that he made his first inroads upon the deposit of faith. This beautiful and talented princess was a Jewess, and from the time of her marriage to Odenathus, prince of Palmyra, cultivated the acquaintance of learned men. Paul, the Christian bishop of Antioch, was as erudite as any she met, and he possessed a certain eloquence and dictatorial manner which captivated her. He was not the man to forego the advantages of a friend at court, and the consequence was an intimacy which led him to please the Jewess by disguising the doctrines of Christianity.

(1) The text has ducentarius, which can mean either the commander of two hundred soldiers, or a man possessing 200,000 sesterces.

His first and capital error was that Christ did not exist before His birth from Mary. When Christ was conceived, said he, the Word descended to dwell in Him, and by this temporal mission, became the Son. Nevertheless, Christ was eternal, by predestination. The fathers of the Council of Antioch say that "He refused to confess with us that the Son descended from heaven. . . . Nor is this simply our assertion; it is declared more than once in the records which we have sent to you, especially where he says that Jesus Christ had His origin from the earth. . . . having abjured the mystery of our religion, he passed to the execrable heresy of Artemas" (1). From this error, Paul logically drew that of two Persons in Christ, one by nature, the other by adoption. Of this heresy, St. Dionysius of Alexandria wrote to him, saying, "Thou sayest there are two hypostases, and two Persons in the One and Only Christ, and two Christs and two Sons; one by nature the Son of God, who was before all time, and one, the Son of David, who was not before, but who, by the pleasure of God, took the name of Son, as a city takes the name of its lord, and a house the name of its builder." Other errors, consequent upon these, Paul developed in a list of Questions sent by him to Dionysius. Christ was by nature a man like ourselves; the hypostasis of the Word and the Crucified are not the same; He who hungered, thirsted, labored, &c., was not God. His next error was akin to that of Sabellius, and must have been especially pleasing to Zenobia. He explicitly denied the doctrine of the Trinity, asserting that the Word was not a Person, distinct from the Father, but merely the efficiency of the Father. Speaking of this doctrine, St. Epiphanius says (2): "The opinion of Paul is that the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost are one God; the Word and His Spirit are perpetually in God, as his own word is in the heart of man; the Son of God has no subsistence by Himself, but subsists in God. The Word of God, coming into the world, dwelt in Jesus, who was a mere man. Thus, he says, God is one. . . . that one God is the Father, and the Son is in Him, as the word is in man." The points of difference between the Samosatian doctrine and that of Sabellius and Nestorius, are given as follows by Leontius (1): "He erred as to the Divinity and the Incarnation. As to the Divinity, because he acknowledged only the Father. As to the Incarnation, because he asserted that Christ was merely a man. . . . nor did he teach the same as Nestorius; for although Nestorius said that Christ was simply a man, yet he acknowledged as dwelling in Him the Word and Son of God, who subsists by Himself. For Nestorius erred in nothing as to the Trinity. But Paul of Samosata did not acknowledge in Christ the Word of God which subsists by Itself; he called the Word a something ordered, that is, God commanded (as he expressed the idea) what He wished to be done through that man and did perform through him. Nor was the opinion of Paul, as to the Divinity, that of Sabellius. For Sabellius said that the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, were the same; he called God a Being of three names, and admitted no Trinity whatever; while Paul did not say that the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, were the same, but asserted that the Father was the God who created all things, the Son being a mere man, and the Holy Ghost the gift that descended upon the apostles." Paul also erred as to the formula of Baptism; at least, his followers did. Hence the Council of Nice, in its nineteenth canon, decreed that the Paulianists (as they were generally called) should be baptized, when they applied for admission into the fold.

(1) Synodical Epistle.

(1) Artemas was a heretic of the 2d century, who taught that Christ was a mere man. Eusebius speaks of him in his Hist., b. 7, c. 22.

(2) Heresies, 65.

Against the heretical bishop of Antioch a synod was held in the year 264, during the Pontificate of Pope Dionysius. Among the more celebrated prelates who attended it, were St. Gregory of Neo-Cæsarea and Firmilian of Cæsarea in Cappadocia; St. Dionysius of Alexandria excused himself on account of sickness and old age. Paul disguised his opinions, and protested that the alleged doctrines were not his; the bishops therefore contented themselves with condemning the heresies, without pronouncing any censure against him. But Paul soon began to teach his errors so openly that evasion was no longer possible, and in another synod, held in the year 270, he was condemned and deposed from his see. Then was witnessed the curious spectacle of an appeal to a Pagan emperor, made by Catholic bishops against a rebellious brother. Paul refused to yield up the temporalities of the diocese to his successor, Domnus, and the bishops of the province applied to Aurelian for his ejection. The emperor entertained the appeal, and gave the very just decision that the temporalities should be secured to whomsoever the Roman Pontiff and the Christian bishops of the Italian province should designate as legitimate bishop of Antioch (1). Sympathizing more or less with all of the early heretics, Mosheim (2) tries to justify Paul, or rather, since that would be too difficult a task, to cast suspicion upon the motives of those who condemned him. He ignores any zeal for truth on their part, and supposes that they were actuated by envy of Paul's wealth, and by jealousy of his influence. If the Protestant historian could bring forth any documents or any substantial reasons for this suspicion, we might abstain from accusing him of pure maliciousness, but, as it is, the records of the time are against him, and the characters of so many of the subscribers to the Acts of the synod are of proven sanctity, that we need do no more than refer to him as another instance of historical acumen rendered null by party spirit.

(1) On the Sects, action 3.

Coming now to an important question which arises from a perusal of the decrees of the Council of Antioch, we must first draw attention to one of Paul's prime sophisms. If Jesus did not become God, he said, He is not consubstantial to the Father, and hence there are three substances, one principal, and two derivative (3). Now since it is because the Son is consubstantial to the Father, that there are not three substances, the argument of Paul is absurd, if he used the term "consubstantial" as we now use it. St. Athanasius has been said to have believed that the fathers of Antioch rejected the word "consubstantial," and that they did so, taking the word in another sense, in which it might have been used by Paul, namely, that there were three substances formed from one pre-existing materia. However this may be, it is certain that the prelates assembled

(1) EUSEBIUS; Hist., b. 7, c. 23. THEODORET; Fables, b. 2, § 35.

(2) Hist. Christ., sect. C, § 35.

(3) FLEURY; History, b. 8, n. 1.

at Antioch formally taught that the Son of God is equal and co-eternal with the Father. We now proceed to examine the question, whether or not the fathers of Antioch rejected the term homoousios, "consubstantial," because Paul of Samosata had so abused it as to deceive many, even well meaning persons. This term, as we shall afterwards see, became, during the progress of Arianism, the test, as it were, of orthodoxy, and the opponents of the true doctrine on the Incarnation were fond of citing this synod of Antioch as favorable to their heresy (1). To show that it was a moral impossibility for the fathers of Antioch to reject the term "consubstantial," it is only necessary to consider the events which happened at Alexandria, scarcely ten years before the celebration of their synod, on account of a reported unwillingness of Dionysius to accept the term. This holy bishop had been accused, before Pope Dionysius, of this hesitancy, by certain Pentapolitans, who declared that he "styled the Son a creature, and not consubstantial to the Father." Having called a synod at Rome, the Pontiff wrote to the Alexandrian bishop, asserting the necessity of the term in question. Indignant at the accusation, the prelate repelled it in the strongest of language, and to further clear himself, sent to the Pope four of his books, which plainly proved that he held the consubstantiality of the Son, and received the term homoousion as a test of the doctrine. Now, is it at all probable that so many learned and holy bishops, as were those assembled at Antioch, would, not ten years afterwards, have sent to this very Pontiff Dionysius, during the life too of the very prelate whom he had ordered to receive the term, a synodical epistle which rejected the word homoousion? Again, would not the Antiochian fathers have seemed demented, if, while condemning an impious and most dangerous heresy, they rejected the very term which, of all possible terms, most conclusively indicated the one true doctrine? And how is it that the Arians never objected that the term had been rejected at Antioch? It would have been an excellent argument for their cause, they never missed a chance, and yet they never alleged even a suspicion of such a thing. No such assertion was ever made until nearly ninety years had elapsed since the holding of the synod, and then it was made by the Semiarians at the synod of Ancyra, in the year 358. And although it was greatly to the interest of these Semiarians to prove their assertion, yet it always remained a simple assertion, without an attempt at proof. It is worthy of note that Eusebius of Caesarea, who certainly was not very hostile to the Arians, while commemorating the anti-Nicene writers who received the term homooousion, says that he found none who rejected it, and in his seventh book he gives us that part of the Synodical Epistle of Antioch which alone has come down to us. And in that portion, nothing can be gathered which would give rise to the slightest suspicion that in the lost part there was a rejection of the term. Finally, the Antiochian fathers could not, in their epistle, have rejected a word, the use of which they defend in their Symbol (1).

(1) The student will find this question treated most thoroughly in the work of Maran on the "Divinity of our Lord J. C., Manifested in Scripture and Tradition," b. 4, c. 20. We shall merely give a synopsis of this author's argumentation.

Those who contend that the term homooousios was rejected at Antioch, rely upon certain passages of Sts. Hilary, Athanasius, and Basil, in trying to defend their position. But St. Hilary does not assert the rejection of the word, as his own opinion; he simply proffers the objection as coming from the Semiarians. The same may be said of St. Athanasius, for, in treating of the objection, he says, in parenthesis, "as they say, for I have not a copy of the epistle," and he shortly adds, "If I possessed a copy of the epistle, which they say the fathers wrote, I believe I would find several reasons why they may have been forced to write in such a manner." As for St. Basil, he certainly says, in his 52nd epistle, that some excuse may be made for those who receive the Nicene decrees, excepting the word "consubstantial," because "those who met in the case of Paul of Samosata condemned the term as less apt and convenient." If such was St. Basil's opinion, then he showed much confidence in the Semiarian assertion, but his solitary judgment is of little weight when compared with the arguments we have adduced.

(1) This Symbol is found in Hardouin, Councils, vol. 1, p. 1639, and the erudite entertains no doubt as to its genuineness.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE CONVERSION AND BAPTISM OF CONSTANTINE.

Eusebius tells us, in his Life of Constantine, that while that emperor was marching on Rome to meet the tyrant Maxentius (310), and was reflecting upon the difficulty of his undertaking, he remembered that his father, Constantius Chlorus, worshipped only one God, and that, unlike most of the Roman emperors, he was a happy man. Constantine therefore resolved to devote his worship to the one only God, and "he began," says Eusebius, in chap. 28, "to implore His aid, beseeching Him to make Himself known unto him, and to extend His helping hand to the present enterprise." Then occurred that signal miracle of the appearance of a cross in the sky, and Christ's manifestation of Himself to Constantine on the following night. Our Lord explained the meaning of the miracle to the emperor, ordered him to adopt the cross as his standard, and promised him victory. Constantine then sent for some Christian priests, and having acquired the rudiments of Christian doctrine, was enrolled among the catechumens. The following are the words of the historian: "A wonderful sign, sent by God, appeared to the emperor as he was simply praying. If the event were narrated by any other person, it would not easily be believed. But since the august victor himself told it to us, who write this history, some time after it happened; when, that is, we had become familiar with him; and since he attested the declaration with his oath, who can hesitate in believing it? About the middle of the day, as the sun was turning to the west, he saw, with his own eyes, he asserted, immediately over the sun, a figure of the cross made up of light, and with it the inscription 'En touto nika' (In this, conquer). At this vision, both he and the soldiers, who were following him on I know not what journey, and were witnesses of the miracle, were thoroughly stupefied." Many Pagan authors are mentioned by Gelasius of Cyzicus (1), as rejecting this vision of

(1) Council of Nice, h. 1, c. 4.

Constantine as false or imaginary, and as a rule, Protestants are too averse to any admission of miracles, to receive this one as authentic. That Voltaire should rank the story among fables (1), is not surprising. If a wish to disbelieve be any reason for rejecting an assertion, then those who are incredulous as to this miracle are not unreasonable. As for any more solid argument against it, the rules of criticism furnish none. Eusebius is not alone in his narration, and even if he were, his authority would be great indeed, living, as he did, at the time it is said to have happened, and publishing it, as he did, in the hearing of those whom he declares to have been witnesses to it. What about the oath of Constantine? What about the coins and medals struck by Constantine in commemoration of the vision, and which have come down to us? But Eusebius is corroborated by two Pagan authors, one, the famous orator, Nazarius, the other anonymous (2). The story of the vision is also given by the author of the book on "The Deaths of the Persecutors" and by Optatian Porphyry, the poet. Prudentius, Socrates, Sozomenus, and Theodoret, all agree in believing in its truth. And of no small value as an argument of its authenticity is the sign of the cross on the military insignia of the early Christian emperors, and on many of the public monuments of the day.

We now approach the question as to where and when Constantine received the sacrament of baptism. The great mass of authors, until within the last two centuries, held that he was baptized at Rome about the year 324, by Pope St. Sylvester. The popular tradition in the Eternal City has always been to that effect. One of the principal complaints made by the enemies of Cola di Rienzo in 1347, was that he had been guilty of profanation, by bathing in the sacred font of Constantine. But the weight of evidence is too much for this tradition, and goes to show that the emperor was baptized only at the close of his life, and in the suburbs of Nicomedia. The principal defenders of the Nicomedian baptism are Mamachi, Papebrock, Henri de Va-

(1) Essay on General History, c. 5.

(2) Their stories are found in the Parisian edition of Pliny's Epistles, of 1599.

lois, Pagi, Aeneas Silvius, Alexandre, Mosheim, and Palma. Among the modern approvers of the Roman baptism the chief place is held by Baronio. But though it is more probable that Constantine's baptism was deferred until he was about to die, it would be incorrect to say that he was at heart a Pagan up to that time, as some have asserted. This accusation must be repelled, before we treat of his baptism. As Mosheim notes, the facts, laws, and institutions of his reign, show that Constantine had embraced the Christian religion with his whole soul. All his efforts were for the establishment of that faith, and for the destruction of Paganism. In the interests of Christianity, he changed nearly the entire system of Roman jurisprudence; he richly endowed the bishops and priests, and provided in every way for the splendor and accuracy of divine worship. From the day of his vision, he constantly praised and worshipped Christ; he brought up his children in the faith. It is foolish to object certain events of his life as abhorrent to the spirit of the Gospel. Thus, the killing of his son Crispus and the execution of his own wife Fausta (1), his vanity and voluptuousness, do not militate against his Christianity. Are there no bad Christians? Of no value to the theory of Constantine's persistent Paganism, especially when compared with the known facts of his life, is the passage of Eusebius where he is said to have "first merited to receive the imposition of hands with solemn prayer" at Nicomedia. For these words do not necessarily imply that only then Constantine became a catechumen; there were several impositions of hands upon the candidate, ere he finally received baptism. Nor is it at all unlikely that a man in Constantine's elevated position would not have been subjected to all the ceremonies usually adopted at an induction among the catechumens; in which case, the passage of Eusebius is at once understood. We know from Eusebius himself that the emperor was present at the divine services, that he kept the Lord's Day and the feasts of the martyrs, that he fasted at the appointed times, that he kept the vigil of Easter, &c.; we know too that he allowed himself to be excluded from all in which catechumens could not participate. He must, therefore, have been a catechumen long before the journey to Nicomedia, and in the quoted passage of Eusebius, the phrase "first merited" applies to the last and final imposition of hands before baptism. Arguments for the theory of Constantine's continued Paganism have been found in the restoration of the temple of Concord at Rome, in his decree for the consultation of omens, and in the fact that he retained the title of "Supreme Pontiff." With regard to the temple of Concord, we answer that the inscription proves that the Senate and Roman people (S. P. Q. R.) restored it, but not that Constantine did so (1). The decree as to the consultation of omens proves simply that he could not all at once do away with Pagan superstition. He tolerated the augurs by a law of the year 320, which is found in the code of Theodosius, b. 16, tit. 10, No. 1, and its words show that he looked upon their system as a superstition. If Constantine was at heart a Pagan because he bore the title of "Supreme Pontiff," then so were many of his successors, for not until the year 375 was the appellation dropped by Gratian. From the time of his vision, however, he never officiated as Pontiff, nor did he ever sacrifice to the gods. He kept the title, lest it should be taken up by some one else in the interests of the dying system, and not from any affection to the office.

(1) Crispus was accused of high treason, and of attempted outrage on herself by Fausta, his stepmother. The emperor revenged him by ordering Fausta's death.

And now for the time and place of Constantine's baptism. Eusebius, in his Life of Constantine, b. 4, c. 61 and 62, gives the circumstances as follows: "In the beginning he was attacked by an uneven temperature of the body, and then by illness. Therefore he went to the warm waters of his city, and then he was taken to Helenopolis, where, pausing for a long time in the church of the Martyrs, he offered supplications and prayers to God. When he felt that the end of life was imminent, he thought that at length the time had come for him to expiate the faults of his whole life ; most firmly believing that whatever sin he had committed, through human frailty, would be wiped out by the efficacy of the secret words, and the salutary immersion. Having thought these things, kneeling on the ground, he humbly begged pardon of God, confessing his sins in the same church of the Martyrs, and in that place he first merited to receive the imposition of hands with solemn prayer. Thence having gone as far as the suburbs of Nicomedia, calling the bishops, he addressed to them these words : ‘ This is the time for which I have long hoped, for which I have longed with incredible desire, which I have asked for with my every prayer, that I might attain salvation in God. Now is the time when we also should receive the sign which confers immortality; now is the time for us to be made participants of the salutary seal. Truly, I had once decided to do this in the river Jordan, in which, for our example, our Saviour Himself received the immersion. But God, who best knows what is useful for us, deigns that it should be done in this place. Therefore, let all doubt be removed. For if God, the arbiter of life and death, wishes me to live longer here, and it is decreed that I am hereafter to mingle with the people of God, and that, aggregated to the Church, I am to partake of her prayers with the rest, I promise to prescribe for myself such laws of living as are due to God.’ When he had said this, they performed the divine ceremonies with solemn rite, and enjoining upon him what was necessary, they made him a participant in the Sacred Mysteries. Of all the emperors who have ever been, Constantine alone, &c.” There is only one way of escaping from this testimony of Eusebius, and that is at once adopted by Baronio, firmest of all those who believe in the emperor’s baptism at Rome. No confidence is to be placed in Eusebius, in this matter at least, says the father of Ecclesiastical Annals, since he was tinged with Arianism, and naturally drew a curtain over the baptism by Pope Sylvester, that he might consult the feelings of Constantius, the Arian son of Constantine. But Eusebius is not merely silent as to the baptism at Rome; if he were, the conjecture of Baronio might demand attention. He positively asserts the Nicomedian baptism, knowing, that if he lies, there are hundreds living who can brand him as he deserves. Again, how could such a lie be a salve to the feelings of Constantius? Was this prince so much more ignorant of affairs than the rest of the world, as to be unaware of his father's intense aversion for Arianism? He well knew that he was not following in the footsteps of Constantine; hence, there was no solid reason why Eusebius should, for the sake of his tender feelings, frame so tremendous a lie. We will merely allude to Socrates, Sozomenus, Theodoret, Sts. Jerome, and Ambrose, as agreeing with Eusebius in this matter, and pass to the arguments generally adduced by those who contend that Constantine was baptized at Rome.

(1) Palma speaks of two inscriptions, one of which is addressed to Constantine by the S. P. Q. R., but contains nothing attributing the restoration to him; the other treats of the restoration by the S. P. Q. R., but says nothing at all of the emperor. "There are some," he says, "who think that, through the fault of some ignorant man, these two inscriptions have been made into one."

Their principal argument is derived from the Acts of St. Sylvester, and the records of a Roman synod held in the year 324, which assert that the emperor was baptized and cured of a leprosy by that Pontiff. But neither these Acts nor the records of the synod are genuine. Alexandre (1) details many reasons why the Acts should be rejected, of which we will give one as a specimen of all. They narrate that in the year 315 a synod was held at Rome, at which attended 75 bishops, and 109 Jewish priests; 12 of the latter having been sent by the high-priest, Isachar, to dispute on religion with their patroness, the empress Helena, and with Constantine. For, they say, Helena was yet a Pagan, but almost converted to Judaism, and was violently angry with her son because of his Christian proclivities, and had begged him to become a Jew. Is not all this trash? Passing by the absurdities, do we not know that, after the destruction of Jerusalem, the Jews ceased to create high-priests, and that the very name of Pontiff had grown obsolete among them? We cannot, therefore, yield homage to the Acts of Sylvester. As for the cited records, they represent a synod which was never held. In the first place, they speak of the heresy of Photinus, which did not arise before the year 343, and treat of it as condemned, while it was not condemned before the Sirmian council of 351. We pass several other intrinsic proofs of falsity, and ask if women, even though they were empresses, were ever admitted into the synods of the Church? Yet these records present Helena as even subscribing to the decrees. Again, this synod appears to have been so lacking in the roughest kind of common sense, that no one can believe it other than fictitious. Among its canons is this one: "No bishop shall bless the marriage of a sacred virgin unless he knows her to be seventy-two years of age." Another canon says that "no bishop shall be condemned unless by seventy-two witnesses; no priest, without forty-four, &c." In the 13th canon, it is established that "no one shall attain clerical honors unless he has first received the sacred veil of marriage at the hands of a priest." It is evident then that no value can be attached to the testimony of such records. The Acts of Liberius are also produced in favor of the Roman baptism. According to them, Constantius was highly indignant because Liberius said that Constantine had been cured of leprosy when he was baptized by St. Sylvester. Baronio himself admits that these Acts are full of errors, and the ancient writers are silent in their regard, although they are most diligent in collecting all possible evidence bearing upon the contest of Liberius with Constantius. And why should Constantius be specially angry with Liberius for asserting that which, if true, must have been as yet fresh in the minds of many?

(1) Fourth cent., dis. 23.

It is incredible, say the defenders of the Sylvestrian baptism, that Constantine should have been so superstitious as to put off his baptism, merely that he might receive it in the Jordan. And whose example encouraged him to defer so important an act to the end of his life? Besides, if he really wished to be baptized in the holy river, why did he not avail himself of the opportunity, when he was at Jerusalem for the dedication of the new temple? To this we may answer that there was no superstition in desiring to be baptized in the waters sanctified by contact with the body of Christ. That the waters of the Jordan were often bathed in with a religious devotion, we know from Eusebius and St. Jerome; especially on the feast of the Epiphany, the faithful were wont to don the shroud they were to wear in the grave, and descend into the river to be blessed by the priest. A spirit of piety, therefore, and not of superstition, animated Constantine when he wished to be baptized in those waters (1). As for the examples by which the emperor was influenced, they matter little, but we know that he was not alone in deferring his baptism, however we may condemn the delay. Valentinian died a catechumen; Constantius remained one for many years. Nectarius, and Sts. Ambrose and Augustine were baptized in mature age; the last tells us it was common in his time (2). The observation upon the opportunity furnished by the dedication at Jerusalem is of no importance; we wish not to know what the emperor might have done, but what he did.

But, it is urged, if Constantine was baptized in the year 337 at Nicomedia, he must have been baptized by Eusebius of Nicomedia, who was an Arian; hence, he became an Arian, which is absurd. It does not follow from the fact of his having been baptized at Nicomedia, that Constantine was baptized by Eusebius, bishop of that city. Had he so been, the equally Arian Eusebius of Cæsarea would gladly have mentioned the fact. Gelasius of Cyzicus (3) tells us "he was baptized by an orthodox priest, and not, as some have said, by some one of the heretics." And the Pagan historian Zosimus, in the peculiarly Pagan way of treating Christian matters, says that the emperor was purified by a Spanish magician; might it not then, asks Alexandre, have been Hosius of Cordova, who was so often in his suite, and was very dear to him, who performed the ceremony? Finally, even though we grant that Constantine was baptized by Eusebius of Nicomedia, it does not follow that he became an Arian, for that bishop had subscribed to the Nicene faith, and professed himself a Catholic.

A reconciliation between the description of Eusebius and the theory of the Sylvestrian baptism was attempted by

(1) St. Jerome, translating Eusebius (Loc. Heb.), writes: "Bethabara, across the Jordan, where John was accustomed to baptize unto penance. Hence, even to-day, many of the faithful desire to be there reborn, and are there baptized in the life-giving waters."

(2) Confessions, b. 1, c. 10.

(3) See PHOTIUS, Bibliotheca, Cod. 88.

Bianchini (1), who applied the words of the historian to Constantine's reception of the sacraments of Penance and Confirmation. The phrase, "kneeling on the ground, he humbly asked pardon of God, confessing his sins," naturally refers, he says, to confession; while, among the Greeks, it was common to speak of Confirmation as "the divine seal." But this theory, while ingenious, is not solid. Eusebius expressly states that Constantine received the sign "which confers immortality," and that phrase applies only to Baptism. Again, of Baptism it is properly said, of Confirmation it cannot be predicated, that it makes one a participant in the sacred mysteries; that by it one is reborn, renovated, &c.; that through it one is allowed to mix with the people of God. Finally, how could Constantine have wished to receive Confirmation by the banks of the Jordan? Chrism, not water, is the matter of the sacrament of Confirmation.

So grievous were the suspicions excited in some minds by the circumstances of the baptism of Constantine, that, when compared with certain events of his life, they led to a belief that this first Christian emperor had become an Arian. A few remarks, therefore, upon the faith of Constantine will not be amiss at the close of this dissertation. He certainly was cruel to Athanasius and other defenders of the Nicene Creed; he was undeniably very familiar with the Arians, or, to speak more correctly, with the Semiarians; and he may have, as Rufinus says, consigned his last will and testament to an Arian priest. St. Jerome, in his Chronicle; Lucifer of Cagliari, in his book addressed to the emperor; Sulpitius Severus, in his History; Rufinus, also in his History, all speak of him as an Arian. And nevertheless, it is easy to show that, in his life, and at his death, the faith of Constantine was orthodox. During his life, the Arians did not dare to attack the faith of Nice; even, in the time of Constantius, when they tried to do so at Antioch, they declared, "We certainly are not acolytes of Arius nor do we receive any faith but that delivered in the beginning." If, therefore, Constantine was familiar with the Eusebians, he ought not be supposed to have been drawn by them into Arianism. Again, Athanasius, whom Constantine had exiled, upbraids Constantius because he does not imitate the faith and piety of his father (1). After the death of Constantine, Athanasius, in an interview with the youngest son, Constans, pays the same tribute to the faith of the parent (2). St. Hilary styles Constantius "a rebel heir of the paternal piety" (3). St. Epiphanius says that Constantius, "while otherwise pious, and endowed with many ornaments of virtue, wandered in this one thing, that he did not follow the parental footsteps in the faith" (4). Finally, the ancient Menologies of the Greek Church number Constantine among the saints, and although Rome has never approved that canonization, any more than she has the popular canonization of Charlemagne by some of the peoples of Europe, yet the insertion of his name in the sacred dyptichs is a strong argument for the orthodoxy of Constantine. The combined authority of St. Jerome, Lucifer of Cagliari, Sulpitius Severus, and Rufinus, proving, as they all do, at the most, that Constantine was deceived by the enemies of Athanasius, is of far less weight in determining the faith of that sovereign, than the favorable testimony of the saintly hero of Alexandria, who was for so many years in the thick of the fight, and had far better opportunities of forming a correct opinion upon Arian matters than they could have possessed. The opinion of Athanasius as to the faith of Constantine may be gathered from the passages already quoted, and from the following, taken from the Epistle to Solitaries: "The father (Constantine), on account of the calumnies of the Eusebians, sent Athanasius into Gaul for a time, where he would be free from the cruelty of those who tried to ensnare him And if he did admit Arius into his presence, when he knew him for a perjurer, he showed no good will to him, but, the affair being known, he regarded him as condemned, and as a heretic."

(1) Historical Notes to Anastasius the Librarian.

(1) Epistle to Solitaries.(2) Theodoret, b. 2, c. 4.(3) B. I., to Constantius.(4) On Heresies No. 69.

CHAPTER XIV.

PUBLIC PENANCE AND AURICULAR CONFESSION.

We have already seen that, in the first ages of Christianity, such persons as were guilty of idolatry and certain other grave sins, were obliged to perform public penance before they could be restored to the communion of the faithful. That this custom was in full vigor in the days of Tertullian (born A. D. 150) appears from his book on Penance, c. 9., where he says that penance is a discipline for the humiliation of man; that in its course he should be clothed in sackcloth, and sprinkled with ashes; that his soul should be cast down in grief, and his body treated with contempt; that he should nourish his prayers with fasting and weep by day and by night; that he should have recourse to the priests, and ask the prayers of the dear ones of God. And St. Cyprian (died, 258) tells us, speaking of those who had fallen into idolatry, "They should pray more earnestly, pass the day in grief, and the night in watches and in weeping, spend the whole time in tearful lamentations; they should lie prostrate on the ground in ashes, be covered with sackcloth and dirt; having lost Christ for a vestment, they should wish no other clothing; having eaten the food of the devil, they should prefer to fast; they should attend to good works, through which sins are washed out, and often give alms, through which their souls may be freed from death." But St. Gregory of Neo-Cæsarea (210–270) called the "Worker of Miracles," is the first author who expressly mentions the four classes into which the public penitents were divided. They were the weepers, the hearers, the prostrate, and those who remained (consistentes). In his canonical epistle, written about the year 263, in reference to those who had eaten food offered to the idols during the barbarian inroad into Pontus, and about whose treatment he was consulted, the saint describes, in the eleventh canon (1), the state of each of these classes. The weepers were kept entirely outside the church, and they there besought the faithful who were entering, to pray for them. The hearers were admitted within the doors, but restricted to a part of the nave called narthex, where they could hear the sermon. The prostrate, though mentioned as a separate class, are comprehended by St. Gregory under the same rules as the hearers, both being sent out of the church with the catechumens before the Offertory. The remaining penitents were allowed to hear the whole mass, but could not receive the Holy Eucharist. Thus we see that the weepers alone were, of all classes of humanity, entirely excluded from the services of the Church. We learn from the 4th Council of Carthage, can. 84, that Pagans, Jews, and heretics, were permitted to be present up to the Offertory, in order to receive some amount of instruction. This, however, must be understood of the time when the Discipline of the Secret had been relaxed, for while that system was in force, outsiders were rigidly excluded. All penitents wore a peculiar dress. The stuff was clean, but sprinkled with ashes; it was of sackcloth or even of haircloth. The hair was dishevelled, and so far as was consistent with modesty, the appearance of the body betokened contempt of conventionality. During the penitential course, arms could not be borne, nor could its subjects assist at weddings and other reunions of society. The time was passed in rigid fasting, in prayer, in vigils, and every kind of bodily mortification. These particulars we learn from the 2nd Council of Arles, can. 21; St. Leo the Great, epist. 92; Tertullian, book on Penance; St. Jerome, epist. to Oceanus on the death of Fabiola; 3rd Council of Toledo, can. 12.

(1) The authenticity of this canon is proved by Nat. Alexander, in diss. 18, 4th cent.

It may be asked whether this public penance was rendered more painful by a public confession of the sin committed. Certainly, the spectators might easily conjecture the nature of the sin by noting the time spent in penance, which would amount to a confession on the part of the penitent. Thus, we know from St. Basil, in his canons to Amphilochius, that adulterers passed fifteen years in penance, four among the weepers, five with the hearers, four with the prostrate, and two with those remaining to the end of mass. However, such conjecture would not be very conclusive, for it often happened that humility and fervor prompted a penitent to remain in discipline long beyond the prescribed time. But sometimes there was a public and explicit confession, especially when the crime was notorious. This we learn from St. Jerome, who describes the avowal and penance of Fabiola, a noble lady, who under the impression that the adultery of her husband had dissolved her marriage, publicly espoused another. When, however, the sin was secret, it depended upon the will of the penitent whether a public confession should be made. St. Ambrose, in his work on Penance, book 2. c. 10, exhorts to public penance those whom shame is keeping therefrom, and he founds his argument upon the idea that shame should not deter from public humiliation before God, him whom shame has not withheld from the private confession to a priest. "Should it shame you to supplicate God from whom you are not hidden, when it does not shame you to confess your sins to a man to whom you are hidden?" This method of reasoning could not have been adopted, had public confession been inseparable from public penance. Again, the fourth and tenth Councils of Toledo, in canons 12 and 10 respectively, decide that no one shall be debarred from Holy Orders on account of a public penance which was unaccompanied by public confession. Now we know that the public knowledge of his crimes would render a candidate irregular for Orders. Therefore, since men who had undergone public penance were sometimes admitted to Orders, it follows that said penance was not always accompanied by, or even necessarily equivalent to, a public confession. Finally, St. Leo the Great, epist. 238 (alias 80), speaking of public penance, expressly teaches that a private confession to a priest is sufficient, without any public manifestation of the particular crime. Here we take occasion to note that in the African Church, at least at one period, a public confession of a hitherto unknown crime could not take place. For in the third Council of Carthage, can. 32, public penance is absolutely forbidden "unless on account of a public and most notorious crime, known to the whole Church. With regard to this matter of public confession, we may safely say with Petau, that it was never prescribed by the Church, but sometimes allowed, for the sake of edification.

The public penitents received from the priest two kinds of "imposition of hands." One was "deprecatory," and was given each time they were dismissed, before the Offertory; the other was sacramental and "absolatory," and was only given when the penance was completed. When it happened that danger of death came upon one as yet in the course of penance, absolution was of course conceded, but with the obligation, in case of recovery, of completing the interrupted discipline. At the time of their "reconciliation," the ex-penitents always received Holy Communion. See St. Ambrose, book 2, on Penance.

From the nature of the system of Canonical Penance, we are prepared to hear that few crimes were subject to its discipline. We learn from Tertullian, on Purity, c. 14 and 12, and from Pacianus, that they can be reduced to the heads of infidelity, luxury, and homicide. "These three crimes are to be feared as the breath of the basilisk, as a cup of poison, as a deadly arrow. What shall the contemner of God do, what the bloody man? What remedy shall the fornicator take? Can he who deserts Him, pacify the Lord? Can he consecrate His blood who has spilled another's? Can he reconstruct the temple of God, who by fornication has violated it in himself? These things are capital, brethren, these are mortal." St. Gregory of Nazienzen (328-389) in his epistle to Lactorius, seeks a reason for the Church's severity against these crimes, in their connection with the prominent activities of the soul: reason, concupiscence, and anger. Impiety towards God perverts the whole reasoning faculty; anger causes homicide, concupiscence brings forth every species of impurity. Under the heading of infidelity, he classes all recourse to magicians, all incantations, all invocations to the demon. The first Council of Arles, can. 14, subjects to public penance the perpetrators of forgery, false witnesses, and calumniators of character.

The system of public penance flourished in the Church for twelve centuries, and in the last two of its existence, although formerly penitents could not bear arms, it was commuted for participation in the crusades. (1) Some Protestant authors have contended that it was from this discipline that arose the Catholic practice of auricular confession; that, in fact, the custom of private and secret confession only came into use when the ancient system of public and general confession was abolished. It is outside of our historical province to defend the Catholic doctrine on this subject, but we will not enter the special domain of dogmatic theology, if we show, by the light of history, that ancient writers recognized both private and public confession. Origen (185-254), in his 2nd Homily on the 37th Psalm, tells all sinners who may think of doing public penance, to first confess their sins to a priest, and then act according to his judgment. "Seek diligently," he says, "for one to whom you may confess your sins. Try the physician, to whom you will expose the cause of your malady. . . . that so, at length, if he says anything, who first shows himself to be a merciful and learned physician, if he gives any counsel, you may follow it. If he understands, and foresees, that your trouble should be exposed and cured in an assembly of the whole church, so that perhaps others may be edified, and you yourself easily healed, this should be arrived at with much deliberation." Here certainly we find that upon the private confession was to depend the feasibility of the public penance in a particular case. We may adduce the testimony of St. Cyprian (died 258) who in his book on The Fallen, speaking of those who had bought certificates of compliance, though they had not really been guilty of idolatry, says, "Of how much greater faith and fear are those who, although stained by no crime either of sacrifice or of certificate, yet, having thought to commit the act, do now in simplicity and grief confess this to the priests of God, and make a confession of conscience, (sic) lay open the burden of their souls, and receive the healing cure for even their little wounds." Surely by the term "confession of conscience" the saint cannot mean a public avowal; the very word implies secrecy. We learn from Anastasius the Librarian that Pope Simplicius (467) ordered that on certain days priests should be in attendance at the basilicas of St. Peter, St. Paul, and St. Laurence, on account of penitents and baptisms. In the Roman Penitentiale, tit. 8, Pope Symmachus (498) says: "All whom we receive in penance, are thereby our spiritual children, just as are those whom we have taken from the font, or whom we have immersed therein, and whom the baptismal water has regenerated." This spiritual affinity could not be contracted with public penitents merely because of their being such; again, the comparison with baptism shows that Symmachus supposes his penitence to be the administration of a sacrament. In the Council of Elvira, which was held before that of Nice, the 32nd canon reads thus: "It pleased the fathers that if any one should fall into a deadly sin, he should do penance rather before the bishop than before a priest," which can only mean that the Spanish prelates wished public and very grave crimes to be referred to the bishop, while hidden ones, which did not call for public penance, should be confessed to, and absolved by, the priest. The history of the Novatian schism in the 3d century also shows that private confession was in use at that time. The doctrine of the Novatians is well expressed by Chrysostom (1) in the words he puts into their mouths: "It is not for thee to give the Eucharist to those who have sinned, for there is no other remission" (than by baptism). That is, the Novatians held that since the Eucharist could only be received by the innocent of sin, the fallen (into idolatry, under Decius) could not receive it, for there was no way of recovering their baptismal innocence. The whole controversy, therefore, was as to whether Christ had left to His Church any sacrament, other than baptism, for the remission of sin. The fathers of the council held at Rome in the year 254 declared that the "fallen," when penitent, were to be forgiven. The mere standing in penance for a time could not bring about their reconciliation, except as a preparation for the sacrament, to be received at the end of the probation. Again, it is certain that the quality and length of the public penance depended entirely upon the judgment given by the confessor; nay, it depended upon him as to whether or not there should be any public penance. As Origen said, in the passage just quoted, the confessor had to judge whether "the trouble should be exposed and cured in an assembly of the whole church," and that judgment could be delivered only after private confession.

(1) As to the treatment of the clergy, under the system of public penance, there is a variety of opinion, some authors contending that not even the higher clergy were exempt from its application. See the dissertations of Cabassut and Constant, inserted by Zaccaria in his Latin edition of Fleury's Discipline of the People of God.

(1) Comment on Epist. Heb., c. 10.

The opponents of auricular confession contrive to draw considerable comfort from a famous fact in the life of Nectarius of Constantinople, who succeeded St. Gregory of Nazianzen in that see, in the year 389. This bishop, they say, abolished in his diocese the practice of private confession, and was not therefore condemned; this shows that the custom was derived from human, not divine institution. Premising that a note should be taken of this objection as an admission that the practice was in vogue in the 4th century, we narrate the fact in the words of Socrates, book 5, c. 19, "About this time, it pleased (the authorities) to abolish the priests of the churches who managed penance, and for this cause. After the Novatians had separated from the Church, because they would not communicate with those who had fallen in the Decian persecution, from that time the bishops added to the church rolls a penitentiary priest, in order that those who, after baptism, had fallen, might confess their sins to a priest appointed for that purpose. . . . When this institution had been in vogue a long time, it was at length abolished, in the time of bishop Nectarius, on account of a certain crime committed in the church. A certain noble woman had approached the penitentiary priest, and confessed the sins committed by her since her baptism. The priest ordered the woman to fast and pray frequently, which actions, taken together with her confession of her sins, would constitute a work befitting penitence. In the course of time, the woman confessed another crime, that a deacon of the church had committed fornication with her.

When she had said this, the deacon was ejected from the church, and the people were greatly moved; not only on account of the crime committed were they indignant, but because of the infamy and heavy stain put by this fact upon the Church. When, therefore, on account of this thing, reproaches were heaped upon churchmen, Eudaemon, a priest, and Alexandrian by birth, persuaded bishop Nectarius to do away with the penitentiary priest, and to allow every one, as he might wish, and for his own conscience, to approach the communion of the sacraments." Besides confirming the above narration, Sozomenus, book 7, c. 16, says: "Since, in seeking pardon of sin, one must necessarily confess it, it rightly, and from the beginning, seemed to the priests grave and annoying to have to divulge one's crimes, as in a theatre, before the multitude. Therefore they assigned to this office one of the priests who was noted for integrity of life, and who was endowed with taciturnity and prudence, in order that those who had sinned might confess their acts to him. Then, according to each one's fault, what each should do or suffer, he indicated by way of penance, absolved them confessing, each one to exact of himself the punishment of his crime." If we carefully peruse this narrative, we shall see that Nectarius abolished, not sacramental and private, but public confession. For it is plainly stated that he did away with that office which was established at the time of the Novatian schism, which office was no other than of superintending public penance. Again, Nectarius abolished that which was causing scandal. This was, not the betrayal of the woman's crime by the priest who had heard it in the confessional, for neither the words of Socrates bear that interpretation, nor does the testimony of Sozomenus, showing how the selection of the penitentiary was from among those noted for "integrity, taciturnity, and prudence." The occasion of scandal was, and our opponents admit this, the open avowal, on the part of the woman, of her criminal intercourse with the deacon. Nectarius therefore abolished the practice which sometimes obtained, as we have already seen, of publicly confessing certain crimes, according as the permission of the confessor and the fervor of the penitent dictated. That Socrates understood public confession to be the subject matter of the abrogation is plain from the remark which he says he made to Eudaemon, the instigator of the decree: "Whether or not thy advice will profit the Church, priest, God knows. For my part, I see that to each one is now given a pretext for no longer stirring up his neighbor on account of his sins, and for not observing that precept of the Apostle which tells us not to communicate with the barren works of darkness, but to rather reprove them."

CHAPTER XV.

ORIGIN OF CHRISTIAN RITES AND CEREMONIES.

Among the many changes produced by the spread of Christianity, that upon the arts is not the least notable, and the first effect upon art was a re-establishment of the sublime. A propensity towards the sublime as an æsthetic element, modified by the Mosaic and Christian dogma of Creation, and by the consequent retirement of Eastern emanatism, is observed in the authors of the New Testament, and conspicuously in the writings of Sts. Paul and John. And although it was reserved for later days to witness the maturation of the sublime in the pre-eminently Catholic Dante, and for still more modern times to be blessed by the adult genius of a Michel Angelo, we cannot arise from the perusal of Tertullian, Cyprian, or any of the early fathers, without feeling that their souls were afire with preternatural eloquence prompted by meditation upon the four great types of Christian art, the God-Man, the Virgin Mother, the Angel, and the Saint. These four subjects are ever present to the Christian, and it is natural to him to externate the ideas born in his soul, now by painting, now by sculpture, now by music, now by ritual. All religionists, of course, in a greater or less degree, experience this tendency, and in accordance with their approach to truth in the conception of divine things, do they arise to the sublime, or sink to the commonplace—mayhap, to the deformed, in their artistic manifestations. Influenced by her four great types of art, the Church banished from the portals of the sublime the deformities of Oriental symbolism, substituting therefor an emblematicism which was simple at once and dignified. It was only when the days of open persecution had been for a while shortened, that the world found that she who claimed its mastery in the spheres of religion was also its mistress in the domains of art. But even when she lurked in the bowels of the earth, there moved within her the instinct to present to the eyes and ears of her children the beautiful ideas of eternal truth with which she glowed. The damp and bare walls of her subterranean churches were utilized, the slabs of her martyrs' graves were adorned, and the faithful could see around them pictorial illustrations of the doctrines they believed. Through the long and gloomy corridors of the Catacombs, on stated occasions, there wended its pious way a torch-lighted procession of clergy and of virgins, chanting the praises of the Lord and His saints. Arrived at the chapel designed for the service of the day, the Pontiff seats himself on his throne, cut in the solid rock, and by his attendant deacons is vested in habiliments each one of which has a deep and liturgical meaning. For he is about to offer up to God that Eucharistic Sacrifice of the Lamb of God which is the centre of all Catholic ritual, and it is the aim of the Church that her ritual shall be instructive of doctrine even in its minute details. Here too, then, just as, when circumstances shall permit, she will avail herself of architecture and sculpture as a means of instruction, does she seek in her ceremonies to impress truth upon the minds of men. The awful and majestic rite is begun, and after a series of prayers and ceremonies—all excitant of faith and devotion in the bystanders—it is consummated amid the tears of many who will never participate in it again. They will soon receive the martyr's crown, and among the causes which, under God's grace, will have contributed to the enlightenment of their understanding and to the strengthening of their wills, will be those very ceremonies which the Church has used for their edification.

And now for the object of this chapter. That the rites of the Church are deeply impressive, many outsiders admit ; that some of them are eminently beautiful, all agree ; why and how and when they originated, is a matter of dispute. It is not within the province of the historian to illustrate the meaning of the Church's liturgy, but it is his office to investigate a charge of unworthy origin brought against her rites. Of such a nature is the accusation put forth by Mosheim, one of the most worthy, as he is about the most impartial of our opponents in the historical order. This author, when treating of the third century, reduces the origin of Christian rites to the following causes. The primitive worship of Christians was distinguished by simplicity ; in fact, it was so void of ritualistic tendencies, that it seemed to the Pagan mind to even ignore the existence of God. To avert, therefore, the charge of atheism, the Christians introduced external paraphernalia of which the Pagans were fond. Again, among the apparatus of the Greek and Oriental worship, the chief respect was paid to the mysteries : to draw, therefore, the Gentiles more easily away from the temples, our forefathers in the faith introduced their mysteries and sacred rites. To these alleged causes, which in last analysis are based upon a mere "perhaps," and might, therefore, be dismissed by a "perhaps not," Mosheim assigns a more specious one. "To these causes, add the study of the Platonic philosophy, or, if you prefer, the popular superstition of the Orientals about demons, which the Platonists had made their own, and which the Christian teachers had received from these latter. From this opinion as to the nature and propensities of the genii, the origin of many rites is to be sought. This idea called forth public exorcisms, frequent fasts, the avoidance of marriage. This idea dissuaded companionship with those not yet admitted to the sacred font, or with those who were excluded from communion in divine things, since all such were regarded as subject to the dominion of some evil genius. This idea, to say nothing of other effects, increased the annoyances and punishments generally imposed upon sinners" (1). And in another place (2), "The Christian bishops slightly changed the institutions and rites with which the Romans, Greeks, and other people showed their devotion and reverence towards the false gods, and introduced them into Christian worship, and therefore at that time there was but little difference between the public religions of Romans, Greeks, and Christians. All possessed showy vestments, mitres, tiaras, wax torches, trumpets, supplications, purifications, golden and silver vases, &c." Let us now examine these causes which Mosheim assigns as an origin of our Catholic rites and ceremonies. Firstly, as to the desire of the clergy to attract the Greeks and Romans who were used to mysteries. Were such a reason given for the present use in this city of New York of a certain pomp and ceremonial, supposing of course that they were of late introduction, it would not lack a certain speciousness, although it would be little complimentary to the intellectual calibre of our Protestant friends, and would display very little confidence in their religious sincerity. But when it is assigned to the third century as a motive of Christian action, we are asked to believe too much. At that time the Church was in hiding. Of what use to the object in view would have been the introduction of rites when the Pagans were excluded, not merely from the spectacle, but in most cases even from a knowledge of the place where it was given? Is it not more logical to admit that as the Church ever taught that God was to be adored in external worship, as well as by internal obsequiousness, so she furnished her children with the means of fulfilling the obligation? And this, from the very nature of her doctrine, she was compelled to do, so far as circumstances would permit, even though there had been no calumny as to her atheism.

Puerile, indeed, is the charge of imitation in the matter of mysteries. Mosheim could scarcely have intended to descend to a play upon words when dealing with so important a matter. And yet, outside of the mere verbal analogy, there is no similarity between the Pagan mysteries and the hidden dogmas and sacred rites of the Christians. In what were these like unto the Eleusinia, the Thyestea, or the Lupercalia? But rooted deeply into the Christian religion there were certain heads of doctrine, real mysteries, so called because they were too sublime for the caption of human understanding. No need had the Christian pastors to go outside of their own communion for what they had within in such abundance; no need to go to the decrepit and sensual systems of Paganism for what the Redeemer had given them in all purity and sanctity.

(1) History, p. 2, c. 4.(2) Ibid., hist. Cent. 4, c. 4.

Of no greater weight is the assertion based upon the affection of many of the early fathers for the philosophy of Plato. Deep indeed and all-powerful would that affection have been, and weak indeed their respect for Christianity, if the Neo-Platonist fathers had been led to so radically vitiate the faith as Mosheim supposes. But the theory of demonology as understood by the Church, and with her by these Neo-Platonists, was far different from the superstition of genii, &c., encouraged by ancient Paganism and modern Mohammedanism. Her exorcisms, &c., are based upon her own theory derived from her Founder, and of the truth of which both the Old and New Testament furnish abundant proof. As for the frequency of fasts having any connection with the Platonic philosophy, we are at a loss to account for it, as all Pagans extolled the system of Lucullus as above that of the Baptist. But there is a way of accounting for the introduction of any rational system of mortification into the Christian discipline, if we reflect upon the example and teaching of Christ. As for avoidance of matrimony, the idea of which Mosheim derives from the Platonic affiliations of the early Christians, the veriest tyro in sacred science knows that the Church holds marriage to be a sacrament, and therefore holy, but that, with St. Paul, she teaches that in particular cases the celibitic state is preferable. Nor is there any Platonic sympathy displayed in the discontinuance of association with the excommunicated, which the ancient discipline so rigidly inculcated; it is rather in accordance with the command of St. Paul whereby we were not even to give the compliment of salute to a heretic.

The entire theory of Mosheim in this matter is based upon the supposition that because there exists a similarity between the Christian rites and those of Paganism, therefore the more modern system drew such institutions from the other. "Similitudes are not to be urged in all points" is a very good maxim, but the points of assumed similarity should at least be tangible, and not merely fancied. Now there is no more likeness between the rites of Catholicism and those of Paganism as practised in Rome, Greece, and Egypt, especially when we consider the symbolic meaning of the ceremonies, than exists between them and those which were once in vogue in the temples of the Montezumas. And even if we discovered a well-founded similarity, we could not logically infer a connection, if there were other ways of accounting for the origin. Palma (1), in treating of this subject, presents Mosheim as very neatly undermining his own position in another part of his works (2), where he expressly contends that because similarities are found between the Christian and Jewish customs, it by no means follows that the Church modelled her discipline upon the form of that of the Synagogue. "I easily believe," says Mosheim, "that the Christians established many customs which were in use in the Jewish assemblies, and that therefore it would not be rash to say that the Church is similar to the Synagogue. But this similarity by no means shows that the Christians took from the Jews those things which are like in form to the Jewish worship. For since the same end was proposed by the Jews and Christians in frequenting their houses of worship, it could not but necessarily happen that sometimes the Christians would do the same things as the Jews did. . . . the divine law was to be publicly promulgated, and explained; the people were to be excited by sermons and exhortations, and to be taught; hymns were to be sung and prayers recited. For no religious assemblage, convened for divine worship, can lack these things. . . . The nature of things demanded these institutions, without which religion could not subsist; not, however, the desire, which they are said to have had, of imitating the Jews."

(1) Hist. Eccl., c. 33.(2) Inst. Hist. Maj., sec. 1, p. 2, § 9.

Several Catholic writers assign a Pagan origin to many of our rites, though not prompted by the spirit of contempt which actuated Calvin, the Centuriators of Magdeburg, Conyers Middleton, Buddeus, Mosheim, &c. Among such we regret to notice Gerson, Raynaud, Petau, Noel Alexandre. But all rely upon the similarity which they find between the Christian and Pagan rites, which argument, as we have seen, is not conclusive. As well might it be said that since both Pagans and Christians eat and drink, live under roofs, and cover their bodies, therefore the latter do so in imitation of the former. There are some things which men are impelled by nature to do, and in which they need no teacher. Just so, many of the sacred ceremonies come into use instinctively, without any example being necessary from the more ancient religions. Thus nature prompts men to use for the honor of God those things of earth which seem to speak of goodness, of purity, and of glory. Hence in nearly all religions the use of flowers and lights. Even Puritanism sought, for a time, to manifest by external signs the spirit of its doctrine. The very simplicity of its worship, the barrenness of its temples, the primness of countenance and severity of costume of its followers, all were so many ritualistic expressions of the sombreness of the Deity it adored. On the contrary, the Catholic religion, being pre-eminently one of joy, of love, and of filial confidence, in a God who had given so many and such proofs of love to man, naturally sought to express its feelings by the use of everything in nature and in art which, otherwise legitimate, might enhance the devotion of its children. Nature, and not Paganism, was its teacher. There are certain passages of Gregory of Nyssa and of Theodoret (1) which seem to give weight to the theory of our opponents. But they only go to show that as the Pagans on certain days celebrated the memory of their gods and heroes, so the Christians assigned other days to the memory of the saints. The same might be alleged of temples, but no one contends that we owe to Pagans the idea of a place of worship. The origin of saints' days flows naturally from the Catholic dogma of their veneration, and traces of such may be found in the Old Testament, without recurring to Gentile sources. But granted that the Church wished to substitute her own feasts for those of the Pagan world, wherein is strengthened the theory we combat? Some ancient fathers (1), commenting upon the words of St. Paul, Gal., 4, 10, "You observe days and months, &c.," ask themselves whether the Christians imitated the Jews in the establishment of feast-days, and answer with a denial, because of the diversity of end proposed in each case. St. Jerome says (2), "We do not celebrate the Pasch of the unleavened, but of the resurrection and the cross; nor have we, according to the rule of Israel, seven weeks in Pentecost, but we venerate the advent of the Holy Ghost." The same father answers our opponents, when he says to Vigilantius, "That was done for the idols, and is therefore detestable; this is done for the martyrs, and is therefore to be received." And St. Augustine (3), "When these are shown to God, in accordance with His inspiration and teaching, it is true religion; but when to the demons, in accordance with their impious pride, it is a baneful superstition.

(1) BARONIO, year 44, num. 86.

It may be interesting to notice some of the rites which we are said to have derived from the Pagans. We shall confine ourselves to those which in themselves are the most important, or which have been placed in this category by authors of celebrity (4). The pious Gerson so insists as to the Purification of the Blessed Virgin (5), the ancient Romans being accustomed to carry candles in honor of a certain goddess, and in the purification of the city. The learned Erasmus, Melancthon, and Gravati, derive the Christian idea of excommunication from the same source. Polydorus Vergilius thus treats the constitution of our hierarchy and our ecclesiastical polity; especially our cus-

(1) ORIGEN, Ag. Celsus, B. 8. CHRYSOSTOM, hom. 63.

(2) Ad. Apost. loc.

(3) Ep. 49, al. 102, qu. 3, n. 18.

(4) The reader who is anxious for more information will find an abundance in the valuable dissertation of the Jesuit Peter Lazeri, inserted by Zaccaria in his Latin edition of Fleury's Discipline of God's People, published at Venice in 1782.

(5) Tom. III., p. 474.

tom of kissing the foot of the Supreme Pontiff and the hand of a bishop ; also, the "Ite, missa est" at the end of Mass. Buddeus classes together our Canonization of Saints and the Gentile apotheosis of heroes. Angelo Rocca gives a Pagan origin to our prayers for the dead. Raynaud (1), does the same with vigils, the placing of holy water at the doors of churches, Rogation Days, the prohibition of marriage at certain periods. Now of all these instances of an apparently Pagan origin on the part of our rites, there is not one to which, with more probability of accuracy, should not be assigned as source one of the following : either nature, of which we have already spoken ; the institutes of the Jews ; the words of the Scriptures ; or Catholic dogma as naturally calling for it. And here again we must insist upon the weakness of an argument drawn from a similarity of rites. If such a reasoning were permissible, then we ought to style even the Sacrament of Baptism an imitation from Paganism. For, as Tertullian says of the devil (2), "He also immerses some, and promises his believers and faithful ones an expiation from the font," and to extend the parallel to matters of which Christ is certainly the Author, "the devil also celebrates the offering of bread, and has his virgins and his continent ones."

Those who assign a Pagan origin to a single one of the Christian rites must lay aside any acquaintance with the feelings of our ancestors in the faith towards the Gentiles. It is no exaggeration to say that they held the Pagan system in utter execration, and that they harbored a holy fear lest by any contact with anything belonging to the pest, they should contract some deadly evil. How then are we to suppose that they would willingly incorporate into their very economy of worship, the rites of the priests of Baal ? Again, we know that of old the fathers had to bear the reproach of having no temples, no images, no altars ; that Origen, Clement of Alexandria, Athenagoras, Minutius, Arnobius, Lactantius, all seem to concede the truth of the accusation. Did they really possess no temples before the year 230, as Tillemont contends, and no images, as Petau and Noel

(1) Heteroocl. Spirit. part 1, p. 109.(2) De Præscript., c. 41.

Alexandre hold? Then why did they not have those things which so soon afterwards came to be regarded as useful to the service of God? It must have been because they wished to have nothing in common with the Gentiles, whose temples, altars, and sculptured ornaments were everywhere visible. As Petau rightly observes (1), "Since as yet the Pagan superstition was navigating under full sail, in those first days of the Church, it was deemed better to suppress and omit many things, which were in themselves not useless and even proper; for there was danger lest the parade of certain rites would give offence, bearing, as they did, some similarity to those in use by the Pagans." If this be so, can we believe that the fathers deliberately adopted the Gentile ceremonies? And how stands the case if we partly differ from Petau, and hold that in many churches the use of images was known? How is it, if we hold with Medus and Bingham that temples existed before the year 230? And how, when it is contended that the existence of altars flows necessarily from the Catholic dogma of the Eucharistic Sacrifice? Surely in this supposition, there must be some way of accounting for the silence of the fathers when accused of having neither temples, altars, or images. Bona (2) thinks it was because the sanctuaries of the Christians were hidden and modest. Petau holds that they were silent as to the altars because these were temporary, not permanent. Noel Alexandre (3) finds a reason in the repugnance of the early Christians to the theory of the Pagans that an image, when consecrated, became the god himself (4). We can only believe, in the supposition that the fathers were possessed of temples and images (of altars there can be no doubt), that so profound was their detestation of everything Gentile, they wished, as far as possible, to remove from their rites every similarity to those of the hated superstition. We cannot therefore suppose them guilty of the adoption of Pagan ceremonies.

(1) Incarnation, b. 15. c. 13, No. 3.

(2) Liturgy, b. 1, c. 19.

(3) Cent. VIII., diss. 6.

(4) MINUTIUS FELIX in Octav.

CHAPTER XVI.

JULIAN THE APOSTATE.

Flavius Claudius Julianus, nephew of Constantine the Great, was born in the year 331. Although baptized and educated as a Christian, he became a Pagan when quite young, but kept the perversion a secret. Constantius II. was very suspicious of him, and often imprisoned him, but in the year 355, he proclaimed him Cæsar, and gave him the hand of his sister Helena. Having defeated the German invaders of Gaul, and driven them across the Rhine, Julian became the idol of the soldiery, and when, in 360, Constantius ordered him to send his best troops for a campaign against Persia, they proclaimed him emperor. He was marching on the capital, when the death of Constantius left him undisputed master of the empire. It was only then that he openly avowed his abandonment of Christianity, and entered upon a course of persecution. But his system was quite different from that adopted by the olden Pagan emperors; he aimed rather at undermining Christianity than at openly persecuting its votaries. He did not compel people to sacrifice to the gods; he rather enticed them to do so. Thus, he ordered his statue to be surrounded by images of the gods; then the Christians found themselves in a dilemma. If they paid it any sign of respect, the homage was regarded by him and his partisans as given also to the idols; if they refused the token, they could be held for treason. On one occasion, some soldiers had burnt incense before the imperial image, in gratitude for a gift of pocket-money. When they discovered what was then imputed to them, they rushed to the palace, and before the eyes of Julian, they flung the coins out of the windows, protesting themselves Christians, and ready, if necessary, for martyrdom. The enraged emperor ordered them to be beheaded, but, recovering his usual subtlety, and envying them such glory, he commuted the sentence to exile. Another means of annoying the faithful, and of corrupting the integrity of the weak-minded—one which has proved, in modern times, far more successful than bloody persecution—was adopted by the imperial philosophaster. Under the reigns of the late emperors the Christians had arisen to the highest posts of the state, both civil and military, and in the great republic of letters, they had shone with a glory which far surpassed that of their Pagan compeers. We do not read that he entirely forbade the army to the faithful—their prowess was as serviceable to the state in those days as it is in more modern times—but the higher posts were to be opened to them no longer. They were to be shut out also from the great world of literature; probably he hoped to be able one day to reproach them with their ignorance, as more modern persecutors have done in the case of their victims. He promulgated a law, in accordance with which, the children of Christians could receive no academic education. Upon the consequences of such a law, no comment is necessary; the reader's acquaintance with modern English and Irish history is sufficient to enable him to form a correct opinion upon them. If Julian thus looked forward to the mental degradation of future generations, it is not surprising that he at once interdicted to Christians all entrance into the judiciary, or even the bar. But he was not content with these open attacks upon the faith; he descended to puerilities, which, even if successful, could have had no effect upon the victims. Thus, he ordered the food, exposed for sale in the markets of Constantinople, to be mixed with that which had been offered to the idols. When the faithful discovered the fraud, they subsisted as best they could on what they had at home, and Julian, probably fearing the market-women, put a stop to the trick. At Antioch, his agents poured the "water of purification" (aqua lustralis) from the temples into all the wells, but the Christians used the wells, remembering perforce the words of the Apostle, 1 Cor. 10, "Whatsoever is sold in the shambles, eat, asking no questions for conscience's sake."

Julian was also guilty of violent acts of insult to Christianity. At Antioch, he broke into the magnificent basilica constructed by his uncle, urinated on the altar, and carried the Sacramental vessels to his treasury. He ordered the worship of Apollo to be revived in the wood of Daphne, wherein reposed the relics of the martyr-bishop of Antioch, Babyla, and the people solemnly transferred the body to the city, singing, with the Psalmist, confusion to all the adorers of idols. He threw down the statue at Cæsarea Philippi, which had been erected to Christ by the woman cured of a bloody flow, and put up one of himself (1). Although Julian preferred to use insidious rather than aggressive means for the overthrow of Christianity, there were several martyrdoms during his reign. Publia, an abbess, Juventin, Maximin, and Artimius, are mentioned by Theodoret as dying for the faith. If not by his order, at least with the connivance of Julian, the Pagans of Ascalon ripped open the bowels of many priests and nuns, and filling them with grain, threw the mutilated and quivering frames to hogs to be devoured. At Arethusa, the bishop, Mark (2) who had once saved the life of Julian, was subjected to many and grievous vexations. The regard which Julian had for the lives of his Christian subjects, and for his own laws of toleration, may be known from his having exiled a Pagan prefect who had presumed to upbraid some other Pagans for killing some Christians. The apostate tried hard to win over Sts. Basil and Gregory of Nazianzen, and made the latter's brother, Cæsarius, prefect of the imperial treasury. But the two saints spurned all bribes and solicitations for themselves, and influenced Cæsarius to do likewise. It is notable that although Julian affected a profound contempt for Christians, whom he designated as "Galileans," yet he never ceased to propose their purity as a model to his Pagan priests.

The most important event of Julian's reign was the attempted restoration of the great temple at Jerusalem, in order to falsify the prediction of our Lord. About 300 years had passed since the destruction of the temple by

(1) Sozomenus relates that the statue of Julian was immediately struck by lightning, and demolished. The people collected the fragments of the statue of our Lord, and reverently placed them in the main church.

(2) Mark was at one time an Arian, but he must at this time have again become orthodox, for St. Gregory of Nazianzen and Theodoret are strong in his praise, when speaking of this part of his life.

Titus, when the apostate, aided by the Jews, set about his task. But all his efforts only served to further verify the prophecy of Christ. We shall take occasion to speak more fully of this matter at the close of our dissertation. Although the destruction of Christianity was the main object of Julian's reign, he was compelled by exigencies of state to pause in his work in the year 363. The war with Persia claimed his attention; therefore, swearing to finish the ruin of the Church on his return, he made his preparatory sacrifices to the gods, and set out on what proved his last campaign. With his usual intrepidity, he was leading a charge, in the very first battle, when he was mortally wounded by an arrow. According to Theodoret and St. Gregory of Nazianzen, he threw some of his blood towards Heaven, crying, "Galilean, Thou hast conquered." Ammianus Marcellinus says nothing of this incident, but his silence casts no improbability upon the story. Nazianzen knew Julian thoroughly, having studied with him at Athens, and been on terms of intimacy with him, and he certainly deemed the bitter words consonant with the character of the dying man. And it is natural that Ammianus, a Pagan, should have hesitated to report this avowal of defeat on the part of his hero, especially since the Pagans had just been flattering themselves on the approaching ruin of the Christian religion, for the edict of persecution had already been sent into Africa. The last moments of Julian were spent in an interview with Maximus, a philosopher and magician, to whose influence was due, more than to anything else, his apostasy. This "philosopher" had involved the ardent young man, when a student of 24 years of age, in the mysteries of astrology; he attached him to himself by flattering his ambition, and prognosticating for him a universal empire. Leading him to believe in the theory of metempsychosis, he persuaded him that the soul of Alexander the Great resided in his body; hence, perhaps, much of his rash intrepidity in battle, and hence, certainly, much of his love of Paganism. When Julian died, he was only 32 years of age.

Since the character of Julian was a mass of contradictions, it is not strange that writers have formed upon him very different judgments. Chastellux, the author of the treatise on "Public Happiness," says of him, "Sometimes Julian essays to copy Marcus Aurelius, sometimes Trajan, and again Alexander. His works are those of a sophist and of a rhetorician. In his habits, he is a Stoic; in the temple he is an idolater, and in his cabinet, a bad Platonist, seeking to corrupt the doctrines of that sect by an unworthy alliance with magic." The following portrait, drawn by St. Gregory of Nazianzen, is as interesting as it is reliable: "Most persons only knew Julian after he made himself known by his actions, and by his abuse of absolute power; but I knew him from the time of our acquaintance at Athens, and I never found a sign of good in him. He ever rolled his eyes from side to side, and had a ferocious aspect. He could not keep his limbs at rest, he was continually distending and contracting his nostrils, in sign of anger or of contempt, and he was constantly addicted to sharp sayings and cool buffooneries. His laugh was a bellow. He would at the same moment grant or refuse a favor with equal ease, talked without rhyme or reason, put inopportune questions, and gave answers far from the point. But why do I enter into such detail as to his exterior? those who were with us (at Athens) can witness, that, when I noted his characteristics, I said that the Roman state was nourishing a very dangerous serpent. So I said, hoping, at the same time, that I was deceived; and without doubt, it were better that I had been, and the earth not been desolated by so many evils." Le Beau, in his History of the Lower Empire, thus speaks of Julian: "We can perceive in his soul every play of vanity. As greedy of glory as the miser is of riches, he seeks it in the smallest of objects. His temperance is pushed to extremes, and becomes a theatrical virtue. A great portion of his subjects never received any justice from him; had he truly been the father of his people, he would have ceased to hate the Christians, and would not have made war upon them from the moment he became their emperor. He spared their lives only in his words and edicts. Julian is the model for such persecuting rulers as wish to escape reproach by an appearance of sweetness and equity." From what has been said, it can be readily seen that the Christians of his day had some excuse for identifying Julian with the persecutor mentioned in an enigmatical manner in the 13th chapter of the Apocalypse (1).

We now come to the principal event in the life of Julian, his failure in the attempted rebuilding of the temple of Jerusalem. The apologists of Christianity have always drawn an argument to prove its divinity, from its miracles and from the fulfilment of the prophecies connected with it. To this latter class belongs the argument deduced from the destruction of the Jewish temple by Titus. It came to the mind of Julian that by rebuilding this temple, he would render void the prophecy of Christ, and thus shake the Christian system to the core. But God ordained that he was not to succeed. All that money could produce was at hand, the Jews flocked from all parts to aid in the work, and in a short time the new foundations were well under way. But suddenly, there burst from the bosom of the earth a sea of fire, which drove the workmen from their labor, and consumed all the preparations for the task. The reality of this event is impugned by many Protestant authors, and by all the foes of the miraculous. It is for us to show that our reasons for believing the above to be an incontestable fact of history, are solid and convincing. And first, we have the testimony of Ammianus Marcellinus (d. 395), a Pagan, a courtier and admirer of Julian, and a fellow-soldier, who, speaking of Julian's widespread activity, says that, "wishing to perpetuate the memory of his reign by the magnitude of his works, he thought to restore, at an immense outlay, a certain magnificent temple at Jerusalem, which, after many destructive combats during a siege by Vespasian and Titus, had with difficulty been captured; and he assigned the task to Alypius of Antioch, a former pro-prefect of Britain. While, therefore, Alypius was energetically pushing the affair forward, with the assistance of the rector of the province, there burst forth, at the foundations, fearful masses of flames, which, by their frequent assaults, rendered the place inaccessible, burning up the laborers as often as any approached. In this manner, the element obstinately repelling them, an end was made to the design."

(1) The Abbé Baudouin, in an explanation of the Apocalypse, published at Paris, in 1784, contends that the Greek term apostates, now Julian's distinctive surname, gives exactly the number 666, according to the numerical value of the letters, as assigned by the Greeks.

Is it likely that a man in the position of Marcellinus would have published a fact so triumphant for the Christians, had he been in the slightest doubt as to its truth? Again, St. Cyril was almost on the spot at the time, for he was then bishop of Jerusalem. Socrates (1) says of him, "At that time, Cyril, bishop of Jerusalem, mindful of the prophecy of Daniel, which Christ confirmed in the Holy Gospels, plainly predicted to many hearers that, in a short time, not one stone above another should remain of that temple, and thus would the oracle of the Saviour be fulfilled." Socrates is confirmed by Rufinus. This passage shows us that the Christians of the Holy City fully appreciated the motives of Julian, and when Socrates speaks of the prediction of St. Cyril, he plainly proves that, a short time after it, must have occurred some event which, by destroying what had remained of the ancient foundations of the temple, fulfilled the Biblical prophecy. Another testimony to the truth of this miracle is found in St. Ambrose's reprimand to Theodosius for wishing to compel Christians to rebuild a Pagan temple. "Hast thou not heard, O emperor," he said (2), "that when Julian ordered the temple of Jerusalem to be rebuilt, those who were doing the work were burnt by divine fire? Dost thou not beware, lest it may do so now?" and St. John Chrysostom, speaking of the miracle, says (3), "The emperor Julian, although he was so madly devoted to the design, yet feared, that if he proceeded any further therein, the fire would descend upon his own head; and, with all his people, he ceased from the work. And now if you go to Jerusalem, you will see the bare foundations, and if you ask the reason, you will hear only this: 'We are all witnesses to this thing; in our day, only a little while ago, it happened; reflect upon the wonderful victory. This did not occur under the pious Cæsars,

(1) History, b. 3, c. 20.

(2) Epist. 11, to Theodosius.

(3) Oration against Jews and Gentiles.

lest some might say that the Christians' coming had perfected the work ; but it happened when we were in affliction, when all liberty was withdrawn, when Paganism flourished, when the faithful were either hiding at home or had fled into the solitudes and avoided the open places. It happened, in fine, so that there would be left no pretext to impudence.' " Looking over these testimonies of Sts. Cyril, Chrysostom, and Ambrose, we cannot perceive in them any lack of weight with which a candid mind would find fault, or any innate weakness which the rules of criticism can discover. St. Cyril was a man of cool judgment, and was thoroughly cognizant of the aspirations and acts of Julian ; he was the Christian leader in Jerusalem at the time of the attempted restoration of the temple ; and, finally, there was no reason for Socrates' introduction of his prediction unless it was well known by all that the prediction was connected with some act which fulfilled it. That act is accounted for in the supposition of the truth of the miracle in question ; it remains unknown, and therefore Socrates was guilty of holding up Cyril as a false prophet, if we set the miracle aside. St. Chrysostom exhibits too much confidence in his remarks to a people who must have been well informed on the subject of his discourse, for us to suppose him in error. The same holds good of St. Ambrose in his rebuke of Theodosius. We have already alluded to St. Gregory Nazianzen, as a valuable authority for anything connected with the reign of Julian.

The following testimony, taken from his 4th Oration against the apostate, fully confirms that of Marcellinus : " Julian pitted the Jews against us. He availed himself of their ancient fickleness and of their intense hatred for us, to perfect his design ; asserting that, according to their books and traditions, they were destined to return to their own land, and to renew their ancestral rites. . . . Those who have studied their doings narrate how their wives not only stripped themselves of all their ornaments and matronal insignia, that they might contribute to the reconstruction of the building, but even carried earth in their bosoms, sparing neither their exquisite robes nor their delicate frames in what they deemed a work of piety—regarding all else as subordinate to this enterprise. When, however, forced by a dire confusion and by a sudden tremor of the undulating ground, they rushed to a neighboring temple to pray and to escape the danger, . . . they found, according to some, the doors suddenly closed and bolted by an invisible power. . . . One thing certainly all do narrate, and hold for certain, that when they were striving by main force to secure an entrance, a fire burst forth out of the temple, and consumed some of them entirely, and destroyed the principal limbs of others. . . . But more wonderful yet, and significant, a light shone forth in the heavens, and forming a cross over the earth, showed to all alike that name and that figure which were once held in contempt. Even now, those who were witnesses of this miracle show their garments burnt by the sign of the cross.”

It is difficult for the incredulous to institute any positive argumentation against the truth of this miracle. Preconceived opinions and violent religious prejudice may give birth to conjectures, but they are none of them even plausible when compared with the positive testimonies we possess in its favor. About the strongest of the negative arguments which can be adduced against it is offered by Basnage (1). St. Cyril, he says, who was bishop of Jerusalem at the time of the alleged miracle, and predicted, according to Socrates, that the prophecy of Christ was soon to be fulfilled, has nevertheless nowhere given us any account of this important event. This argument, though weak, might be of some weight, could its author show that any of the works of St. Cyril, which we possess, were written after the attempted restoration of the temple. But this cannot be proved; nay, that all of the works of St. Cyril, which have come down to us, were composed before the event in question, is conceded by the erudite in such matters. Thus, the Catechisms belong to the year 347; the Epistle to Constantius to the year 351. These are all the works of St. Cyril that we have, for the epistle to St. Augustine on the Miracles of St. Jerome, which is found in the works of the great doctor, is manifestly a forgery, as is shown by its own absurdities, and by the fact that St. Cyril died thirty years before St. Jerome. Basnage relies considerably upon the discrepancies between the narrations of the miracle as given by Socrates, Sozomenus, and Theodoret. But the diversities are merely in accidentals, not in essentials, and just as in the case of the gospels, so in purely historical matters, accidental variations of authors, if united with concord in essentials, are no justification for their being rejected.

(1) History of the Jews, b. 6, c. 18.

CHAPTER XVII.

THE DONATIST HERESY, AND THE JUDGMENT OF POPE MELCHIADES.

In the year 311, a certain Spanish woman named Lucilla, living at Carthage in Africa, was observed to kiss, with superstitious veneration, the bones of a man, who, though probably a martyr, had not been formally recognized as such by the ecclesiastical authorities. Being reprov'd by Cæcilian, the Archdeacon of Carthage, her religious devotion proved less strong than her vanity, and she bided her time for revenge. About this time Mensurius, bishop of Carthage, having been called to Rome by Maxentius to answer the charge of hiding a deacon who had written against the tyrant, was removed by death, and Cæcilian was elected to his place. Before his departure for Rome, Mensurius had consigned the sacred vessels to the care of certain seniors of the church, and these now refused to obey the requisition for them made by the new bishop. To the vindictive ex-devotee, Lucilla, and the avaricious old stewards of the church, both parties ready for anything which promised the ruin of Cæcilian, was soon given the aid of Botrus and Cælesius, two priests who had each been disappointed in the hope of succeeding Mensurius. This was the origin of the Donatist schism, the fruit of an alliance between feminine ire, avarice, and ambition. But an excuse was wanting to the enemies of Cæcilian, and that was soon found. His episcopal consecration had been received at the hands of Felix, bishop of Aptonga, who was accused of being one of those unfortunates who, in the time of persecution, had given up the gospels to the enemies of Christianity. Therefore, the factious contended, the consecration of Cæcilian was null and void. They also asserted that, during the persecutions, Cæcilian had prevented food from being carried to certain confessors in prison. Their first step was to procure the deposition of Cæcilian, but to bring that about, they were compelled to fall into a great inconsistency. They invoked the aid of Secundus, primate of Numidia, himself one of the most noted of "traitors," as those were styled who had surrendered the sacred books. This prelate assembled a synod of seventy bishops, "traitors" like himself, but whose sins the money of Lucilla had covered (1). In this pseudo-synod, Cæcilian was condemned, and in his place was thrust Majorinus, a creature of the precious Lucilla. The intruder received consecration from Donatus, bishop of a place called "Black Cottages," "Casae Nigrae," and this prelate may be regarded as the prime inciter of the new schism. To another Donatus, however, the new schismatics preferred to give the honor of having named their body; to the one, that is, who succeeded Majorinus in the usurped see of Carthage. The identity of name sometimes caused confusion in the mind of St. Augustine, as he confesses in his Retractations, b. 1, c. 21. In spite of the apparent triumph of his enemies, the holy Cæcilian could, as St. Augustine says (2), "care nothing for their conspiring multitude, when he saw himself united by letters of communion with the Roman Church, in which always flourished the principality of the Apostolic Chair." His foes also dreaded the affection of Constantine for their victim, and in order to lessen it, they used their influence with Anulinus, the proconsul of Africa, to have presented to the emperor, then in Gaul, the libel they had composed against the integrity of Cæcilian. They also begged of Constantine that he would assign Gallic judges to settle the Carthaginian troubles, "for in Africa there are contentions between us and the other bishops," they added. According to Optatus, when the emperor had read the documents, he angrily cried out, "You ask judgment of me, a secular, who myself expect the judgment of Christ?" However, he wrote to Pope Melchiades asking him to decide the case, and requested three Gallic prelates, Maternus of Cologne, Marinus of Arles, and Rheticius of Autun, to go to Rome to assist the Pontiff. A council was accordingly held in the year 313, in the Lateran palace, then the residence of the empress Fausta, and to it were summoned, besides the three Gallic bishops, fifteen Italians. After a patient hearing of both Cæcilian and Donatus, the synod condemned the latter (him of the "Black Cottages") and declared the former legitimate bishop of Carthage. As for those dioceses in which the Donatist troubles had introduced two rivals for the episcopal chair, it was decreed, for the sake of peace, that priority of consecration should decide each case, "for the other bishop, another flock should be provided." The Donatists again had recourse to secular influence, telling the emperor that the case of Felix of Aptonga, the consecrator of Cæcilian, had not been decided, and that there had been too few bishops in the Roman synod. At this new appeal, says Optatus, Constantine exclaimed, "Such rabid audacity of fury! Just like Gentiles, they put forth an appeal." Thinking he might thus calm the raging schismatics, he now ordered Elianus, the new proconsul, to inquire into the case of Felix, and the result was his acquittal of the charge of "betrayal." But the Donatist fury was by no means assuaged, and at the request of the emperor, another synod was called in the year 314. This council met at Arles, and was attended by two hundred bishops, the Papal legates presiding in the name of the new Pontiff, Sylvester I. (1) Again was the cause of Cæcilian triumphant, but again, with few exceptions, were the Donatists obstinate. From the sentence of the Church they again appealed to Constantine, and from this time the emperor vacillated in their regard. While he condemned them in Milan in the year 316, he was finally conquered by the obstinacy which, under the leadership of the "great Donatus" (the intruder of Carthage), they continued to display; and at first content with diminishing the severity of his laws against them, he soon allowed them full liberty. At his death, the government of Africa fell to Constans. Under this emperor, benignity was at first the order of the day towards the Donatists, but when he found them degenerated into worse than highway robbers, carrying fire and sword into the homes, not only of Catholics, but even of their own sect, he made use of the army to restore order. When the schismatic bishops saw the ruin of the armed bands which they had employed, some of them fled, others again were exiled. Among these latter was Donatus of Carthage. Most of the sectarians now returned to the communion of the Church, and during the following reign of Constantius, there was comparative peace in religious matters in Africa. Donatus of Carthage died in the year 350, and his place was filled by Parmenian; St. Cæcilian had died in 348, and to him succeeded Gratus, and then Res-titutus. Under Julian the Apostate, the Donatists were naturally caressed as internecine foes of Christianity. Not only were they recalled from exile, and restored to their churches, but many of the basilicas of the Catholics, which they took with the armed hand, were secured to them. With the accession of Valentinian I., their audacity met with a check, that emperor passing very severe laws to keep it within limits. At the invasion of Africa by Gildo in the year 397, the Donatists had reason for joy, as he removed all restraint from their murderous proclivities. Honorius, however, put another stop to the slaughter of the orthodox, and sincerely endeavored to bring about a permanent peace. He sent into Africa a tribune named Marcellinus, a man of high character, who, in the year 411, held at Carthage that famous Conference, of which St. Augustine gives a full history, and in which he participated. In this assembly, both parties pleaded their causes with full liberty for three days, and after due consideration, Marcellinus passed judgment in favor of the Catholics, and it was confirmed by Honorius on Jan. 30, 412. Terrified at the severe penalties pronounced against them by the emperor, and which were sternly executed by Dulcitius, the successor of Marcellinus, most of the Donatists yielded, and before many years the sect had vanished. It would seem that, violent and audacious as it was, this heresy made no headway outside of Africa. It tried to obtain a foothold in Rome, and there sustained successively six bishops, men of ability and of grave manners. But they met with no success, not obtaining the use of even one church in the city. Indeed, from the fact that their conventicles were held in the mountains of the neighborhood, they were known among the Romans as "Mountaineers."

(1) See ST. AUGUSTINE; Heresies, c. 69; Epist. 162. Also OPTATUS, against Parmenian, b. 1.

(2) Epistle No. 162.

(1) Sirmond and Launoy thought, from the large number of prelates attending this synod, that it was the plenary council, the authority of which St. Augustine frequently quotes against the Donatists. That the holy Doctor means the Council of Nice is fully proved by Alexandre.

We pass now to the doctrines of the Donatists. In regard to Baptism, they held that it was only valid when given in the Church. Since they contended that the true Church was to be found only in their communion, the rest of Christendom having fallen away from purity of doctrine, they rebaptized such perverts as they succeeded in enticing to their fold. As to their tenets concerning the Church, St. Augustine says they differed from Catholics rather as to the body than as to the head. By contact with the betrayers of the gospels, and by communion with the wicked in general, the Church had been reduced nearly unto death, and was then confined to Africa, and restricted, indeed, to the faction of Donatus. Africa, they said, was the southern country where the Spouse of the Canticles was represented as resting in the midday. According to St. Augustine, Donatus of Carthage erred in regard to the Trinity, teaching that the three Persons were of the same substance, but that the Son was less than the Father, and the Holy Ghost less than the Son. He did not succeed, however, in inculcating this theory upon his followers. As for the morals and general conduct of the Donatists, they seem to have been of the most horrible nature. Optatus charges them with literally throwing the Holy Eucharist to the dogs, "not without a token of the divine judgment: for the dogs went mad, and as though their masters were robbers and strangers, tore them to pieces, using their teeth against the violators of the Holy Body." According to the same author, when they did not overthrow the Catholic altars, they practiced a sacrilegious rite of scraping the surface, to indicate that purification was necessary on account of the Catholic contagion. Whenever they obtained possession of a church, or of sacred vessels, vestments, &c., they reblessed them for the same reason. Of so exalted a character was their religious frenzy, that thousands of them took their own lives, deeming the act a martyrdom, and justifying it by the example of Razias, Macch. II. Like most heretics, the Donatists were very hostile to monks, and, according to St. Augustine, were fond of saying, "What is the meaning of the word 'monk'? Show us in the Scriptures this word 'monk.'" (1)

In treating of the Donatist heresy, we cannot omit some remarks upon the judgment given by Pope Melchiades in the synod held at Rome in the year 313, as both Protestant and Gallican writers have contended that the history of the Papal connection with the condemnation of this sect goes to weaken the doctrine of the irrefragability of Pontifical decisions. And firstly, Basnage and Mosheim hold that Pope Melchiades acted, in this decision, as a delegate of the emperor Constantine, and not in his own right, as the supreme judge in matters of faith. But we know from Optatus, that when the prince was approached by the sectarians, he cried out, "You ask of me, a secular, to give judgment, when I myself await the judgment of Christ?" And to the complaining Donatus, after the Roman synod, he answered, "O mad audacity of fury! Just as do the Gentiles, they put forth an appeal." We also know that when Constantine took cognizance of the case after the Council of Arles, it was with disgust at the audacity of the Donatists, and with the intention of "afterwards asking the pardon of the bishops" for daring to judge of sacred things (2). If such were the sentiments of the emperor as to the respective provinces of the ecclesiastic and the secular, is it credible that he would try to make a delegate of the Pontiff? Had the power of Melchiades been merely vicarious, would he have joined with himself the fifteen Italian bishops whom the prince had not named? Again, those were given by Constantine as judges, whom the Donatists had asked for, namely, the three Gallic prelates, not Melchiades and the fifteen Italians. And if Constantine had thought himself possessed of any authority in the premises, would he have sent these Gauls all the way to Rome, especially when he himself was then in Gaul? But St. Augustine certainly regarded the Pontiff, not as an imperial delegate, but as exercising his own supreme judicial prerogative in the Roman synod, for he says of Constantine, "He conceded the other Arletan judgment, not because it was necessary, but yielding to their perversity, and wishing in every way to repress their impudence" (1). If the synod of Arles was not necessary, then certainly Melchiades had acted as supreme judge. Finally, if the Pontiff only judged in this Donatist matter, as the vicar of Constantine, how is it that Cæcilian was able, when and how he wished, to carry his case to the Apostolic See?

(1) On Psalm 132.

(2) AUGUSTINE, epist. 162.

A question is raised as to whether or not the Donatists appealed to the emperor from the decision of Pope Melchiades. We have seen how they complained of it, and how the Council of Arles was assembled, in a vain attempt to pacify them. Alexandre contends that this complaint was of the nature of an appeal; Valois, Noris, and Sirmond hold that they only appealed from the Council of Arles. We may at once remark that the very nature of an appeal, if judicial forms are to be at all respected, precludes the sitting in the new court of those judges against whose previous decision the appeal is made. But we learn from the Acts of the Arletan synod that in it were seated as judges, besides the Roman Pontiff through his legates, five of the very bishops who had attended the Roman synod. Therefore, it is plain that at Arles there could have been no appeal from the sentence of the Pontiff. Against this conclusion is adduced the authority of Optatus, who plainly says that the Donatists appealed from the Roman synod to Constantine, that prince answering, "O mad audacity of fury, &c." But Optatus was mistaken, for he plainly shows, by making no mention of the synod of Arles, that he regarded the letter in question as sent by Constantine to the prelates of the Roman synod. We know that it was sent to the Arletan prelates from this passage of St. Augustine: "Nor did the Christian emperor so dare to receive the tumultuous and deceitful complaints, as to himself judge of the decision of the bishops who had sat at Rome. But he assigned other bishops, from whom, however, they preferred to appeal; for which, as to how he detested them, you have heard." These last words refer to that exclamation "O mad audacity, &c." It is plain then that the letter in which the emperor used this expression was sent to the prelates of Arles, and therefore, the testimony of Optatus must be excluded. According to Optatus, the Donatists appealed from that synod to which Constantine addressed the quoted words, and that synod was the one of Arles.

(1) Epist. 162.

To the most casual reader of the events we have been narrating, at once occurs a question as to the relationship subsisting between the Roman synod, and the Council of Arles. Did the latter synod reconsider the judgment given by Pope Melchiades, and if so, was this reconsideration undertaken without the consent of the then Pontiff, Sylvester I.? Alexandre held that the latter supposition is improbable, but the Roman censors applied to his proposition the remark, "Neither question nor conclusion pleases us. The question does not, because it is to be supposed, not discussed, that Councils cannot reconsider causes of faith already adjudged by the Supreme Pontiff; the conclusion does not, because it says, 'it is probable,' while nothing is more certain." Before the Council of the Vatican settled the question of Papal infallibility, the Gallican theologians were fond of this matter of the Arletan synod, and such Protestant writers as trouble themselves at all about Church authority have ever pointed to it as a weak spot in the Roman line of defence. One of the best writers in defence of the irreformability of Papal decisions on faith, is Cardinal Orsi. In his apposite work, refuting the allegations of Bossuet, he shows that the cause of Cæcilian, having been decided by Pope Melchiades, was no longer a subject matter for retractation; that it could not have been reconsidered without the permission of the Holy See ; and that the cause of Cæcilian, of which Augustine speaks in a passage adduced by Bossuet, and to be now noticed by us, was not one of those causes which belong to the Universal Church. Cardinal La Luzerne, in his book on the Gallican "Declaration" of 1682, opines that the arguments of Orsi are not conclusive. Equally with the bishop of Meaux, La Luzerne relies greatly upon the following passage of St. Augustine (1): "Let us suppose that all the bishops, who judged at Rome, were not good judges. There yet remained a plenary Council of the whole Church, in which the cause of these judges could be agitated, in order that their sentence might be abrogated, if they were convicted of a wrong decision." This shows, say the Gallican authors, that, according to St. Augustine, there remained a general Council in which the Pontiff's decision might be rescinded, and though that Council did not rescind it, yet the cause of Cæcilian was settled with no less authority because the judgment of Melchiades received the approbation of the Church. But this plenary Council, of which Augustine speaks, could not have been held without the consent of the Pope, or without his presidency, either personal or by means of legates. And if a general Council, with the Pope at its head, takes up a cause already defined by the Pontiff, and with the Pope's consent and participant action, repeats the Pontifical decision, it does not follow that either Pontiff or bishops deem the judgments of the Holy See a matter for conciliar revision. It is one thing to take up a decision, in order to assent and submit to it, and another to subject it to a critical and judicial discussion. When we come to treat of the Councils of Ephesus, Chalcedon, and the third Constantinopolitan, we shall see that the fathers read the decrees of the pontiffs, actuated by the former, not the latter motive. If then, in the passage of Augustine, the holy doctor declares that to the Donatists yet remained the authority of a general Council, we must not conclude that he believed that the said synod could revise the judgment of Melchiades. He wished to press the

(1) Epist. 43, alias 162, to Glorius Eleusius, c. 7, n. 19.

Donatists to the wall by showing them that the whole Church was against them. We have already heard him say that the emperor yielded to the Donatists in the matter of the Council of Arles, "not because it was necessary, but ceding to their perversity, and wishing in every way to curb their impudence." When, then, he alludes to a possible future plenary Council, he means to say that if such a synod were to take up the judgment of Melchiades, its unanimous assent would show the Donatists that those were "good judges" indeed who pronounced sentence in Rome. It will not be inopportune to here introduce a passage of Optatus which plainly shows that he did not deem the decision of Pope Melchiades revisable by a Council (1). He speaks of the absolution of Cæcilian "by the sentence of Melchiades, through which the trial was closed," and says that the two bishops sent by the Pope into Africa to promulgate his decree, did so, saying that "it could not be abrogated ; they thus communicated it to the clergy of Cæcilian, and returned."

CHAPTER XVIII.

ARIANISM, AND THE COUNCIL OF NICE.

Scarcely had the persecution of brute force been brought to an end by the accession of Constantine to the imperial throne, when the Church was called upon to withstand the attacks of a more insidious enemy. If not in one shape, then in another; if not in one place, then in another. the Church upon earth must be ever militant. The new enemy came in the shape of the most radical heresy which to this day she has ever encountered, and the new error soon made proportionately greater inroads upon her flock than any other had done before, or has done since that time. But with all its apparent successes, in spite of the active and enthusiastic aid of the secular power, that great heresy has vanished.

(1) Donatist Schism, b. 1, n. 24

Arius was born in Libya, and was subject to the spiritual jurisdiction of the bishop of Alexandria. He was of a nature to win the affections of men—his manners were grave but gentle; he was modest in his bearing, dress, and conversation. In dialectics, he was a master. Several years before he turned his attention to innovation, he had acquired some experience as a schismatic, having joined the followers of Meletius of Lycopolis, when that bishop refused to submit to his deposition by his superior, St. Peter of Alexandria. Abandoning the schism, Arius received deaconship at the hands of the latter prelate, but when St. Peter excommunicated the Miletians, the young deacon became so vituperative that he was soon involved in the same sentence. After the martyrdom of St. Peter, his successor, Achilla, restored Arius to communion, and probably raised him to the priesthood (1). At the death of this prelate the future heresiarch aspired to the vacant see, and when he saw Alexander preferred by the clergy, he was devoured by envy. He commenced to disseminate his errors as to the Divinity of the Son of God about the year 317 (2). According to St. Epiphanius, he soon counted for his disciples one bishop, Secundus of Pentapolis, seven priests, and seven hundred nuns; however, St. Alexander, in an encyclical epistle, speaks of only fourteen of such disciples. They were soon condemned by Alexander, and Arius fled for a time into Palestine. In order to popularize his tenets, he now struck upon the idea of reducing them to poetical shape, and setting the verses to popular music. He took for his model Sotades, an old Egyptian poet, with whom the mob was familiar. Under the name of Thaleia, a mixture of obscenity and distorted theology was soon chanted in the streets and public places, and thus the new religion was sprung upon humanity. His seven hundred nuns were probably of considerable help to the enterprising theologian, and he soon received quite an important acquisition from the same devout sex in the person of the imperial Constantia, sister of Constantine. The patronage of this lady was of great advantage to the new

(1) According to Gelasius of Cyzicus, Arius was ordained by Alexander.

(2) St. Jerome dates the rise of Arianism from the year 321; a falsified codex of Lactantius places it before the persecution of Licinius, about 310.

heresy, for she possessed more than her due share of influence at court. Eusebius of Nicomedia now held a synod in Bythinia, and sent out a letter to all his brethren of the episcopate, entreating them to communicate with the Arians, and to compel Alexander to do the same; in this epistle he also congratulates Eusebius of Cæsarea on having undertaken the "defence of the truth." Many and desperate were the arts used by the friends of the new doctrine to gain over the emperor, but he decided to request the Supreme Pontiff to convoke a General Council of the Church. Accordingly, in the year 325, there assembled at Nice of Bythinia three hundred and eighteen bishops under the presidency of the legates of Pope Sylvester, Hosius, bishop of Cordova, and Vitus and Vincent, priests. In this Œcumenical Council the doctrine of Arius, as to the non-consubstantiality of the Son with the Father, was condemned; a symbol of faith—a Creed—was issued, and in it was inserted the apposite word "Homœousion." This Council also decided the vexed question as to the time of the Paschal celebration, establishing it on the Sunday following the fourteenth day of the March moon. It also edited twenty disciplinary canons, on the sixth of which we shall have something to say. At the sessions of the Council the emperor was present, but was placed below the fathers, and took his seat only when they gave the signal of permission. The expenses of the prelates were defrayed by the imperial treasury. The sentiments held by Constantine as to the relative positions of priesthood and empire are plainly indicated by the following remarks made by him during the Council, when the Arians presented to him certain petitions, tending to draw him over to their side. Having ordered the petitions to be burnt in full synod, he thus addressed the bishops (1): "God has established you as priests, and given you power to judge us, and hence we are properly judged by you; you, however, cannot be judged by men; wherefore, among yourselves await the judgment of God alone, and let your differences, whatever they may be, be reserved for divine examination. For you have been given to us as gods by God, and it is not proper for man to judge gods, but only Him of whom it is written : God has stood in the synagogue of the gods, and in their midst God judges." Two only of the most violent, and perhaps the most sincere, Arians, refused to sign the symbol of faith, Secundus of Ptolemaide, and Theonas of Marmarica ; even Eusebius of Casarea feigned submission (1).

(1) RUFINUS, Hist., b. 1, c. 1.

After the condemnation of Arius, the emperor ordered him into exile, but in the year 330, at the intercession of Constantia, then at the point of death, he sent for him and accorded him an interview. Being asked whether he would assent to the Nicene creed, he answered in the affirmative. Requested to put his Creed into writing, he handed the prince an equivocal formula, which could easily be interpreted in an heretical sense. With the permission of Constantine, Arius now returned to Alexandria, bearing letters from Eusebius of Nicomedia, urging St. Athanasius to admit the apparently repentant priest into communion. But the inflexible bishop would not yield, even though the emperor followed up his endorsement of the request by threats to depose and exile him. In the year 335, many bishops, principally of the Arian faction, assembled at Jerusalem for the dedication of the magnificent temple built by Constantine. Requested by the emperor to examine the symbol of Arius, they pronounced it orthodox. Finally, in the year 336, Constantine called the heresiarch to the capital, and ordered the bishop, Alexander, a firm defender of the Nicene faith, to accord communion to him. Force was being used to effect this nefarious purpose, when Arius was suddenly stricken with death. But with its founder, the heresy did not disappear. The Arian sympathy of the emperor Constantius secured the condemnation of St. Athanasius in the synods of Arles (353) and Milan (355), and before long St. Jerome was obliged to cry out that the world was half Arian. On the death of Valens (378) the heresy began to decline in the East, and after the General Council of Constantinople, it lost all hold in those parts. But the barbarous tribes of Germany long clung to it. Its last refuge was among the Lombards, but with king Liutprand (744) it died out.

(1) ATHANASIUS, Epist. on decrees of Nice ; THEODORET, b. 1, c. 19 ; ST. JEROME, Dialogue against the Luciferians.

Arius asserted that the Son of God was a creature, and not God by nature; that although He existed before all ages, yet He was not co-eternal with the Father. Eusebius of Nicomedia endeavored to persuade Constantine that this doctrine was not antagonistic to Catholic faith, that the whole question was one of verbal subtlety. But it is evident that Arius denied the Divinity of Christ, when he denied the Consubstantiality of the Son with the Father. He also erred in regard to the mystery of the Incarnation, asserting that the Word took unto Itself a body without a soul; that the office of soul was supplied by the Divinity (1). He perverted the doxology, singing "Glory to the Father, through the Son, in the Holy Ghost." St. Augustine (2) says that Arius rebaptized his perverts from Catholicism, but he seems to be alone in the assertion.

Arianism met the inevitable fate of all heresies, and was soon cut up into many factions. Of these there were three principal sects. First, were the Anomœians, so called because they contended that the Son was Anomoios, that is, dissimilar to the Father. Not only, according to them, was the Son not equal to the Father, but he was in no way similar. The principal leaders of this sect were Aetius, Eunomius, and Euzoius of Antioch. Then came the Semi-arians, who, while they denied the Consubstantiality (homousia) of the Son with the Father, yet held that He was similar (homoiousios) in all things, even in substance. The chiefs of this sect were Basil of Ancyra, George of Laodicea, and Eustathius of Sebaste. Finally are to be mentioned the Acacians, who drew their name from Acacius, bishop of Cæsarea in Palestine. These differed from the Anomœians only in name, and abstained from asserting a thorough dissimilarity between Father and Son only when circumstances of interest compelled them; when, however, they were withheld by fear of Constantius, who abhorred the Anomœians, they said the Son was not Consubstantial, nor similar in substance, to the Father, but only similar.

(1) THEODORET, Hæret. Fab., c.1; ATHANASIUS, Advent of Christ.

(2) On Heresies.

Let us now turn our attention to the Council of Nice. Several questions are to be considered, and, first of all, the convocation of the Council. The adversaries of the Holy See contend that the Council was not convoked by Pope Sylvester, but by the emperor Constantine, and this assertion they support by passages from Eusebius, Socrates, Theodoret, Nicephorus, and by the synodical epistle which the Council sent to the church of Alexandria, in which the fathers say, "Since, by the grace of God, and the command of the most sacred emperor Constantine, who has called us together, from various provinces and cities, the great and holy Nicene Council is assembled." Similar expressions with regard to the Council of Nice occur in the Relation of the fathers of the Council of Ephesus to the emperors Theodosius and Valentinian, and in the remarks of Justinian in the 1st Collation of the Fifth General Council. Our ancestors in the faith, therefore, say the adversaries of Rome, believed that the right of calling an Ecumenical Council resided in the emperor, not in the Pope. There is no doubt that Constantine paved the way for this Council, that he invited to it the bishops of the world, that he treated them as his guests, that he assisted at the sessions, that, in fine, he cast around it, by way of protection, the strong arm of the secular power. From the fact of ancient authors gratefully acknowledging these services of the emperor, and hence using the term "convocation" in regard to his invitation, it by no means follows that in their minds the convoking authority of Pope Sylvester was ignored. The fathers of the Council of Sardica (347) used the same word with regard to the action of the emperors Constans and Constantius, and yet St. Athanasius (1) tells us that the Council was called by Pope Julius. In the Eighth General Council (869) the Eastern vicars said that the emperor Basil, imitating the old emperors, had called the synod, but we know from the letter of Pope Adrian II. to that sovereign, which was read in the first session, that the Pontiff convoked the Council. "We wish," said the Pope, "through your pious exertions, a numerous synod to be assembled at Constantinople." And the Papal legates used these words, "The most pious and most Christian emperor, following the example of his predecessors, sent his most noble ambassadors to Rome, to ask for a synod." That the fathers of the Second General Council (381) regarded the convocation of such assemblies as the prerogative of the Holy See, is shown by their Synodical Letter to Pope Damasus, in which they say that they have come to Constantinople in obedience to the Pontiff's letters to Theodosius. Finally, with regard to the convocation of the Nicene Synod, the fact of the Pontifical legates presiding over its deliberations, the humble attitude of Constantine during its sessions, and his own words already quoted, go to show that the emperor considered himself as bound to facilitate the work of the Church, but felt that he possessed no authority in the premises. Had the sovereign been regarded at that time as enjoying the right of convoking Councils, Hosius would scarcely have used the following words to Constantius: "Concern thyself not with ecclesiastical affairs, nor teach us in such matters, but rather learn from us. To thee God has committed the empire, to us He has given the things of the Church; and as he who reviles thy government, contradicts the divine ordinance, so do thou beware, lest by taking to thyself the things of the Church, thou becomest guilty of a great crime. Give, it is written, to Cæsar that which is Cæsar's, and to God that which is God's. It is not right for us to hold empire upon earth, nor hast thou, emperor, any jurisdiction over incense or sacred things."

(1) Epist. to Solitaries.

In treating of the presidency of the Council of Nice, we propose to show that the Papal legates not only presided, but that they did so, precisely because of their office as representatives of the Supreme Pontiff. With regard to the presidency of Hosius, we have from Athanasius (1), "In what synod was he not the leader and standard-bearer? What church does not retain monuments of his presidency?" Socrates, in book 1, chap. 9, giving the names of the fathers of Nice, begins thus: "In this Council were present Hosius, bishop of Cordova; Vitus, and Vincentius, priests; Alexander, bishop of Egypt, Eustathius of great Antioch, Macarius of Jerusalem, Harpocraton, Cynon, and others, whose names, &c." Unless Hosius, Vitus, and Vincentius, were presiding officers, why does Socrates place their names before those of the incumbents of the great sees of Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem? Hosius was simply bishop of insignificant Cordova, and the other two were not even bishops. Hincmar, Archbishop of Rheims (d. 882), when writing against his nephew, Hincmar of Laudun—and speaking of the Nicene Council, says: "Over which, in the place of Sylvester, presided Hosius, bishop of Cordova, Vitus and Vincent, priests of the city of Rome." Some ultra-Gallican critics have held that Hosius presided indeed over the Nicene Council, but that such office was assigned him as a compliment to his heroic labors for religion, not because of his position as Papal legate. Firstly, we may answer that this is a mere conjecture, and it is founded on no pre-eminent excellence really possessed by Hosius over his brother bishops. There was Paphnutius, who had undergone fearful tortures during the reign of Maximian; so also had Potamon. Paul, bishop of the Euphratesian Neo-Cæsarea, had suffered all but death under Licinius. Then there were present many prelates who were famous for their miracles and for the gift of prophesy, such as James of Nisibis, Spiridion of Cyprus, Nicholas of Lycia. As for influence with Constantine, no one equalled Eusebius of Cæsarea. As far as dignity of position was concerned, there were Eustathius of Antioch, and Alexander of Alexandria. And yet we see elevated above all these prelates the bishop of an insignificant diocese in distant Spain. He is placed above two legates of the Roman See, above the Alexandrian and Antiochene patriarchs, above Cæcilian, the primate of all Africa. When he sits in the Council of Elvira, in his own Spain, although there are present but nineteen bishops, he holds the second place; and when he sits in the Council of Arles, he is not mentioned among the chief prelates (1). Again, if we do not admit that Hosius presided by virtue of his legatine authority, we must accuse the fathers of Nice of having violated those privileges of the patriarchates, which they confirmed in this very synod; the bishop of Alexandria would no longer have held the second place, decreed to him according to ancient customs. But at this time there was a canon which recognized in the Roman See the right of presiding in all synods wherein was discussed anything pertaining to the Universal Church. In an epistle to the Eusebian prelates of the East, Pope Julius I. (337-352) says that they have violated the canons in not inviting him to their synod: "Since the ecclesiastical canon forbids any decrees to be sanctioned without the judgment of the Roman bishop." That canon was in the mind of the Council held at Rome by Pope Damasus, when it reproved the prelates of Rimini for having edited a profession of faith which Rome had not passed upon. It also governed the fathers of the fifth General Council (553), when after having thrice invited Pope Vigilius to preside at their deliberations, they wrote to him, through Eutychius of Constantinople, "And we therefore beseech you, that your Blessedness presiding over us, with priestly tranquillity and gentleness, the holy Gospels being brought forward, by a common discussion these same Chapters may be treated, and an end put to the question." But it is incredible that the presidency of the bishop of Cordova should have been accepted by all the bishops at Nice, if his legatine position had not compelled them to accept it. To say nothing of the rights of the patriarchs, there were Theognis, bishop of Nice itself, and Eusebius of Nicomedia, metropolitan of all Bythinia, both intensely Arian, and not at all likely, if they could avoid it, to acquiesce in the choice of a president whom they knew to be hostile to their cause. We must conclude therefore that they regarded Hosius as president of the Council by virtue of his position as Papal legate. As for Vitus and Vincent, it is impossible to assign any reason for their being recognized as colleagues of Hosius, unless that furnished by their legatine quality, for, as simple priests, they had no right even to a seat in the Council.

(1) Apology for his Flight.

(1) ST. AUGUSTINE, against Parmenian, b. 2, c. 5.

The Nicene Council issued twenty canons. Among the Maronites of the Lebanon, the Armenians, Copts, Abysssinians, and other Orientals, both United and Schismatic there have been regarded as Nicene sixty-four other canons; but that they are supposititious, and no older than the time of the Council of Chalcedon (451), is proved by their frequent presentation of the term "patriarch," as applied to the bishops of the greater sees—that name having been introduced into the hierarchical nomenclature at that period. That the Nicene canons numbered only twenty, is shown by all the ancient Collections, among which may be specially quoted that of Dionysius Exiguus (6th Cent.) and the one drawn up by Theilo and Tharistus, and sent by Atticus of Constantinople in the year 419 to the sixth Council of Carthage. The same is proved by the fact that, in the cause of the appeal of Apiarius to Pope Zosimus (417), the Nicene canons furnished by St. Cyril of Alexandria were of that number. Again, Theodoret, book 1, c. 8, expressly says: "The bishops again assembling in Council, issued twenty laws or canons on Church administration." It is true that Rufinus, in his History, c. 6, b. 1, cites twenty-two canons, but that comes from his dividing the sixth and eighth into two parts each.

Only one of the Nicene canons calls for any special consideration in a work such as the present. The sixth canon reads as follows: "Let the ancient custom be preserved throughout Egypt, Libya, and the Pentapolis; that the bishop of Alexandria have power over all these; because such is the custom with the bishop of Rome. Similarly in Antioch, and the other provinces, let their privileges be preserved by the churches. Generally, however, this is clear, that if any one be made a bishop without the consent of his metropolitan, the great Synod defines that such ought not to be a bishop. If, then, two or three, on account of their own contentions, contradict the common decree of all, reasonable and approved according to ecclesiastical rule, let the sentence of the majority (plurimorum) obtain." In interpreting this canon, all recognize a certain comparison between the churches of Rome and Alexandria. Some hold that only the metropolitan's privileges as to episcopal appointments are established; others that the patriarchal rights are arranged

Protestants in general contend that by this canon the theory of Roman supremacy is subverted, for, they say, by it the Roman jurisdiction is restricted to the "suburban regions," which do not extend beyond the hundredth mile-stone from the Eternal City. And Rufinus of Aquileia certainly interpreted the canon as reading, "That in the Alexandrian diocese, and in the City, the ancient custom be preserved, that the former should have the care of Egypt, and the latter of the suburban churches." Photius, the prime author of the Greek schism, made considerable use of this canon in carrying out his design. But nothing is more sure than that, even after the Council of Nice, the Roman Pontiff was regarded by the entire Church as endowed with jurisdiction over the patriarchs. What then did the fathers of Nice mean to establish when they edited this sixth canon? In the first place, there is nothing in the canon to justify the Protestant interpretation of the reading of Rufinus. Why should that author be supposed, in the use of the phrase "suburban regions," to allude to that limited territory lying within the hundredth mile-stone from Rome? Why could he not have meant to signify the Western patriarchate? The canon assigns to the Alexandrian jurisdiction all the immense region of Egypt, Libya, and the Pentapolis; is it likely that Rufinus would have interpreted the same canon as giving to the great patriarch of the West only that narrow strip of territory commonly known as the suburban region? The Protestant reading of Rufinus is strained. The natural reading of the canon, and therefore the proper interpretation of the phrase of Rufinus, is that as the Roman Pontiff has immediate jurisdiction over the countries of the West, so the Eastern patriarchs should wield that authority over their respective regions which time and law had given them. And we should consider the circumstances which gave rise to this sixth canon. Meletius, the bishop of Lycopolis, had usurped the patriarchal rights of the bishop of Alexandria, and that bishop, Alexander, had complained thereof to the Council. The fathers therefore framed a canon in which, although incidentally legislating upon the appointing authority of the patriarchs, they protected in general all the privileges of the great sees of Alexandria and Antioch, asserting that as the entire West was subject to the patriarchal sway of Rome, so the East should be divided between the patriarchates of Alexandria and Antioch. In fine, we may say with Henry de Valois (1), that the citation from Rufinus is not a version, but a paraphrase, of the canon, and the adversaries of Rome have badly interpreted it. An authoritative interpretation of this sixth canon can be found in the 16th Action of the Council of Chalcedon. Paschasius, the Papal legate, having been asked to produce the canon of Nice which he had alleged against that Council's 28th canon, he thus recited it from his codex: "The Sixth canon of the 318 Fathers: That the Roman Church has always had the Primacy; let Egypt however hold, that the bishop of Alexandria has power over all, because such is the custom with the Roman bishop. Similarly also, for him who is constituted in Antioch, and in other provinces, let the churches of the greater cities have the primacy." Against this reading not one protested, but all answered, "We declare that the Primacy, and chief honor, according to the Canons, be preserved to the Archbishop of ancient Rome." That in this canon the primacy of Rome was asserted, Gelasius I. (492) certainly believed, since in his epistle to the Orientals concerning Acacius, he asked, "With what reason or sequence can deference be paid to the other sees, if the ancient reverence is not paid to the first see of Blessed Peter, through which the dignity of all priests is always strengthened and confirmed, and to which by the singular and invincible judgment of three hundred and eighteen fathers, the most ancient honor was adjudged?" So also opined Boniface I. (418-422), in his epistle to the bishops of Thessaly. "The institution of the Universal rising Church assumed its beginning in the honor of Blessed Peter, in whom its government resides. For from him as source, in the increasing regard for religion, ecclesiastical discipline spread through all the churches. The precepts of the Nicene Synod testify to nothing else, since it dared not to establish anything in regard to him above whose merit it saw nothing could be conferred; it knew in fine that to him everything had been conceded by the words of the Lord." In treating of this canon, and its paraphrase by Rufinus, the learned Oratorian, John Morin (1), holds that this writer understood the entire West by the term "suburban churches." He well observes that from the time of Augustus to that of Constantine, the whole world was regarded as "suburban" to Rome, that is, subject to its rule, and owing it all reverence and submission. No other city at that time disputed the palm of empire with Rome. But when Constantine transferred the imperial residence to Byzantium, the new capital was soon designated as the "governing city," the "New Rome." This method of distinguishing the two rivals was especially prevalent in the time of Arcadius and Honorius, when Rufinus lived. The empire was practically divided into two parts, the Eastern and Western; at the head of the one was Rome, of the other Constantinople. At this time, therefore, the entire world was no longer "suburban" to the Eternal City; only the West continued to be so designated. In the mind of Rufinus the "suburban churches" were all the Western churches which go to make up the Roman patriarchate, and hence his exposition of the sixth Nicene canon would be, "Let the bishop of Alexandria exercise throughout his subject dioceses all patriarchal rights, according to ancient customs, just as the bishop of Rome patriarchally governs the churches of the West." It may also be observed that the interpretation of Rufinus, granting it to be adverse to the claims of Rome, is of little value to our opponents, since its sincerity is liable to more than suspicion. He nourished profound hatred for the Roman Church, having been excommunicated by Pope Anastasius. Both Anastasius (2) and St. Jerome (3) use very severe terms in his regard. His authority is unreliable too on account of his ignorance. He makes out St. James, bishop of Jerusalem, to be bishop of the Apostles; he confounds Eusebius of Pamphili, an Arian bishop, with Pamphilus the martyr; he knows no difference between Sixtus, a Pagan philosopher, and St. Sixtus, Pope and martyr: he thinks a chorepiscopus is a bishop without a diocese. St. Jerome says of Rufinus, "he teaches what he knows not, he writes of what he is ignorant." "He talks so stinkingly (sic) and confusedly, that Jerome is more fatigued in reproving than Rufinus was in writing." "Thou hast so much knowledge of the Greek and Latin languages that the Greeks take thee for a Latin, and the Latins for a Greek." According to St. Jerome, Rufinus was in his writings "a solecist and barbarous," "a liar, impudent, and sly." Granted then that the term "suburban" used by Rufinus should be understood as it is by the adversaries of Rome, little can be gained by them by the allegation of such an authority (1). No more need be said of Rufinus; so much would not have been written, were it not that in his reading of the sixth Nicene canon is found the only apparent justification of the idea that the Nicene Council gave equal authority to the three patriarchs of Rome, Alexandria, and Antioch.

(1) Observations on a New Version of the Histories of Socrates and Sozomenus, c. 1.

(1) Ecclesiastical Exercises, No. 30.

(2) Epist. to John of Jerusalem.

(3) 2nd Apol. against Rufinus.

CHAPTER XIX.

THE GENERAL COUNCIL OF SARDICA.

This Council was held by decree of Pope Julius I. in the year 347. It has not been generally mentioned, under its own name, as one of the Œcumenical Councils, because it was regarded as a kind of appendix to that of Nice. Again, to use the words of the learned Ballerini brothers (2), in enumerating those Councils, the decrees of which were to be received as so many gospels, the olden writers only thought of such synods as were held for the purpose of condemning some particular heresy, and the Synod of Sardica dealt only with the relics of Arianism, upon which the main attack had been made by the fathers of Nice. The reason for its convocation was furnished by the calumnies of the Eusebian faction against St. Athanasius, Marcellus of Ancyra, and Asclepa of Gaza, and by the dissatisfaction evinced among those malcontents at the restoration of these prelates to communion by Pope Julius. This Pontiff presided over the Council by means of his legates, Hosius of Cordova, and the priests Archidamus and Philoxenus. We do not know to a certainty the number of bishops who attended the sessions, for Theodoret places the number at two hundred and fifty, while Socrates and Sozomenus say there were three hundred Western prelates, and seventy-six Orientals. St. Athanasius, in his Apology, says, that besides the sixty bishops who, before the Synod, attested in writing their belief in his innocence, there did the same at Sardica, ninety-two from the Italian provinces, thirty-four from Gaul, thirty-six from Africa, ninety-two from Egypt, fifteen from Palestine, and twelve from Cyprus; in all, that is, two hundred and eighty-four. But in the beginning of this same Apology, the saint tells us that there were at Sardica, bishops from Isauria, Pamphylia, Lycia, Galatia, Dacia, Thrace, Dardania, Macedonia, Epirus, &c., which would indicate that the number 284 did not comprehend all the fathers of the Synod.

(1) In his 20th Dissertation, when treating of the 4th century, Natalis Alexander gives several instances of omission, addition, and interpolation of the Nicene canons, on the part of Rufinus.

(2) The Ancient Collections and Collectors of Canons down to Gratian, p. I., c. 7.

Scarcely had the bishops assembled for the Council, when the Eusebian faction, to the number of eighty, retired to Philippopolis, where they held an independent Synod, retaining the name of "Council of Sardica." They took this action because the fathers would not commence the proceedings by ejecting Athanasius and his companions from their body. After their departure, the Council solemnly absolved Athanasius, Marcellus, Asclepa, and others who had been wickedly condemned by the Eusebians; and deprived of their bishoprics Valens, Ursacius, Narcissus, Stephen of Antioch, Acacius of Cæsarea, Menophant of Ephesus, and George of Laodicea. In their Synodical Epistle, notifying Pope Julius of their action, the fathers say that "it will be right and proper that the priests of the Lord, from all the provinces, refer all to the head, that is, to the See of the Apostle Peter."

With regard to the convocation of this Council, the same reasoning will apply that we have used in treating of the calling of the Nicene Synod. That Hosius, Archidamus and Philoxenus presided, appears from the 2nd Apology of Athanasius, in which he says, "Of those who subscribed in the Synod these are the names : Hosius from Spain ; Julius of Rome, through Archidamus and Philoxenus, his priests ; Protogenes of Sardica, &c." The factious prelates of Philippopolis prove the same in their Synodical Letter, "And since those who were with Hosius wished to violate the Catholic and Apostolic faith, &c." The Council of Chalcedon, in its allocution to the emperor Marcian, says that "Hosius presided over those who, at Sardica, pronounced sentence against the remnants of Arius."

Against the œcumenicity of this Council, the captious Archbishop De Marca, in his celebrated work on the Concord of the Priesthood and the Empire, b. 7, c. 3, holds that while it was general in the beginning, yet the curse and exit of the synod were such as to destroy all claim to œcumenicity. The Council was intended, he says, to be composed of the prelates of all the provinces, both Eastern and Western ; but the Philippopolitan secession reduced the synodical body to the dimensions of a Western, not a General, Council. To this we answer, in the first place, it is untrue that all the Orientals seceded, for the bishops of Palestine, Arabia, Egypt, and the neighborhood of Constantinople, remained and signed the decrees. This is proved by the heading of the Synodical Epistle sent by the fathers to the church of Alexandria. "The holy Synod, by the grace of God, congregated at Sardica, from Rome, Spain, Gaul, Italy, Africa, Sardinia, Pannonia, Mysia, Dacia, Noricum, Tuscany, Dardania, the second Dacia, Macedonia, Thessaly, Achaia, Epirus, Thrace, Rhodes, Palestine, Arabia, Crete, Egypt, to the Priests and Deacons and the universal Church of God in the Alexandrian district, beloved brethren, health in the Lord." And the rebellious prelates themselves admitted that many Eastern bishops remained at Sardica. In their Synodical Epistle, they say, "An immense multitude of bishops, arriving from Constantinople and Alexandria, drew together in Sardica, and having united them with themselves, Hosius and Protogenes held a Council." But granted that all the Orientals were Eusebians, and that all seceded from the Council, no argument can be deduced against the œcumenicity of the Council. It had legitimately assembled, in obedience to the call of the Roman Pontiff, and the secessionists had no legitimate motive for their defection. They were guilty of open schism, and when the decayed branches are lopped off, the vitality of the tree is not affected. If the Eusebian revolt impaired the authority of the Sardican Council, the 1st Council of Constantinople was not general, for there the Macedonians, against whom that body was convoked, were wanting; nor was the Council of Ephesus œcumenical, for there were absent John of Antioch and his suffragans; nor again were the Councils of Trent and of the Vatican General, for in each of these were unrepresented those sections of the Greek and other Oriental churches which yet cling to their schism.

The canons of Sardica are in number twenty or twenty-one. Of these, the third, fourth, and seventh, claim our attention. To these canons is assigned by some writers the origin of appeal to Rome. Among these authors the principal are De Marca, Quesnel, Dupin, and Febronius (Hontheim). They have been fully confuted by such polemics as Alexander, the Ballerinis, and most triumphantly by Zaccaria, in his refutation of Hontheim entitled "Anti-Febronius." So far as our limits permit, we propose to show that the Council of Sardica did not initiate the right of appeal to Rome, but that long before the time of that Synod that right had been recognized by the Christian world. It is not our province to prove that this right of receiving appeals pertains of necessity to the Papacy; that must be left to the dogmatic theologian. Our task is purely historical, and in strictly confining ourselves within our own domain, we shall see that our ancestors held what Gallicans used to regard as ultramontane views on this subject, and what all Protestants deny. The first instance of an appeal to the Roman See which we shall adduce is that of Marcion, in the year 142. Marcion was a son of the bishop of Sinope, and after having followed the monastic life for some years, was raised by him to the priesthood. Having seduced a young woman from the path of virtue, he was excommunicated by his father, and as the discipline of the Church in the matter of fornication, &c., was in those days very severe, he in vain tried again and again to be restored to communion. He then resolved to appeal to Rome. Arriving in the Eternal City, he found the Holy See vacant by the death of Pope Hyginus. Not waiting for the election of a new Pontiff, Marcion laid his case before the Roman clergy, and begged to be received into their communion (1). Now the Roman clergy could not have admitted him to communion without previously quashing the sentence of his bishop; therefore, Marcion's action must be regarded as an appeal from an inferior's condemnation to the judgment of a superior. He must have argued, as did St. Cyprian in a similar emergency, that the See of Rome "was the principal church, whence arises ecclesiastical unity (2). The request of Marcion was rejected, both because of the canons which forbade the admission of any cleric not bearing commendatory letters from his own bishop, and because of the vacancy of the Roman See, the Supreme Pontiff alone having the power to grant the mitigation of discipline which Marcion besought.

Another example of an appeal to Rome, "whence the authority of this Church is more and more confirmed," is found by Constant (3) in the affair of Privatus in the year 250. This heretic had been condemned in a synod of ninety bishops, and the sentence had been confirmed by Donatus of Carthage and by Pope Fabian. Upon the death of the Pontiff, the cunning Privatus endeavored to prevail upon the Roman clergy to accord him communion, but with the same result as Marcion had achieved.

The African churches furnish us with another instance of appeal to the Holy See in the year 252. The election of St. Cyprian had been opposed by Felicissimus and four other priests, and they had chosen a certain Fortunatus. Excommunicated by St. Cyprian, all five fled to Rome, and appealed to Pope Cornelius. The bishop of Carthage complained strongly because of this proceeding but not because he denied the right of a bishop to appeal to Rome; rather because he regarded Fortunatus as possessed of no episcopal privileges, he having been illicitly, though validly, consecrated. A short time previously, the African church had prohibited the recourse of priests to Rome, and of this decree we shall treat in a special chapter. It is sufficient for our purpose that Fortunatus, regarding himself as possessed of episcopal rights, appealed to Pope Cornelius, and that St. Cyprian, looking upon him as no bishop, only denied his right according to the African canons which applied only to priests. An event which happened two years later than the above will throw some light upon the matter. Two Spanish prelates, Basilides and Martial, had been deposed for crime, and in their places were installed Sabinus and Felix. The former appealed to Pope Stephen, and that Pontiff ordered their restoration to their sees. Sabinus and Felix then crossed into Africa, and begged the sympathy of St. Cyprian. This bishop in a synod decided that the Pope had been deceived by Basilides, but he did not deny his right to receive the appeal of the deposed prelate.

(1) ST. EPIPHANIUS, b. 42.(2) Ej. u. 43, to Cornelius.(3) Epist. Rom. Pont., tom. v., col. 22.

The history of Paul of Samosata presents a fact, which, though it may not be necessarily regarded as an appeal, yet shows that the authority of synods was not, at that time, thought to be superior to Papal revision. Protected by Zenobia, the powerful queen of Palmyra, he refused to give place to Domnus, in whose favor he had been deposed. After the victory of the emperor Aurelian over Zenobia, the Christian bishops complained to that sovereign against Paul, and he decided that the episcopal residence and appurtenances should be handed over to that one of the claimants "to whom the Roman bishop and the Italian prelates of the Christian religions should write" (1). Aurelian being a Pagan, and therefore but little conversant with Church matters, could scarcely have come to the conclusion of referring the question to so distant as that of Rome, and one too of different nationality and language, unless the idea had been suggested to him either by the Oriental bishops or by Paul himself. The former may have done so in all sincerity, the latter in the hope of gaining time. In either case, the conclusion is favorable to our position.

(1) EUSEBIUS, VII., c. 30.

Very interesting, and at the same time apodictically conclusive for our cause, is the episode of the Donatist treatment of the consecration of Cæcilian of Carthage. The Donatists contended that Cæcilian could not have acquired any episcopal rights, since his consecration was at the hands of Felix of Aptonga, whom they designated a "traitor." With Secundus, primate of Numidia, and seventy other bishops of the same ilk, they formed a synod, and in place of Cæcilian appointed Majorinus. Speaking of the pretended deposition of Cæcilian, St. Augustine says, "he might well despise so strong a conspiracy of many bishops, hostile to himself, when he found himself in communion with the Roman Church, in which was always in vigor the principality of the Apostolic chair. . . . and before which he was ready to plead his cause"(1).

Here was a question of a bishop condemned by a synod convoked from many provinces, and yet Augustine deemed that he might breathe securely for the simple reason that Rome was with him. The holy bishop of Hippo certainly recognized, therefore, the right of Rome to hear and to pronounce in the cause of Cæcilian. And the appeal took place. The Donatists, seeing that the communion of Cæcilian with Rome fortified the position which he held among Catholics, asked the emperor Constantine to call a Council to settle the question, and requested that the Synod should be composed of French bishops. But Constantine, knowing that the bishops of Gaul had no jurisdiction in Africa, wrote to Pope Melchiades, asking him to examine the matter, in union with three Gallic prelates. Melchiades judged the case, but in his examination, he joined with himself fifteen other bishops, all Italians. This episode certainly furnishes an instance of an appeal to Rome, forced, if you please, but yet an appeal.

(1) Epist. 43, alias 182.

Finally, the history of St. Athanasius shows us that the canons of Sardica did not introduce the right of appeal to the Holy See. Liberatus the Deacon (1), speaking of John Talaja, says that "taking from him (Calendion of Antioch) synodical letters of intercession, be appealed to the Roman Pontiff, Simplicius, just as did the Blessed Athanasius." Alexandre denies that this action of Athanasius was an appeal (2); he styles it a refugium. Yet it is certain that Pope Julius condemned the Eusebians and absolved Athanasius; that is, he examined and reversed the judgment of the former. Socrates and Sozomenus declare that Pope Julius restored Athanasius and several other prelates to the sees of which they had been unjustly deprived (3); Celestine tells the people of Constantinople the same (4), and so does Gelasius, in a letter to the bishops of Dardania (5). St. Athanasius himself, in his 2nd Apology, says: "Not once, but frequently, was judgment pronounced in our favor; first, in our own province, when to that end about a hundred bishops assembled; secondly, at Rome, when we and the other adversaries of Eusebius stood on trial against his calumniating letters; finally, for the third time, in the great Council of Sardica."

We now pass to an examination of some of the canons of Sardica, and to a refutation of their interpretation by Febronius. In the collection of Dionysius the Little, the third canon reads thus: "If any bishop shall have been judged in any matter, and shall be persuaded that he has a good case, so that he may desire a second Council, if it pleases you, let us honor the memory of St. Peter the Apostle; let those who examined the matter write to Julius, the Roman bishop, that if he deems it right to revise the judgment, it be revised, and let him appoint the judges. But if he decides that the cause is not of a nature to war-

(1) Breviary, c. 18.

(2) For a refutation of Alexandre in this matter, see the Anti-Febbronio of Zaccaria, p. 2, b. 3, c. 2, No. 8.

(3) Book 2, c. 15; and Book 3, c. 8, respectively.

(4) Epist. 14, Rom. Pont., col. 1143.

(5) Idem, ep. 13.

rant a revision of what was done, what he shall decree shall be confirmed. Does this please all? The synod answers: It pleases." This canon was proposed by Hosius, and as he took special care, in proposing the seventh canon, to express the idea of appeal, whereas here there is no such mention, we must conclude that he had no thought of appeal, just then, in his mind. Again, in no appeal does the judge communicate with the superior; that is the province of the condemned. Hence when Pope Zosimus wished to show the Africans that the right of appeal to Rome had been acknowledged by the synod of Sardica, he cited, not the third, but the seventh canon. But there is a question of appeal in the fourth canon, which reads as follows: "The bishop Gaudentius said: If it pleases, let there be added to the sentence full of goodness which you have proffered, that if any bishop be deposed by the judgment of the neighboring bishops (this is the second judgment) and declares his wish that his case be adjudged at Rome, (the third judgment), after the appeal of him who appears deposed, let no other bishop be ordained for his see, until his cause be defined by the decision of the Roman bishop." To the appellant then is conceded a third trial, although already two decrees of deposition have been pronounced, the first by the prelates of his own province, and the second by his neighbors, assigned to him as judges, according to the third canon, by the Roman Pontiff. But Hosius desired a more ample declaration to be made, so after the settlement of other matters in the fifth and sixth canons, we find the seventh speaking thus plainly: "Bishop Hosius said: It pleased, however, that if any bishop was accused and judged, and deposed by the bishops of his own province, and if he who is deposed appeals and has recourse to the bishop of the Roman Church, and wishes to be heard by him; if that bishop believes it just to revise the judgment, and the discussion of the cause, let him deign to write to the neighboring bishops of the next province, that they carefully look into everything, and deliver a true and just sentence. And if he who asks for another hearing of his cause, moves the Roman bishop to send a priest as legate, that bishop will do as he deems fit. And if he decides upon sending legates who, with the bishops, will in his name give judgment, he will so do. But if he believes that the bishops suffice to put an end to the business, he will do what to his prudence shall seem the most expedient." (1)

Febronius contends that in these canons the fathers of Sardica did not acknowledge in the Pontiff the absolute right to entertain all appeals, but only a right to arrange a revision of the cause, and that too in the original province, and by a new intervention of the same provincial bishops who had already delivered judgment. This theory is as old as the time of Hincmar, who pronounces it in a letter written in the name of king Charles the Bald to Pope John 8, and before the advent of Hontheim it had been confuted by Alexandre (2) and by the Ballerinis (3). To any one even casually reading the seventh canon, it would seem that the right of appeal was very clearly stated, but Febronius asserts that in the Greek text the condemned bishop is said to be "like" or "as an appellant" (osper ekkalesameños); and what is more, he holds that the appeal does not refer to the Pope, but to the new judgment demanded by the accused. Since the Latin version of the canons is the original one, we cannot see why it should be explained by the Greek. But the Greek text does not necessarily give the force of the Latin quasi, "like" or "as," displaying mere similarity. Osper may just as naturally signify "as" in the sense of "thus," and the phrase would then run "thus appealing." As for Febronius' idea that the appeal refers, not to the Pontiff, but to the new judgment, the conjunction and binds the appeal with the recourse which assuredly is had to the Pope. But the context of the canons is against the theory of Febronius. And first, as to the assertion that they only accord to the Pontiff the power to assign new judges to act with the others in the original province. The seventh canon speaks only of the neighboring prelates, who certainly formed no part of the first tribunal ; the fourth canon also mentions them alone. The third canon says that the Pope should "appoint judges," but the judges of the first instance were already appointed, and if they were also to sit in the second tribunal, there would be but little chance of a remedy being given for any injustice of the first. As for the assertion that the canons do not allow the Pope to decide the cause in Rome, but only to arrange a revision in the province where the first trial took place, the form adopted by Hosius, "let him deign to write," shows that no law is imposed upon the Pontiff, but only a suggestion is offered as to an easy means of expediting the affair. And if the Pope could send legates to give judgment in his name, could he not deliver it by himself? Does not the fourth canon expressly state that after the second trial the accused could call upon the Pontiff to finish the question? This decision would necessarily be given not in the province, but in Rome.

(1) This canon is the seventh in the Latin collections, and fourth in the Greek. All the canons were first written in Latin, and then drawn up in Greek. When the latter were arranged, the above canon was placed immediately after the third, since the subject matter of both was the same.

(2) Fourth Cent., diss. 28, prop. 2.

(3) Observations on Quesnel's diss. 5.

But these canons of Sardica do not pretend to confer a new privilege upon the Roman See ; they reaffirm, and more clearly explain, an ancient right exercised whenever there were occasion and opportunity. Only the fourth and seventh canons touch upon the subject of appeal, properly so called, and of these the former supposes that such appeals are and have been made, while the seventh merely indicates a manner of entertaining them, and leaves the method to the pleasure of the Supreme Pontiff. When the latter canon says that the Papal legates possess the authority of him who designates them, can it be supposed that the framers thought that they were conferring a power never before enjoyed? But we have seen that those who came after the Council of Sardica did not conceive such an idea of its canons, and that long before it, the Roman Pontiffs had received and acted upon appeals from all parts of the world.

CHAPTER XX.

ALLEGED HERESY OF POPE LIBERIUS.

IN the year of our Lord 352, sixteenth of the reign of Constantius, son of Constantine, Liberius was elected to the Papal See to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Julius I. The circumstances of the time were difficult indeed, and none but a Pontiff of pre-eminent sanctity and prudence could have guided the ship of Peter with even moderate success. Arianism, perhaps the most powerful, though not the most immediately destructive, heresy, which the world has seen, was rampant throughout the world, and all the influence of the imperial authority was brought to bear to add to its already excessive audacity. At this time, Athanasius of Alexandria was the bulwark of Catholic orthodoxy in the East, and to defend him, therefore, and to be a good Catholic, were regarded as synonymous. The word Homoousion (Consubstantial), which the Council of Nice had added to the Creed, was looked upon as a test of belief in the Divinity of Christ. The word Homoiousion (Similar) was indicative of rank heresy, although there were some who persisted in its use, and in the rejection of the orthodox term, even while they held the Catholic doctrine. In the year 355, having again, after an interval of reconciliation, become opposed to St. Athanasius, the emperor endeavored to attract the Roman Pontiff to his aid. He sent to him the eunuch Eusebius with magnificent gifts, and when these failed, threats were employed. The sentiments of Pope Liberius are to be judged by his own answer to Constantius. "How can we condemn one who has been pronounced free from crime by two Synods, and whom the Roman Church has dismissed in peace? Who would approve of our action, if we were to be hostile to him absent, whom, when present, we have cherished and held in communion? The Ecclesiastical Canons run not thus, nor have we ever received such a tradition from the Fathers. But if the Emperor wishes indeed to exercise his care for Ecclesiastical peace, or if he wishes that which we have written in favor of Athanasius to be erased, let those things also be erased which have been written against him; let there then be held an Ecclesiastical Synod at a distance from the palace, where the Emperor is not at hand, nor any count is officious, nor any judge utters threats, and where the fear of God and the institutes of the Apostles alone suffice for everything, that in that place, before all else, the Faith of the Church be set forth, just as it was defined by the Fathers in the Nicene Council; then let all be ejected who are of the Arian opinion, and let their heresy be anathematized; then finally let a judgment on Athanasius be delivered, or upon any other person deemed guilty: and as many as are found guilty, so many let there be ejected, and as many as are pure, let them be absolved of guilt. For it cannot be allowed that those should sit in the Synod who are impious in belief, nor is it proper to question any one's deeds before we have security as to his religion. Every discord about faith is to be first abolished, and then action may be taken upon other things." The consequence of this worthy reply was the exile of the Pontiff into Thrace. On his way to punishment, Liberius had an interview with the sovereign, and as we know from St. Athanasius (1) he thus repelled the renewed attempts to seduce him: "Cease to persecute Christians. Do not try, through me, to bring heretical impiety into the Church. We Christians are prepared to sustain everything, ere we will suffer ourselves to be called Arians." Liberius also declared, "he thought it more important to keep the laws of the Church than to reside at Rome." When about to depart, he was offered a sum of money for his journey, in the name of the emperor, but he rejected it, saying: "Thou hast pillaged the churches of the earth, and now thou offerest me alms as to a guilty one! Go first, and become a Christian." Gibbon deems this spirited answer insulting. The exile of the Pontiff lasted three years, and was terminated by a decree of Constantius, in answer to the entreaties of the Roman matrons, on the occasion of his visit to the ancient capital. And now comes one of the most important questions that have ever challenged the investigation of the historian.

(1) Epistle to Solitaries.

What change had come over Constantius that he so readily liberated the Pontiff, or rather, had any change taken place in Liberius? The character of the emperor had remained the same; it follows, then, say some, that the Pontiff yielded to the importunities of the sovereign, and to the cruelties of exile. This is a fearful accusation, and is made not only by the bitter enemies of the Church, but by those theologians who, writing before the Vatican Council had settled the vexed question of Papal Infallibility, readily seized upon every fact of history which might be brought to bear in favor of "Cis-montane" opinions. Gibbon says that "the Roman Pontiff purchased his return by some criminal compliances, and afterwards expiated his guilt by a seasonable repentance." Blondel, Basnage, and other Protestant authors, contend that Constantius did not accede to the prayer of the Romans, until Liberius had subscribed to the second of the Sirmian formulas, which was plainly heretical. Quite naturally, Jansenistic writers take the same view. Bossuet holds that the formula which the Pope signed was the most innocent of the three, but that he erred in thus conniving at a dissemblance of truth, for in this formula the consubstantiality of Christ to the Father was not stated. As at this time the communion of Athanasius was the true one, so, according to the Bishop of Meaux, Liberius was wrong in condemning him. Cardinal La Luzerne, who, though not a rank, was yet a firm Gallican, asserts that even if the Pontiff signed the first of the Sirmian formulas, he became guilty of heresy. There is a school of authors in which Liberius is treated with some consideration, but by which he is blamed for having condemned Athanasius and for communicating with the Eusebians; also for having signed the first formula of Sirmium, in which the word Homousios, the test of Catholic doctrine, was omitted. The most eminent of this class are Coustant and Mazocchi. Of the writers who defend Liberius from each and every charge, both of heresy and weakness, the most distinguished are Cardinal Orsi, F. A. Zaccaria, Peter Ballerini and Palma.

The following are the arguments adduced by the authors who contend that our Pontiff was guilty of heresy: First, St. Hilary, at No. 11 of his book against Constantius, declares that he "does not know in which the Emperor showed the greater impiety; whether in the exile, or in the liberation of Liberius." The same saint, in the Fragment commencing, "For the fear of God," adduces an epistle of the Pope to the Orientals, in which he says: "I do not defend Athanasius, but as Julius, my predecessor of holy memory, had received him, I dreaded lest I should be deemed a prevaricator. But when I knew. that you had justly condemned him, I quickly assented to your decree. Therefore, Athanasius being deposed, with regard to which, all of your statutes are to be received by me and the Apostolic See, I say that I am united and at peace with all of you and all the Eastern Bishops. And that you may the more securely know that I proffer true faith in this letter, I have willingly accepted, without any contradiction, as it has been explained by our common brother, Demophilus, that Catholic faith which was discussed, explained, and received at Sirmium by all our brethren and fellow-bishops." There are three other epistles of Liberius in the Fragments of Hilary, all redolent of heterodox sentiment. Again, in the 6th Frag., Hilary cries, "Anathema from me to thee, Liberius, and to thy companions!" And in Frag. 8, he says, "To the prevaricator and to the Arians I declare anathema." In No. 4 of Frag. 6 we have, "afterwards, when Liberius was sent into exile, all these things, which he had done or promised, he reduced to nothing, writing to the heretical Arian prevaricators who had pronounced unjust sentence against the orthodox Bishop Athanasius." Second, St. Jerome, in his Chronicle, says that "Liberius, conquered by the pain of exile, subscribed the heretical depravity, and entered Rome like a victor." And in his Ecclesiastical Authors, the holy doctor tells us that "the African Fortunatianus, bishop of Aquileia, is to be detested because he solicited, broke down, and compelled to an heretical subscription, Liberius, bishop of Rome." Third, the Acts of Eusebius show us the Pontiff, after his return to the Eternal City, publicly teaching Arianism, and putting the priest Eusebius to death. Fourth, the Pontifical Book, of great weight with Bossuet, says that when Liberius arrived at Rome after his exile, he dared not to enter the city at once, but besought the aid of the princess Constantia; that Felix, the Anti-Pope, was then expelled; that Liberius entered, fraternized with the Arians, and persecuted the orthodox who refused to recognize his authority. At first glance, these four arguments seem to form a terrible indictment against Liberius, but they will not bear the sifting of impartial criticism.

Now as to St. Hilary, his remark as to the impiety of Constantius in the liberation of the Pope does not prove that the saint thought that the Pontiff had assented to the Emperor's conditions. We may answer with Zaccaria that this doubt of St. Hilary may be taken as rather oratorical than practical; that also there would have been some room for it, practically speaking, since the cruelty of Constantius in exiling the Pope was well matched by his wickedness in accompanying the liberation with a false rumor as to his defection. But we can account also for the saying of Hilary, if we reflect upon the outrageous decree of the Emperor that thereafter the government of the Church should be administered in common by Liberius and Felix. Such an abominable fashion of withdrawing from the difficulty that he himself had effected, might well cause Constantius to seem to the saint equally guilty in the exile and the pardon. As for the Fragments attributed to the holy bishop of Poitiers, they are forgeries. In the first place, a clear evidence of falsehood is shown in two of the alleged letters of Liberius herein quoted. They are the epistles beginning "Studious of peace" and "Because I know you." In these, Liberius is made to say that from the very commencement of his reign he had condemned Athanasius, and all authentic documents show that for a long time he was the most strenuous defender of the persecuted bishop. But all these Fragments are to be rejected. The sentiments contained in them are opposed to those found in the saint's authentic writings; they give everything which might militate for the Pontiff's alleged Arianism, but say nothing of his celebrated orthodox letter. Rufinus declares himself dubious as to the defection of our Pope; now if he knew anything of the existence of these Fragments, he would not have been doubtful, and he says nothing of them. St. Jerome enumerates the works of Hilary, but is silent as to the Fragments (1).

As for the testimony of St. Jerome, expressly stating that Liberius signed an heretical formula, we may answer with Palma that it is allowable in matters of history to sometimes differ from even this great doctor. But it is far from certain that the Chronicle has come down to us uninterpolated; indeed, we have the testimony of Menochius that nothing pointing to a fall of Liberius is contained in the Christina MSS. of the Vatican, and that is certainly of the sixth or seventh century (2). Literary forgery was easier in the days of copyists than it is in our time, and the olden heretics were much addicted to the use of this weapon. Origen, Athanasius, and others were often put to trouble by these gentry; the first, indeed, owes to them the greater part, if not all, the suspicion as to his orthodoxy. What more natural then than to suppose the audacious Arians guilty of falsifying, in the case of so important a witness as St. Jerome? If our adversaries are unwilling to accept our supposition, as the only way of accounting for the singular and absolutely isolated position among all Catholic writers of antiquity, in which they place St. Jerome, we can only say that he was deceived, and that his sole opinion should not militate against the many positive arguments to the contrary. As for the accusation against Fortunatianus, taken from the book of the saint on Ecclesiastical Authors, Palma regards it as a proof that also this work of the great doctor has been mutilated. For, he argues, Fortunatianus would not have urged the Pontiff to encourage a heresy which he himself detested. Be this as it may, we may apply to our own use the answer which Alexandre gives to those who adduce this passage of St. Jerome to prove that Liberius must have signed the second (plainly heretical) formula of

(1) Acts of the Bollandists, Sept. 23.

(2) BARTHELEMY, Errors.

Sirrius. Believing that the Pope subscribed the first of the three formulas, the Gallican historian says that St. Jerome might well have blamed Fortunatianus for inducing Liberius to sign a formula in which the word Homoousion, which was regarded as a test of orthodoxy, was omitted, and for having brought about the condemnation of Athanasius; it by no means follows from this passage, he insists, that St. Jerome believed the Pontiff to have signed an expressly heretical document.

As to the "Acts of Eusebius," they were discovered in the fifteenth century, and were believed by Bossuet to be genuine. They purport to be a narrative of the martyrdom of a holy priest who suffered with the consent of the late convert to Arianism, our Pontiff Liberius. But these "Acts" show themselves to be of no value, since they speak of a dialogue between the Pope and Constantius in the year 359, and we know that the latter left Rome in 358, and never entered it again.

And what of the Pontifical Book? In the first place, Muratori holds that this Diary of the Popes, as it may be styled, was not begun until the eighth century. If this opinion be correct, we must deny the Book any value in the premises. At any rate, there are so many contradictions in the chapter from which the adverse testimony is taken, that we can place no reliance upon it, and must suppose at least that part to be an Arian forgery. Thus, it is said that Liberius was parloned by Constantius, but that he dared not enter Rome until he had made his peace with the Emperor through the intercession of Constantia. It is said too that the matter of dissension between the Pope and the Emperor was the question of rebaptism, a subject some time forgotten. We also read of an interview between Constantius and Liberius in the year 359, while the former was warring in Pannonia against the Sarmatians. We are told that the ex-intruder Felix died a natural death, but we know that he became a martyr to the faith.

Having now done justice to the arguments of our opponents, we would, before commencing our positive defence of Liberius, ask what would be the conclusion if all that has been alleged were acknowledged as true. Alexandre and some others will answer that even in this case, it could not be held that the Pontiff became a heretic, for the formula which he signed (if he signed any) was tenable, though it omitted the "Homousion;" that even if he did condemn the saintly Athanasius, that would have been cowardice and not heresy. But the majority of those who strive so eagerly to besmirch the memory of Liberius, go further than Alexandre to obtain a de facto proof that the Roman Pontiff is not, by divine appointment, an infallible teacher. Now all their arguments go to show, first, that Liberius yielded to violence; second, that his conduct was that of a personal coward, not that of one wishing to teach the Universal Church—they prove, that is, nothing against the Catholic doctrine of Papal Infallibility.

But we propose to proceed further in this matter than a mere refutation of the Gallican and Protestant theories. It is admitted by all that Liberius was faithful up to the year 358, and the sole praise of his successor, Damasus, is enough to show that in his last years he was free from heretical taint. If any unworthy concessions purchased for him the privilege of returning to his See, we should find some allusions to them in those authors who treat of that return. But these writers furnish testimony to his innocence. Thus, Sulpicius Severus, in his Sacred History, b. 2, c. 49, says: "Liberius, bishop of Rome, and Hilarius, bishop of Poitiers, are exiled. . . . but Liberius is soon restored to the city on account of the seditions of the Romans." Socrates tells us, b. 2, c. 37, that "Not long afterwards, Liberius was recalled from exile, and resumed his chair, when the Roman people, having risen in rebellion, had expelled Felix, and the Emperor, although unwilling, had given his assent." But Theodoret speaks still more plainly in his History, b. 2, c. 15, where he narrates how the Roman senators sent their wives to Constantius as suppliants for the return of the Pope. Thus the nobles argued: "He may not forgive us who are men, but if you women entreat him, he may pardon you." The Emperor received their request, but answered that the Roman See was not a widow, since it had Felix for a spouse.

To this the matrons replied that the Roman citizens would not enter the church while Felix was in it, because though he himself held the faith of Nice, yet he communicated with those who did not hold it. "Then," continues Theodoret, "the Emperor being touched, he ordered that illustrious and praiseworthy man to come out of exile, and both (that is, Liberius and Felix) to administer the Church in common. When this epistle was read in the circus, the people exclaimed that the Emperor's decree was just. But the spectators soon divided into two factions. . . . one declaring for this Bishop, the other for that. . . . then with one voice all cried out, 'One God, One Christ, One Bishop.' After these acclamations of the most Christian people, full of piety and justice, the admirable Liberius returned." This conclusive testimony of Severus, Socrates, and Theodoret, is confirmed by Cassiodorus in the fifth book of his Tripartite History. That these four grave historians were well acquainted with the events of the fourth century, no one will deny, and their testimony will bear more to our point, if we consider with the learned Stilting (1) that it is very unlikely that the Arians and Semiarians would have omitted to sustain their cause by quoting any lapse in their favor made by a Roman Pontiff. They seized with avidity upon the fall of the unfortunate Hosius; would they have ignored that of his master? Not one of the many Greek or Latin fathers, who flourished in such number in the centuries immediately following Liberius, alludes to any fall, either directly, or by excuse of it, or by asserting his repentance.

A strong argument for the constancy of the Pontiff is found in the manner of his treatment of the Council of Rimini, held in 359. The fathers of this synod accepted a Profession of Faith which was Catholic in the letter, but which the usual frauds of the Arians easily perverted to a comfort of heresy. Liberius condemned their action, and only pardoned them on condition that they should condemn the accepted Profession, issue one conformable to that of Nice, and cease all communication with the Arians. We find in Socrates (2) an epistle of the Pontiff to the Orientals, in which he says :

(1) BOLLANDISTS, Sept. 23, § 9.(2) Book 4, c. 12.

“For very nearly all of those who were then assembled at Rimini, and were deceived, partly by seduction, and partly by fraud, are now returned to a healthy state of mind, and have anathematized the formula of faith issued by the Council of Rimini, and have subscribed to the form of Catholic and Apostolic faith once edited at Nice ; and having entered into our communion, they are now moved by the greatest indignation against the doctrine of Arius and his disciples.” Such words are not consistent with the supposition that the writer himself had been guilty, but a few months before, of the same, if not a greater crime.

Of no light weight is the argument drawn from the affection of the Roman people for Liberius, for both the clergy and the laity of Rome were intensely hostile to Arianism and devoted to Athanasius. Sozomenus says, in his History, book 4, c. 15, “The Roman people loved Liberius without measure, as a man in every sense illustrious, and one who, for the sake of religion, had bravely resisted the emperor.” And Theodoret, in book 2, c. 27, says of the intruder Felix that “He preserved entire and inviolate the formula of faith drawn up by the Nicene fathers. But with those who tainted it, he freely communicated, and for that reason none of the Roman citizens entered the church while he was inside.” Would not this affectionate admiration for Liberius have ceased, if he had made shipwreck of his faith, of that faith of Nice which they so jealously cherished? They twice drove Felix from the city for merely communicating with heretics, and they continued to love him who had acknowledged and professed the heresy itself?

The reader will have noticed that the heart of the Liberian controversy lies in the Pontiff's subscription to one of the formulas of faith drawn up at Sirmium. It is now proper for us to see to which one of these documents the Pontiff put his name, if indeed he signed any one of them, and to discover its nature. Baronius holds that all three of the formulas in question were edited in the Sirmian synod of 351, held against Photinus, but Nicholas Faber (1) and Alexandre prove that only the first one was issued by that synod. The second document saw the light in the year 357, and the third in the year 359. The first formula sins by omission, as all that it contains is Catholic, but it lacks the "Homœousios;" the second is unmitigatedly Arian, the third is Semiarian. We propose to show that Liberius could not possibly have signed the second or third; that therefore the first, if any whatever, should claim our attention. Pagi and Valois hold that the Pope subscribed the third formula; the following reasons will show they are mistaken: Firstly, Valois himself holds (1) that the third synod of Sirmium was celebrated in the year 359, in the consulship of Eusebius and Hypatius, and that Marcus Arethusius drew up the formula. But the one (if any) signed by Liberius is the one to which the sixth Fragment of Hilary alludes as "that perfidy of Sirmium which Liberius calls Catholic," and which was drawn by many bishops whose names are given. Again, this third formula did not appear until the year 359, and Liberius had been pardoned the year previous. How then could this document be connected with his restoration to freedom? Nor did he sign the second formula, for the reason that its profession of Arianism was so patent, so void of mystification, that no possible art could have cleansed the signer of the stain of heresy. In case the Pontiff had signed that document, there would have been no room for doubt as to his crime, and our opponents must admit that there are some points indicating his innocence. But we are not wanting in reasons extraneous to the nature of the paper. It is not likely, says Alexandre, that Liberius signed that formula which Constantius himself had condemned, through the agency of Basil of Ancyra. The Pontiff was called to Sirmium after the Anomœans (2) had been driven from Antioch by the Emperor, and when already the second formula had been thrust aside as a hideous abortion. Again, we know from the book on Synods of Hilary that, excepting the avowed Arians, the unfortunate Hosius was the only one to accept this formula. And the document which Liberius is said to have signed was subscribed by twenty-two bishops, all Orientals, while the second formula was drawn by Western prelates, as we learn from Athanasius, Socrates, and Hilary. This formula bears the names of Hosius and Potamius, while that attributed to the Pope makes no mention of these bishops. Finally, among the signers of the document assigned to Liberius are numbered Theodore of Heraclea, Basil of Ancyra, and Silvan of Tarsus, all of whom must be excluded from any connection with this second formula: Theodore (1), because he died two years ere it was issued; the others because at the very worst, they were Semiarians, and detested those Anomœan errors which are found in it.

(1) Preface to FRAGM. of St. Hilary.

(1) Notes to SOZOMENUS, b. 2, c. 30.

(2) The Anomœans were the ultra Arians, who held that the Son was anomoios, dissimilar to the Father. Their leader was Aetius.

There remains, therefore, only the first formula, promulgated in the year 351, to which Liberius could possibly have subscribed. If this is examined, the charge of heresy, which is brought against the Pontiff, must fall to the ground. It reads as follows: "We believe in One God, the Father Almighty, creator and maker of all things, in whom all pater-nity is in Heaven, and is named on earth. And in His Only-begotten Son, our Lord Jesus Christ, generated before all ages from God the Father, light from light, through whom were made all things in Heaven and on earth invisible as well as visible; He is the Word and Wisdom, true light and life, and in the later days was made Man and was born of the Holy Virgin, crucified, dead, and buried; He sits at the right hand of the Father, and is to come at the end of time to judge the living and the dead, and will render to each one according to his works; whose Kingdom never-ending will last for infinite ages; He sits at the right hand of the Father, not only in this time, but in the future. And in the Holy Ghost, that is, the Paraclete, whom, having promised Him to the apostles, after His ascent to Heaven He sent to teach them and to advise them in all things. Through whom are sanctified all souls which sincerely believe in Him." Now, although the word Homoousios is not found in this profession, yet there is nothing in it repugnant to the Catholic doctrine on the divinity of the Word. The omission should not have been allowed, for an insertion of the term "Consubstantial" was regarded by the orthodox as a safeguard to the true faith. But all those who omitted it were not regarded, in the time of Athanasius, as necessarily heretical. There never was a more strenuous defender of the word Homoousios than the holy bishop of Alexandria, and yet he says in his book on Synods, No. 41, "It is not right to regard as enemies those who accept all the other Nicene writings, and hesitate only as to the word 'Consubstantial' for we dispute as brothers with brothers, who are of the same opinion as ourselves, bringing a name alone into controversy. For when they avow that the Son is from the substance of the Father, and from no other substance; that He is not a creature or a thing made, but a genuine and real Son, the Word and Wisdom, existing one with the Father, they are not far from receiving the term "Consubstantial."

(1) THEODORET. b. 2 c. 16.

And now we may conclude our dissertation on the orthodoxy of the holy Liberius. We have seen that the arguments against him are not tenable, that there is abundant positive evidence in his favor, and that if he signed any one of the Sirmian formulas, it was one which was innocent of heresy. As the opinion of the Greek Church in this matter may be of interest to some, we will finish with a quotation from the ancient Menology, a liturgical book in use in both the United and Schismatic Churches, and corresponding to the Roman Martyrology. At the date of Sept. 27th, we read, "The blessed Liberius, defender of the truth, was bishop of Rome while Constantius was Emperor. His zeal caused him to defend the great Athanasius afterwards, Liberius contended with all his might against the malice of the heretics, and was exiled to Beræa in Thrace. But the Romans, who loved and venerated him, were faithful to him and entreated the Emperor to restore him. He returned to Rome, where he governed his flock in wisdom and died."

With the question of the fall or innocence of Pope Liberius is intimately connected the controversy as to the place due to Felix, the occupant of the Papal chair during the exile of the former. Bellarmine, Baronio, and a few others, contend that he was, at least for a time, a legitimate Pon-tiff, and hence they style him Felix II. Papebroch and Zaccaria hold that Felix was a vicar of Liberius. Christian Lupus, Dupin, Alexandre, Tillemont, and Orsi, place him among the Anti-Popes, and it is difficult to refute their arguments. If there was any time when Felix was a legitimate Pontiff, it was when Liberius was in exile, and only then, because Liberius had abdicated. But nothing in history is more certain than that Liberius never abdicated ; and if he had done so, Felix should have become his successor in a legitimate manner, and not through the intrigues of the Arians and the violence of Constantius. Nor can an argument for the legitimacy of the claims of Felix be deduced from the fact that some of the ancient records number him among the saints. Granting that he is not confounded, in these documents, with Pope St. Felix I., it does not follow, because he became a saint, that he was never an Anti-Pope. Upon the return of the legitimate Pontiff, he may have repented of his usurpation, and during his last years of life, while, as Philostorgius says (1), "he retained the dignity of bishop, but governed no church," he may have advanced to heroic sanctity.

CHAPTER XXI.

THE COUNCIL OF RIMINI.

In the year 358, the emperor Constantius endeavored to put an end to the dissensions of the Eastern Church, by calling a synod at Nicomedia. This city, however, being devastated by an earthquake, Nice was chosen as the place of meeting. Another earthquake prevented, as Theodoret thinks (2), the Arians from desecrating, as the event proved, the city where was issued the great decree upon the Divinity of Christ. In 359, therefore, a Council was ordered to assemble

(1) History, b. 4, n. 5.

(2) "God, who does not cease to protect His Church, would not have the Council held here, lest the Arians should take advantage of the name of the place, and by styling the Synod Nicene, should circumvent simple minds." Hist., b. 2, c. 26.

at Rimini in the Romagna, but by the advice of the Arians, the Eastern bishops left Rimini to the Westerns, and betook themselves to Seleucia, in Isauria. St. Athanasius tells us, in his book on Synods, that four hundred bishops met at Rimini (1). Julianus Pelagianus (2) puts the number at six hundred and fifty, but St. Athanasius is the more reliable of the two authors, and is corroborated by good authority. When the prelates had met, Valens and Ursacius, obstinate Arians, brought forth the third formula of Sirmium, in which the Son was declared, according to the Scriptures, similar to the Father, and asked the Council to approve of it, as it pleased the emperor. The bishops rejected it, and deemed it sufficient to declare their reception of the Nicene Creed. Ursacius, Valens, Germinius, Auxentius, Caius, and Demophilus, were then condemned as heretics (3). Ursacius and Valens now visited Constantius, and so worked upon his Arian sympathies that when the Council's messengers waited upon him for license for the prelates to depart to their homes, he refused to receive them. He had too much to attend to; he was preparing for a campaign against the Barbarians; when he was at leisure, he would listen to them. But if he trusted that the bishops would become tired out, and would reconsider their condemnation of Ursacius and his companions in heresy, he was mistaken, for all the synodals sent him word that they had instructed their legates to inform him that their decision was final (4). When Constantius received this message, he caused several bishops to be taken to Nice in Thrace, and there, some out of simplicity, and others from fear, they were induced to sign a formula only differing from the third of Sirmium in that it declared the Son "similar to the Father in all things," while that of Sirmium presented the Son as "similar to the Father who begat Him, according to the Scriptures." This Thracian formula was then offered to the fathers of Rimini, and they signed it. On account of this action, they have sometimes

(1) In his Epistle to the Africans, Athanasius says two hundred, but Baronio thinks that this document has been corrupted..

(2) In St. Augustine: Imperfect Work, b. 1, c. 73.

(3) SOCRATES; b. 2, c. 29. THEODORET, b. 2, c. 18. SOZOMENUS; b. 4, c. 16.

(4) Ibi.

been accused of heresy, and we now proceed to inquire into the justice of the accusation.

The following, according to St. Jerome (1), is from the Profession of Faith given in the Acts of the Council of Rimini, to which the members subscribed: "We believe in one true God, the Father Almighty. We also believe this. We believe in the only-begotten Son of God, who was born before all ages; born the only-begotten of God the Father alone, God from God, similar to the Father according to the Scriptures; whose nativity no one knows, but the Father who begat Him." St. Jerome then continues his own remarks: "Was it here inserted that there was a time when He was not, or that the Son of God is a creature? The perfect faith is the belief that He is God from God. And they said that He was born, the only-begotten from the Father alone. What means 'born'? Certainly not 'made.' Nativity removes a suspicion of His being a creature. They also added: 'Who descended from heaven, was conceived by the Holy Ghost, born of the Virgin Mary, was crucified under Pontius Pilate, the third day He arose from the dead, He ascended into heaven, sitteth at the right hand of the Father, to come to judge the living and the dead.' The words sounded piously, and amidst so much honey of praise, no one suspected any insertion of poison. . . . For the rejection of the word ousia, a plausible reason was given, that it is not found in the Scriptures, and it scandalizes the more simple by its novelty; the bishops cared not for the word, if the meaning were safe. But at last, in the course of time, when popular rumor had it that a fraud had been practised in the Profession, Valens, bishop of Mursia, who had written it in the presence of Taurus, the Pretorian prefect, who was at the synod by order of the emperor, declared that he was not an Arian, and that he detested their blasphemies. The secrecy of the thing had not destroyed the popular opinion. And hence, another day, in the church of Rimini, many bishops and a crowd of laics being present, Musonius, a Byzantine prelate, whose age gave him honor among all, spoke thus: 'Let one of us read to your Holinesses the common reports which have reached us, that the evil things, which ought to be abhorrent to our ears and hearts, may be unanimously condemned.' All the bishops replied: 'It pleases.' And then when Claude, a Picene bishop, had begun to read the blasphemies which rumor ascribed to Valens, this prelate denied that they were his, and cried out: 'If any one denies that Christ is God, the Son of God, and born of the Father before the ages, let him be anathema.' And all answered: 'Anathema.' 'If any one denies that the Son is similar to the Father, according to the Scriptures, let him be anathema.' And all replied: 'Anathema.' 'If any one says that the Son is not eternal with the Father, let him be anathema.' All called 'Anathema.' 'If any one says the Son of God is a creature, like other creatures, let him be anathema.' In the same way was cried 'Anathema.' 'If any one says the Son is not from God the Father, let him be anathema.' All exclaimed 'Anathema.' If any one says there was a time when the Son was not, let him be anathema.' At this, all the bishops, and the entire audience, with great joy and applause, saluted the words of Valens. If any one deems this a fiction of ours, let him examine the public archives; the records of the churches are full, and the memory of these things is recent. Men yet survive who were at that synod, and to confirm the truth, the very Arians do not deny that the proceedings were as we have said. While then all were extolling Valens to the skies, and were condemning and repenting of their suspicion of him, the same Claude, who had begun to read, said: 'There yet remain a few words which have escaped my lord and brother Valens, which, if you please, that no scruple may remain, we will together condemn. If any one says that the Son of God was indeed before all ages, but not so before all time, that nothing was before Him, let him be anathema.' And all said: 'Anathema.' And many other things which seemed suspicious, after Claude pronounced them, Valens condemned. If any one desires to learn more, he will find them in the Acts of the Synod of Rimini, from which we have drawn the above. These things done, the Council was dissolved, and all return joyful to their provinces But crimes are not long hidden, and a badly-healed wound opens again. Afterwards Valens, Ursacius, and other of the companions in iniquity, illustrious priests of Christ, commenced to clap their hands, saying they had not denied that the Son was a creature, and that he was like unto other creatures. There were certain bishops, deceived by the snares of Rimini, who when they were unwittingly regarded as heretics, protested by the Body of the Lord, and by all that is holy in the Church, that they had suspected no evil in the Profession. ‘We thought,’ said they, ‘that its sense agreed with its words; nor did we fear that in the Church of God, where there is a pure Confession, one thing would be expressed by the lips, and another be hidden in the heart. We were deceived by our good opinion of evil men; we did not think that priests of Christ would combat against Him.’ And weeping, they said much more, which, for brevity, I omit; they were prepared to sign the old Profession, and to condemn all the Arian blasphemies.” This testimony of St. Jerome abundantly proves that the fathers of Rimini signed a Profession of Faith which was, in itself, orthodox; that when they discovered the fraud of Valens and Ursacius, they condemned Arianism and the Arians.

(1) Dialogue against the Luciferians.

The same fact is evinced from the following passage of the historian, Sulpicius Severus (1): “The emperor forced our legates to the synod of Rimini to join the heretical communion, and gave them a Profession drawn up by the wicked, one couched in deceiving terms, which presented Catholic truth, while perfidy was latent. For, lest the Son should be believed to be of the same substance with the Father, they abolished, under a false species of reasoning, the word ousia, as ambiguous and rashly adopted by the Fathers, and not authorized by the Scriptures. The same Profession declared the Son similar to the Father, but there was the fraud prepared, that He should be similar, not equal. . . . Valens, as though he were helping our cause, added a sentence in which there was a hidden trap, namely, that the Son of God was not a creature like other creatures. For in those words, in which the Son is declared not like other creatures, He is nevertheless pronounced a creature, although more powerful than the rest."

(1) History, b. 2.

St. Augustine indeed informs us that the Arian poison infected many at the Council of Rimini, but he attributes the calamity of the fallen prelates to their simplicity: "Because they were of little intelligence, and were so deluded by obscure language, that they thought the Arians believed as they believed" (1). He adds that some yielded to fear, but that they immediately recovered their strength. St. Hilary uses similar language (2).

There certainly are some pretty strong passages in the writings of certain Fathers, which seem to affix the mark of heresy upon the bishops of Rimini. Thus, Liberius (3), Basil (4), Ambrose (5), and Facundus (6), present isolated remarks which, at first sight, would indicate a belief that these prelates were formally guilty. But when these Fathers, in this connection, speak of Arian poison and of Arian dogma, they allude either to the Arian communion, to which the deceived prelates temporarily adhered, or to that insidious Profession which the Arians had arranged for the implicit defence of their heresy. These Fathers believed with Facundus (7) that "a heretic is not made by that ignorance which is not contumacious to true doctrine, but by that which is an obstinate defence of falsehood." There is one passage of St. Jerome (8), however, which demands more than casual notice: "Then was abolished the word ousia; then was acclaimed the condemnation of the Nicene Faith. The whole world groaned, and wondered to find itself Arian." This hyperbolic saying of the great doctor does not necessarily mean that the bishops of Rimini voted the entire discontinuance of the word ousia; that they rejected that Nicene Faith which they had hitherto professed and afterwards acclaimed; that the entire world had abandoned the orthodox faith. The saint is indignant because of the suppression of a word which was a great obstacle to Arian

(1) Epist. 48.

(2) Epist. to the Eastern Bishops.

(3) Epist. 11 to the Easterns.

(4) Epist. 52, to Athanasius.

(5) On St. Luke, c. 6.

(6) Book 5, c. 3.

(7) B. 12, c. 1.

(8) Dialogue against the Luciferians.

progress ; the Nicene Faith was joyfully rejected, not at Rimini, but after the synod there held, and by the Arians who boasted that the Catholic bishops had agreed with them in their Profession ; the whole world could not have been Arian, when even the fathers of Rimini were not Arian. St. Athanasius testifies (1) that these prelates, impelled by the laudable desire of peace, subscribed to a Profession which was apparently orthodox. As for the last clause of St. Jerome's rhetorical passage, we know that there were far more Catholics than Arians in the world. The peoples of Alexandria, Constantinople, Antioch, Samosata, and Milan, resisted with all their might the intrusion of Arian bishops in those sees. The immense numbers of monks and hermits, who almost robbed the Egyptian desert of its name, were, according to Athanasius, ardent defenders of the Nicene Creed. St. Basil (2) testifies that the immense majority of Christians were orthodox ; Socrates (3) and Sozomenus (4) say that the Westerns, generally speaking, hated Arianism, while in the East the disaffection was principally confined to the use of the word " consubstantial." Although so closely dependent upon the emperors, the very soldiers, according to Theodoret (5), were Catholic ; so much so, that Julian, at the beginning of his reign, dared not openly show his hostility to the faith. St. Athanasius says to the emperor Jovian (6) : " Know then, most religious Augustus, that this is the faith, professed by the Fathers congregated at Nice, with which agree all the churches of the earth ; those of Spain, Britain, and the Gauls ; those of all Italy, Dalmatia, Dacia, Moesia, Macedonia, and all Achaia ; all those of Egypt and Lybia, of Pontus, Cappadocia, and the neighboring regions ; all those, also, of the East, excepting a few who follow the opinion of Arius. . . . Although a certain few contradict this faith, we know, most religious Augustus, that they are of no prejudice to the entire world." Lucifer of Cagliari thus urges the Arian emperor Constantius (7) : " If you could go among all the nations, you would find, most obstinate emperor, that everywhere the Christians believe as we do, that they persist in this faith, and like us, desire to die for the Son of God. But this new preaching, this recent religion, this blasphemy uttered by you, to the detriment of your salvation, has not only been unable to progress beyond the Roman confines, with all your efforts, but wherever it has tried to fix its roots, it has withered." It is evident, therefore, that the quoted passage of St. Jerome must be regarded as hyperbolical.

(1) Epistle to Rufinian.(4) B. 3, c. 12.(2) To the Neo-Cæsareans, 72 and 75.(5) B. 3, c. 3.(3) B. 2, c. 22.(6) Synodical Epistle on Faith, in Theodoret, b. 4, c. 3.(7) We Should Die for the Son of God.

CHAPTER XXII.

SECOND GENERAL COUNCIL ; FIRST OF CONSTANTINOPLE.

This Council was called to take action against the heresies of Macedonius and Apollinaris, and to put an end to troubles in the churches of Constantinople and Antioch. Macedonius, bishop of Constantinople, successively an Arian and a Semiarian, finally denied the Divinity of the Holy Ghost, asserting that He is not of the same substance as the Father and the Son. Apollinaris, bishop of Laodicea, taught that Christ took from Mary a body without a soul ; that then He assumed a soul, but one wanting mind, the Divine Word taking the place of mind and intellect. He erred also in his doctrine as to the flesh of our Lord, for he held that the Word and flesh were one and the same substance, since the "Word was made flesh ;" that is, he taught, something of the Word was changed into flesh, and the flesh of Christ was not taken from that of Mary. Against these two heresies the Council took immediate action. Its sessions commenced in May, 381, and lasted until the end of July. At first, Meletius of Antioch was its president, but, dying during the synod, he was succeeded by St. Gregory of Nazianzen. This latter abdicating his see of Constantinople, Timothy of Alexandria was called to the head of the Council, and finally the presiding chair was given to Nectarius, the successor of St. Gregory Nazianzen. The synod was attended by a hundred and fifty bishops, all Orientals. In the beginning it did not possess the authority of an Œcumenical Council, for it was convoked by the emperor Theodosius, and to it the Occidental prelates were not invited; but the character of œcumenicity was affixed to it when its acts were confirmed by the Holy See. This occurred, in regard to its Symbol and its definitions of faith, shortly after the Pontificate of Gelasius; but its canons were not accepted in the West for some time afterwards. St. Gregory the Great (el. 590) says: "The Roman Church does not as yet hold, nor has she accepted, the canons and acts of this Synod; but she has received that which was defined against Macedonius."

Before their separation the fathers of this Council wrote to Pope Damasus, relating their acts in regard to faith and discipline, and asking that he and the Western bishops "would rejoice with them, that when the Word of God shall be established by common consent and Christian charity be confirmed among us, we may cease to say 'I am of Apollo, and I of Cephas.'"

(1) From this passage Bossuet concludes that the Constantinopolitan prelates held that the assertion of a dogma of faith is to be sought, not in a Pontifical definition, or approbation, but in the common consent of the bishops. But the passage of St. Gregory above quoted shows that the Pope considered his authority as superior to the decrees of the Council. However, as this may be regarded as inconclusive, we adduce the testimony of the Sixth General Council. Although in the Second Œcumenical Council Pope Damasus was present, neither in person nor through his legates, yet the fathers of the Sixth Council declared that to him was principally due the destruction of Macedonianism. This could only have been by the posterior confirmation of the anti-Macedonian decrees, by which they obtained an irrefragable authority. The Council, in its eighteenth Action, uses the following language: "Macedonius denied the Divinity of the Holy Ghost, but the great emperor Theodosius, and Damasus, the adamant of faith, whose strong mind was not to be affected by the attacks of outside sects, and Gregory and Nectarius, brought together that Synod in the imperial city." For what other reason could these fathers of the Sixth Council have styled Damasus "the adamant of faith" in connection with Macedonius, than that of his confirmation of the decrees condemning that heretic? They knew that without that confirmation the decrees were null. They agreed, in fine, with the prelates whom Damasus united in Synod at Rome to confer upon the lately held Council of Rimini, who said that, "The number of the bishops who were collected at Rimini can have no influence. . . . for neither the Roman bishop, whose sentence before all others should have been awaited," &c. If then the Constantinopolitan fathers asked for the consent of Pope Damasus, they did so, not in accordance with the theory of Bossuet, because they deemed common consent desirable in definitions of faith, but because they knew that without the concurrence of the Pontiff their decrees were of no value. Bossuet himself cites a passage from Sozomenus, b. 6, c. 21, showing how, when Pope Liberius had defined that the Holy Ghost is Consubstantial with the other Divine Persons, the opponents "rested their cause, as the controversy was ended by the judgment of the Roman Church, and the question was seen to be terminated." If it was the belief of those times that only the consent of the various churches could put an end to controversies of faith, as the Gallicans once held, how could the sole decision of Rome terminate this one?

(1) Defence of the Declaration, . 12, c. 8.

One of the most important acts of the Second General Council was the addition, by way of explanation, of several clauses to the Nicene Creed. First, to the clause "maker of all things visible and invisible" was added "of heaven and earth" against the Marcionites, and the Manicheans, who asserted the doctrine of two Principles. Secondly, was inserted "born before all ages," to combat the teaching of Photinus that the Word was not eternal but temporal, having an origin in the womb of Mary, and in the man Christ. Thirdly, the heresy of Apollinaris caused the introduction of "by the Holy Ghost, of the Virgin Mary." Fourthly, where the Nicene Creed reads only "suffered," the sixth synod inserted the words "was crucified for us under Pontius Pilate, and was buried." It also added, "He sitteth at the right hand of the Father," and "He is to come again in glory." And as Apollinaris taught the doctrine of the millennial reign of Christ, and to Marcellus of Ancyra was imputed the assertion that Christ would one day surrender His kingdom to the Father, and then be reduced to the order of the just, the Council wrote "of whose kingdom there shall be no end." Fifthly, to further confound the Macedonian errors as to the Holy Ghost, was introduced the passage from "Lord and Life-Giver" to "the holy prophets." Sixthly, was added the concluding clause, beginning with "and in one Holy, Catholic Church," and terminating with the "Amen." As to the assertion, made by some, that Pope Damasus added the celebrated clause "Filioque," "And from the Son," to the Constantinopolitan Creed, there is no foundation whatever for it (1). In the Roman Church, this addition was probably made in the time of Pope Nicholas I. (858), as we gather from the Encyclical sent by the heresiarch Photius to the Orientals. Finally, in the second Council of Lyons (1274), the phrase was solemnly sung thrice in the Creed by both Greeks and Latins, but by special indult the former were permitted to omit it in their churches; and in the Council of Florence (1439), when the dogma of the Procession of the Holy Ghost was confirmed, the Universal Church approved of the addition.

The Second General Council issued only three canons, as is shown by Dionysius the Little, and by the synodical epistle sent in 382 by Nectarius to Pope Damasus. The seven canons contained in the collection of Isidore Mercator are in substance our three; the first corresponds to our first; the second, third, fourth, and fifth, form our second; the sixth is our third; the seventh is not properly a canon, as it is the Symbol of Faith. Of these canons, the third alone is of special interest to us. In it the fathers decreed, "Let the bishop of Constantinople have the primacy of honor after the Roman bishop, because that city is the younger Rome." By this canon, which gave to a bishop, hitherto subject to Alexandria, the patriarchal dignity, and jurisdiction over all the Thracian, Pontian, and Asiatic dioceses, a radical revolution was wrought in Oriental discipline; and while it could but be received with joy by the Constantinopolitans, it must have weighed heavily upon the hearts of the bishops of Alexandria and Antioch, the former being now relegated to the third seat in the hierarchy, and the latter to the fourth. A see which, fifty years before, had been a modest member of the provincial synod of Heraclea, found itself now raised to a position second only to that of Rome. The Roman Pontiffs, ever zealous for the rights of each and all of the churches, for a long time resisted the encroachments authorized by this third canon, and only recognized it when the entire East was willing, nay desired, that it should be acknowledged. In the year 418, Pope Boniface I. thus reproved Atticus, bishop of Constantinople, for his arrogance in lording it over the bishop of Alexandria: "I leave it to your Fraternity to better understand who is master in humility, who in pride. But be it far removed from the priests of the Lord that any of them fall into the guilt of contemning the example of the fathers by any new usurpation. . . . If circumstances require, you can discover, by searching the canons, which is, after the Roman Church, the second see, which the third. Let the aforesaid great churches of Alexandria and Antioch preserve the dignity granted them by the canons, keeping a knowledge of ecclesiastical law." And Pope Sixtus III. (elect. 432), writing to the bishops of Illyria that they should not obey the bishop of Constantinople, said, "Do not deem yourselves bound, dear brothers, by those constitutions which the Oriental Synod willed to decree, against our commands; only in that (are you bound) which, with our consent, it adjudged concerning the faith." After the condemnation of Eutychianism in the Council of Chalcedon (451), when most of the fathers had left the city, a canon was rushed through, in spite of the protests of the Papal legates, confirming this third canon of Constantinople. Those who had signed the canon endeavored, assisted by the emperor Marcian, to obtain the approbation of Pope Leo the Great, but in vain. All three of the Constantinopolitan canons were rejected in the Council of Chalcedon, for the Papal legates cried out, when an oriental codex containing them was introduced, "These canons are not found in the Synodical records." And for a long time afterwards the Supreme Pontiffs declared that the Church did not receive said canons. It is true that in the 16th Action of Chalcedon, Eusebius of Dorylæum, speaking of the third canon, says: "I have willingly subscribed, because in the city of Rome I read this regulation to the Most Holy Pontiff, in the presence of Constantinopolitan clerics, and he received it." But this prelate must have misunderstood the Pontiff, for St. Leo, in his epistle to Anatolius of Constantinople, declares the precise contrary. Pope Gelasius, addressing the bishops of Dardania, well accounts for the hesitancy of the Holy See to advance the see of Constantinople at the expense of the rights of Alexandria and Antioch. "If it is a question," he says, "of the dignity of the cities, certainly greater is the dignity of the priests of the second and third sees, than that of the priests of the city, which not only is not numbered among the (great) sees, but is not reckoned even among those having metropolitan rights. For if you call it the 'imperial city,' the power of the secular government is one thing, and the distribution of ecclesiastical dignities another." At length, in the fourth Council of Lateran, held under Pope Innocent III., in the year 1215, the Holy See recognized the right of Constantinople to the second place in the hierarchy. The fifth canon reads as follows: "Renewing the ancient privileges of the patriarchal sees, the holy universal Synod approving, we sanction that after the Roman Church, which, the Lord so disposing, holds the principality of ordinary power over all others as the Mother and Mistress of all the faithful of Christ, the Constantinopolitan church shall have the first place, the Alexandrian the second, the Antiochian the third, and that of Jerusalem the fourth, each one preserving its own dignity."

(1) ALEXANDRE; 4th Cent., diss. 37, art. 3.

CHAPTER XXIII.

THE APPEAL OF ST. JOHN CHRYSOSTOM TO POPE INNOCENT I.

Among the many instances of appeal to Rome which are furnished by the olden records, our attention is especially challenged by that of St. John of the Golden Tongue, both on account of the eminent hierarchical position of the appellant, and because of his brilliant learning and indisputable sanctity. The great Chrysostom was bishop of Constantinople, of that see which in his time had already given signs of the overweening ambition which was one day to bring about both the spiritual and temporal wreck of Eastern Christendom. An appeal to the Roman Pontiff on the part of so exalted a prelate, and against the decision of so powerful a bishop as him of Alexandria, who was recognized as second in dignity to the Pope alone, cannot be very tasteful to gentry of the Cæsarean and Gallican schools, any more than to Protestants in general. Hence we find averse to an admission of such appeal Abp. De Marca (1), Dupin (2), and of course, Febronius (3). "The Romans," says this rehasher of old and already confuted arguments, "commencing with Pope Gelasius, conclude that Chrysostom appealed to Innocent," and then he proceeds to repeat the ideas of De Marca, Dupin, and the Protestant Basnage (4), the erroneousness of which he has seen demonstrated by David (5), by Alexandre (6), by Pagi, and by Christian Lupus (7). In his treatment of this subject, Zaccaria (8) avails himself copiously of the arguments adduced by the celebrated Franciscan controversialist, Bianchi (9), and we can do no better than imitate his example. But before entering upon an argumentative consideration of our question, it is well to speak briefly of the circumstances out of which it arose.

(1) Concord of Priesthood and Empire, b. 7, c. 9.

(2) Ancient Discipline, diss. 2, c. 2.

(6) Fourth Cent., diss. 28.

(3) c. 5, § 8.

(7) On Appeals, diss. 1, c. 17.

(4) Annals.

(8) Anti-Febronio, p. 2, b. 3, c. 4.

(5) Canonical Judgments, c. 7. (9) The External Polity of the Church, L. 5, n. 2

When, in the year 398, St. John Chrysostom was chosen as their bishop by the clergy and people of Constantinople, Theophilus of Alexandria exerted all his influence, and descended to every species of chicanery, to prevent his accession to the episcopal dignity. But the emperor Arcadius so willing, Theophilus accorded the consecration, and the new prelate, then fifty-four years of age, entered upon a career which soon excited the admiration of the good and the hate of the wicked. The enmity of Theophilus proved long-lived, and it only wanted a suitable occasion to manifest itself in works. This occasion was furnished in the year 401, when the saint kindly received under his protection some Egyptian monks whom the Alexandrian bishop had persecuted. Chrysostom had also made many enemies among the rich and powerful by his eloquent outbursts against their arrogance and cruel injustice. Nor were all of the clergy friendly to him; his severity in upholding the canons created much excitement among the lovers of a relaxed discipline. But neither Theophilus the bishop, nor his allies, the eunuch Eutropius, and Gainas, a general of the army, could avail much against the holy prelate until the empress Eudoxia came to their aid. Chrysostom one day preached a severe sermon on the vanity and luxury to which many females of the capital were given in an extraordinary degree, and the discourse being represented to Eudoxia as directed especially against her imperial person, she resolved upon vengeance. Accordingly, in the month of June, 403, Theophilus held a synod in a suburb of Chalcedon, called "At the Oak," in which forty-five bishops hostile to the saint, presented false accusations, Chrysostom himself being absent. Theophilus rendered judgment of deposition, and the emperor followed up the sentence with a decree of exile: but under the combined influence of fear of the popular indignation, and of terror on account of an earthquake, Eudoxia relented, and obtained the restoration of the saint. But about eight months afterwards, a statue of Eudoxia was being dedicated alongside the church of St. Sophia, while divine service was being held within, and Chrysostom was so impressed with the incongruity, and the disrespect caused by the noise of the accompanying games, that in his sermon he condemned the participators in, and the managers of the festivity. Then the smouldering fire burst out anew, and in June of 404 another synod was held, and the sentence of deposition renewed. Arsacius was intruded into the Constantinopolitan see, and Chrysostom exiled to Mt. Tarsus in the Lesser Armenia. So cunning were the persecutors of the saint, that even shrewd and learned men like Sts. Epiphanius and Jerome were deceived, and believed him in fault. His enemies tried to justify their conduct before Pope Innocent I., but when that Pontiff received an appeal from the persecuted bishop, he rescinded the iniquitous decree of deposition, and led the Western emperor, Honorius, to patronize Chrysostom's cause before his imperial brother, Arcadius. In the meantime, the saint had suffered much in his place of exile—almost a desert—and had been frequently in want of the necessaries of life. He dragged out an existence at Mt. Tarsus for three years, and then, having been ordered to Pithium in the Euxine, he started on the journey, but succumbed at Comana to the cruelties of his guards, and died Sept. 14, an. 407, in the sixty-third year of his age.

And now for St. Chrysostom's appeal to Pope Innocent I. We take it from Palladius, bishop of Helenopolis, a bosom friend of the saint, who wrote a Life of him which may be read in the edition of his works prepared by the erudite Benedictine, Montfaucon, of the Congregation of St. Maur. After a narration of the proceedings of the synod "At the Oak," and of his restoration, Chrysostom tells the Pontiff how he sought for a hearing before a synod wherein his enemies would be present, but not as judges; he then speaks of his condemnation without a hearing, and of the violent occupation of his church on the night of Holy Saturday, and then comes to the point of his appeal: "In order that such confusion may not invade the whole earth which is under heaven, we pray you that by your letters you denounce those things which have been wickedly done against us by one of the parties (to the question), while we were absent, and not declining a trial; that they may not have any value, as indeed from their very nature they have none; and that those who have dared such things, be subjected to the penalties of the ecclesiastical laws. Concede, therefore, to us, who have been neither convicted nor reprehended nor proved guilty, the enjoyment of your letters of communion, of your charity, and of all other things, as hitherto." If these words of Chrysostom do not constitute an appeal, it would be difficult to frame one less open to exception. But Febronius contends that this letter does not prove that the writer believed the Pope to be possessed of authority to rescind his condemnation, since the same missive was despatched to Venerius of Milan, and to Chromatius of Aquileia. It proves merely, concludes Febronius, that the saint invoked the moral influence of these Western prelates, of the Pope included, to be exercised by a disapprobation of a judgment irregularly given, and not by a nullifying action, which they were incompetent to put forth. This objection had already been made by Dupin, and in answering him, Bianchi furnishes our reply to Febronius. "We find," says Bianchi, "among the epistles of St. John Chrysostom, one to Chromatius of Aquileia, and one to Venerius of Milan. But these two letters were written in the year 406, as Montfaucon observes, that is, two years after the letter to Innocent. And again, there is not a shadow of similarity between them and the letter to the Pontiff. But it might be alleged in favor of Dupin, that at the end of the epistle to Innocent, as it is given to us by Palladius, is said, 'this same was written to Venerius, bishop of Milan, and to Chromatius, bishop of Aquileia.' But we may well answer that this clause was added by some interpolator of the codex of Palladius. For this assertion no trivial argument is found in the fact that the passage is not read in certain MSS. cited by Coustant; that it is wanting in all the editions of the works of Chrysostom; that it does not occur in the copy of the same letter added by Fronto Duceus to the epistles of the saint. But granted that Chrysostom sent to Venerius and Chromatius a copy of the letter which he had sent to Innocent, must we therefore conclude that he recognized in them the same authority that he acknowledged in the Pontiff? Not at all. These two bishops were the chief ones among the Italian prelates forming the ordinary council of the Pope, with the aid of which council were decided by the Holy See the most important affairs of religion and of discipline. The many Councils held in Rome by Damasus with the intervention of St. Ambrose of Milan, and of the bishop of Aquileia, and the very Synod held by Innocent in the case of Chrysostom, leave no doubt as to the custom of the Pontiffs. It was quite natural then that, in appealing to Pope Innocent, the saint should write also to those two prelates who were then the only metropolitans in Italy, and should send them a copy of the letter to the Pontiff, in order that, if called to the Synod, they would be well informed as to the state of affairs. We must also observe that the four bishops, who formed the embassy of Chrysostom, were sent, not to Milan or to Aquileia, but directly to Rome, and with the letters not only of the saint, but also of the forty prelates who persevered in his communion. Innocent answered the letters of Chrysostom and those of the clergy of Constantinople, and only his answers were spread through the East."

So much for the letter; now as to its reception by Pope Innocent. As Palladius writes, the Pontiff reprobated the judgment of Theophilus, but Febronius answers that so did Venerius and Chromatius, and others, but not in a judicial manner. To this we reply that Palladius, speaking of this reprobation, uses the word atheteo, which word, besides its general significance of reproving, possesses also the sense of abrogating, abolishing, cancelling (1). That the sentence of Theophilus was really cancelled by Pope Innocent, was believed by Pope Gelasius, who wrote to the bishops of Dardania that the Apostolic See (alone, says the Pontiff) had absolved John of Constantinople, whom a Synod "even of Catholic prelates, had condemned." Such was the opinion of Pope Vigilius, who, in his Constitution, declares that neither Chrysostom nor Flavian could be cut off from the Church, because the Holy See adjudged them to be most firmly united to her. But according to Febronius, or rather Dupin, Pope Innocent himself confesses, in his letter to the clergy of Constantinople, that a Synod was necessary for his judicial decision. "That alone," says the Pontiff, "will calm the waves of such tempests." Only ignorance of ecclesiastical law, or perhaps the passion of party, can excuse the proffering of such an objection. "We must observe," says Bianchi, "that although, regularly speaking, an appeal to a legitimate judge entails the suspensive act, that is, renders necessary an inquiry by the judge into the merits of the case, suspending the execution of the sentence, and placing the appellant in his pristine condition; sometimes, nevertheless, the sentence is not suspended. The cases of such non-suspension of execution are named, in both civil and ecclesiastical jurisprudence. Again, it is one thing to appeal from an unjust sentence of a competent judge, who has acted according to the proper mode of procedure, and quite another thing to appeal from a sentence which is null and void through defect of authority in the judge, or on account of a judicial error in the proceedings. In the first case, it may happen that the appeal may not entail the suspensive act, but never in the second. . . . Now, as the judgment pronounced against Chrysostom by the Eastern Synod was null because given by incompetent judges, because rendered in the absence of the accused, Innocent having accepted the appeal, and heard the ambassadors from each side, did first of all what legality demanded; he annulled the acts of Theophilus, and restored Chrysostom to his see, giving him the ecclesiastical communion, and with it, the possession of all his rights. But the Pontiff prudently abstained from any judgment, so to say, in petitorio, with regard to the truth or falsity of the accusations, reserving them to the consideration of a Synod. This then was the first judgment, most proper and most legal, of Innocent, and by it Chrysostom was not as yet declared innocent of the accusations, but restored to those rights of which he had been violently despoiled. And because Innocent reserved to another Synod the consideration of the cause in devolutivo, it does not follow that he thought he could not himself consider it; he had already treated it in suspensivo, therefore he might consider it in petitorio and in devolutivo. But the gravity of the question, a party to which was composed of so many Eastern bishops, among whom was Theophilus, first prelate of the Orient, and already celebrated in the West for his Paschal Letters, translated by Jerome, and which party was aided by the Byzantine court, demanded that the Pontiff should not judge of it by himself, but together with a General Synod, over which would preside his legates, who, in his name, would give the Synodical sentence." It was better, in fine, that judgment should be delivered as was afterwards done in the case of Nestorius by the Council of Ephesus, and in that of Dioscorus by the Council of Chalcedon, but it by no means follows that Pope Innocent thought he had no right to pronounce a definitive decision.

(1) See Mansi's notes to Alexandre's 28th Dissertation, in Fourth Century.

Our position is confirmed by the letter of the emperor Honorius to his brother Arcadius, touching the cause of Chrysostom. He depicts the lamentable disorders in the Eastern churches, and shows how both parties to the present dispute had sent legates to the bishop of Rome and those of Italy, and had referred the cause to the Roman See. He then insists that, pending the decision, nothing further should have been undertaken; and yet, he says, the accused had been sent with unprecedented haste, into exile. Had the recourse of Chrysostom to Rome not had the force of an appeal, suspending the execution of the first judgment, the action of the saint's enemies would not have been so irregular as the complaint of Honorius declares it to have been. Nor can Febronius draw any comfort from the fact that the emperor says that legates were sent also to the "bishops of Italy." In settling the appeals of bishops, the Pontiffs were accustomed to examine them in a council of those prelates who formed their supreme senate, just as secular monarchs proceed in a council of ministers. But who will say that the ministers of a prince, when united in cabinet council, have the same authority as the sovereign?

After holding a Synod at Rome, Pope Innocent resolved to convoke one at Thessalonica, to be composed of both Eastern and Western bishops. Nothing more is needed to throw sufficient light upon this question than his instruction to his legates. He orders that Chrysostom "shall not appear for judgment, until he is restored to communion and to his see, so that all occasion for refusing the sentence being removed, he may willingly come to the assembly." Innocent had therefore judged the cause of the saint, at least, in suspensivo, and had therefore treated his letter as an appeal. There is no question about the propriety of restoring him to his rights; that the Pontiff absolutely commands. The Thessalonican Synod was merely to inquire into the truth of the accusations brought by Theophilus against Chrysostom, and to punish those persons who had so shamefully violated the canons of the Church.

CHAPTER XXIV.

PELAGIANISM.

Whether Origen was to blame in any way, as a forerunner of this heresy, is disputed by men of erudition and acumen; that Theodore of Mopsueste (d. 428) and Rufinus (d. 410) were, we may gather from Marius Mercator (1) and from St. Jerome (2) respectively. The latter says of Rufinus, that, although dead, "he yet barks by means of a big and corpulent dog of Albion for he has a progeny of the Scottish race (which is) in the neighborhood of Britain." Among the continentals of those days, the Britons and Scots or Irish were frequently confounded. Hence, it is not strange to hear St. Jerome calling Pelagius a Scot, "too heavy with Scotch porridge" (3). Pelagius was a British monk, but he never took Holy Orders, probably not even the minor ones, for Pope Zosimus styles him a layman (4). According to Orosius, he was fond of the pleasures of the table, bloated in the face, and heavy shouldered. But St. Augustine certainly for a time believed him to be a holy man (5), and it was only when he became better acquainted with him that he altered his

(1) Preface to Annotations on the Writings of Julian.

(2) Preface to Jeremiah, b. 5.

(3) Idem, b. 1.

(4) Epist. to Aurelius.

(5) Remission of Sins, b. 3, c. 1.

mind (1). Pelagius had a happy knack of making valuable acquaintances, and wherever he went, he made good use of a store of introductory letters from bishops, nobles, influential matrons, holy nuns, &c., all sounding his praises both as to learning and sanctity. His greatest successes were among noble ladies, whose love of novelty easily led them to lend their valuable aid in extending the sect. It would seem that the new heresy made its first appearance about the year 405, for in an epistle written in 417, Pelagius alludes to a letter written by himself "twelve years ago" to St. Paulinus, and St. Augustine tells us that he read that letter, and found it corrupted with Pelagianism. The principal disciple of Pelagius was a Scottish monk named Cælestius, and so active was he in the propagation of the heresy that in many places the innovators were called Cælestians; indeed, it was under that name that they were condemned at Ephesus. According to St. Augustine, Cælestius was "a man of the keenest intellect, which, had it been corrected, would have profited many." He wrote many books, which were preserved by Marius Mercator, and have been well criticized by the erudite Jesuit, John Garnier.

Before we proceed to sketch the progress of Pelagianism, it is well to note in what its errors consisted. The basis of the entire system was the erroneous assertion that Adam and Eve were created as mortals, so that, whether they sinned or not, they would have died. This sin of our first parents injured themselves alone, and when infants are born, they are in that state in which Adam and Eve were, before the fall. Hence infants, even if not baptized, attain to eternal life. According to Pelagius, concupiscence and death are natural conditions of humanity, even as it was created, and therefore, human nature has not been vitiated by the fall. If it has not been vitiated, it remains as in the beginning, and by its own innate strength, is able to avoid all sin. Hence, divine grace is not necessary to man, that he may perform meritorious works. From these general principles were derived an immense number of errors, permeating through the entire economy of the Christian system, but which it is not our province to indicate. The morality of the Pelagians was detestable. According to them, ignorance and forgetfulness, even when vincible, excuse from sin. No rich man can enter into heaven, unless he has sold all he possessed. They exaggerated, far beyond the limits of truth and common sense, the necessity of modesty in dress, of taking no oaths, and of loving our enemies. With regard to the last, however, they inconsistently held that an enemy was never to be believed. Pelagius was very favorable to the "woman's rights" theory; hence St. Jerome upbraids him, saying (1), "Thy liberality is so great, in order that thou mayest conciliate the favor of thy Amazons, that in another place thou writest that women should have a knowledge of the Law, whereas the Apostle teaches that they should be silent in the Church, and that they should consult their husbands at home, as to what they ignore. Nor is it enough for thee to give thy women a knowledge of the Scriptures; thou must needs be rejoiced with their voices in canticles. Who does not know that females should sing in their own rooms, and not before a crowd of men?"

(1) Deeds of Pelagius, c. 22.

After having spent some time in Rome, during which they insinuated, rather than taught, their heresy, Pelagius and Cælestius crossed into Africa in the year 411, at the time of the Conference at Carthage in the affair of the Donatists. The former went, in the following year, to Jerusalem, the latter remaining for missionary work at Carthage. The bishop, Aurelius, soon excommunicated him, and he went to Ephesus, where he managed to be ordained a priest. During the next few years, St. Augustine spent much of his time in preaching against the slowly spreading heresy, and in the year 414 he received from two of the perverts of Pelagius a copy of a book which the heresiarch had written in answer to the epistle of St. Jerome to Ctesiphon, which had bitterly attacked his errors. This was the cause of St. Augustine's work on Nature and Grace. Pelagius had by this time made many friends in Palestine, among them, no less a personage than John, bishop of Jerusalem. This prelate, in order to justify Pelagius, called a Synod of his priests in the year 415. Orosius, a celebrated Spanish priest, whom St. Augustine had sent to the Holy Land to study under St. Jerome on the "origin of souls," was present, and narrated to the synodals what he had heard Pelagius say at Carthage in 412, when arraigned in a Synod in that city. This was that "man can be without sin, if he wishes," and that "the commandments of God can be easily kept." To this assertion of Orosius, Pelagius, who was, by order of the bishop, seated among the priests, took exception. "He had not said that this could be done without the help of God." The bishop said the exception was well taken, and confirmed it by Scripture. Orosius then protesting that John could not be both judge and counsel, an altercation ensued, the upshot of which was that a decision was given that a cause which had arisen among Latins, should be settled by Latins, and the affair was remitted to the Pope. Towards the end of the year, this farce was rivalled by another at Rama, then called Diospolis. A Synod was held by Eulogius of Cæsarea, to consider the complaints made against Pelagius by two Gallic prelates, Eros and Lazarus. The heresiarch had recourse to his large stock of commendatory letters, and presented one from St. Hilary of Poitiers. The records of the Synod say that the heresiarch was then asked as to his own and Cælestius' doctrine. "What does the monk Pelagius here present say to these Chapters? The Holy Synod and the Holy Church of God reprobate them. Pelagius answered, 'I again say, according to their own testimony, these are not mine; for them I owe no satisfaction. What I have avowed to be my own, I affirm to be true; what I have said are not my own, these, according to the judgment of Holy Church, I reject, saying anathema to every one contradicting the teachings of the Holy Catholic Church. For I believe in the Trinity of one substance, and in everything taught by the Holy Catholic Church. If any one avows things contrary to her doctrine, let him be anathema.' The Synod said: Now that we are satisfied as to the persecution of the monk Pelagius here present, who really consents to pious doctrine, and who rejects and anathematizes what is contrary to the faith of the Church, we acknowledge that he is of the communion of the Church." It is to be observed that, though deceived by Pelagius, this local Synod did not approve his doctrine. Falsely, therefore, he boasted of a victory for his teachings. After this piece of fraud, the Pelagian faction waxed so turbulent and audacious, that they set fire to the monasteries under the care of St. Jerome, and killed several persons, the holy doctor narrowly escaping to a fortified tower (1). When Aurelius of Carthage learned from Orosius of the doings at Jerusalem and Diospolis, he held, in 416, a Synod of sixty-eight bishops of the Proconsulate, and condemned both Pelagius and Cælestius. The Acts of the Synod were sent to Pope Innocent I. "We thought it right," said the bishops, "Holy Brother, to send our Acts to your Charity, that the authority of the Apostolic See might be added to the statutes of our mediocrity, to guard the salvation of many, and to correct the perversity of some." In the year 416, Silvanus, primate of Numidia, held a Synod of 61 bishops at Milevi, which accused the two heresiarchs to the Pontiff, and concluded its epistle in these words: "We believe that, by the help of the mercy of our Lord and God Jesus Christ, who deigns to guide thee when consulting Him, and to hear thee when praying to Him, those who hold such perverse and pernicious things will more easily yield to thy authority, derived from the authority of the Holy Scriptures; that we may rather rejoice because of their correction, than lament their destruction." Pope Innocent I., having received the Relations of the African Synods, now condemned the two primary errors of Pelagianism, and defined the two opposing dogmas on the necessity of grace and on infant baptism. In a Rescript to Silvanus and the other fathers of the Milevitan Synod, he says, "Wherefore, in the authority of Apostolic vigor, we decree that Pelagius and Cælestius, that is, the inventors of new words. . . . are deprived of ecclesiastical communion, until they withdraw from the snares of the devil, in which they are held captive according to his will; that they be not received, in the meantime, into the Fold of the Lord, which they, following the perverse path, have willed to desert. At the same time we command, that any who may with similar pertinacity attempt to defend the same, shall be punished, &c. Let this fixed sentence remain, therefore, against the aforesaid, &c. We order, nevertheless, that, since Christ the Lord, by His own will, has signified that He wills not the death of the dying, but that he be converted and live; if ever any shall recover, and having abandoned the error of depraved dogma, shall condemn those things for sake of which they have condemned themselves, the customary medicine, that is, her association, shall not be refused them by the Church." With the receipt of this Rescript of St. Innocent, says St. Augustine, "the cause was finished;" but well did he add, "would that the error also were ended!"

(1) Dialogues. b. 1.

(1) AUGUSTINE, Deeds of Pelagius, last chap.

Soon after these events, Pope Innocent died, and was succeeded, on the 18th March, 417, by Zosimus. Scarcely had he been seated in the Apostolic chair, when there arrived from Palestine a letter which Pelagius had addressed to the defunct Pontiff. In it he accused of calumny the two Gallic bishops who had attacked him at Diospolis; he enclosed a Profession of Faith calculated to deceive; he enclosed also an intercessory letter from Praylius, the new bishop of Jerusalem. The new Pontiff was also approached by the heretics from another quarter. Although a superior man to the Augustinian monk, Pelagius was in many respects, physical and moral, the Luther of his heresy; Cælestius was no less its Melancthon. Far more learned than his master, and much more conciliatory, because naturally more cunning, he was the fitter man to carry on the struggle in Rome. Accordingly, he now appeared in the Eternal City, and presented a humble petition to Zosimus. In it he denied original sin, but tried to ward off the charge of heresy by saying, "If by chance any error of ignorance has crept in, let it be corrected by your judgment." He promised to condemn whatever the Holy See would condemn. Zosimus then gave him letters to the African bishops, in which he reprimanded them for giving too easy credence to the accusations of two deposed and vagrant prelates (Eros and Lazarus had been deposed in Gaul). He then said, "Hence we have decided nothing in the present case immaturely or impulsively, wherefore, within two months let them come to show that he (Cælestius) believes otherwise than he has pretended in his writings to us, and in his Profession of Faith, or else, after the open and manifest explanation he has made, let your Holiness know that no doubt remains." When the letter of Pelagius arrived, it produced about the same effect on the mind of Zosimus as the interview with Cælestius had done, and the result was another letter to the African bishops of the same tenor as the first. Upon the receipt of these epistles, Aurelius of Carthage immediately held a Synod of all the African bishops, which sent a letter to the Pontiff, begging him not to interfere with the judgment of his predecessors until he had examined the proofs of fraud which would soon be sent to him. Zosimus having received all the documents which the Africans sent to expose the tricks of the Pelagians, he now summoned Cælestius to a "fuller audience." But the wily disturber felt that his time had come, and fled from Rome. Thereupon, the Pontiff condemned both Pelagius and Cælestius, and their doctrines. When the news of the condemnation reached Africa, another plenary Council of the Africans was held in May, 418, in which 214 bishops received the letters of Zosimus with acclamations of joy, because, as St. Prosper said, the Pope "had armed their right hands with the sword of Peter."

Having now glanced at the origin, nature, and condemnation of Pelagianism, we must give place to some considerations which naturally arise from the facts we have narrated. And firstly, we have heard St. Augustine saying that, after the definition of St. Innocent I., "the cause was finished." The opponents of the irreformability of Papal definitions hold that the holy bishop of Hippo merely signified by this phrase that, as the Universal Church had consented to Pope Innocent's decree, nothing more was needed for a perfect knowledge of the heretical nature of Pelagianism. But that his idea was that a Pontifical decision is, by itself, conclusive of a cause, will appear from the following reflections. We have seen that after the Carthaginian synod of 416 condemned the teachings of Cælestius, it wrote to Pope Innocent, saying, "We send our Acts to your Charity, that the authority of the Apostolic See may be added to the statutes of our mediocrity, to guard the salvation of many, and to correct the perversity of some." It thought, therefore, that the authority of Rome was necessary to "guard the salvation of many;" that is, the many whom a provincial Synod's teaching would not deter from heresy, would be held back by an infallible guide. Hence, when that authority was exercised, "the cause was finished," according to Augustine, who participated in that Synod, and certainly knew its mind as well as any man in Africa. The Milevitan Synod also deemed it necessary to invoke the authority of the Pontiff, and precisely for the same end. But, it may be urged, the Milevitan fathers only desired from Innocent some Scripture testimony with which to confound the Pelagians. If the reader will again run over the words of these bishops, he will see that this interpretation is indeed strained. And again, the Milevitans already possessed the writings of Augustine and others, which were well stocked with Scripture arguments against the heretics. To these, the Pelagians would not yield; hence, the bishops invoked the authority of the Supreme Pontiff, which the Pelagians admitted to be proved by Scripture. In his letter to the Milevitans, Innocent throws light on this matter. He says that they know that "responses ever go from the Apostolic source to seekers from all the provinces especially when a question of faith is ventilated, all our fellow-bishops should have recourse only to Peter, that is, to the author of their name and honor, as your Lovingness has now done; that there may be profit to all the churches throughout the world. Wherefore we decree that Pelagius and Cælestius, the inventors of new words, be deprived, &c." St. Augustine himself in many instances plainly indicates the sense in which he said that "the cause is finished." Thus (1), "All doubt in this matter was removed by the letters of Pope Innocent of blessed memory." And he tells us that although Cælestius refused to condemn what Paulinus the Deacon declared he taught, he could not resist the letters of Innocent (1). When some wished another examination, he asked, "Why do you still demand an examination, when it has been given already by the Apostolic See?" (2)

(1) To Boniface, b. 2, c. 3.

A point is raised by Bossuet which claims our attention. Peeping into every nook and corner of history in the search for instances of Papal errability, he came across the conduct of Pope Zosimus in the affair of Cælestius, and jumped to the conclusion that this Pontiff had certainly approved of a heresy, since he designated as "Catholic" the book containing heresy which Cælestius presented to him (3). Now the bishop of Meaux admits that when Zosimus interrogated Cælestius as to the letters of his predecessor, Innocent, the heresiarch answered that "he would condemn whatever the Holy See condemned." But it is certain that Zosimus stamped Cælestius as heretical in saying that infants are born without original sin; he could not, therefore, have approved his book, inasmuch as it did not acknowledge the existence of that original sin. We must conclude, therefore, that when Zosimus applied the term "Catholic" to the book presented by Cælestius, he did so, not in reference to its contents, but because of the promise to correct whatever the Pontiff should reject. "The will to correct," says Augustine, "not any falsity of dogma, was approved." But even if we were to grant that in this matter Zosimus fell into error, the school of Bossuet could derive no comfort from the concession, since the letter of the Pontiff to the Africans contained no definition ex cathedra, nor indeed any definition whatever. St. Augustine covers the objection of Bossuet, as though he had anticipated it, when he says, "Since this (the error upon original sin) had been placed in his book by Cælestius among those about which he said he yet doubted, and wished to be instructed upon; the will to correct, not any falsity of dogma, was approved, in a man of the keenest intellect, which would have profited many, had it been corrected. Hence his book was called Catholic, because it is the part of a Catholic mind, when it deviates from the truth, not

(1) On Original Sin, c. 7.

(2) Against Julian, b. 2, n. 103.

(3) Defence of the Declaration, p. 2, b. 14, c. 36.

to define the thing as certain, but to reject it, if detected and shown to be false" (1). Had Pope Zosimus declared, as Cælestius in his book affirmed, that the sin of Adam did not descend to his posterity, different, indeed, would be the aspect of affairs. But, as Augustine triumphantly asks, "What epistle of Pope Zosimus, of venerable memory, what saying can you find, in which he taught that we should believe man to be born without original sin? Never did he say such a thing, never did he write it."

We cannot close this dissertation without alluding to some of the many writers whom Pelagianism was the means of exciting to the production of some of the most valuable monuments of theological lore. First comes St. Jerome, whose learning made Prosper style him "Teacher of the World." His works on Pelagianism are the epistles to the tribune Marcellinus and to Ctesiphon; three books of Dialogues; the four Prefaces to his Commentaries on Jeremiah. Orosius, an intimate friend of Jerome and Augustine, having been accused of saying that "not even with the aid of God, can man be free from sin," wrote his Apology against Pelagius, on Free Will. But easily prince among all the Anti-Pelagians is the great St. Augustine, who, says Prosper, for twenty years and more combated the enemies of the grace of God. His first work in this material was the one dedicated to Marcellinus on The Remission of Sins, composed in the year 412. In the same year, he wrote his Grace of the New Testament to please his friend Honoratus, to whom he, in great measure, owed his conversion from Manicheism. This year also came forth the book on The Spirit and the Letter. In 413, Augustine preached his principal Sermon against the Pelagians in the chief basilica of Carthage. It is the fourteenth of the sermons on the Words of the Apostles. In 414, he produced a book on the Perfection of Justice, in which he teaches that man can avoid sin, when helped by the grace of God, and answers the objections of Cælestius taken from Scripture. In 415, was published the work on Nature and Grace, in answer to a book in which Pelagius defended the nature of man against God's grace. In 417, Augustine brought out a history of the

(1) To Boniface, b. 2, c. 3.

Deeds of Pelagius, and his epistle on the Presence of God. In 418, were issued the epistle to Optatus on the Origin of the Soul, and the first book on Nuptials and Concupiscence. Besides these, he produced a large number of epistles in defence and explanation of the Catholic doctrine on grace.

We must not omit to notice that large body of men who, like the Semiarians in reference to the Arians, without involving themselves in the condemnation of Pelagius, yet were sufficiently tainted with the poison to be called Semipelagians. They were thoroughly orthodox in their doctrine as to original sin and the necessity of the grace of Christ for its remission. Their fundamental error lay in denying the necessity of divine grace for the beginning of faith, or for those first movements of the will which prompt the striving for eternal salvation. Their leader was John Cassian, a monk of uncertain nationality, but who became quite celebrated for sanctity and erudition, and whose ascetic maxims are prized to this day. He was sent by St. Chrysostom to Pope St. Innocent I., when that saint found it necessary to appeal to Rome, and when he learned that his holy patron had died under his torments, he went to Marseilles, and there founded a monastery. He wrote many works, and Semipelagianism is visible in nearly all. Nevertheless, he died with a reputation for sanctity, and St. Gregory the Great congratulates a certain abbess in Marseilles upon the fact that her monastery is dedicated to St. Cassian (1). The doctrines of Cassian were embraced by most of the monks of Lerins, and the writings of their abbot Faust were directed especially against St. Augustine. That Vincent of Lerins and Hilary of Arles were Semipelagians, seems more than probable (2). Christian writers at this time, and for about a century, were in matters of grace, either Pelagian, Semipelagian, or Augustinian. But in the beginning of the sixth century, Semipelagianism was no longer tenable by a Catholic. Pope Gelasius condemned the books of Cassian, and Pope Hormisdas those of Faust, and in the year 529, the Synods of Valence and Orange condemned the Semipelagian doctrines, receiving in the following year the confirmation of Pope Boniface II.

(1) Book 6, epist. 12, to the Abbess Respecta.

(2) ALEXANDRE: 5th Cent., c. 3, art. 7, § 6 and 7.

CHAPTER XXV.

CONTROVERSY ON AFRICAN APPEALS TO ROME.

During the Pontificate of Pope Zosimus, there came to Rome an African priest named Apiarius, who had been excommunicated by his ordinary, Urban, bishop of Sicca. Appealing to the Pontiff, although the bishops of Africa at that time contended that African custom did not allow a simple priest to do so, he found that his appeal was not rejected. However, with the proverbial prudence of the Roman See, Pope Zosimus acted in such a manner as not to unnecessarily irritate the susceptibilities of the African prelates, while, at the same time, he did not forget the inalienable prerogatives of the Holy See, or the rights of her humblest child. He thought it best to proceed in accordance with a decree which, in the year 418, had been issued by a Carthaginian synod, and which allowed the "inferior clergy," who might feel themselves unjustly treated by their own ordinaries, to be judged by a Synod of the provincial bishops. He therefore sent to Africa three legates, Faustin, bishop of Potenza, and Philip and Asellus, priests of Holy Roman Church, who were instructed to investigate the case of Apiarius in a Synod composed of the bishops of his province. This legation ought not to have nettled the African prelates, but lest it might, the Pontiff instructed his legates to call their attention to certain ecclesiastical canons which recognized the right of Rome to receive appeals. The cited canons were those of Sardica, of which we have spoken in chapter 19, but, unluckily, as it proved, for the expediting of the affair in hand, Zosimus spoke of them as canons of the Council of Nice. In doing this, he only followed the custom of the Roman Church, which preserved the canons of Sardica in the same codex and under the same title as those of Nice (1). When the legates

(1) When treating of the Council of Sardica, we remarked that it was generally regarded as a kind of appendix to that of Nice. Many of the Popes cited the canons of Sardica arrived in Africa, Aurelius of Carthage convoked a Synod, and quite a dispute arose as to the canons cited by Zosimus. They were not found in the African codices of Nice, and as for the Council of Sardica, the bishops seem to have had no remembrance of any such assemblage, save the infamous conciliabulum of Philippopolis, to which the schismatics had fastened the date of Sardica (2). Such a difference could scarcely be expected to vanish immediately, hence it was resolved to call a plenary Council; but, so great was the respect of the Synod for the Pontifical wishes, it was resolved that, in the meantime, the canons quoted by Zosimus should be obeyed. On May 28 of the year 419, the case of Apiarius, and the accompanying question of appeals, were considered by 217 bishops in the presence of the Papal legates. We learn from the Synodical Epistle, addressed to Pope Boniface I., the successor of Zosimus, that it was decided to restore Apiarius to communion, but, as a measure of prudence, he was given "letters dimissory," and he settled down in the diocese of Tabraca. As for the canons cited by Pope Zosimus, the Synod repeated what had been already reported to Rome, namely, that those canons were not to be found in the Nicene codices in use among the Africans. The fathers therefore suggested that Pope Boniface should inquire as to their genuineness, in Alexandria, Antioch, and Constantinople, where the most authentic codices of Nice as those of Nice. Thus, Innocent I., while quoting them to the Constantinopolitans, says that "only the canons of Nice" are to be observed. Even St. Leo the Great spoke in a similar manner. Mark Anthony de Dominis, the apostate archbishop of Spalato (d. 1634), accuses Pope Zosimus of deliberate forgery and imposture in this matter. When Hosius of Cordova, the papal legate, returned from the Council of Sardica, he brought its canons with him, just as he had brought those of Nice from that Synod. Both were preserved in the Roman archives under the one title of Nicene. And not only at Rome were the two collections united. To this day Gallic codices are extant, in which the two are quoted together. In the time of Justinian, some, at least, of the Eastern codices must have presented the same union; for, in his edict on the Orthodox Faith, that emperor, after distinctly styling the Council of Sardica oecumenical, numbers down to his time only four General Councils, thus showing that he regarded those of Nice and Sardica as one. The reason why the Synod of Sardica was looked upon as an appendix to that of Nice, was its having been called to establish what the latter had constituted, and not for the definition of any new dogma. Hosius was Papal legate to both Councils, and many of the Nicene fathers sat in the Council of Sardica; hence, just as the General Council under Eugenius IV. is called Florentine, although its first sessions were held at Ferrara, so these two Synods of Nice and Sardica, held by almost the same prelates and for the same object, were spoken of as one. St. Gregory of Tours (History of the Franks, b. 9) cites as canons of Nice, the canons of the Gangrensan provincial Synod, because it was held about that time, and under Hosius. Thus also, the Greeks commonly attribute the Trullan canons to the Sixth Council, because they regarded the Trullan Synod as an appendix to that Council.

(2) As for the ignorance of the Africans in regard to the true Council of Sardica, see St. Augustine's epistle 44 (or 163), which was written in the year 398, that is, twenty years before the Papal legates cited the "Nicene canons" to the prelates assembled in Carthage.

were likely to be found. Until answers should be received, however, the prelates of Africa, they promised, would observe the instructions of Pope Zosimus. The search among the Oriental exemplars of the Nicene records having been made, and no canons having been found such as Zosimus had quoted, the African bishops mentioned the fact to Pope Boniface ; but, in the meantime, they did not prevent appeals to Rome, as is seen in the case of Lawrence of Icosium which is mentioned by St. Augustine, in an epistle to Pope Cælestine. Things remained in statu quo until towards the end of the year 425, when the unfortunate Apiarius gave occasion for a renewal of the complaints against "transmarine" appeals. This miserable man had not profited by experience, and he so conducted himself in the diocese of Tabraca that he was again excommunicated. Again he had recourse to Rome, and he so well managed his case that Pope Cælestine, who then occupied the chair of Peter, sent him back to Africa, accompanied by the legate Faustin of Potenza, who was instructed to see that justice was done the apparently persecuted priest. When Faustin appeared in Carthage, he acted more like a patron than a judge towards Apiarius, and the bishops of Africa became more than ever averse to the idea of appeals from their decisions. But so far as Apiarius was concerned, the question was soon ended, for when Aurelius of Carthage had opened the new plenary Council summoned for a reconsideration of the case, the culprit unexpectedly avowed his crimes, and then, so far as history shows, disappeared from the scene. While yet influenced by the remembrance of the horrors of which Apiarius had confessed himself guilty, the Synod of Carthage addressed a letter to Pope Cælestine, in which they energetically complained of the inconveniences and even disorders entailed by "transmarine" appeals. We have now to look into the nature and meaning of this letter, that we may see whether the opponents of Papal authority can derive any comfort therefrom. But before we treat of the letter itself, we must examine another document which will throw light upon it, namely, the canon on appeals which, in the year 419, was issued by the 2nd Synod of Carthage which bishop Aurelius assembled for the consideration of this matter.

This canon had originally been edited in the Synod of 418, and it was in recognition of it that Pope Zosimus instructed his legates to consider the case of Apiarius in a provincial Synod. It reads as follows: "It was pleasing, that if priests, deacons, or other inferior clerics, complain of the decisions of their bishops in any case, they shall be heard by the neighboring bishops, with the consent of the ordinary, and the prelates assigned by him shall settle the case. But if they wish to appeal from this judgment, let them not have recourse to transmarine tribunals, but to the Primates of their provinces, or to a plenary Council, as has frequently been ordered in regard to bishops. And let no one within the province accord communion to him who appeals to a transmarine tribunal." The phrase of this canon, "as has frequently been ordered in regard to bishops," has been rejected as not authentic by Orsi and Alexandre (1). The brothers Ballerini and Zaccaria are willing to regard it as a part of the original canon, but it proves nothing against the right of Rome to receive episcopal appeals. Where are the decrees by which such appeals were "frequently" prohibited? Not one can be adduced. Again, we have a letter written by Pope Boniface to his legates, then in Africa, under date of the 26 April, 419 (2), from which we learn that they had informed the Pontiff that all trouble had vanished. Now it is very improbable that within two months the African bishops would have again become so troublesome as to prohibit episcopal appeals. Had the legates not possessed good reason for believing in their acquiescence, they would not have represented the state of affairs as calm and satisfactory. Finally, it is not at all likely that a Synod which promised, at least, a temporary obedience to the canons cited by Zosimus, would, at the same time, and in the presence of the Papal legates, deny a right which those canons conceded. What interpretation then is to be given to the canon in question? A reading, by no means forced, and the only one which would not be contradicted by the history of the time, is presented by the Ballerinis, Zaccaria, and Palma, which so recommends itself, that it is strange that any other should have ever occurred to any mind. The adversaries of the Papal authority understand the canon as saying "let them not have recourse to transmarine tribunals, as has been ordered in regard to bishops;" but the phrase "as has been ordered, &c." should be applied, in the most natural manner, to the immediately preceding one, "but to the Primates of their provinces, or to a plenary council." The sense of the canon would therefore be, that priests should not appeal to the Pontiff, unless they had previously had recourse to the Primate or to a Council, in the third instance, as had been arranged already in the case of appealing bishops. It must be observed that hitherto, in conformity with the Synod of Hippo of 393, African priests were allowed to appeal from the decision of their own ordinary to that of six neighboring bishops, as a tribunal of the second instance. But as the priests often appealed to Rome, in the third instance, the African prelates decided that for the inferior clergy, as well as for the superior, there should be a tribunal of the third instance in their own land, namely, that of the Primate or of a national Synod. Unless this is the correct reading of the Carthaginian canon, it is impossible to account for the appeals to Rome which we know to have been made, before its promulgation, by African bishops. When treating of the Donatists, we had occasion to quote the 162d epistle of St. Augustine, in which, speaking of Cæcilian of Carthage, whom the Donatists had excommunicated, he says, "He might well ignore the multitude of his conspiring enemies, when he saw that he was joined in communion with the Roman Church, in which always flourished the principality of the Apostolic chair, and with the other places whence the gospel came into Africa, where he was ready to plead his cause For it was not a question of priests, deacons, or of clergy of the lower order, but of colleagues, who could reserve their causes entire, for the judgment of the other colleagues, especially of the Apostolic Churches. . . . he saw remaining to himself an incorruptible examination of his cause by a transmarine church, free of private enmities, and independent of each party to the dispute." St. Augustine certainly was well informed as to the customs of the African churches. We have also the instance of Perreivius, threatened with deposition by his co-provincials, who appealed to Pope Boniface I. In his letter to his vicar, Rufus, whom he appointed to investigate the case, the Pontiff says, "We wish your Charity to carefully hear the case, calling together the aforesaid bishops, from whose persecution he (Perreivius) says he suffers. Then let them know that if anything has been done contrary to custom, it must be cancelled; and having examined the affair, let your Charity hasten to refer it all to us, that the judgment given by you may be confirmed by our sentence." The appeal of Anthony, bishop of Fussala, made to the same Pope Boniface (1), is also well authenticated.

(1) Alexandre gives the following reasons for rejecting the phrase: It is not to be found in the Milevitan canon, nor in the Collection of Cresconius. Again, no African Conciliary canon can be produced, which prohibits appeals of bishops to Rome. Also, the African bishops, when they wrote to Pope Celestine, offered every argument they could excogitate against appeals, but said nothing of any such canon. See 4th Cent., diss. 28, prop. 1.

(2) MANSI; Councils, vol. IV., col. 431. AMORT; Canon Law, vol. I.

We now return to the letter which the 3rd Synod of Carthage sent to Pope Cælestine after the confession of Apiarius. Febronius (2) says, "This new form of ecclesiastical judgment did not altogether please the Africans, and in their Synod of Carthage, held about the year 425, they wrote to Pope Cælestine, asking him not only not to receive the wicked appeals of priests and other clerics (which at that time were not rare), but even not to send any legates to investigate the cases of appealing bishops." Nevertheless, the African bishops did not contest the Pontifical right to receive appeals. They knew that the use of such appeals had been always known in Africa. In the letter sent by him to Pope Cælestine, with reference to Anthony of Fussala, St. Augustine says: "There are instances of some, who, on account of their crimes, through the judgment or confirmation of the Apostolic See, have not been deprived of the episcopal honor, nor yet have been entirely unpunished. Not to go in search of the remote ones, I shall only mention the more recent examples." If the African bishops, with a knowledge of this antiquity of the right of appeal, had thought to annul it, why simply beg the Pontiff to render a less facile countenance to every appellant? Why did they not protest against it as a usurpation? But they utter no word which can be construed as a denial of the Papal prerogative. They speak of the distance from the Eternal City, and hence the ease of deception; of many other inconveniences, too manifest in the case of Apiarius, and hence combat the expediency of appeals. If the Africans denied the right of appeal, why, when bitterly complaining of the patronizing attitude of Faustin towards Apiarius, did they not stamp his action as a usurpation? Let us hear their letter: "We entreat that hereafter you will not so readily admit to audience those who go from here to you, nor receive into communion those whom we have excommunicated . . . you should guard against too hastily restoring to communion those who have been rejected in their own province . . . do not be willing, at the instance of every petitioner, to send your clerics as executors of your sentences" (1). Though these words betray a very strong sentiment against the expediency of entertaining appeals, they certainly acknowledge the Pontifical right to receive them.

(1) LUPTON; Appeals, dissert. II., c. 21.

(2) Chap. 5, § 5.

The African church was certainly most hostile to appeals to Rome, and prohibited them to the inferior clergy, in the 2nd and 5th Carthaginian and in the Milevitan Synods. But it could not deny a right, which necessarily belongs to him who was commanded to feed the sheep of the Lord, and to confirm his brethren. After these canons were passed, the inferior clerics continued to appeal to the Pontiff, and were not repulsed. Thus, St. Gregory the Great (2) speaks of the recourse of the deacons Vincent and Felicissimus at one time, and of the deacons Constantius and Mustellus at another. The examples of appeals on the part of the inferior clergy of other regions are, however, much more frequent. The clerics of Constantinople, who were degraded by Nestorius, appealed to Pope Cælestine, and were restored. The same happened with Ætius the archdeacon, and the monk Eutyches, appealing to St. Leo. To this Pontiff also appealed many Alexandrian clerics, from the persecutions of Dioscorus. From Gaul also there came appeals to St. Leo. The priests Savinian and Leo had recourse to his tribunal after their degradation by Rusticus of Narbonne. Tuentius besought the protection of Pope Zosimus against the vexations of Proculus of Marseilles. The clerics of Arles appealed to Pelagius I. against Sapandus. In fine, the epistles of Zosimus, St. Leo, Pelagius I., and St. Gregory I., show that the inferior clergy frequently had recourse for justice to the Holy See, sometimes even in the first instance (1). We would here notice a remark of the famous Abp. De Marca, to the effect that Pope Zosimus claimed the right of receiving episcopal appeals, only because the emperors Arcadius and Honorius had resigned the right of issuing imperial rescripts for the revision of such cases. Let the reader note the following words of the Pontiff to the fathers of Carthage, and he will find that the right was claimed as derived from the canons, from tradition, and from Christ: "Although the tradition of the fathers has given such authority to the Apostolic See, that no one can dare to differ from its decision, and has preserved that authority by the canons and laws, and the current discipline shows by its rules the reverence it feels for the name of Peter, from which it itself comes down; for canonical antiquity, by unanimous consent, has held the power of this apostle to be so great, from the promise of Christ our God, that he can bind what is loosed and loose what is bound, the same power being given to him who holds the authority of the See Since, therefore, Peter is possessed of such authority, and the studies of our forefathers have established that by both human and divine law is strengthened the Roman Church, which, in the place of Peter, we rule with the power of his name, as you know, dear brethren, and as priests ought to know; when we possess such authority, that no one can reject our decisions, we wish to consider the case of him who has been accused among you, as your own letters say, and who, declaring himself innocent, has appealed to our See."

(1) Epist. Rom. Pont., vol. 1.

(2) Book I., epist. 82; Book II., epist. 33.

(1) RONCAGLIA; parag. I., in note to Alexandre's Diss. 28, 4th Cent.

We have hitherto allowed it to be taken for granted that the Council of Carthage prohibited, in some way or another, or unless made under some certain conditions, appeals to the Roman See. But the canon adduced by our adversaries by no means compels us to this admission. When the African prelates forbade recourse to transmarine tribunals, it is not certain that they intended to include appeals to Rome in the prohibition; indeed, the contrary is more than insinuated in the same canon as cited by Gratian, causa II., quest. VI., for, immediately after the excommunicatory clause, we there read the exception: "Unless he appealed to the Roman See." That is, Gratian expressly mentions that exception which, in all canons of this nature, Innocent I. declares to be understood. This Pontiff, alluding to the canons of Sardica (which he calls Nicene), says "It is permitted to no one—without prejudice, however, of the Roman Church, which must be revered, in all causes—to leave the clergy who, by the Providence of God, govern the Church in the same province, and to recur to other provinces" (1). Unless this general rule of excepting the Roman See, in all such prohibitory canons, had been kept in mind by the African bishops, the legate Faustin would certainly have asserted the privileges of that See, as we know he was accustomed to do. The authors of this canon would scarcely have applied the common and indefinite adjective transmarine to that Church which they recognized as the mother of all. Nor did they complain of any violation of their canon, when Apiarius appealed to Rome the second time, and Faustin was sent to his assistance. That they would have complained, had their intentions been disregarded or contemned, is to be supposed, when we consider the bitterness which, throughout the controversy, they otherwise manifested. Even when the confession of his crimes, on the part of Apiarius, had demonstrated how justly they had condemned him, they did not dare ask the Pontiff not to receive any more appeals. They merely besought that such appeals should not be very easily entertained: "We earnestly entreat that you will not very easily listen to those who go hence; and that you will not accord communion to those who have been excommunicated by us." Aurelius of Carthage had a chief part in the formation and promulgation of the canon under consideration, and certainly he must be regarded as an excellent interpreter of its significance. Well, in his Synodical Letter, written to Pope Cælestine a few years later, he plainly acknowledges the right of the Pontiff to revise the causes of priests already judged in Africa.

(1) Epistle to Victricius.

It has been urged that, from its very infancy, the African church enjoyed the privilege of giving definitive judgment in the causes of her priests and deacons; that this privilege was not abolished before the time of St. Gregory the Great, into whose hands the Africans renounced it. Naturally then, it is objected, we must suppose that, in the formation of the Carthaginian canon, the African prelates designed to include the Roman See among the "transmarine" to whom appeal was to be illicit. That the African churches enjoyed the privilege alleged, is well proven by many testimonies, but, before a conclusion can be reached in the matter in question, we should understand the precise nature of the privilege. The Roman Pontiff, in his capacity of Patriarch of the West, had the power to relax the immediate dependence of the Western churches upon his patriarchal see; to remit, as occasion demanded, the right of receiving appeals which all the patriarchs possessed in regard to their subject provinces. But the Roman See must be considered from a point of view different from that from which we regard Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem; at Rome there is another chair besides the patriarchal throne, viz., the chair of the Supreme Pontiff of the Universal Church. To abrogate the essential rights of this chair of Peter, is not within the power, even of Peter's successor (1).

Before closing this chapter, we would draw the reader's attention to the valuable essay of Mark Anthony Cappello, which is one of the best ever written upon this subject.

(1) Our adversaries admit that this African custom was a privilege. A privilege does not destroy the right of him who accords it, but rather, by its very exercise, demonstrates the superiority of the giver. As Cappello well observes, this African privilege may be compared to the honor accorded by the Roman emperors to the Prefects of the Pretorium, "from whose decisions no one could ever appeal;" which honor, however, did not render the Prefect independent of the imperial authority.

This Franciscan controversialist, incited by the carpings of the apostate De Dominis, who had exchanged his archiepiscopal see of Spalato for the Anglican deanery of Windsor, and had issued a most bitter diatribe on the Holy See (1), published, in 1622, a "Dissertation on the Appeals of the African Church to the Roman See." In this, the first edition of his work, Cappello rejected as spurious the epistles of Pope Zosimus to the African bishops, in which the Pontiff is disposed to be lenient towards Pelagius and Cælestius, on account of their simulated docility. He also denied the authenticity of the Synodal Letters of the 6th Carthaginian Synod to Popes Boniface and Cælestine, and threw doubt over the entire history of Apiarius. Nor was Cappello entirely alone in this view of the subject. The illustrious cardinal Du Perron, who wrote about the same time (2), thought that the true meaning of the letters to Boniface and Cælestine could not be reached, unless through the Greek version; that the Collection of Canons, attributed to the Carthaginian Synod, was the rhapsody of some private individual. Even the erudite and critical Christian Lupus said of Cappello's opinion, that though he "would not dare follow it, yet it is not without foundation, nor are the arguments of the learned author frivolous" (3). But the theory of Cappello was soon found to be untenable, owing to the authority of the Hermian Facundus, first published, in 1629, by Sirmond; and by that of the Commonitory of Mercator, edited first by Labbe, in 1671. Cappello himself, in the last years of his life, met the Vatican apograph, which Sirmond afterwards gave to the light, and was led to reconsider his views. Accordingly, after much investigation, especially in the works of St. Augustine, Cappello prepared a new edition of his work, in which he accepted as genuine both the canons of Carthage and the epistles of Zosimus and the African fathers. The volume, however, did not see the light until the year 1722, when it was published by order of Pope Clement XI., into whose hands, when a youth, the MSS. had been given. Modern critics have approved of many of Cappello's judgments in matters of their special province. In Chap. II. of the dissertation now before us, he proves, against the author of the common Collection of Canons, and against Baronio, that the canon on African appeals was not a canon of Milevi, but of Carthage; and this opinion has been followed by Noris, Pagi, and Tillemont. "The proceedings," he says (1), "of the ancient Council of Africa have come down to us enshrouded in such darkness, that they cannot be restored to their native integrity without immense labor; and unless they are restored it is impossible to form a correct judgment as to the things done in that church. Take, as an example, the canon on appeals to 'transmarine' sees, which had for its author, one or another Council, as I shall show; but which has been attributed to four, i. e., to two of Milevi and to two of Carthage. If it was enacted in either one of the Milevitan Synods, then the Roman Pontiff was either unwilling, or ignorant of its issue. But if it was passed in either one of the Carthaginian Councils, not so; for whatever was done therein, was done with the approval, and by order of, the Roman Pontiff. Since, therefore, the very essence of this difficulty depends upon a knowledge of the authorship of the canon, we must investigate the matter as diligently and as accurately as possible." Cappello then proves that the canon on "transmarine" appeals was not edited by either of the Synods of Milevi which were held during the reign of Pope Innocent I. (there were only two); not by the first, for no such canon is found ascribed to it in the Codex of African Canons; not by the second, because that Synod was merely provincial, and only a national and plenary Council could issue a decree like the "transmarine" canon, which affected the whole African church. It was issued, therefore, by a Council of Carthage, and as we know it first saw the light in the 12th Consulate of Honorius and the 8th of Theodosius, it follows that it was enacted by the plenary Council held in 418, and repeated in the following year in the sixth, also plenary, Synod. But since both these Synods were held under the auspices and express approbation of Rome, it follows that none of their canons could have been intended to curtail the Roman authority. Therefore the famous "transmarine" canon was directed, not against appeals to the mother See, but against recourse to the arbitration of other "transmarine" churches, e. g., of Milan, or of Arles, to which sees African disputes were frequently referred (1).

(1) The Ecclesiastical Republic.

(2) Reply to the Response of the King of Great Britain.

(3) Roman Appeals, diss. 2, c. 30.

(1) Appeals of the African Church, c. II., n. I.

CHAPTER XXVI.

NESTORIANISM, AND THE COUNCIL OF EPHESUS.

Nestorius, by birth a Syrian, at first a monk, and then a priest of the church of Antioch, was appointed by Theodosius to the see of Constantinople in the year 427. He had scarcely received the episcopal consecration, when his true character commenced to reveal itself. Animated, says Socrates, by a tempestuous audacity, and by an ardent desire of fame, rather than by a true zeal for the faith, he made this eruption in his oration to the emperor: "Give me the earth, O emperor, purged of heretics, and I will give heaven to thee. Aid me in the destruction of heretics, and I will aid thee in destroying the Persians." He commenced at once a most bitter war against almost every kind of error, as though, says Vincent of Lerins, he wished to prepare an open way for his own. With his own hands he once applied the torch to an Arian temple, and as a devastating fire ensued which for a while threatened the entire capital, the indignant populace began to style him a "fire-bug." We have said that he was bitter against almost every error, for he rather favored Pelagianism, as we gather from a letter of Pope Cælestine written in response to one of Nestorius interceding for the Pelagians of Constantinople.

(1) History furnishes several instances of arbitration in African causes by the churches of Milan and Arles. The reason for this action is as follows: In the Council of Sardica, at which Gratus of Carthage and thirty-five other African prelates were present, it was enacted, Can. XIV., that a condemned cleric "had the right of appeal to the bishop of the metropolis of the same province; and if there were no metropolitan, he could recur to a neighboring metropolitan, and request him to examine into the affair." Now in the African provinces there were no regular metropolitans, their office being filled by the senior bishops, no matter of what sees they were the prelates. Hence grew the custom of recurring to the metropolitan of Milan or of Arles.

But his own pet crop showed itself in the very first year of his episcopate. His primary errors were two. First, he contended that the Man formed in the womb of Mary was other than the Word of God ; that the Incarnation was simply a dwelling of the Word in man as in a temple, so that God was not born, and did not suffer and die ; that Christ therefore was not God, but only the Temple of God. His second error was in styling the Blessed Virgin, not Theotikos, "Mother of God," but Christotokos, "Mother of Christ." His earliest lieutenants were a bishop named Dorotheus and a priest called Anastasius, who opened the campaign by anathematizing all who designated Mary as Mother of God, Nestorius being at the time of the outburst seated on his episcopal throne. The congregation were horrified at the blasphemy, and a certain simple monk openly contradicted it, and attempted to put Anastasius out of the sacred building. But by order of Nestorius the zealous man was publicly flogged, and sent into exile (1). The greater part of the people now began to absent themselves from church, lest they should communicate with heretics. Many priests attempted in their sermons to check the spread of the contagion, but the threats of their bishop kept too many silent. In the meantime, the false shepherd was indefatigable in his preaching, and soon the faithful lamented that "an emperor we have, but no bishop" (2). Like many heresiarchs, Nestorius found a valuable ally in his nefarious work in his external appearance. The mortification of abstinence seemed to shine forth from his pallid features and his delicate frame ; grave thoughts had impressed a solemn seal upon his intellectual brow ; a certain modest sadness, which is not without a charm, especially for the fair, pervaded his gestures. His clothes bore the marks of long usage ; he certainly loved books, and he claimed to love solitude. With these advantages, and an eloquence greatly admired, his forte lay in preaching. But there were not wanting in the capital able defenders of the truth. A distinguished attorney named Eusebius (afterwards bishop of Dorylæum) challenged the prelate to a public dispute, and Proclus, newly consecrated as bishop of Cyzicus, delivered an admirable panegyric on the Mother of God before an immense audience of all classes of society. To this latter Nestorius responded immediately by an extemporaneous oration, and afterwards in three set sermons. Before long he published his treatise on the Incarnation, and several Homilies, which he took care to send as feelers into Egypt. It was owing to this importation among his people that St. Cyril of Alexandria wrote his Epistle to Monks, which work so excited the angry fears of the heretic that he laid before Theodosius an accusation of treason against the saint (1). The two prelates now interchanged letters; Cyril breathing the spirit of charity towards his adversary and that of chivalrous devotion towards Mary, and Nestorius lamenting the "intemperance and injustice" of the Alexandrian prelate. A further correspondence soon ensued, in which Nestorius plainly betrayed his arrogance and vanity, while he in the clearest terms announced his heresy. While these letters were passing between Constantinople and Alexandria, Nestorius wrote twice to Pope Cælestine. St. Cyril also addressed the Pontiff concerning the new doctrine, because, he says, "the ancient custom of the churches requires that such things be communicated to your Holiness." He then proceeds as follows: "We would not openly break our communion with him, before we had informed you of these things. Deign, therefore, to tell us what you think, that it may be clear to us whether we ought to communicate with him, or rather freely announce to him that no one can communicate with him who favors and teaches this erroneous doctrine. Further, the mind of your Integrity upon this matter ought to be made clearly known by letter to the devout bishops of Macedonia, and to all the bishops of the East. . . . that with one soul we may all persist in one doctrine, and give help to the true faith which is now attacked." Among other writings which St. Cyril produced about this period was a letter to Acacius of Beroë, to which he received a reply full of praise for his zeal, but full, also, of excuses for Nestorius, as for one guilty only of a slip of the tongue.

(1) See the Supplication to the Emperor of the monks of Constantinople, extant in the Acts of the Council of Ephesus, p. 1, c. 30.

(2) Ibi.

(1) CYRIL; Apology to Theodosius.

When Pope Cælestine had read the letters of Cyril and of Nestorius, he held a Synod of such bishops as were then in the Eternal City, in August, 430. Sentence of excommunication and deposition was pronounced against Nestorius unless within ten days from notification he renounced his errors, in an open and written confession. All whom Nestorius had wickedly deprived of communion were restored to it ; the Pelagians, whom he had restored, were recondemned. Seven epistles were sent by the Pontiff. One was to Cyril of Alexandria, that he would represent the Holy See in the cause of Nestorius, and in providing for the see of Constantinople. Another was to Nestorius, urging him to return to his right mind. A third was directed to the Constantinopolitan clergy, encouraging them to persevere in the faith. The others were to John of Antioch, Rufus of Thessalonica, Juvenal of Jerusalem, and Flavian of Philippi, begging them, as bishops of the next greatest sees of the Orient, to labor energetically in the cause of truth. In the month of November, St. Cyril proceeded to carry out the orders of the Holy See. All the bishops of Egypt were assembled in a Synod at Alexandria, and a Synodical Epistle sent to Nestorius by the hands of four legates. In this letter, the heresiarch is officially informed of the sentence pronounced by the Pope against him ; he is notified that the Synod communicates with all those whom he has excommunicated for their fidelity ; he is ordered to publicly, and in writing, reject his heresies : he is furnished with a Profession of Faith, and with twelve Anathematisms, written by Cyril, to which he is required to subscribe. But Nestorius was far, indeed, on the road to perdition. Instead of obeying, he at once issued twelve counter Anathematisms, each one a blasphemous contradiction to a corresponding one of Cyril. He declared the Alexandrian Anathematisms infested with Apollinarianism. He at once, after the usual style of heresiarchs, proceeded to secure the help of the government, filling the ears of Theodosius with calumnies as to Cyril's fidelity to Pulcheria (1), and alleging that when Cyril had dedicated his book on The Right Faith to the emperor, he dedicated a similar one to his imperial sister, for the purpose of securing her aid against Theodosius, should he prove averse to him. In the meantime, letters were sent to the greater sees throughout the world, giving notice of an Œcumenical Council, to be held at Ephesus on the Pentecost day of the year 431. When the eventful day arrived, there came to Ephesus, on the part of the emperor, a certain courtier, Count Candidian by name, with orders to expel from the city all the monks and foreign seculars, lest they should interfere with the liberty of the bishops. He was instructed also to allow no bishop to leave before the end of the Synod, but was prohibited from intruding in any way upon the proper business of the Council. Nestorius arrived, accompanied by twelve of his episcopal partisans. Marius Mercator puts the number of attending bishops at 274, but the best authorities fix it at 218. In the beginning of the Council, Cyril of Alexandria presided in the name of Pope Cælestine; the other legates, the bishops Arcadius and Projectus, and the priest Philip, being delayed on their journey until the second Action, on the 10th of July.

Although fixed for the day of Pentecost, the fathers waited sixteen days for the coming of John of Antioch, but finally they opened their sessions in St. Mary's church on the 22nd of June. In the first Action, were read the Nicene Creed, the 2d epistle of Cyril to Nestorius, the epistle of Pope Cælestine to the same, and the Synodical Letter of Alexandria. Also was read, and declared heretical, the epistle of Nestorius to Cyril commencing, "The contumelies of your wonderful letters, &c." The testimony of the legates whom Cyril had sent to Nestorius was then taken, to the effect that he had not complied with the demands of the Pope. Theodotus of Ancyra, and Acacius of Melitus, also swore to having heard blasphemies from the mouth of Nestorius. Many extracts from various writings of the heresiarch were also presented to the Council, all manifestly heretical. Then the Synod pronounced the sentence of excommunication and deposition against Nestorius, "compelled by the sacred canons, and by the Epistle of the Most Holy Father and Co-minister, Cælestine, Bishop of the Roman Church." This sentence was inscribed "To Nestorius, the New Judas," and was sent to him. Theodosius, deceived by Count Candidian, who intercepted the Synodical Relation to the Emperor, now sent a rescript to the Council, declaring the proceedings defective (1), but the Council seems to have paid it no attention. In the second Action, the legates Arcadius, Projectus, and Philip, having arrived, the letter of Pope Cælestine to the Synod was read, the fathers acclaiming Cælestine as "the new Paul," the "Guardian of the Faith," &c. The legates then demanded that they should be informed of what had been already done, but this was postponed until the next session. In the third Action, the proceedings already held in the cause of Nestorius were read, and approved of by the Papal legates. A Relation was then sent to the emperor, informing him that the Pontifical legates had confirmed the deposition of the heresiarch, and requesting permission for the Synodals to leave Ephesus. In the fourth Action, as St. Cyril and Memnon presented a complaint against John of Antioch and his conciliabulars, for their pretended deposition of the complainants, the Council sent three bishops to John's residence to cite him before it. The summoners returned, reporting that they had been disrespectfully repelled by the guards, whereupon the fathers decreed John's action against Cyril and Memnon null and void. In the fifth Action, Cyril demanded that the bishop of Antioch should be forced to prove all his charges against the Alexandrian prelate, or be punished for calumny. Then John was again thrice cited to appear, and as he persisted in his obstinacy, sentence of excommunication was pronounced against him and his followers (2). In the sixth Action, the fathers

(1) During the minority of Theodosius II., the empire was governed by his elder sister, Pulcheria, a woman of heroic virtue, and now honored by the Church as a saint. Throughout his reign, she had great influence over him for his own and the people's good, but he often chafed under what his eunuchs, whom he too often consulted, termed a yoke.

(1) John of Antioch had already, immediately upon his arrival at Ephesus, before proceeding to the Council, surrounded himself with 43 bishops at his residence, and caused them to sign a decree of deposition against St. Cyril and against Memnon of Ephesus, as guilty, the first of Apollinarism, the second of usurpation. He also threatened the other fathers with excommunication, unless, by a certain day, they joined his "Synod." He then sent a Relation of his proceedings to Theodosius, and remained at the head of his partisans.

(2) Liberatus, speaking of this condemnation of John of Antioch, says: "Therefore, Cyril condemned the wicked Symbol of Theodore of Mopsueste, of whom we shall hear more when treating of the Controversy of the Three Chapters. The remaining Actions were devoted to cases of discipline respecting particular dioceses.

The office of "protector of the Church," of "external bishop," of "executor of the canons," &c., which the Roman Christian emperors, with the willing consent of the Popes, exercised in the early ages, was sometimes productive of serious evil. These sovereigns did not always observe, if indeed they always knew, the line of demarcation which separates the province of a protector from that of a ruler. And not unfrequently, the ignorance of theology and of most ecclesiastical matters, which must, almost from the nature of things, be part and parcel of the equipments of a more or less military autocrat, rendered the emperor a facile tool in the hands of ambitious churchmen and of theologistic courtiers. Theodosius the Younger was styled by the authors of his day "a most religious man," and yet he was sometimes led to exceed his authority, and to cause much trouble to the Church, though he wished to protect her. While his imperial mind was yet perplexed by the contrary Relations of the Ephesine Council and of the conciliabulars of John of Antioch, the fathers of the Synod thought best to send him ambassadors who would explain to him the true state of affairs. But three days before these arrived at Constantinople, the Count Irenaeus, a friend of Nestorius and of John, had come from Ephesus, and when they presented themselves to Theodosius, they found his mind preoccupied with prejudice against their cause. He allowed the two parties to dispute the case of John in a public audience, but the result was that he ordered his almoner, Count John, to return to Ephesus, to regard Cyril, Memnon, and Nestorius, as all three deposed, and to settle matters peacefully. Count John's first act was to arrest the three bishops, giving Cyril and Memnon to the care of one officer, and Nestorius to that of another. Horrified at this action, the and Memnon, wishing to be revenged, condemned John and all who agreed with him, and with similar arrogance, visited both with many evils at Ephesus." Brev., c. 6. But this author was a stern defender of the "Three Chapters," and, therefore, naturally hostile to the memory of St. Cyril.

fathers chose a faithful messenger, and to elude the vigilance of the partisans of Nestorius, they enclosed their new letter to the emperor in the hollow of a reed. In this epistle they firmly refused to communicate with John of Antioch and his brethren before these assented to the condemnation of Nestorius; they begged for the liberation of Cyril and Memnon, and asked the sovereign to receive and patiently listen to a new embassy they would send. In the reed they also enclosed a letter to all the bishops then in the capital, and to its clergy. The consequence was that Theodosius was so beset with supplications, that he decided to receive a delegation of seven from each side. He met the legates at Chalcedon, and having heard their respective arguments as to the validity of the Acts of Ephesus, the hopes of the Antiochians were crushed. On the 25th Oct., of the same year, 451, Maximian, a man of pure faith and confirmed piety, was consecrated bishop of Constantinople (1).

As for the convocation of the Council of Ephesus, Roncaglia, who labored strenuously to neutralize the Gallicanisms of the great work of Alexandre, feels compelled to admit that "it is difficult to prove, from the monuments of ecclesiastical history, that the Ephesine Synod assembled at the orders of Pope Cælestine. But there is no doubt that the Council is called legitimate, not because it was convoked by the emperor, but because at least the after-consent of the Roman Pontiff was accorded, since the right of calling General Councils belongs only to him who rules the whole Church, as Alexandre himself well shows in his dissertation on the convocation of the Council of Nice." The remarks which we made, when speaking of the convocation of the Nicene Synod, and which we shall have occasion to repeat when treating of that of the Council of Chalcedon, may also apply to the indiction of the Ephesine Synod. There is no doubt as to the presidency of this Council, for the Acts plainly show that until the arrival of the other legates of Rome, St. Cyril presided by virtue of his appointment by the Pontiff to hold his place in all matters relating to Nestorius ; they also show that after the advent of Arcadius, Projectus, and Philip, all presided in unison.

(1) In the following year, John of Antioch signed a Confession of Faith drawn up by St. Cyril. Nestorius died in exile, in an oasis of Libya, about the year 440.

The authors of the Gallican, Aulic, and Protestant schools contend that in the Council of Ephesus, it was the action of the fathers that impressed upon the mind of the Catholic world the fact that the doctrine of Nestorius was heretical, and not the action of the Roman Pontiff. They hold that the reformability of a Papal decree by a General Council is shown in this instance, for, they say, the fathers of Ephesus examined the letters of Pope Cælestine to Cyril before they assented to them. We answer that the bishops certainly did order the letters to be read ; the documents were issued to be acted upon, and therefore they had to be examined. But, as we shall have occasion again to say, when treating of other Councils, a judicial and critical examination is one thing, and an examination for information is another ; the reading of the Pontifical letters at Ephesus belonged to the latter, not to the former category. If we read attentively the letters of Cælestine and Cyril, and the Acts of the Council, we must conclude that the Pontiff regarded the cause of Nestorius as finished before the Synod met ; that so it was looked upon by Cyril and the fathers. Then of what use was the Council ? Why so much trouble, expense, and danger ? Not, certainly, for a definitive judgment of the cause, but in order that, by a manifestation of the will of the entire episcopate, the audacity of heresy might be the more easily checked, and error more readily refuted. Again, a Pontifical definition is made to be received, and to be received solemnly, and submissively, and officially ; there is no way of doing this so appropriate and effective as that furnished by a General Council.

Nothing can be more certain than that Pope Cælestine did not hand over the cause of Nestorius to the will of the Council ; he simply ordered that it should do what was necessary to carry into effect the decision he had already given at Rome. In his instructions to his legates, he said, "You will in all things consult our brother, the bishop Cyril (already made Papal legate), and you will perform whatever you see to be in his power to decide ; and we command that the authority of the Holy See be respected. For the instructions, which you have received, tell you that you must be present at the Council ; if they come to a disputation, you must judge among their opinions, and not undergo a struggle." These words, which are as literally those of Cælestine as merely decent translation will permit, certainly show that he regarded his decision as definitive. In his epistle to the Ephesine prelates, he says : " On account of our solicitude, we have sent to you our brother priests, the bishops Arcadius and Projectus, and the priest Philip, who are of one mind with ourselves, who will be present at all that is done, and who will execute what we have established." This epistle was brought to the Council by the legates themselves, and as they did not arrive until after the condemnation of Nestorius, the fathers had acted before they read it. Nevertheless, in pronouncing sentence in the first Action, the bishops said, " Compelled by the holy canons, and by the epistle of our Most Holy Father and co-minister Cælestine, bishop of the Roman Church, and covered with tears, we necessarily come to the sorrowful sentence against Nestorius." The epistle here mentioned must have been the one sent to St. Cyril long before the Council ; hence, we conclude that the Synod thought the decree of Cælestine definitive. Again, in the second Action, Firmus, bishop of the Cappadocian Cæsarea, said to the Apostolic legates, " The Holy Apostolic See, through the letters of Cælestine sent to the most religious bishops, Cyril of Alexandria, Juvenal of Jerusalem, &c., before the present business, prescribed the sentence and the rule which we have followed. since Nestorius has not appeared when cited by us, we have put into execution that form, pronouncing against him the canonical and apostolic judgment." And if we consider the conduct of the Papal legates in the second Action, our position is still more secure. They presented the following demand : " We request that you order to be made known to us that which has been done in this Holy Synod before our coming, in order that in accordance with the decree of our Blessed Pope, and with that of this present holy company, we also may confirm it that following the formula of the Most Holy Pope Cælestine, who has committed this task unto us, we may confirm the judgments of your holiness." Here the legates declare that the decree of the Council must be confirmed by them ; is not that a clear assertion of the Papal superiority ? And the fathers acquiesced.

In the first Action, the Ephesine fathers speak of Nestorius as "most reverend" and "most religious," but this does not prove that they disregarded the decree of Cælestine. As yet Nestorius had not been condemned, when these terms were used ; up to the very moment of his sentence, he enjoyed a strict right to receive the terms of courtesy and respect due to his elevated position as bishop of Constantinople. Nor can it be urged that the Pontiff had decreed his deposition if he did not recant within ten days from his receipt of the decree ; that therefore the use of such respectful terms towards him implies an ignoring of the Papal sentence. For we know from the last letter of the Pope to St. Cyril, that a further delay of time had been mercifully accorded. This letter was read in the second Action, and contains the following passage : "Thou askest whether the Holy Synod ought to receive a man who condemns what it teaches, and whether the sentence yet holds good, now that the time of delay has elapsed. Upon this matter, let us together consult our common Lord. Does He not instantly answer by the prophet, that he does not wish the death of the dying, and by the apostle Paul, that he wishes every man to be saved, and to come to the knowledge of truth ? I study Catholic peace ; I study the salvation of the perishing one, if he is willing to avow his malady If he is to perish, let him see that you are not quick to shed blood, when he knows that a remedy is extended to him."

Having briefly sketched the course and significance of the Council of Ephesus, we will in a few words indicate the fortunes of Nestorianism after the definitive condemnation of its leader. We refer the reader who desires a fuller account than our limits permit us to give, to the valuable Dictionary of Bergier. Proscribed by the Roman emperors, the Nestorians sought the protection of the Persian monarchs, and the enmity of the two states proved favorable to them. They founded celebrated schools at Edessa, and established the patriarchate of Seleucia. When Mohammedanism overran the Eastern countries, the conquerors proved quite lenient towards the Nestorians, then called "Oriental Christians," and even under that savage regime they preserved enough vitality to send their missionaries into China, establishing missions which lasted until the thirteenth century. At this day, Nestorianism is professed by the schismatic portion of the Chaldean Christians, and, according to Mosheim, it is to their immortal honor that they are the only Eastern Christians who have avoided the superstitions of the Greek and Latin churches. When Mosheim made this assertion, he knew that the modern Nestorians agreed with the Mother Church in teaching seven sacraments, transubstantiation, the worship of saints, prayer for the dead. And as for what he calls their purity of doctrine, he knew that they teach that our souls are created before our bodies ; that they deny original sin ; that they teach that not until the last day do we receive our final award ; that they hold that hell is not eternal. It is worthy of note, since Protestants have such sympathy for all the Orientals who hold aloof from Rome, that in their liturgy the Nestorians persist in the use of a "dead language" ; they never use the vernacular, but always the ancient Syriac, following the custom of all the other schismatic churches of the East, not one of which has its liturgy in the language of its people. Nor should we omit to note that these Nestorian Christians regard as canonical precisely the same books of Scripture which Rome presents to her children, and if our Protestant friends would reflect a little upon this fact, they would not be so confident that their canon of Scripture is correct (1). There have been several tentatives of reconciliation with Rome on the part of the Nestorians. Thus, in the year 1304, their patriarch Iaballaha sent a profession of ortho-doxy to Pope Benedict XI. ; in the pontificate of Pius IV., the patriarch Sulaka did the same ; the latter's successor, Ehedjesus, came to Rome and made his abjuration, received from the Supreme Pontiff the pallium, and returning home, made many converts. In the year 1771, Dominican missionaries received into the fold the Nestorian patriarch, then resident at Mozul, and five of his suffragan bishops. From that time to the present, there has been a flourishing Chaldean church in communion with Rome, and governed by its own patriarch. And now for a few words upon those Nestorians who are known in history as the "Christians of St. Thomas." In the year 1500, the Portuguese, having doubled the Cape of Good Hope, and penetrated into India, were thunder-struck on coming upon a community of Christians on the coast of Malabar. These people called themselves "Christians of St. Thomas," and had for a pastor only a bishop who was sent to them by the Nestorian patriarch of Mozul. They declared that their ancestors had been converted by the Apostle, St. Thomas (1), but, according to Govea, the Augustinian historian of the mission which John of Albuquerque, archbishop of Goa, seconded by the Jesuits, established among them, they erred in many things besides the doctrine of the Incarnation. Their very errors, however, furnish good arguments to Catholic controversialists, for in them all can be traced an original belief in the doctrines of the Catholic Church. Some Protestant authors have endeavored to show, by means of these "Christians of St. Thomas," that primitive Christianity must have been more Protestant than Catholic. If Protestants hold the necessity of an episcopal hierarchy, if they believe in Transubstantiation and in confession, if they enforce the celibacy of their bishops, and devoutly observe the fasts of Lent, &c., then they may be of some kith and kin with these Nestorians. At present, the Malabar Christians number about three hundred thousand ; less than fifty thousand are Nestorians, and the rest are about equally divided between the Latin and Syriac rites of the Roman Church. Those of the latter rite have native priests.

(1) Another fact should be noted by the Protestant friends of these Asiatic schismatics. During the seven hundred years of the Nestorian missions in Tartary, they never presented their converts with a Tartar version of the Bible. This was done, however, by a Franciscan friar in the fourteenth century.

(1) Bergier shows, under the article ST. THOMAS, that their assertion has some fair arguments in its favor.

CHAPTER XXVII.

THE FAITH PREACHED BY ST. PATRICK.

“Is it not known to all that the things which have been delivered to the Roman Church by Peter, the Prince of the Apostles, and preserved ever since, should be observed by all; and that nothing is to be introduced, devoid of authority, or borrowed elsewhere? Especially as it is manifest that no one has founded churches for all Italy, the Gauls, Spain, Africa, and the interjacent islands, except such priests as were appointed by the venerable Peter and his successors?”

(1) From the earliest times, the Roman Pontiffs constantly carried out the commission of our Lord to feed His lambs, and all the Northern nations of Europe were converted by their missionaries. It is unknown when the name of Christ was first carried to Ireland, but during the Pontificate of Cælestine I. (422–432), the islanders were not numbered among Christian peoples. According to the Chronicle of St. Prosper, published about the year 434, “Palladius was ordained by Pope Cælestine, and sent as first bishop to the Irish (2) believing in Christ.” The Life of St. Patrick, in the Book of Armagh, written by Muirchu-Maccu-Maetheni before the year 700, records that “Palladius, archdeacon of Pope Cælestine, bishop of Rome, and 45th successor of St. Peter in the Apostolic See, was ordained and sent to convert this island, lying under wintry cold. But he was unsuccessful, for no one can receive anything from earth unless it be given to him from heaven; and neither did these fierce barbarians receive his doctrine readily, nor did he wish to remain long in a land not his own; wherefore, he returned to him who sent him. On his way, however, after passing

(1) Pope St. Innocent I.; Epistle to Decentius.

(2) The text has ad Scotos, but, as we had occasion to remark, when treating of the Paschal controversy, in the fifth century Ireland was the only land known by the name of Scotia. “Even in the time of Bede,” says Dr. Todd, “Scotia meant no country but Ireland, and Scoti no people but the inhabitants of Ireland.” See Todd’s St. Patrick, p. 232.

the first sea, having begun his land journey, he died in the territory of the Britains." The scholiast on St. Fiacc's Hymn (1), whose writings the best Celtic philologists refer to the 7th or 8th century, says, that landing in Wicklow, Palladius "founded some churches, Teach-na-Roman, or House of the Romans, Killfine, and others. Nevertheless, he was not well received by the people, but was forced to sail around the coast towards the north, until he was driven by a tempest to the land of the Picts, where he founded the church of Fordun; and there he is known by the name of Pledi" (2). But with the advent of St. Patrick, the light of Christianity shone upon Ireland. Probably born, certainly brought up, near Boulogne-sur-Mer (Bonaven Taberniae, say the Confessions), in France, Patrick was led a captive to Ireland, and sold as a slave to a chieftain named Milchu (3). When in his twenty-second year, he gained his liberty, and dedicated himself to God in the monastery of Marmontier, near Tours. After a few years, he went to the "blessed island" of Lerins, the founder of which holy retreat, St. Honoratus, was still living; among his companions at this monastery, were Sts. Hilary of Arles, Eucherius of Lyons, and Lupus of Troyes, together with the famous author, Vincent of Lerins. When, in 429, Sts. Germain of Auxerre and Lupus of Troyes were sent by Pope Cælestine to combat Pelagianism in Britain, Patrick accompanied them, thus receiving his first training for the apostolate under the guidance of the legate of the Holy See. St. Palladius was at this time destined for the Irish mission, and St. Germain thought that Patrick, from his knowledge of the language and customs of the people would be a valuable acquisition to the apostolic messenger,

(1) The learned Irish archaeologist, George Petrie, says that it is itself given in MSS. which cannot be later than the ninth. Essay on Tara, p. 71.

(2) COLGAN; Trias Thaum., p. 5. The reader will notice that Palladius did not reach the "land of the Picts" (modern Scotland), until after he had sailed around the island of the "Scots," and been driven thence by a tempest. We draw his attention to the conclusion, although there is no longer any doubt among the learned in such matters, that, before the eleventh century, the term Scotia was applied only to Ireland, the proper name of Scotland being Caledonia. The latter country changed its name to Scotland, only after its colonization by the Scots or Irish.

(3) The most ancient authority, St. Fiacc, mentions Nemthur as Patrick's birthplace, and the Three Lives identify Nemthur and the Campus Taberniae. Probus says that the Vicus Bannave Taburniae regionis was in Neutrid. On the other hand, the scholiast on St. Fiacc's Hymn, and the Tripartite Life say that Nemthur was the same as Alcluda; hence Usher asserted that Patrick was borne at Alclud in Scotland, now Dumbarton. The 4th Life seems to reconcile these conflicting statements, identifying Nemthur with Armorian Bonavem, and adding that it was in the district of Strato-clud, or Alclud. MORAN; Early Irish Church, p. 9.

“St. Patrick,” writes Probus “poured forth to God the following prayer: ‘O Lord Jesus Christ, lead me, I beseech Thee, to the seat of the Holy Roman Church, that, receiving authority there to preach with confidence Thy sacred truths, the Irish nation may, through my ministry, be gathered to the fold of Christ.’ And soon after, being about to proceed to Ireland, this man of God, Patrick, went, as he had wished, to Rome, the head of all churches, and having asked and received the Apostolic blessing, he returned by the same road by which he had gone thither” (1). Having secured the consent and blessing of Pope Cælestine for his future labors, Patrick journeyed back to Auxerre to see his patron, St. Germain; he then left for his mission, but, hearing, on the way, that St. Palladius had died, he paused to receive episcopal consecration at the hands of Amatorex (2). He finally set out for Ireland in the summer of 432, accompanied by Analius, Iserminus, and some others. It is not within our province to enter into the particulars of St. Patrick’s wonderful career. It is more or less familiar to every Catholic, and for such Protestants as have agiological tastes, there is access to many biographies of value. We propose, however, to treat of some questions concerning the great apostle, which have been mooted by certain Protestants of the Anglican and Presbyterian schools—questions which, though calculated merely to provoke a smile on the part of one ordinarily well versed in historical matters, yet have been seriously proposed, and, by many, willingly entertained. The subject matter of our investigations has engaged the pens of many erudite and zealous critics, but, to our mind, no writer has so well succeeded as Dr. Moran, in his learned work on the early Irish church (3). We can do no better than avail ourselves of his patient and discriminating research, and refer the reader, if he desires fuller information,

(1) Probus’ Life of St. Patrick, in Colgan’s Trias Thaum., p. 49.

(2) It is difficult to determine the identity of this prelate. Some of the old biographies call him Amator. Moran conjectures that he was St. Lupus of Troyes. The old Latin treatise on the Irish Liturgy says that, after Cælestine, Sts. Germain and Lupus had the chief part in sending St. Patrick to Ireland.

(3) Essays on the Origin, Doctrines, and Discipline of the Early Irish Church, by Rev. Dr. Moran, Vice Rector of the Irish College, and professor of Hebrew in the Propaganda Rome; now archbishop of Sydney.

to a really interesting and exhaustive treatise (1). The less complete, but yet instructive essay by Gaffney, entitled The Ancient Irish Church, may also be recommended to the student.

The first, and certainly the most amusing, question which is raised with regard to St. Patrick, is whether or not he belongs to the mythical region occupied by the British Arthur, the Popess Joan, and William Tell. The existence of our saint was denied for the first time by Ledwich (2) who based his assertion on the assumption that the great missionary was unknown to all who wrote previous to the ninth century. This foolish theory can soon be dismissed, for, says Moran, "All the Christian traditions of Ireland are clustered around the memory of St. Patrick. Her hills, and islands, and streamlets, and fountains re-echo his name. Every monument that traces the line of separation between Christianity and Paganism in Ireland, rests for its basis on his existence. And hence, even should we suppose the assumption of Dr. Ledwich, as regards the silence of her early records, to be true, yet it would not suffice to warrant the conclusion which he would fain deduce from it." But the would-be skeptic is wrong in his assertion that St. Patrick was known to no writer before the ninth century. In the eighth century, Ængus, in his Felire, marks the feast of St. Patrick (3). The Irish "Collection of Canons," preserved in MSS. of the same century, contains decrees enacted by him. The famous Stowe Missal, which Dr. Todd admits to be at least of that period, has St. Patrick's name in the Litany. Alcuin calls him the "glory of the Scottish race." In the seventh century, Adamnan speaks of a bishop who was "the disciple of holy bishop Patrick" (4). The Antiphonary of Bangor, composed before the year 691 (5), has a "Hymn of St. Patrick, Teacher of the Scots." St. Cummian Fota (d. 661), left a Hymn in honor of the

(1) The reader may also consult with profit Lanigan's Ecclesiastical History, the works issued by the Irish Archaeological Society, and O'Curry's MS. Materials of Irish History.

(2) Antiquities of Ireland.

(3) CURRY; Lectures, p. 368. PETRIE; Essay on Tara, p. 89.

(4) REEVES; Columba.

(5) LANIGAN; Eccles. Hist., v. 1, p. 59.

Apostles, the sixteenth strophe of which is devoted to St. Patrick. St. Cummian Albus, abbot of Iona, in his life of the founder, speaks, at the very beginning, of "St. Patrick, first apostle of Ireland." In an Irish poem by St. Cuimin of Connor, one verse is devoted to the fasting of "Patrick, of Ardmacha's city, the son of Calphurn." In the letter of the abbot of Durrow on the Paschal controversy, written in 634, one of the arguments for the use of the Roman computation is that it was used by "our father Patrick" (1). In the sixth century, St. Columba, the Irish apostle of Scotland, terminates his transcription of the Gospels, with a prayer to "the holy bishop Patrick" (2). Some of the Saint's deeds are commemorated in the Hymn of St. Fiace, even the Scholia to which Usher ascribes to the sixth century. St. Fiace refers to still earlier records regarding St. Patrick, and the Tripartite Life, supposed to be by St. Evin, gives customs and proverbs originating in the apostle's deeds and teaching. So much for the assertion that St. Patrick was unknown to all who wrote before the ninth century.

We now come to the nature of the doctrine preached by St. Patrick. A certain class of Protestants in Ireland noisily proclaim that the religion taught by our saint was not that at present held by the Irish masses; that, in fine, the doctrines now presented by the Anglican establishment were those inculcated by him, and that this institution itself is the self-same church founded by the apostle (3). In refutation of this theory, we shall now examine, firstly, into the senti-

(1) USHER; Sylloges Epp. cp. 11.

(2) WESTWOOD; Paleogr. Sac. O'CONOR; Writers, 1—182.

(3) The London Times, of May 20th, 1863, gives the following remarks of James Whiteside, M. P., in the House of Commons: "If I were asked to say why I maintain that branch of the church which exists in Ireland, my answer would be, plainly and directly, that I maintain it because I believe it upholds the ancient, pure, Catholic, faith which was professed in Ireland, centuries before the English set foot in that country. The ablest scholars, the best divines, the soundest antiquaries, are agreed upon that point; and no man has proved it more logically, or more conclusively, than Canon Wordsworth. In the series of discourses which he delivered in Westminster Abbey, for the purpose of establishing our claim to be the true descendants of the ancient Catholic Church in Ireland. That man is profoundly ignorant who attacks the ancient church in Ireland. The question between us and the Roman Catholics is, which of us most nearly conforms to that church? Few will venture to deny that the argument of the divine who compared the ancient creed with that which we repeat every Sabbath-day—who showed that the Nicene Creed agrees, in substance, with that established by St. Patrick—was conclusive; and, therefore, I maintain that the church in Ireland preserves the old, ancient, true, Catholic faith" (cheers). The cool impudence of this assumption is only equalled by the audacity that appeals to "the ablest scholars and antiquaries" for help in sustaining it. Was such the opinion of O'Donovan, by far the best Irish antiquarian of the age? Was O'Curry, the best historian of ancient Ireland, of this belief?

ments of the early Irish Christians in regard to the Roman See.

"As true," says Wilde, "as that the Irish people were governed by their own kings and princes, and were amenable to their own laws and Brehons only, up to the middle of the twelfth century, so true is it that the Irish Catholic church was independent of all foreign rule, in either temporal or spiritual matters, until the beginning of that period" (1). With regard to any temporal suzerainty of the Roman Pontiff over Ireland, either before or after the twelfth century, we have nothing to say. We propose to decide this question—Was the spiritual supremacy of the Pope of Rome acknowledged by the early Irish church? We shall prove that it was, firstly, because the Irish church was founded by the Church of Rome, and accepted her doctrines, one of which was the Papal supremacy; secondly, because that supremacy was expressly avowed by the early Irish ecclesiastical writers, and attested by the canonical enactments of the early Irish church; thirdly, because it was the custom of the early Irish church to appeal to the Holy See, and to be guided by its decisions. As to the foundation of the Irish church, Usher admits the Roman mission of Sts. Palladius and Patrick. "From the first legation of Palladius and Patricius, who were sent to plant the faith in this country, it cannot be shown out of any monument of antiquity, that the bishop of Rome ever sent any of his legates before Gillebertus," &c. (2). Nor could Usher avoid the admission, for Eric of Auxerre, a French monk of the ninth century, says of St. Patrick, that "as Germain saw him magnanimous in religion, eminent for virtue, strenuous in the sacred ministry, and thinking it unfit that so strong a husbandman should be listless in the cultivation of God's harvest, he sent him to holy Cælestine, the Pope of the city of Rome, accompanied by his own priest, Segetius, who might bear witness to his ecclesiastical probity at the Apostolic See. Being thus approved by its judgment, leaning on its authority, and strengthened by its blessing, he journeyed to Ireland, and being given to that people as its chosen apostle, he illustrated

(1) Boyne and Blackwater, p. 281. (2) Religion of Ancient Irish, c. VIII.

the whole nation at that time, indeed, by his preaching and miracles, as he continues to do at the present day, and will continue forever to illustrate it by the wonderful privileges of his apostolate." Mark the Anchorite wrote his History of the Britons in 822, and in it we find a short sketch of the life of our saint, which may justly be taken as deriving from the most authentic records (1). "Under divine guidance Patrick was instructed in the sacred Scriptures, and then he went to Rome and remained there a long time, studying, and being filled with the Holy Ghost, learning the holy Scriptures and the Sacred Mysteries. And whilst he was there applying himself to these pursuits, Palladius was sent by Pope Cælestine as first bishop to convert the Irish to Christ; but God, by some storms and signs, prevented his success; and no one can receive aught on earth, unless it be given to him from above. This Palladius, returning from Ireland to Britain, died there in the land of the Picts. The death of bishop Palladius being known, the patricians Theodosius and Valentinian being the Roman rulers, Patrick was sent by Pope Cælestine, the angel of God, Victor, accompanying, guiding, and assisting him, and by bishop German, to convert the Irish to the belief in the Holy Trinity." The ancient and most authentic of the Irish annalists also derive the mission of St. Patrick from the Holy See. Thus, the Four Masters write: "St. Patrick was ordained to the episcopacy by the holy Pope Cælestine, the first who commissioned him to come to Ireland and preach, and give to the Irish the precepts of faith and religion" (2). And the Annals of Innisfallen say that "Patrick came from Rome, bishop, into Ireland, and devoutly preached here the faith of Christ" (3). The Annals of Ulster begin: "In the year from the Incarnation of our Lord 431, Palladius was by Pope Cælestine ordained bishop of the Irish, Ætius and Valerian being consuls. He was the first that was sent to Ireland that they might be converted to Christ. . . . In the year 432, Patrick came to Ireland in the ninth year of Theodosius the Younger

(1) "History of the Britons by the Anchorite Mark;" from a Vatican MS. of the 10th century, and published in 1819, by W. Gun, London.

(2) Four Masters, by O'Donovan, y. 432.

(3) An interesting account of these Annals is given in Curry's Lectures, p. 75.

and first of the episcopacy of Sixtus. Sixtus was the forty-second bishop of Rome, as Bede, and Marcellin, and Isidore reckon in their chronicles In the year 439, Secundinus, Auxilius, and Iserninus, were sent as bishops into Ireland to assist St. Patrick." The great chronicle of Marianus Scotus, which the Anglican Reeves admits to be "the most elaborate historical production of the middle ages, and always enjoying the highest encomiums of the learned" (1), was composed in the eleventh century (2). It thus chronicles the mission of St. Patrick: "In the eighth year of Theodosius, Bassus and Antiochus being consuls, Palladius was ordained by Pope Cælestine, and sent as first bishop to the Irish believing in Christ. After him was sent St. Patrick, who, being a Briton by birth, was consecrated by Pope St. Cælestine, and sent to the archiepiscopate of Ireland. There, during sixty years, he confirmed his preaching by signs and miracles, and converted the whole island to the faith of Christ." St. Patrick himself refers to the See of Peter as the source of Ireland's Christianity (3). He thus exhorts his converts: "Thanks be to God, you have passed from the kingdom of Satan to the city of God; the church of the Irish is a church of Romans; as you are children of Christ, so be you children of Rome." The great Columbanus wrote to the Roman Pontiff, less than a hundred years from the death of St. Patrick, that "The Catholic faith is held unshaken by us as it was delivered to us by you, the successors of the holy Apostles" (4). The Leabhar Breac, described by the Protestant Petrie as "the oldest and best Irish MS. relating to Church history now preserved, or which perhaps the Irish ever, possessed" (5), and which is certainly the chief collection of religious compositions extant in Gaelic, gives the following attestation of the Roman commission of Palladius and Patrick: "The year that Patrick came to Ireland was the 433rd

(1) Translation of Wattenbach's Irish Monasteries in Germany, p. 13, note q.

(2) The proper name of Marianus Scotus was Maelbrigte (servant of Bridget). Born in Ulster in 1028, he became a monk in 1052, and four years later, entered the Irish monastery of St. Martin at Cologne. He removed to Mentz in 1069, and there worked out his great Chronicle. The autograph copy, with Marianus' signature, is preserved in the Vatican.

(3) Sayings of St. Patrick, in the Book of Armagh. This celebrated book was transcribed in 807, and was then believed to have been originally written by St. Patrick. This has been skilfully proved by the Protestant Graves. See Proceedings of the Royal Irish Academy, Nov. 30, 1846.

(4) Epistle to Boniface IV.

(5) Tara, p. 74.

from the Incarnation, in the 9th year of the reign of Theodosius, king of the world, and in the 1st year of the episcopacy of Sixtus, the successor of Peter, and in the 4th year of the reign of Leoghaire Mac Niall, at Tara, and in the 60th year of his own age. For sixty years he baptized and instructed the men of Erin, as Fiacc says, 'He preached, for three score years, the crucifixion of Christ to the tribes of the Feni.' And here is the character given by Heleran of Patrick, at the time when he brought an account of him to Clonard: 'Meek and great was the son of Calphurn, a vine-branch laden with fruit'. . . . Palladius was sent by Pope Cælestine with a gospel for Patrick to preach it to the Irish. This was the 401st year from the crucifixion of Christ (1). In the year after this, Patrick went to preach in Ireland, Ætius and Valerius being consuls. It was in this year that Sixtus assumed the supremacy of Rome after Cælestine, and it was the 4th of the reign of Leoghaire, son of Niall, at Tara." From all these authorities it is evident that the Irish church was founded by the Church of Rome, and was a daughter of that Church.

We now propose to show that the early Irish church turned to Rome with filial reverence, and acknowledged the divinely guaranteed authority of the Holy See. This is evinced, firstly, from the writings of early Irish ecclesiastics. In the old Irish monastery of Reichenau, the eminent antiquarian, Francis Mone, discovered, a few years ago, some valuable Irish MSS. of the 8th and 9th centuries, in which were contained two Hymns very pertinent to our thesis (2). In the first, St. Peter "holds the place of Christ, and feeds His sacred fold;" he is styled "the foundation of the Universal Christian Church;" he is pronounced "the legislator of the Most High;" and he is adorned with "the aureola of Rome, in which city he is destined to reign with an ever-enduring triumph." In the second, the Apostle is called the key-bearer of the heavenly kingdom, for all time; he is the pontiff of souls, the shepherd of all the fold of Christ. St. Cum-

(1) The Irish writers generally assign the crucifixion to the year 31 of the vulgar era. For reason of discrepancy, see Alexandre's Dissert. II., in 1st Cent.

(2) Latin Hymns of the Middle Ages; Freiburg, 1855.

mian Fota (1), born in 590, of whom the scholiast on the Feliré of Ængus says that, when he and other saints prayed to God for different graces, that of wisdom fell to Cumman, has the following passage, in a Hymn on the Apostles: "Rejoice, O New Jerusalem! Solemnize the gladsome festivals of Christ, and exult in the commemorations of the Apostles—of Peter the key-bearer, the first pastor, the mystic fisherman, who, with the Gospel-net, draws in the spiritual fish of Christ." The Penitential of this same St. Cumman Fota (the Tall) was the basis of many similar codes in the eighth, ninth, and tenth centuries (2). In this work, the saint shows how, in his time, contempt for Roman customs was punished. Having prescribed a fast of forty days for any pastor who, through ignorance, allows a heretic to say Mass in his church, and having extended the fast to a year, if the heresy is public, he adds: "But should he thus permit any individual to celebrate, through contempt for the Catholic Church, and for the customs of Rome, he himself shall be cast off as a heretic, unless he do penance, and his penance shall last for ten years." One of the most important monuments of the Irish church is the Missal of St. Columbanus (3), first published by Mabillon in 1724, and the MS. of which the learned Benedictine judged to be then "more than a thousand years old" (4). In the Mass assigned in this Missal to the feast of the Chair of St. Peter, the prince of the Apostles is said to hold "the keys of heaven, the dignity of the Pontifical chair; so great a power, that what he binds, none can loosen, and what he loosens, shall be loosed also in heaven; a throne of exalted dignity, where he will sit in judgment on all the nations of the earth." And the first Collect of the same Mass says, "Oh God! who on this day didst give to St. Peter, after Thyself, the headship of the whole Church, we humbly pray Thee, that as Thou didst constitute him pastor for the safety of the flock, and that Thy sheep might be preserved from error, so now Thou may-

(1) His contemporaries styled him the Gregory the Great of Ireland.

(2) In his Appendix III., Dr. Moran proves that this Penitential cannot be ascribed to any other author than St. Cumman the Tall.

(3) Brought from Bobbio to the Ambrosian Library by Cardinal Frederick Borromeo.

(4) Italian Museum, v. 1.

est save us through his intercession." "The monastery of Bangor," says Moran, "was the school of sanctity from which Columbanus went forth, towards the close of the sixth century, to renew the well-nigh spent civilization of Gaul, Germany, and Italy. The memory of few of the Irish saints has been better preserved on the continent than that of Columbanus, and of none do so many written memorials still remain. It is owing to this circumstance that we are able to enter more fully into an examination of his teaching concerning the prerogatives of the Holy See, than we have done in regard to the other ancient writers of the Irish church. Indeed, his letter to Pope Boniface is so replete with expressions of reverential devotedness to Rome, that it is difficult to refrain from quoting the whole of that noble document. Our saint had just settled in North Italy, and on every side was encompassed by those who warmly defended the well-known schism of the 'Three Chapters.' King Agilulf, at whose request St. Columbanus wrote this letter to the Pontiff, was himself the patron of the schismatics, and hence the holy man, fearing lest he might, perhaps, be betrayed into some error by the influence of those who surrounded him, at the very outset of his letter declares that whatever 'he shall say useful or orthodox, was to be reputed to the Pontiff's praise, but if any word, perchance, should bear the impress of intemperate zeal, it was to be referred 'not to any insubordination, but to his own individual lack of wisdom and discretion.' " The letter is addressed to "the most beautiful Head of all the churches of the whole of Europe; to the beloved Pope; the exalted prelate; the most reverend overseer; the pastor of pastors," &c. The Pontiffs are designated as "the masters, the steersmen, the mystic pilots of the spiritual ship, that is, the Church." Of the Irish people, he says: "We are the scholars of Sts. Peter and Paul, and of all disciples subscribing by the Holy Ghost to the divine canon; all are Irish, inhabitants of the remotest part of the whole world, receiving nothing save what is Evangelic and Apostolic doctrine. None of us has been a heretic, none a Jew, none a schismatic; but the faith, just as it was at first delivered by you, the successors of the holy Apostles, is held unshaken. We are, as I said before, bound to the Chair of St. Peter. For although Rome is great and illustrious, yet it is only through this Chair that she is great and renowned amongst us."

The Anglican Murray (1) says that the language of this letter is "too strong to allow us to suppose that the Irish monk, who used it, considered Pope Boniface, whom he was addressing, to be the head of the Church." And yet the writer expressly styles the Pontiff "pastor of pastors," and if he writes with that energy which might be expected from one who had grown old in the apostolate, he adds, as though anticipating Murray's objection, "therefore, freely will I speak, for I address our spiritual masters, the steersmen and pilots of the mystic ship." Murray also asserts that St. Columbanus says "it is possible for the see of Rome to forfeit Apostolic honor by not preserving the Apostolic faith." This is a deliberate falsification of the text (2), which reads: "That you may not lack Apostolic honor, preserve the Apostolic faith, confirm," &c. The idea of Columbanus is, that if the Pontiff were slow in repressing heresy, he would merit reproach, not praise; but he does not insinuate that, even then, the supremacy of the See would be affected. When our saint summons Boniface to "preserve the Apostolic faith," he addresses him as the universal pastor. "The sheep," he says, "are affrighted by the approach of wolves; wherefore use, O Pope, the whistlings and well-known voice of the true shepherd, and stand between the sheep and the wolves, so that, casting away their fear, the sheep may in everything find thee the first pastor. Set, in a manner, higher than all mortals, and exalted near unto the celestial beings, lift up thy voice as a trumpet, that thou mayest show their wicked doings to the people of thy Lord, entrusted to thee by Him." Claude, bishop of Auxerre, better known as Claudius Clemens, an Irish writer of the ninth century, is the next to whose testimony we would draw attention. In his Commentary on the Gospels (1), there are some passages which Usher tries to endow with a Protestant sense, by dint of omitting the context, or by forced interpretation (2). Among the passages omitted, is the following: "To thee will I give the keys of the kingdom of heaven. The word key, then, does not here refer to anything material formed by the hand of man, but it indicates the judiciary power. He who with a zeal greater than the rest, acknowledged Christ, was deservedly, in a special manner, endowed with the keys of the kingdom of heaven." This also is omitted: "But blessed Peter, who had acknowledged Christ in the fulness of faith, and loved Him with a true love, received, in a special manner, the keys of the kingdom of heaven, and the principedom of judiciary authority, that thus all the faithful throughout the universe might understand, that whosoever in any manner separates himself from the unity of his faith and communion, such a one can neither be absolved from the bonds of sin, nor enter the portals of the kingdom of heaven." We would remind the reader of the testimony of St. Cumminian the hermit (3), whom, when treating of the Paschal question, we cited as saying, "An old authority,' says Jerome, 'rises up against me. Meanwhile, I shout out, whosoever is joined to the Chair of Peter, with him shall I be.'" One of the ancient Brehon Laws, and preserved in the Leabhar Breac, is given in an Irish tract called, "On Injury and Assault to Ecclesiastics." It proceeds by question and answer and lays down the ancient legislation of the Irish in regard to the respect due to churchmen. In it we read: "Which is the highest dignity on earth? Answer—The dignity of the Church. Which is the highest dignity in the Church? Answer—The dignity of a bishop, and the highest of bishops is the bishop of Peter's Church, to whom the Roman kings are subject."

(1) Dean of Ardagh, and author of a "History of Ireland and her Church."

(2) "Ut ergo honore Apostolico non careas, conserva fidem Apostolicam, confirma testimonio," etc.

(1) This Commentary has been attributed to the contemporaneous Claude of Turin; but the internal evidence is in favor of the Irishman, as well as the Cambridge MS., which has the title "Claudii Scoti Commentarius." Such is the opinion of Usher, Ware, Colgan, Harris, and Rothe.

(2) See Moran p. 3, c. 1.

(3) Some confound this writer with St. Cumminian Fota, but Colgan, together with the ancient tradition of Ireland, identifies him with Cumminian the Fair, abbot of Hy, who died in 669. More modern authors reject the latter theory, Moran thinks, on very slight grounds. This Cumminian at one time ruled the monastery of Durrow, but all the schollasts are silent as to any connection of Cumminian Fota with Durrow.

After assigning the respective fines for various injuries to clerics, the tract continues : "Where is this doctrine found ? Answer—It is found in the treatise which Augustine wrote upon the Degrees of the Church, and upon the fines and the reparation to be made ; and it is thus, according to the rule of the Church of Peter, empress of the whole world."

(1). Seventy years before the English invasion of Ireland, Gille-Esperic (Gillebert) was appointed bishop of Lunnach, anglice, Limerick. One of his first episcopal acts was to congratulate St. Anselm on having "induced the untamable minds of the Normans to submit to the canons of the holy Fathers" (2). He also addressed a treatise on the "Ecclesiastical State" to all the Irish clergy, from which we take the following : "The picture I have drawn sheweth that all the Church's members are to be brought under one chief bishop, to wit, Christ and His vicar, blessed Peter the Apostle, and the Pope presiding in his See, to be governed by them. As Noah was placed to rule the ark amidst the waves of the flood, just so does the Roman Pontiff rule the Church amid the billows of this world. . . . The position held in the Eastern church by the patriarchs is that which belongs to archbishops in the West ; and both patriarchs and archbishops are subject in the first degree to the Roman Pontiff. As the patriarchs, however, govern the Apostolic sees, Jerusalem, Antioch, Alexandria, it is their privilege to ordain archbishops, and, in a manner, are they likened to the bishop of Rome. To Peter alone, however, was it said : 'Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my Church.' Therefore, the Pope alone is exalted in dignity above the whole Church, and he alone has the privilege of ordaining and judging all" (3).

That the early Irish church acknowledged the supremacy of the Roman Pontiff, is also shown by her canonical enactments. In the ancient Book of Armagh (4), is preserved a canon of St. Patrick, in which, after a reservation of certain

(1) Curry MSS. in the Catholic University of Ireland.

(2) This letter was accompanied by a present of twenty-five Irish pearls.

(3) USHER; Sylloges Epist., n. 30.

(4) It is found in "that part of the same old MS. which was copied from the book written by St. Patrick's own hand." Curry's Lectures, p. 372; Petrie's Tara, p. 81.

cases to the see of Armagh, it is decreed : “ Moreover, if any case of extreme difficulty shall arise, and one which the various judges of the Irish nation cannot decide, let it be referred to the see of the chief bishop of the Irish (that is, of Patrick), and submitted to his episcopal examination. But if such a case of the aforesaid importance cannot easily be decided in that see with the assistance of its wise counsellors, we have decreed that it be sent to the Apostolic See, that is to say, to the Chair of the Apostle Peter, which holds the authority of the city of Rome.” With regard to this canon, which he admits to be genuine (1), Usher patronizingly remarks, “ It is most likely that St. Patrick had a special regard for the Church of Rome, from whence he was sent for the conversion of this island ; so as, if I myself had lived in his days, for the resolution of a doubtful question, I should as willingly have listened to the judgment of the Church of Rome, as to the determination of any church in the whole world ; so reverent an estimation have I of the integrity of that Church as it stood in those days.” However, St. Patrick was not influenced by any mere sentimentalism, or by any individual opinion as to the just-as-good-as-another qualities of the Church of Rome ; nor does he merely express a willingness to submit to a Roman arbitration. He commands that difficult cases be referred to Rome, and because that See is that of Peter. This canon of St. Patrick was obeyed by the Synod of Magh-lene (630), and one of its members, St. Cummian, attests the fact : “ In accordance with the canon, that if serious questions arise, they shall be referred to the head of cities, we sent such as we knew were wise and humble men, to Rome ” (2). About the year 700, a collection of canons for the Irish church was compiled, of which many MSS. have been preserved. The (now) National Library of Paris has one copy of the eighth, and one of the twelfth century ; Darmstadt possesses one of the ninth ; St. Gall another very old ; the Vallicellian Archives at Rome a minuscule MS. of the tenth century ; a Cambray MS., of the eighth century, gives us a copy, transcribed by order of bishop Alberic (d. 790) ; and the Cottonian Codex, also of the eighth century, used by Usher, Wilkins, Spelman, and others of our opponents, contain it (1). In Can. xx., c. 6, we read: "Care must be taken, that no controversies be referred to other provinces or churches which follow different customs and profess a different religion; or to the Britons, who are contrary to all, and separate themselves from the Roman usages, and from the unity of the Church (2); or to heretics, even when they are affable, and skilled in ecclesiastical causes." And in c. 5, of the same canon, is said: "St. Patrick enacts: If any grave questions arise in this island, they shall be referred to the Apostolic See. The Roman canons decree, that when the more difficult questions arise, they are to be referred to the head city. The Roman Synod enacts: If in any province questions arise which cannot be settled amongst the disputants, let the matters be referred to the chief See." In the 21st book, entitled, "Method of Inquiry in Causes," the course is prescribed to be followed in matters of doubt, in the very words of Pope Innocent I., "Should the Scriptures not be sufficiently clear, the inquirer must recur to the doctors of the Church;" if he is not then satisfied, "let him consult the canons of the Apostolic See" (3).

(1) Religion of the Ancient Irish, p. 84.

(2) USHER; Syllog. Epp., n. 30.

That the supremacy of Rome was acknowledged by the early Irish church, is also proved by appeals to the Holy See. Murray, the zealous Protestant dean already quoted, could not impugn the authority of the canons we have just cited, but he confidently asked: "Now, supposing for one moment that this canon and decree were genuine, were they ever acted upon before the twelfth century? The ancient Irish Church on no occasion ever appealed to the bishop of Rome" (4). This author, like nearly all of his brethren, identifies the teaching of his sect with that of the early Irish, and yet he says that Rome, at that time was "the great centre of corrupted Christianity" (5); while the early Irish, as we have seen, proclaim her the centre of the true

(1) Proceedings of R. I. A., Dec. 8th, 1851.

(2) This reference to the obstinacy of the Britons in the Paschal Controversy, shows, of itself, the antiquity of this collection.

(3) The numerous pilgrimages from Ireland to the shrine of Peter, — journeys not undertaken in the spirit of the "sight-seer" — also indicate the belief of the early Irish Christians in the supremacy of the Holy See. See Moran, p. 3, c. 3.

(4) Ireland and her Church, p. 29. (5) Ibid. p. 59.

faith. Still declaring that Anglicanism and early Irish Catholicism were identical, he asserts that no appeals should be made to Rome, while the early Irish decree that it is to Rome that all difficulties should be carried. He, again like nearly all of his brethren, exults in "the corruptions of the Romish Church" (1), while the early Irish, though they prohibit appeals to heretics, or even to those whose discipline varies from that of Rome, call that See their guide. But let us investigate the accuracy of the assertion that "the ancient Irish on no occasion ever appealed to the bishop of Rome." Towards the close of the sixth century, St. Columbanus and a few companions left their monastery of Bangor, and wended their way to the continent, to gain new conquests for God. The new establishments of Luxieu and Fontaines were soon among the glories of Gaul, but the French clergy became alarmed at the peculiar usages of the Irish monks, and especially at their method of computation of the Easter time. In a Synod held for the purpose, these practices were condemned, but Columbanus, contending that he had received them from his fathers, appealed to Rome, to obtain a reversion of the adverse decree. The appeal, which was made to St. Gregory the Great, did not reach its destination, and Columbanus again addressed "the holy lord and Apostolic father in Christ, the Pope," who was, at that time, Boniface IV., in these words: "To thee alone do we pour out our supplications, through our Lord Jesus Christ and the Holy Ghost, and through the unity of faith which is common to us, that thou mayest bestow upon us, laboring pilgrims, the solace of thy holy decision, with which thou wilt strengthen the tradition of our elders, if it be not contrary to faith; that thus we may, during our pilgrimage, be enabled, through thy adjudication, to keep the rite of Easter as it was handed down to us by our fathers" (2). Another instance of an appeal to Rome is furnished, in the eighth century, by Ferguil (better known by his Latin name Virgilius), abbot of Archadhba

(1) Idem.

(2) Before this appeal could be answered, St. Columbanus had fled from France, owing to the enmity of Brunechild.

(1). Becoming a missionary to the then barbarous Bavarians, he soon was associated with St. Boniface, bishop of Mentz (the English apostle of Germany), and was made bishop of Salzburg by Pope Stephen II. Alcuin composed a poem in his honor, and called him "pious and prudent, second in piety to none;" his German biographers style him "the most learned among the learned." While working with St. Boniface, a controversy on the essential form of the Sacrament of Baptism for a while disturbed their harmony. Some of the clergy, addicted probably to a barbarous pronunciation of the Latin language, were said to have vitiated the form in their utterance, and St. Boniface declared that the sacrament thus administered was invalid. Ferghil, having been educated in the then superior schools of Ireland, seems to have, more precisely than the English bishop, distinguished between the accidentals and the essentials of the sacramental form, and hence he pronounced, in the cases alleged, the baptisms valid. He appealed to the Holy See, and his judgment was confirmed. Still another instance of appeal to Rome, or rather, of being guided by the decisions of Rome, is furnished by the Synod of Magh-lene (630), and the letter of St. Cummian, of which we have spoken in the chapter on the Paschal question. It would be easy to fill volumes with proofs of the devotion and filial obedience of the early Irish church to Rome, but the nature of our work demands that we be content with a few. "To sum up, then, in a few words," to use the language of a learned Irish ecclesiastic (2). "no dissension on religious matters ever arose in Ireland, which was not referred to Rome for adjudication. From Rome Ireland had her precepts of morality and her oracles of faith. Rome was the mother, Ireland the daughter; Rome the head, Ireland the member. From Rome, the fountain-source of religion, Ireland undoubtedly derived, and with her whole soul imbibed, her faith. In doubtful matters, the Pope was the arbiter of the Irish; in things certain, their master; in ecclesiastical matters, their head; in temporals, their defender; in all things, their judge; in everything, their adviser ; their oracle in doubt, their bulwark in the hour of danger. Some hastened to Rome to indulge their fervor at the tomb of the Apostles ; others to lay their homage at the feet of the Pope, and others to obtain the necessary sanction of his authority for the discharge of their functions."

(1) The Four Masters record his death: "In the year 784, Ferghil the geometer, abbot of Archadhbó, died in Germany in the 13th year of his episcopate."

(2) Dr. Lynch, archdeacon of Killala, refuting the calumnies of Gerald Barry (Giraldus Cambrensis). Edit. of Celtic Society, 1850, v. 2, p. 635.

We shall now examine the belief of the early Irish church as to the Holy Eucharist, and will prove that it was that of the Catholic Church of to-day. We shall then notice some of the arguments of our opponents. Among the many monuments of the ancient Irish church, which have come down to us, one of the most valuable is the Stowe Missal (1). In it the words of consecration are given as at present, and the subsequent prayers "agree literally with the Roman Canon down to the Memento for the dead" (2). Thus, we find the Irish of the sixth century using with us of the nineteenth the following beautiful prayer : " Humbly we beseech Thee, O Almighty God, command this offering to be carried by the hands of Thy holy angel unto Thy heavenly altar in the presence of Thy divine Majesty, that all of us who receive, through the participation of this altar, the most holy Body and Blood of Thy Son, may be filled with every heavenly blessing and grace, through the same Christ our Lord." In this same Missal, we find the rather un-Protestant " Mass of the Martyrs," " Mass of Virgins," " Mass for the dead." Another valuable monument of early Irish doctrine is the Bobbio Missal already noticed, and bequeathed by St. Columbanus to his Irish disciples in Italy. Here, we read, in the Daily Mass, the prayer : " We give thee thanks, O holy Lord, omnipotent Father, eternal God, who hast satiated us by the Communion of the Body and Blood of Christ Thy Son" (3). In the Mass for Lent are commemorated the many blessings imparted by Christ, " by participation of whose Flesh, blessed by Thee, we are strengthened,

(1) The inscriptions, yet remaining on the cover of this Missal, show that it belonged to some church of Munster, and probably to the monastery of Lortha, founded by St. Ruadhan in the sixth century. The original MS. was written in an ancient Lombardic character, " which," says Todd, " may well be deemed older than the sixth century. . . . It is by no means impossible that the MS. may have been the original Missal of St. Ruadhan himself, who died in 584." See The Ancient Irish Missal, &c., by James Henthorn Todd, read before R. I. A., June 23d, 1856, and printed from the Transactions of R. I. A. in 1857.

(2) Ibi, p. 32.

(3) MABILLON ; Italian Museum, v. 1.

and by drinking of whose Blood we are cleansed" (1). The Antiphonary of Bangor is certainly of the seventh or eighth century, and it contains a hymn beginning "Come, ye saints," which plainly shows the doctrine of the early Irish church on the Real Presence. We give a literal translation of some of the stanzas (2). "Come, O holy ones, receive the Body of Christ, drinking the Sacred Blood, by which you were redeemed. By the Sacrament of the Body and Blood all are saved from the jaws of hell. In the law it was ordered to immolate victims; these divine Mysteries were prefigured by it. Let all the faithful draw near with pure simplicity; let them receive the Eternal Custodian of their salvation. He gives Heavenly Bread to the hungry; to the thirsty, drink from the living Fountain. The Alpha and Omega, the Lord Christ Himself, now comes, He who is to come to judge mankind" (3). The famous Gaelic scholar, Eugene Curry, describes, in his valuable lectures (4), a Treatise on the Ceremonies of the Mass, contained in the Leabhar Breac, deposited in the R. I. Academy. The following literal translation (the original is in both Latin and Gaelic) of one extract, is every pertinent to our thesis: "Another division of that pledge, which has been left to the Church to comfort her, is the Body of Christ and His Blood, which are offered upon the altars of the Christians. The Body, even, which was born of Mary, Immaculate Virgin, without destruction of her virginity, without opening of the womb, without presence of man; and which was crucified by the unbelieving Jews, out of spite and envy, and which arose after three days from death, and sits upon the right hand of God the Father in heaven, in glory

(1) Ibi.

(2) A beautiful metrical version, by Denis Florence McCarthy, may be found in Gaffney's Ancient Irish Church.

(3) The learned Dr. Todd, at one time ranked in the Usherian school, but afterwards a convert to Catholicism, in his edition of the "Book of Hymns" for the Irish Arch. Society, claims for this hymn a higher antiquity than that of the Antiphonary containing it. In the preface to the hymn of St. Sechnall (Secundinus) on St. Patrick, preserved in the Leabhar Breac, we read that once, while Sechnall was saying Mass, the apostle arrived to visit him. "When Sechnall had finished the Mass, except taking the Body of Christ, he heard that Patrick had arrived at the place." The preface goes on to say that, leaving the altar, he threw himself at the feet of St. Patrick, and when both were approaching the church, "they heard a choir of angels chanting a hymn. . . . whose beginning is 'Sancti venite, Christi corpus,' &c., so that from that time to the present, that hymn is chanted in Erin when the Body of Christ is received." This preface, says Todd, is supposed, from its language and style, to be of the 7th or 8th century, and yet it describes the hymn Sancti venite as having been sung, from time immemorial, in the churches of Ireland.

(4) MS. Materials of Irish History, p. 376.

and in dignity before the angels of heaven ;—it is that Body, the same as it is in this great glory, which the righteous consume off God's Table, that is, the holy Altar. For this Body is the rich Viaticum of the faithful, who journey through the paths of pilgrimage and penitence of this world to the heavenly fatherland. This is the seed of the Resurrection in life eternal to the righteous. It is, however, the origin and cause of falling to the impenitent who believe not, and to the sensual who distinguish it not, though they believe. Woe, then, to the Christian who distinguishes not this Holy Body of the Lord by pure morals, by charity, and by mercy. For it is in this Body that will be found the example of the charity which excels all charity, viz., to sacrifice Himself, without guilt, in satisfaction for the guilt of the whole race of Adam." To this exposition of early Irish faith in the Real Presence, we shall add a few testimonies from the Penitentials and other records. The Penitential of St. Cummin prescribes penance for those who are guilty of negligence when preserving "the Sacrifice" entrusted to their care (1); the Bobbio Penitential (2) assigns a year's penance to him "who shall neglect, or lose, the Eucharist, the Body of the Lord;" both of these passages show a belief in the permanent Presence, not a transitory one, in the act of communion. The Penitential of St. Columbanus (3), orders that "Special diligence must be used in confessing our sins and imperfections, before the celebration of Mass, lest with an unclean heart we should approach the holy altar. It is better to delay a little, and wait till our heart be free from scandal and envy, than audaciously to approach the judgment-seat; for the altar is the tribunal of Christ, and His Body, present there with His Blood, judges those who unworthily approach." The ancient Lives of the early Irish saints are replete with evidence that those heroes held the doctrine of the Real Presence. Thus the Tripartite Life, which competent judges assign to the sixth or seventh century (4), represents St. Patrick as saying to Ethne and Fedhlimia, daughters of king Leoghaire, "Whilst you are clothed with mortal flesh, you cannot see the Son of God; but to behold Him in the brightness of His majesty, it is necessary to lay aside this corruptible flesh, and first to receive His Body and Blood, concealed in an invisible manner, beneath the visible form and species of bread and wine." Probus (1) says that the ladies replied: "Give us the sacrifice of the Body and Blood of Christ, that we may be freed from the corruption of the flesh, and may see our Spouse who is in heaven." Then St. Patrick celebrated Mass, and both the daughters of the king approached the Communion with great hope and perfect faith." Cogitosus, an Irish writer, assigned by the Protestant Petrie to the commencement of the ninth century (2), gives a description of the convent-church of Kildare, in which the "Mary of Erin," St. Brigid, was wont to worship. To the sanctuary there were two entrances; "The one, through which the bishop, with his clergy and assistants at the altar, entered, when about to offer up the Sacred Sacrifice of our Lord; the second door was at the left side of the altar, and through it the abbess alone, with her virgins and faithful widows, entered, to partake of the banquet of the Body and Blood of Jesus Christ" (3). Adamnan, successor of the great Columbkille in the abbacy of Iona (4), in the seventh century, wrote a Life of the holy founder, from which we select, among many equally strong arguments, the following account of a visit made to St. Columbkille by St. Cronan, a bishop of Munster: "Through humility, he sought as much as possible to conceal himself, so that no one might know that he was a bishop. This, however, could not be kept a secret from Columba; for, when on a Sunday he was ordered by St. Columba to consecrate (the text has the stronger term, 'conficere'), according to custom, the Body of Christ, he called our saint, as a brother priest, to unite with him in breaking the Bread of the Lord. Columba, approaching the altar, looking intuitively into his face, said to him; 'May Christ bless thee, O brother; do thou

(1) Chap. 13, n. 5.(2) Can. 17.(3) Canon XI., n. 11.(4) See Curry's Lectures, p. 345.

(1) Trias Thaum.(2) Round Towers of Ireland, p. 202.(3) COGITOSUS: Life of St. Brigid, c. 35.(4) For many years the monastery of Iona was the main centre of Irish missionary enterprise, and the resort of natives and foreigners who aimed at the acquisition of learning and sanctity. See Moutalembert's Monks of the West.

follow the episcopal rule, and distribute it alone" (1). In another memoir of St. Columbkille, written by his contemporary, Cumineus Albus (2), we read that the saint having had a vision in which he saw Columbanus, a bishop of Leinster, summoned to judgment, he called his fellow monks, and ordered them to prepare to offer the "Sacred Oblation," saying, "it is my duty to celebrate the Sacred Mysteries of the Eucharist for the holy soul which, during the night, passed to the angelic choirs." Cumineus adds that "whilst he was offering up the Sacred Mysteries of the Holy Sacrifice, he said to the brethren, 'to-day we are to pray for the holy bishop Columbanus.'" St. Fursa, another Irish missionary and saint, patron of Peronne, in France, died in 650. In an ancient Life (3), we read that Fursa was promised some supernatural manifestations by an angel, and that he prepared for them "by asking for, and partaking of, the Communion of the Sacred Body and Blood." In the same Life are recorded some instructions given to Fursa by two relatives, Sts. Beoan and Mellan, and in one of them is said: "Let the bishops and priests of the Church of Christ stimulate the faithful to tears of repentance for their crimes, and strengthen them with the spiritual food of faith, and by the participation of the Sacred Body and Blood." St. Colgu "the Wise" lived in the eighth century (4), and was the author of many edifying treatises. Among them is a prayer (5) in Irish, "Scuar Chrabhaigh," from which we take the following: "O Holy Jesus! O beautiful Friend! for the sake of the holy tree upon which Thy side was torn; for the sake of the innocent Blood, which trickled upon us from that tree; for the sake of Thine own Body and Blood which are offered upon all the holy altars which are in all the Christian churches in the world; dispense, give, and bestow, Thy holy grace and Thy holy Spirit to defend and shelter me," &c. We could proceed indefinitely with sim-

(1) The phrase Christi Corpus conficere is of frequent recurrence in liturgical treatises.

(2) In Mabillon's Acta SS. Bened., v. 1.

(3) Usher judges that it was composed before the time of Bede (b. 672). See Religion of the Ancient Irish, p. 37.

(4) He was attached to the monastic school of Clonmacnoise. In a letter published in Usher's Sylloge, Aleuin styles him "his blessed master and pious father."

(5) Curry's MS.; Lectures, p. 379; Colgan's Act. SS., p. 378.

ilar citations, but enough has been given to indicate the mind of the early Irish church as to the meaning of the Holy Eucharist. We shall now devote a few moments to the arguments of our adversaries.

Usher, one of the most respectable, and certainly the most learned, of those Protestants who try to identify the Anglican establishment with the early Irish church, appeals to the poet Sedulius, Claude, and a few other Irish writers, to sustain his theory. Let us see what comfort he can derive from Sedulius (1). This poet bore the fame of Ireland to the continent in the fifth century, and by his Carmen Paschale and its corresponding Paschal Prose, won for himself a great reputation. Usher asserts that this author affirms that only bread and wine are offered to God in the Eucharist, and in proof, he adduces a passage from the Poem, and one from the Prose. The first reads: "Who else presides as chief-pontiff and high priest but Christ, institutor of the two-fold libation, of the order of Melchisedech, to whom his own gifts, the fruit of the corn, and the joy of the vine, are always offered?" (2) The second, which Usher cites as rendering more clear the meaning of the former, styles the Eucharist "The sweet meat of the seed of wheat, and the lovely drink of the pleasant vine" (3). In formulating this objection, the Protestant primate of Ireland deliberately mutilated the text of Sedulius, by cutting out from the second passage words which are certainly too eloquent of Catholicism for Protestant taste. The immediate context reads: "For who but the Lord is present, the Pontiff of pontiffs, the Priest of priests, the Author and Founder of the two-fold libation, whose gifts, according to the order of Melchisedech, which He offered for us upon the cross, changed into His own Flesh, are the sweet meat of the seed of wheat, and the lovely drink of the pleasant vine" (4). After noting the dishonesty of Usher, which is but too usual with gentry of his school, no comment is necessary, on our part, to elicit

(1) Pope Gelasius calls him "the venerable Sedulius," and commends his works to the faithful. Venantius Fortunatus also eulogizes him, while St. Hildephonse styles him "an evangelical poet, an eloquent orator, and a Catholic writer;"—a curious fact, if, as Usher asserts, Sedulius was a Sacramentarian.

(2) Paschal Poem, b. 4, v. 206.

(3) Paschal Prose, idem.

(4) Poem b. 5, v. 289.

the thorough Catholicity of the quoted passages of Sedulius. But the reader will please observe how plainly the poet presents the Catholic doctrine on the Eucharist in the following passages : "All of us who, under Christ our leader, are regenerated in the fountain of waters, taking His Body and Blood, do eat and drink thereof that we may deserve to enjoy the Holy Ghost." Another Sedulius, an Irish commentator of the ninth century, is also cited by the Anglican primate, but, if the reader will carefully weigh the quoted words, he will find that the learned abbot, so far from broaching Protestant ideas, taught simple Catholic doctrine. In a Commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews, we read : "Melchisedech offered bread and wine to Abraham for a figure of Christ, offering His Body and Blood unto the Father upon the cross." And in another place of the same Commentary, "But we offer daily for a commemoration of the Lord's passion, once endured, and for our own salvation." Certainly, all Catholics recognize in the Holy Sacrifice a commemoration of Christ's passion, and only Catholics rejoice, with Sedulius, that it is everywhere daily offered for our salvation. Usher tells us that "elsewhere, expounding the words of our Saviour, 'Do this in remembrance of me,' he brings in the similitude used before him and after him by others, 'He left us a memorial of Himself, even as if one that was going on a far journey, should leave some token of affection with a loved companion ; that as often as he beholds it, he may call to mind his benefits and friendship.'" To this we reply that not only Sedulius uses this phrase ; it is used even by the Catholic Church (1). But in quoting this phrase, the Anglican publicist is again guilty of a trick which is but too common with our adversaries. He omits the preceding words : "Take and eat ; this is my Body. As if St. Paul said : beware not to eat that Body unworthily, for it is the Body of Christ." With these words, the passage of Sedulius becomes emphatically Catholic. Usher appeals also to Claudius as favorable to the Protestant theory, but to attain a semblance of success in the estimation of his credulous readers, he has recourse again to misrepresentation. The following passage is cited as favorable to the Protestant tenets: "Our Saviour wished first to deliver to His disciples the Sacrament of His Body and Blood, which he presented in the breaking of the Body (1) and the effusion of the Chalice; and afterwards to immolate the Body itself upon the altar of the cross." No ordinary ingenuity could so manipulate these words as to cause them to evince the Protestant notion of the Eucharist, yet Usher tells us that herein, "Claudius expressly distinguishes the Sacrament of the Body, which was delivered unto the disciples, from the Body itself, which was afterwards offered upon the cross." He certainly does, and so do all Catholics; but nevertheless, while Protestants say that the Eucharist is mere bread and wine, Claudius says that it is the Body and Blood of Christ. Usher professes to inquire into the belief of Claudius as to the nature of the Eucharist, and yet he says nothing of the very chapters in which our author expressly treats of it. From them we select the following passages: "Whilst they were at supper, Jesus took bread, and blessed, and broke, and gave to His disciples, saying, 'Take and eat; This is my Body.' The ceremonies of the ancient Passover being at an end, He passes to the New Pasch, which he wished the Church to observe as a memorial of her redemption; thus, forsooth, instead of the flesh and blood of the lamb, substituting the Sacrament of His own Flesh and Blood, and showing Himself to be Him of whom it was written: 'The Lord hath sworn, nor shall he repent: Thou art a priest forever, according to the order of Melchisedech.'" When speaking of our Lord's burial in the tomb, Claudius remarks: "We may, in a spiritual sense, learn from these words, that the Body of the Lord is not to be placed upon gold, gems, or silk, but upon plain linen. . . . hence is derived the custom of the Church, to offer the Sacrifice of the altar not upon cloths of silk or of rich dye, but only upon simple linen cloths, according to the decree of the blessed Pope Sylvester." Finally, in his Com-

(1) Mass and Office of the Blessed Sacrament.

(1) Usher, strange to say, is candid enough to draw attention to the significant phrase "the breaking of the Body," saying: "At first sight I did verily think that in these words an error had been committed in my transcript, Body being miswritten for bread; but, afterwards, comparing it with the original, I found that the author retained that manner of speaking." The Vatican text (Codex Vat., 3828, fol. 119) confirms this reading.

mentary on Leviticus, Claudius gives a beautiful passage which Usher has himself edited (1), but carefully avoided in the present question: "On the cross Christ rendered His Flesh eatable for us. For had He not been crucified, the Sacrifice of His Body would not be eaten; but now it is eaten in memory of the Lord's passion. Anticipating the cross, He immolated Himself at the supper with the Apostles—He who, bearing the scars of His sufferings, after His resurrection, introduced His Blood into the tabernacle of heaven." Thus, according to Claudius, the Flesh of Christ is indeed our food. The Redeemer offered, at the last supper, a true Sacrifice to His Father; anticipating, in a sense, the Sacrifice of the cross. And further, declares Claudius, this mysterious Sacrifice must be referred to the same mystery and power by which Christ bore His wounds into glory. There are some other writers of minor importance (2), cited by Usher, but our limits compel us to conclude this paragraph with a notice of an objection founded upon some supposed sayings of the celebrated Scotus Erigena (3). Usher asserts that Scotus Erigena was the author of a tract entitled "The Body and Blood of the Lord," condemned by the Synod of Vercelli in 1049, but the able editor of his works, Henry Joseph Floss (1853), having searched the archives of Europe, came to the conclusion that the treatise condemned at Vercelli was the work, not of the Irish writer, but of Ratramn or Bertram, a monk of Corbie, an author of whom we shall take occasion to speak when treating of the religious belief of the early Anglo-Saxon church. Berengarius, the Sacramentarian

(1) Sylog. Epp., No. 20.

(2) Among these is the Transcript of the Gospels, with an interlinear commentary made by an Irish scribe called Maelbrichte. The first to allege this MS. in support of Protestantism was John O'Toolan of Derry (better known by the name Toland, which he assumed after he had renounced faith, family, and country) an apostate of the last century. Dr. Moran, in his Essay on the Eucharistic doctrine of the Irish Church, gives an admirable refutation of O'Toolan's arguments.

(3) John Scotus Erigena, not to be confounded with the great Franciscan doctor, John Duns Scotus, born at Dunstone in England, was an Irish writer of the ninth century, who made quite a stir during the reign of Charles the Bald. It is the fashion with Protestants to style him a learned, solid, and brilliant theologian, and an eminent philosopher. Thus Mosheim, Hist., 9th Cent., p. 2, c. 1, and passim bestows upon him eulogies which he gives to no Father of the Church; and this simply because he is supposed to have attacked the Catholic faith in the Real Presence. As to the truth of this accusation, we can only judge by the opinion of his contemporaries, for none of his Eucharistic writings have reached us. According to his contemporaries Erigena was a subtle and daring sophist, with much profane erudition, but with but little knowledge of Scripture or tradition; infected with Pelagianism and Origenism, and even with the impieties of the Collyridians (Arabian heretics of the first centuries, who paid divine honors to the Blessed Virgin).

leader of the eleventh century, certainly attributed the tract to Erigena, but, in the absence of corroborating proof of its authenticity, we may well suppose that the French heretic fraudulently procured the protection of a great name. We know that the Irish author was requested by the French clergy to oppose the teachings of Paschasius Radbertus, and that the whole controversy then in agitation was not in regard to the reality of Christ's presence in the Eucharist, but about the manner in which it was affected ; about, also, not the fact of Christ's Body being present, but whether or not identity could be asserted of the natural and the Sacramental Body. It is exceedingly improbable that Erigena would have remained in favor at the French court, or that Anastasius the Librarian would have eulogized him, had he rejected Catholic doctrine. His contemporaries accuse him of Semipelagianism and Pantheism, and in such of his works as have reached us, some obscure passages seem to give color to the imputation. But, on the other hand, Berengarius and his disciples are accused of corrupting and distorting the sayings of Erigena—an old dodge of heretics, and one continued in more modern times, as we have noticed in the case of the Anglican primate of Armagh. At any rate, Usher can produce no authenticated saying of John Scotus Erigena, which militates against the doctrine of Transubstantiation. At best, he can only cite the condemnation by a Catholic Synod of a tract on the Blessed Sacrament, imputed to this author, and conclude that this condemnation is prima facie evidence that he taught what is now Protestant doctrine—a conclusion which is entirely too sweeping, and not logically proceeding from the premises.

Of the few points of doctrine in which all Protestant sects agree, one is that veneration of the saints, and the practice of asking their prayers, should be rejected. It will be interesting to note the teaching of the early Irish church on this subject. Preserved in the Leabhar Breac, which the Protestant Petrie (1) calls “the oldest and best MS. relating to Church history now preserved (in Ireland), or which, perhaps, the Irish ever possessed,” is an ancient Litany of the Blessed Virgin, which Curry pronounces "as old, at least, as the middle of the 8th century." From among sixty titles which Protestants would deem extravagant, we select the following: "O Great Mary, Greatest of Women, Queen of Angels, Mistress of the Heavens, Mother of the Heavenly and Earthly Church, Gate of Heaven, Cleansing of Sin, Star of the Sea, Mother of Christ, Destruction of Eve's Disgrace, Sanctuary of the Holy Spirit, Queen of Life." And among the prayers attached to this Litany, are the following: "Let our devotion and our sighs be carried through thee to the presence of the Creator, for we are not ourselves worthy of being heard, because of our evil deserts. O Powerful Mistress of Heaven and Earth, dissolve our trespasses and our sins; destroy our wickedness and our corruptions; raise the fallen, the debilitated, and the fettered; loose the condemned; repair through thyself the transgressions of our immoralities and our vices; bestow upon us through thyself the blossoms and ornaments of good actions and virtues; appease for us the Judge by thy voice and thy supplications; allow us not to be carried off from thee among the spoils of our enemies; allow not our souls to be condemned, but take us to thyself forever, under thy protection" (1). In the Bobbio Missal there is a Mass in honor of Mary for her general feasts, and another for the Assumption. In the former, we read the following prayer: "Hear us, O Lord, Holy Father, All-powerful God, who by the overshadowing of the womb of Blessed Mary, didst deign to illumine the whole world; we suppliantly pray Thy Majesty that what we cannot acquire by our merits, we may obtain through her protection. We beseech Thee, too, O Lord, that the joys of Blessed Mary may accompany us, and by her merits may the handwriting of our sin be cancelled." In the latter Mass, the soul of Mary is said to be "wreathed with various crowns; the Apostles render sacred homage to her, the angels intone their canticles, Christ embraces her, the clouds are her chariot, paradise her house, where, decked with glory, she reigns amid the virgin-choirs."

(1) Hist. and Antiq. of Tara, published from the Transactions of the R. I. A., 1839.

(1) This old Irish Litany was so pleasing to our late beloved Pontiff, Pius IX., that he attached an indulgence of 100 days to its recitation.

The Canon of this Mass also gives the usual commemoration: "Venerating, in the first place, the memory of the ever-virgin Mary, Mother of our Lord and God, Jesus Christ." The devotion of the early Irish to St. Brigid also illustrates their love and veneration for Mary. St. Brigid, or Bridget, is called the wonder of womankind, but the climax of praise is reached when they say that she is "like unto the Mother of God." What Mary is for the whole Church, Bridget seems to be for Ireland; in fine, the latter is "the Mary of the Irish," as many of the olden records explicitly style her. The Litany of St. Ængus, admitted by all Irish scholars to be a composition of the eighth century, begins: "The three times fifty Roman pilgrims who settled in Uimle; I invoke to my aid through Jesus Christ. The three thousand father confessors who met in Munster to consider one question; I invoke, &c. The other thrice fifty pilgrims of the men of Rome and Latium, who went into Scotland; I invoke, &c. The thrice fifty Gaedhils of Erin in holy orders, each of them a man of strict rule, who went in one body into pilgrimage, under Abban, the son of Ua-Cormaic, I invoke, &c." The mind of the early Irish church on this point is also shown by the ancient Book of Kells, of which the learned Protestant Westwood, an undoubted judge of Irish MSS., says (1): "Ireland may justly be proud of the Book of Kells. This copy of the Gospels, traditionally asserted to have belonged to St. Columba, is unquestionably the most elaborately executed manuscript of early art now in existence; far excelling, in the gigantic size of the letters in the frontispieces of the Gospel, the excessive minuteness of the ornamental details, the number of its decorations the fineness of the writing, and the endless variety of initial capital letters, with which every page is ornamented, the famous Gospel of Lindisfarne (2) in the Cottonian Library. . . . The verso of fol. 7, contains the drawing of the Virgin and Child, copied in plate 1, which is inclosed within a highly elaborate border composed of interlined lacertine animals with dogs' heads. This singular composition is interesting from the proof it affords of the veneration of the Virgin Mary in the early Irish church; the large size in which she is represented, as well as the 'glory' around her head (which singularly bears three small crosses), evidently indicating the high respect with which the Mother of Christ was regarded." In the Antiphonary of Bangor, a MS. of the eighth century, is contained a hymn, written, we are distinctly told, by Sechnall. "a nephew of St. Patrick." In it we read the prayer: "Patrick, bishop, pray for all of us, that our sins may be completely wiped away."

(1) Sacred Palæography.

(2) The monastery of Lindisfarne was founded by Irish monks from Iona.

That auricular confession was practised among the early Irish, is not denied by any author of note. Usher admits that "they did, no doubt, both publicly and privately, make confession of their faults, as well that they might receive counsel and direction, as that they might be made partakers of the benefit of the keys Sure we are that this was the practice of the ancient Scottish and Irish" (1). We therefore pass to another distinctively Catholic doctrine, that of Purgatory and prayers for the dead, in order to see whether, on this matter at least, the early Irish Christians agreed with our separated brethren. We have already alluded to the Bobbio Missal. In this monument of the early Irish church, certainly of the sixth century, and probably used by St. Columbanus himself, there are various prayers to God, "for the pardon of the deceased," and for the remission of their sins. Thus, in a "Mass for the Dead," we read: "Grant, O Lord, to Thy deceased servant the pardon of his sins, in that secret receptacle where there is no opportunity of doing penance. And do Thou, O Christ, receive the soul of Thy servant, and pardon his offences more fully than he forgave those who offended him." And in a "Mass for Living and Dead," we read: "Mercifully grant that this Sacred Oblation may procure pardon for the dead, and may promote the salvation of the living." But what better proof of this practice of praying for the dead can be asked than that furnished by the tombs of the dead? About sixty years ago,

(1) Religion of the Ancient Irish, c. 6.

we learn from the Protestant Petrie (1), was discovered the tomb of St. Breccan, founder of the monastery of Ardbraccan, Meath, in the sixth century. He had retired to the island of Arran, and was there interred, in a church of his foundation. Within the sepulchre was found a small block of limestone; on it was carved a cross, and the inscription: "A prayer for Breccan the pilgrim." At Monasterboice, near Drogheda, are three large Irish crosses, of which Wilde says: "they have been not only the great boast of Irish antiquaries, but have frequently, and in glowing terms, elicited the admiration of foreigners. With the exception of the great cross at Clonmacnoise, and one which we ourselves recently exhumed near the cathedral of St. Breccan in the great island of Arran, there is nothing of the kind in Great Britain, or perhaps in Europe, either in magnitude, design, or execution, to compare with two at least of the crosses at Monasterboice the various compartments contain figures of the Apostles, the Virgin and Child, and some of our Irish saints inferior in point of size, but eminently superior in artistic design and execution, is the second crucial monument, which we know, from an Irish inscription on its base, was erected by Abbot Muiredach—'A prayer for Muiredach, by whom this cross was made.'" As there were only two abbots of this name, one of whom died in 844, and the other in 924, the cross must be the work of the ninth or tenth century (2). In the year 924, died Colman, abbot of Clonmacnoise, the great monastery founded by St. Kieran in 547 (3). He erected the cross alluded to in the previous quotation. Its only inscription, unlike the fulsome eulogies of modern times, is "A prayer for Colman, who made this cross on the King Flann. A prayer for Flann, son of Maelsechlain." The cross of Tuam, erected in the beginning of the twelfth century, bears this inscription: "A prayer for Turlock O'Connor, for the Abbot of Jarlath, by whom was made this cross. A prayer for O'Ossin, for the Abbot by whom it was made. A prayer for the successor of Jarlath, for Aed

(1) Round Towers; Transactions of Royal Irish Academy, v. 20, p. 138.

(2) See Ancient Irish Church, by Rev. James Gaffney, Dublin, 1863.

(3) FOUR MASTERS; v. 1.

O'Ossin, by whom was made this cross." These testimonies were not sufficiently conclusive for Usher. Like Bingham in the case of the early Saxon church (1), he discovered that the early Irish did not offer prayers as a propitiation for the dead, but as a thanksgiving for the happiness which they believed to be already the lot of the dead. "Neither the commemoration," says he (2), nor the praying for the dead, nor the Requiem Masses, has any necessary relation to Purgatory, because they are merely thanksgiving." But we have seen, e. g., in the Bobbio Missal, prayers to God "for the pardon of the deceased," and Usher exposes his own bad faith by quoting the following: "Magnus said, on his death-bed, to his friend Tozzo, bishop of Ausboro, 'Do not weep because thou beholdest me laboring in so many storms of worldly troubles, because I believe in the mercy of God that my soul shall rejoice in the freedom of immortality; yet I beseech thee, that thou will not cease to help me, a sinner, and my soul, with thy holy prayers.'" (3)

On Feb. 20th, 1857, the Irish Justice Keogh delivered the following opinion: "It was not, as some vulgarly suppose, a fact that priests in the Roman Catholic Church were never allowed to marry—that celibacy was always enjoined in the Church. It was a fact that, down to a late period, priests and bishops in the Roman Catholic Church were allowed to marry, and did marry. To the year 1015, priests were allowed to marry, and the vow of celibacy was not required until the year 1076" (4). If the reader is disposed to doubt the historical accuracy of Mr. Justice Keogh, he must know that the great English lawyer, Lord Coke, in his chapter on Ireland, in the 4th Institute, informs us that in a "synod holden in Ireland by St. Patrick, their apostle, it was unanimously agreed that Irish priests should have wives" (5). When we come to treat of the celibacy of the clergy, it will be seen that Mr. Keogh's knowledge of ecclesiastical history is greatly at fault, and that, whatever Coke

(1) See our chapter on Conversion of England.

(2) Religion of Ancient Irish, p. 28.

(3) Ibi.

(4) Case of Beamish vs. Beamish.

(5) Whiteside, M. P., quoted by Gaffney, loc. cit.

may have known of English law, his proficiency in Irish church history was no greater than that of the Irish judge. But even though it were shown that the early Irish church tolerated a married clergy, as some of the churches in communion with Rome still do, and always have done, modern Protestants could not claim that Irish church as their own. Clerical celibacy is a matter of discipline, and not of faith. With regard to the discipline of the early Irish in this matter, a learned Protestant writer (1) says: "The idea of the necessity or paramount importance of celibacy, as a rule for the clergy, prevailed at a very early period in most parts of the church, and although 'from the beginning it was not so,' yet few instances of the contrary can be cited from our ancient writers; so that the general practice of our forefathers in this matter would appear to have been pretty much in accordance with the law which was afterwards introduced." In another place (2), the same author says: "We would guard our readers against errors, and not lead them to suppose that the Irish Christians of the seventh century agreed more nearly with ourselves than they really did, according to the accounts given of them in ancient histories. There are points connected with Columbanus—such, for instance, as his views concerning vows and monastic celibacy,—which mark a clear distinction between his system and our own." We shall say nothing about the Irish monastic rule in reference to celibacy, for no one denies that, in all ages and in all countries, strict continency was enjoined upon monks and nuns. But we propose to show that, in the early Irish church, the secular clergy were not allowed to marry. In the Bobbio Missal, the following canon is sufficiently explicit: "If any cleric of the higher grade, who has had a wife, should, after his elevation, live with her again, let him know that he commits adultery." Certainly if one, married before his priesthood, was obliged to leave his wife, one already ordained could not marry. There is extant a treatise by St. Columbanus on the "Measure of Penances," in which the 20th clause reads: "If any cleric or deacon, or one in any orders, who has been a layman in the world with sons and daughters, should, after giving himself to God, again live with his wife and beget a son of her, let him know that he has committed adultery, and has fallen into as great a sin as though he had been a cleric from his youth, and had communicated with a girl to whom he was not married; because he has offended after his vow, and after his consecration to God and he has made void his vow. Therefore, for seven years he shall do penance on bread and water." In the Penitential of Cumminian there is a canon as follows: "If any cleric or monk, after having vowed himself to God, should secularize himself, or should take a wife, let him do penance for ten years, three of them on bread and water, and let him never again know the woman. If he disobeys, a Synod or the Apostolic See will separate him from the communion and association of Catholics." In the year 1186, a Synod was held in Dublin, and the following canon was enacted, in consequence of the iniquities of some of the Anglo-Norman clergy in the train of the invaders: "Since the clergy of Ireland, among other virtues, have been always remarkably eminent for their chastity, and it would be ignominious if they should be corrupted through his (the archbishop's) negligence, by the foul contagion of strangers, and the example of a few incontinent men, he therefore forbids, under the penalty of losing both office and benefice, any priest, deacon, or subdeacon, to keep any woman in his house, under the pretence of necessary services, or for any other reason whatsoever, unless a mother, own sister, or a person whose age would remove all suspicion of any unlawful intercourse." It is remarkable that Gerald Barry (Cambrensis), an English priest, who was present at this Synod, and who wielded one of the most slanderous pens that ever wrote against Ireland, when treating of the Irish clergy, said: "The clergy of this country are very commendable for religion, and among the many virtues which distinguish them, their prerogative of chastity is pre-eminent." These testimonies are certainly sufficient to show that the early Irish church held views upon clerical continence, very different from those of Protestants. It would be interesting to compare the practice of this church with that of the reformed sects, in regard to the use of the sign of the cross; to note the sharp contrast between the former's devout belief in the perpetuation of miraculous powers in the Church, and the latter gentry's quiet consent as to the utter cessation of such gifts since the days of the Apostles. But enough has been said to prove the utter Romanism of the early Irish Christians.

(1) REV. B. KING; Church History, v. 1, p. 370.(2) Ibi, p. 316.

In the course of this chapter, we frequently have had occasion to refer to the celebrated monastery founded by St. Columbanus, at Bobbio in Italy. After this saint had founded many seminaries of sanctity and learning in France and Germany, he went, in the beginning of the seventh century, into Italy, with the design of fixing there his permanent abode. His native island owed her first apostles to Italy, and now, when the peninsula had fallen upon evil times, she was destined to receive some comfort from the children of Erin. It was an epoch of wars and of every kind of tumult, hence the lover of prayer and of study established his new monastery in the solitudes of northern Liguria, at the head of the valley of the Trebbia. In this quiet retreat, Columbanus and his followers helped to stem the tide of barbarism, and prepared for future ages a large number of literary treasures. By the labor of their hands these monks procured their food, and turned their Alpine desert into a fruitful region. In a few years after the death of their holy founder (615), the monks of Bobbio numbered a hundred and forty; crowds of people clustered around the sanctuary for protection and comfort, and by the year 1014, the little settlement had become an episcopal city (1). St. Columbanus brought to his Italian home a number of codices which became the nucleus of a famous library; among the books which formerly belonged to it are many Saxon and Gaelic MSS. of the 6th and 7th centuries. For several centuries the monks were occupied in transcribing codices, and whenever one of their number went to Rome, he returned with an assortment of good books. When the many benefactors of the monastery wished to make it a specially valuable present, rare codices were sure to be chosen. Among such benefactors, the names of Dungal, Smaragdus, and Agilulph are eminent, and they are found written on many of the old MSS. By the tenth century the library of Bobbio had become one of the largest in Europe. "To form an idea," says the learned Barnabite, Vercellone (1), "of the literary wealth of the monastery of Bobbio, it is enough to know that, during the last three centuries, no other library has furnished more abundant material to the researches of scholars; no other has preserved so many texts of ancient classics, sacred and profane. And to speak only of our own time, codices coming from Bobbio have given us the Republic of Cicero, and additional fragments of his Orations; Marcus Aurelius, Symmachus, the Ante-Justinian Code, the codex of Theodosius, the Sermons of St. Augustine, fragments of the version of Ulfila, the apocryphal books of the Old Testament (2), and many other very precious works which had, for a long time, been sought for in vain. This library alone, nay, merely the relics of this one library, have given their most precious codices to the most celebrated of modern libraries, the Vatican, the Ambrosian, those of Turin, Naples, and Vienna. This one fact will enable you to judge of what the library of Bobbio must have been, in its palmy days. These immense literary riches, accumulated by the monks during three centuries, were afterwards guarded during the dark ages in a manner, rather unique than rare. If I were asked the reason of this singular fact, I could only give one based on the condition of the locality. It is, so to say, isolated from the rest of Italy, being almost buried in the mountains, Again, there was not, or we do not know that there was, anything in the monastery likely to excite the cupidity of the barbarians who often devastated, from one end to the other, our too beautiful peninsula. Hence, while ignorance and barbarism scattered or destroyed all the other libraries of the world, that of Bobbio remained hidden and almost forgotten, and was enabled, to our great profit, to preserve the incomparable treasures of ancient wisdom which the wise industry of the monks had deposited there." Bobbio is certainly one of the glories of Italy, and it was long after the time of Columbanus and his Irish brethren that it attained its greatest fame. But still it was Irish zeal for the faith preached by St. Patrick that laid the foundation of that fame. "From the moment that this green Erin," says Montalembert (1), "situated at the extremity of the known world, had seen the sun of faith rise upon her, she had vowed herself to it with an ardent and tender devotion, which became her very life. The course of ages has not interrupted this; the most bloody and implacable of persecutions has not shaken it; the defection of all northern Europe has not led her astray; and she maintains still, amid the splendor and miseries of modern civilization and Anglo-Saxon supremacy, an inexhaustible centre of faith, where survives, along with the completest orthodoxy, that admirable purity of manners which no conqueror and no adversary has ever been able to dispute, to equal, or to diminish. The ecclesiastical antiquity and hagiography of Ireland constitute an entire world of inquiry. The productiveness of the monastic germ planted by Patrick and Bridget was prodigious; for shortly the monasteries of Bangor, Clonfert, and elsewhere, became entire towns, each of which enclosed more than three thousand cenobites. There was, besides, an intellectual development which the hermits of Egypt had not known. The Irish communities, joined by the monks from Gaul and Rome, whom the example of Patrick had drawn upon his steps, entered into rivalry with the great monastic schools of Gaul. They explained Ovid there; they copied Virgil; they devoted themselves especially to Greek literature; they drew back from no inquiry—from no discussion; they gloried in placing boldness upon a level with faith. A characteristic still more distinctive of the Irish monks, as of all their nation, was the imperious necessity of spreading themselves without, of seeking or carrying knowledge and faith afar, and of penetrating into the most distant regions

(1) UGHELLI; Sacred Italy, IV., 926. ROSSETTI; Bobbio Illustrated.

(1) Discourse on a certain Bobbio Palimpsest, read in the Pontifical Tiberine Academy, Rome, April 22, 1861, and printed in the Arcadian Journal, new series, vol. 23; Academic Dissertations. Rome, 1864.

(2) See MAI; New Library of the Fathers, v. 1, p. XIX.; CERIANI; Sacred and Profane Monuments, Milan, 1861.

(1) Monks of the West, v. 2, p. 389.

to watch or combat Paganism ; this monastic nation, therefore, became the missionary nation, by excellence. While some came to Ireland to procure religious instruction, the Irish missionaries launched forth from their island ; they covered the land and seas of the west. Unwearied navigators, they landed on the most desert islands ; they overflowed the continent with their successive emigrations ; they saw in incessant visions a world known and unknown to be conquered for Christ." St. Bernard tells us that "From Ireland, as from an overflowing stream, crowds of holy men descended on foreign nations." St. Rupert, who had been baptized by a nephew of St. Patrick, went, with twelve companions, to evangelize Bavaria. St. Columba and twelve more (1) undertook the apostolic mission to Albany. St. Eloquius carried the faith into Belgium ; St. Willibrod into Germany ; St. Ailbe into Iceland ; St. Seizen into Armorica ; Sts. Florentius, Argobastus, and Hidulf, into Alsace. In Lynch's excellent refutation of Gerald Barry, entitled Cambrensis Eversus, is given a long list of Irish saints "who toiled in strange lands, and fortified them abundantly with the dew of their faith and virtues." In Italy, were Donatus at Fiesole ; and Andrew and Bridget, at Opaca. In Picardy, Sts. Caidoc and Elicorius. At Rheims, Sts. Gibrian, Tressan, Hoelan, Abram, German, Veran, Petroan, Promptia, Possenna, and Iruda. At Paris, Claude, Clement, and John. At Boulogne, Vulgan, Kilian, and Obod. In the district of Beauvais, Maura, Brigid, and Hyspad. In Kleggon, Germany, Northberga and Sista. At Ratisbon, Sts. Marian, John, Candidus, Clement, Murcherdach, and Magnoald. In Austrasia, Sts. Kilian, Colonatus and Totnan. "Not taking into account," says Lynch, "those who were canonized in Britain, nor those who went over to the continent in large bodies, we have in Italy, St. Cathaldus, patron of Tarentum ; St. Donatus, patron of Fiesole ; St. Emilian, patron of Faventum, and St. Frigidian, of Lucca. Pavia honors John Albinus as the founder of her university, and St. Cumean is, above all other saints, the favorite patron of Bobbio. In

(1) Nearly all of the Irish chiefs of missions were accompanied by twelve assistants, probably in memory of our Lord's chosen Apostles, and perhaps, also, in honor of the twelve sent by Rome with Palladius to Ireland.

Gaul, St. Mansuetus is patron of Tulle; St. Finlag, patron of Metz; and St. Præcordius, of Corbie. Amiens honors St. Forcensius, and Poitiers, St. Fridolin. St. Elias is patron of Angouleme, St. Anatolius of Besançon, St. Fiacre of Meaux, St. Fursa of Peronne, and St. Lawrence of Eu. Liege honors Momo, and Strasbourg Sts. Florentius and Arbogast. In Brittany, Sts. Origin, Toava, Tenan, Gildas, Brioc, and many others, are revered as patrons. In Belgium, you have in Brabant, Sts. Rumold, Fredegand, Himelin, Dymphna, and Gerebern; in Flanders, Sts. Levin, Guthagon, Columbanus; in Artois, Sts. Lingluio, Liuglianus, Kilian, Vulgan, Fursa, and Obod; in Hainaut, Sts. Ette, Adalgisus, Abel, Wasnulf, and Mombolus; in Namur, Sts. Farennan and Eloquius; in Liege, Sts. Ultan, Foillan, and Bertuin; in Gueldres, Sts. Wiros, Plechelm, and Othger; in Friesland, Sts. Suitbert and Acca. But Germany especially was the most flourishing vineyard of our saints. St. Albin, or Witta, is honored as apostle in Thuringia; St. Disibode, at Treves; St. Erhard, in Alsace and Bavaria; St. Fridolin, in the Grisons of Switzerland; St. Gall among the Suabians, Swiss, and Rhetians; St. John in Mecklenburg; St. Virgil at Salzburg; St. Kilian, in Franconia; St. Rupert, in part of Bavaria. Was ever panegyric more appropriate than the words of Eric of Auxerre? ‘Need I mention Ireland, who, despising the dangers of the deep, emigrates to our shores, with almost the whole host of her philosophers; the greatest among them become voluntary exiles to minister to the tastes of our wisest Solomon?’ Now, we would ask of those who contend that the faith of the early Irish church was not that of Rome, what kind of doctrine did these Irish apostles preach to their neophytes? What doctrine was believed, what system practiced, by these many Irish saints so revered on the continent of Europe? They everywhere founded churches, or at least worshipped in churches, which acknowledged the supremacy of Rome. Our adversaries must therefore suppose, either that all these evangelizers and saints at once apostatized to Rome, immediately upon commencing their mission; or that none of these countries which revere these saints, held the faith of Rome, when they commenced to honor them. Either idea is as absurd as it is historically false. Viewing, then, the close alliance which subsisted between the continental churches, which confessedly acknowledged the supremacy of the Holy See, and the representatives of the early Irish church, we must conclude that this latter church professed obedience to the Chair of St. Peter, and devoutly received the doctrine that it taught.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

EUTYCHIANISM, AND THE COUNCIL OF CHALCEDON.

Eutyches was a monk, as most heresiarchs have been, in illustration of the motto "corruptio optimi pessima." His position as Archimandrite of the most famous monastery of Constantinople, gave him considerable influence, and at first he used it well in the cause of truth, being most ardent in combatting the heresy of Nestorius. But his zeal lacked the foundation of theological knowledge, and hence he easily fell into an error which was simply the extreme opposite of the one he attacked. St. Leo, in a letter to Pulcheria, says that his heresy "was born rather of ignorance than of subtlety," and in his epist. 19, he styles him "an unlearned defender of the ancient faith." He presented the two Natures as coalesced into one in the Person of Christ; asserting that our Lord was of or from two Natures, but not in two Natures. According to him, the two Natures, which subsisted before the union, became one after it, and hence came the corollary that Christ was not of our substance in the flesh. This error soon spread beyond the monastery, and by the year 448 it had become pretty well known. An intimate friend of Eutyches, Eusebius of Dorylaeum, tried in vain to correct the theologaster, and finally laid the matter before Flavian, bishop of Constantinople. This prelate was at that time (449) holding a Synod of his suffragans, and when the bishops heard the complaint, they begged Euse-bis, in the name of ancient friendship, to again undertake the task of fraternal correction. But when he assured them that there was no prospect of success, they sent to the monastery an order commanding the presence of Eutyches in the Synod. The abbot replied that his vow would not permit him to leave his monastery; that the accusation of Eusebius was the result of enmity; that he was ready to sign the decrees of Nice and Ephesus, but that he would not follow the whims of the bishops when he deemed them contrary to truth; that he acknowledged one Nature in the Incarnate God; and that, in fine, he relied upon the Scriptures alone, as being of more weight than the expositions of the fathers. The Synod now summoned the recusant again and again, and after the third citation he sent several monks to report that he was sick, and to answer in his name the questions of the fathers. Flavian, however, repeated the injunction for the personal attendance of Eutyches, for he well knew that the excuse was a lie. During the interval that passed before the next session of the Synod, the obstinate monk used his influence at the imperial court (1) to obtain from Theodosius a rescript, drawn up ostensibly in the interests of peace, but calculated to terrify the more weak of the prelates. When the Synod resumed its sessions, Eutyches entered the hall with a turbulent crowd of his brethren, flanked by a band of Praetorian guards, headed by the Great Silentarius (2) of the emperor. But the bishops were not deterred from the fulfilment of their duty. They listened to the mandate of Theodosius with respect, and then proceeded to business. They carefully questioned Eutyches, and the result of the investigation was the following sentence delivered by Flavian: "Eutyches, once a priest and archimandrite, has been found infected with the errors of Valentine and Apollinarius, and to unchangeably agree with their blasphemies; he has not revered our persuasions and teaching, nor consented to the right doctrine. Whence with tears and groans

(1) The eunuch Chrysaphius, first chamberlain to Theodosius, was godson of Eutyches and devoted to him. When Flavian was consecrated, this officer applied to him for the usual present to the emperor, of which, of course, he was to have a share. The bishop gave him, instead of golden leaves, some of pure bread. From that day, Chrysaphius moved the court, especially the feminine element, with intrigues against him. NICEPHORUS, b. 14, c. 46.

(2) This officer was the first counsellor of the Byzantine rulers, and was styled "Silentarius" from the secrecy necessary in his functions.

we have decreed his perfect perdition through our Lord Jesus Christ, whom he has blasphemed, and he is deprived of every sacerdotal office, of our communion, and of the rule of his monastery ; all knowing this, that if henceforth they speak or treat with him, they themselves incur the pain of excommunication." To this decree subscribed thirty-two bishops, as judges, and twenty-three abbots as assenting (1).

Eutyches now appealed to Pope St. Leo I., and endeavored to secure the intercession of St. Peter Chrysologus, bishop of Ravenna. The latter declined to interfere, but wrote, "In all things we exhort thee to obediently attend to what is written by the Most Blessed Pope of Rome, for the Blessed Peter, who lives and presides in his own See, gives to seekers the truths of faith." In his appeal to Pope Leo, Eutyches declared that Eusebius had shown nothing wrong in his belief ; that he had been deprived of his rights, although he professed the Nicene faith. As Flavian had not yet written to the Pontiff upon these matters, St. Leo applied for information to that prelate and to Theodosius. Flavian immediately replied, enclosing the Acts of the Synod which had condemned Eutyches. Soon after the receipt of Flavian's letter, the Pontiff sent the celebrated Dogmatic Epistle which was afterwards read at Chalcedon, and of which we shall treat at some length. By the help of the eunuch Chrysaphius, Eutyches now prevailed upon Theodosius to call a Synod at Ephesus, for an examination of his case, and lest his sentence should be confirmed, if the Papal legates were to preside, he induced the emperor to issue an edict conferring the presidency upon Dioscorus of Alexandria. This Synod was attended by 130 bishops, and by four Papal legates. These latter, when they became aware of the violation of the Pontifical rights by Dioscorus, demanded that their credentials should be read, and Dioscorus swore to do so ; again and again the demand was repeated, and each time it was evaded. Therefore, though they remained as witnesses, the legates took no official part in the proceedings. Theodosius, deceived by Chrysaphius, regarded Flavian as a wicked cause of all the Eutychian tumults, and in a rescript to Elpidius, Count of the Consistory, which was afterwards read in the first Action of the Council of Chalcedon, he excluded from the right of suffrage not only Flavian, but all the bishops who had condemned Eutyches, and gave to Elpidius constabular authority to enforce the decision. In this Synod, held in 449, Eutyches was restored to communion and to the government of his monastery; Flavian and Eusebius of Dorylæum were deposed from their sees. When some of the bishops threw themselves at the feet of Dioscorus in intercession for Flavian, the soldiers and monks fell upon them with blows. A scene of horror ensued, in the midst of which the Papal legates protested, and Flavian appealed to Rome. This intrepid prelate was then attacked by the monks, headed, according to the testimony of many bishops in the fourth Action of Chalcedon, by the abbot Barsumas. So severely was he wounded that he died a few days after, while being carried into exile. From this epitome of the facts, may be gathered the wisdom of those who styled this assemblage at Ephesus a "Robber Synod." Theodosius not only refused to allow a reconsideration of the Acts of this Synod, but he made an express law as to the respect to be shown for them. This emperor died in the year 450, and his successor, Marcianus, agreed to forward St. Leo's project of a General Council to heal the wounds of the Church.

This Council at first met in Nicæa of Bithynia, in September, 451, but for the convenience of Marcianus and the senate, who wished to witness the proceedings, the fathers adjourned to Chalcedon, a town not far from the capital. The Pontifical legates were Paschasinus, bishop of Marsala, Lucentius, bishop of Ascoli, and the priests Boniface and Basil; to these was afterwards joined the bishop Julian. The number of bishops in attendance was nearly six hundred.

As to the convocation of the Council of Chalcedon, much need not be said. Alexandre holds that it was convoked by Marcian, with the consent of St. Leo; but his arguments do not prove that it was not convoked by the Pope, with the consent and assistance of the emperor. That Marcian faithfully labored to make the Council a success, as did Constantine in the case of Nice, is certain, but his letters to the Pontiff and his actions in the Council go to show that, no more than Constantine, did he wish to encroach upon the prerogative of Rome. In the epistle of Valentinian and Marcian to St. Leo, which was read in the first part of the Council, occur these words: "We deem it right in the beginning to address your Holiness as possessing the principality in the episcopacy, inviting and praying, &c." These words do not indicate any disposition upon the part of the emperor to usurp the initiative in the matter of convocation, nor do the following: "If it pleases your Blessedness to come into these parts, and to celebrate a Synod, deign to do so for love of religion, and you will certainly satisfy our wishes, and point out what will be useful to religion. If, however, it is laborious for you to come hither, let your Holiness manifest it to us by letter, so that our letters may be sent through the entire East, and into Thrace and Illyria, for all the bishops to meet in some definite place, where it may please us, to dispose things for the good of the Christian religion and the Catholic Faith, as your Holiness, according to the rules of the Church, may define." If the authority of the Supreme Pontiff had not been invoked for the summoning of the Council, the legate Lucentius would not have so confidently accused Dioscorus, because "when he had no power to judge, he presumed and dared to hold a Synod, without the authority of the Apostolic See, which was never done, nor was permitted to be done." Pope Gelasius, in his letter to the bishops of Dardania, says that, "The Apostolic See alone decreed that the Synod of Chalcedon should be held." To this testimony Alexandre says that in his Roman Synod the same Pope spoke "otherwise," when he declared that the Roman Church accepted "the Holy Synod of Chalcedon, congregated by means of Marcianus." But Gelasius does not here speak "otherwise." In this very phrase "by means of" (in the original, mediante) lies the very essence of the question. The Council was certainly convoked "by means of" the emperor, when he afforded the aid of his government in summoning the bishops, in procuring them safe and free transit to and from the place of meeting, in entertaining them, &c. The far-reaching and well-organized machinery of the imperial government was made to take the place held now by the post-office, and without it the summonses could scarcely have been served; the same machinery was necessary to secure the prompt attendance of the Synodals. In this sense of aiding the Roman Pontiff, and in no other, did Marcian convoke the Council.

In noting the Actions of the Council, we shall speak only of the most important, and with the brevity which becomes our limits. In the first Action, at the instance of the Papal legates, it was resolved that Dioscorus could not sit in the Synod as a judge, but that he might be placed in the middle as a culprit. The Acts of the Constantinopolitan Synod of Flavian and of the Robber Synod of Ephesus were read, and Flavian and Eusebius of Dorylæum were vindicated from the charges brought against them. The same punishment was decreed to the leaders of the Robber Synod as they had pronounced upon their victims. In the second Action, the Faith was considered. The Symbols of Nice and Constantinople were read; also, the two Synodical Epistles of St. Cyril, and the Dogmatic Epistle of St. Leo to Flavian, the latter being received by the bishops with the cry of "Peter has spoken through Leo," and with other devout acclamations. Then a debate ensued about Dioscorus, some exclaiming "Dioscorus to exile," "Christ has condemned Dioscorus," "He who communicates with Dioscorus is a Jew;" others crying out, "We all have sinned, let all be pardoned." In the third Action, by order of the legates, were read the accusations made by Eusebius of Dorylæum against Dioscorus. Thrice summoned to appear, the culprit refused to obey. Then the Papal legates pronounced sentence against him for having received Eutyches into communion when he had been canonically excommunicated; for having prevented the reading of Pope Leo's Epistle to Flavian at the Robber Synod; for pretending to excommunicate the Pontiff; for having contemned the Council. "Hence," they said, "by us and through the present Holy Synod, the Most Holy and Most Blessed Leo,

Archbishop of the great and senior Rome, together with the thrice Blessed, and worthy of all praise, Apostle Peter, who is the rock and foundation of the Catholic Church, and the basis of right Faith, has denuded him of the episcopal dignity and removed him from every Sacerdotal ministry." In the fourth Action, the fathers accorded a delay of five days before they would proceed to an inquisition on faith, in order that Anatolius of Constantinople, and a number of those who had subscribed to Pope Leo's Epistle, might explain certain of its passages to some of the bishops. When they again met, all the Synodals subscribed to the document. It was then ordered that a certain petition should be read which a large number of abbots and monks had presented to Marcian, asking him to bring about another Synod, as they could not recognize the present one as general, since Dioscorus was excluded from a seat among the judges. When asked to subscribe to the Dogmatic Epistle of the Pontiff, the monks refused, declaring that this requirement was of a piece with the system of persecution which the secular clergy always exercised towards them. The meek creatures finally threatened to withdraw from the communion of those bishops who would vote for anything contrary to their humble petition. At this juncture, Ætius, archdeacon of Constantinople, read a canon of a Council of Antioch, in which it was ordained that any one suspending his own communion, and refusing to obey his bishop, if he ordered the suspended to return, should be degraded forever; that if he should cause sedition in the Church, he should be handed over to the secular power. To this canon, the fathers assented. In the fifth Action, a definition of faith was read, but the Papal legates and some Orientals contended that it was not sufficient to declare that Christ is "from two Natures;" that it should be stated that He is "in two Natures, inconfusedly, immutably, and undividedly." Thus it was finally arranged. In the sixth Action, the emperor Marcian was present, and he presented certain decrees to the Council, recommending their adoption. "There are certain Chapters," he said "which we have reserved in honor to your Reverences, deeming it proper that such things should be regularly established in this Synod, rather than by our law." The first of these decrees prohibited monks from building monasteries without the consent of the bishop; the second ordered clergymen not to engage in secular business; the third prevented clerics from passing from one diocese to another, at their own free will. In the next eight Actions, were considered the causes of many individual bishops; among others, those of Theodoret, and Ibas of Edessa, who were restored to their sees. In the fifteenth Action, while the Papal legates were absent, the Synod edited twenty-eight canons, of which the last confirmed the famous Constantinopolitan canon conferring the first place after Rome upon Constantinople. In the sixteenth Action, the legates demanded the reading of the twenty-eighth canon and requested the fathers to reflect upon the circumvention which must have been used ere they were compelled to sign the "non-*conscrib*ed canons which they mentioned" (1). The bishops chafed at the word "compelled," and cried out that "no one was forced to sign." Then the legate Lucentius, persisting in his opposition, Ætius, archdeacon of Constantinople, asked if the Pope had included this opposition in his instructions. The legate Boniface replied by reading from the Diploma of Legation, the following: "Suffer not the Constitutions of the Holy Fathers to be violated or diminished by any temerity, preserving in every way the dignity of our person in yourselves, whom we have sent in our place; and if it chances that any city, confused by its splendor, tries any usurpation, repel the attempt with becoming constancy." Nevertheless, the bishops persisted in editing the canon, whereupon Lucentius protested in these terms: "The Holy See commanded that everything should be done in our presence; therefore we ask of your Sublimities that you order to be cancelled all that was consummated yesterday in our absence; otherwise, let our contradiction cling to those proceedings, as we shall know what to refer to the Apostolic and Principal Bishop of the Church, that he may pronounce sentence as to the disregard of the canons and as to the injury offered to his See."

(1) The legates styled the Constantinopolitan canons "non-conscripti" because the Holy See had not received them.

Our attention is now claimed by the Dogmatic Epistle sent by Pope St. Leo to Flavian of Constantinople, when he had received from that prelate a copy of the Acts of the Synod held by him against Eutyches. The Acts of the Council of Chalcedon show that this epistle was received by the fathers with acclamations of joy and of praise, but the adversaries of Papal infallibility hold that, before the bishops gave their assent to the doctrine contained therein, they subjected it to a juridical examination. That such was not the case, but that the fathers of Chalcedon received the letter of the Pontiff as an authoritative and infallible exposition of Catholic doctrine, we now proceed to demonstrate. But it is well to know at once in what light the Pontiff himself regarded this letter. It is certain that when the Robber Synod was about to be held, St. Leo declared that no doubt was to be entertained as to the heresy of Eutyches, since in his epistle to Flavian he had made plain the Catholic doctrine. In his letter to Theodosius, written immediately after the one to Flavian, he says that he has sent legates to Ephesus, "in order that, because there can be no doubt as to what is Christian doctrine, the gravity of the whole error may be condemned, and he who has erred may experience sacerdotal benevolence, if he asks for pardon. As to what the Catholic Church universally believes and teaches upon the Incarnation of our Lord, it is more fully contained in the letters which I have sent to our brother bishop, Flavian." Writing to the bishops congregated at Ephesus, he plainly tells them what they are to do; he says that his legates "will establish what will be pleasing to the Lord; that is, at once the pestiferous error being condemned, let the restoration be considered of him who has imprudently erred; provided, of course, that he accepts the true doctrine, and that he clearly and openly, with his own voice and hand, condemns the heretical ideas into which his ignorance has led him." In another letter to Theodosius (No. 17), he says that he needed not to have called a Synod, which certainly indicates that he did not wish his decision to be critically examined. The mind of St. Leo is made more clear to us by his saying to the fathers of Chalcedon, "In my vicars I am now present, who but lately was not absent in the teaching of the Catholic faith ; that you, who cannot ignore what we must believe from ancient tradition, may not doubt as to what we desire. Wherefore, most dear brethren, the audacity of dispute against divinely inspired faith being left aside, let vain infidelity of error subside. Let not that be defended which cannot be believed, since by the letters which we sent to bishop Flavian of blessed memory, it has been most fully and lucidly declared, according to evangelical authority, according to the voices of the prophets, and according to Apostolic doctrine, what is the pious and sincere confession in regard to the Incarnation of our Lord Jesus Christ." The writer of these words would assuredly be surprised, did he hear that his teaching was subjected to critical disquisition. In his letter of instructions to the bishop Julian, whom he joined to the legation of Chalcedon, probably on the death of Julius of Puteoli, St. Leo says, "I have written to our brother Flavian sufficient for you and the Universal Church to learn the ancient and singular faith which the ignorant opponent has attacked, that which we hold as divinely delivered, and which we undeviatingly preach." Does this sound like the language of one who expected his instructions to be weighed and discounted? When the news of the disgusting scenes at the Pseudo-Synod of Ephesus arrived at Rome, the Pontiff wrote again to Theodosius, and ascribed much of the wickedness of that body to the cunning of Dioscorus in withholding the letter to Flavian, for, said he, "If the Alexandrian bishop had permitted our letter to Flavian to reach the ears of the bishops, all the noise of dispute would have been quieted by the manifestation of that most pure faith which by divine inspiration we have received and hold." And when it was finally determined to hold the Council of Chalcedon, and he selected Paschasinus as his first legate, he sent to him a copy of the epistle to Flavian, saying, "I have sent to you, to be diligently studied and learned, the epistle which we sent to Flavian of blessed memory about this matter, and which the Universal Church receives."

And now for the manner in which the Council of Chalcedon received this epistle. That the Council acknowledged a really dominative power in the Pontiff may be seen at once from its obedience to his mandate that Dioscorus should not judge in the Synod, but only be heard. In the first Action, the legate Paschasinus said, "We have in our hands the commands of the Most Blessed and Apostolic Pope of Rome, which is the head of all the churches, by which his Apostleship has deigned to order that Dioscorus, the Archbishop of the Alexandrians, shall not sit in the Council, but may be admitted as a hearer." Evagrius, b. 2, c. 4, tells us how the Synod obeyed. "There were present in the Council, the bishops Paschasinus and Lucentius, Vicars of Leo; also Dioscorus, bishop of Alexandria, to whose number were added the chief senators, to whom the Vicars of Leo declared that Dioscorus should not sit with them in the Council, as so it had been decreed by their bishop Leo; that if it were not so observed, they would go out of the church. Which when they had said, and by order of the senate Dioscorus had been placed, &c." But to come nearer to the point, why should the fathers of Chalcedon have wished to subject the epistle of Leo to the crucial test, when already, throughout the world, it had been regarded as definitive? Not only in the East, but in the West, it was already regarded as a declaration of orthodoxy, and a subscription to it was the test of faith. Thus, we find the emperor Marcian declaring that, if the Pontiff could not come to the East, all the bishops would agree with what he had defined; we hear the bishops of Gaul (Ballerini, epist. 68) designating the epistle as one approved of by the whole Church; we see it sent to all the metropolitans to be subscribed by them (act. 4, Conc. Chalced.) But let us come to the Council. In the first Action, a question was raised as to the faith of Flavian, and it was settled at once when the Papal legates declared that he believed whatever Leo proposed to be believed. Is this acquiescence likely on the part of men about to doubt of the criterion? In the second Action, the fathers declined to frame a new exposition of faith, on the ground that the Nicene, Constantinopolitan, and Ephesine decrees were sufficient for Arius and Nestorius, and Pope Leo's epistle settled the question of Eutyches. Were they about to examine the decrees of the three general Councils? In this session, the epistle was read, and these were the cries that accompanied and followed it: "This is the faith of the fathers, and of the Apostles. We all thus believe. Anathema to him who believes not thus. Peter has spoken through Leo. The Apostles so taught. Leo and Cyrillus have so taught. Why were these not read at Ephesus? Dioscorus hid them." Of no avail as an argument against us is the delay asked for by Atticus of Nicopolis and a few others, for we read in the records, "Let the session be deferred five days, that those who doubt may be taught. All the bishops exclaimed, 'We believe thus. As Leo believes, so do we. We have already subscribed.'" In the fourth Action, the legates declared that "the letters of the Most Blessed and Apostolic Leo, Pope of the Universal Church, condemning the heresies of Nestorius and Eutyches, have explained what is the true faith. Similarly, therefore, the Holy Synod holds this faith, and follows it; nothing can it add or subtract." And when some of the Egyptian bishops sought to evade an open condemnation of Eutyches, the Synod insisted upon their immediate subscription of the Pontiff's epistle, stigmatizing as a heretic any one refusing to obey. In the face of all these facts, it is plain that the fathers of the Council of Chalcedon, from the very beginning, respected Pope St. Leo's epistle as a certain rule of faith.

Alexandre agrees with Bossuet in finding a proof of the superiority of a Council over the Roman Pontiff in the fact that Pope Leo allowed the cause of Dioscorus to be treated at Ephesus and at Chalcedon, even though he had issued his Dogmatic Epistle. And he adduces the testimony of the Pope himself to show that he believed in this superiority; for in his Synodical Epistle to the fathers at Ephesus, St. Leo says that the emperor wished for a Council, "in order that, by a fuller judgment, every error might be swept away." But we have already seen that the Pope told Flavian that the affair "needed no treatment whatever by a Synod;" that he told Theodosius that 'for reasonable causes he should refrain from calling a Synod;' we have heard St. Peter Chrysologus advising Eutyches to obediently attend to what the Roman Pontiff would write, because "the Blessed Peter shows to seekers the true faith." If, in the face of all this, at the request of the emperor, a Council was called, the Pontiff so permitted, not because he thought an œcumenical Synod superior to himself, but to repress the contumacy of the heretics, by leaving them no possible excuse for their obstinacy. Indeed, asks Roncaglia (1), in treating of this objection of Bossuet, who ever heard an inferior judge declare that a superior tribunal was supererogatory in his regard? And yet, in the supposition of Bossuet, such would have been the presumption of St. Leo. Again, in his epistle to the fathers at Nicea (afterwards at Chalcedon) the Pontiff forbade any disputation upon faith, because he had already, in his epistle to Flavian, fully explained what was to be believed. Writing this, could he have dreamed of a critical examination of his letter? St. Leo assented to the holding of a General Council, concludes Roncaglia, but in it he was to be dominant; what he desired, was to be done; disputes were to be avoided, and his Dogmatic Epistle to Flavian was to be the rule of faith in the matter of Eutychianism. But, it is urged, be all this as it may, the Chalcedon fathers did, nevertheless, institute a judicial inquisition into the letter to Flavian, for the method of subscription adopted by the prelates can be understood in no other supposition. Having read the letter, and found it concordant with the doctrines of the first two Œcumenical Councils, the bishops signed their names in this guise: "It agrees, and I have subscribed;" "Having found it to agree, I have subscribed;" "Persuaded that it agrees in all, I signed." These subscriptions are certainly sufficiently formal, but they do not necessarily indicate that their authors had held a judicial, rather than an informatory, examination of the document. Besides, many of these subscribers had long before assented to this epistle as to a test of their orthodoxy; why, then, should they now inquire into its value? But let us look a little closely into the Acts of the Council. In the fourth Action, when the Apostolic legates declared that the Epistle of

(1) Animadversions on Alexandre's 12th Dissertation, 5th Century; § 3.

Pope Leo contained the true faith, and that the Synod "could not add nor subtract from it," the bishops exclaimed, "We all thus believe; so we were baptized, so we baptize." And this declaration as to not adding to, nor subtracting from, the letter, was made before its comparison with the doctrine of Nice and Ephesus. When, therefore, they afterwards approved of the document, they did so, not because anything was wanting to render it irrefragable, but that they might show that they acknowledged in it an authoritative teaching as to the Incarnation of our Lord. That this is the proper view to take of their action, is made manifest by what followed in the fifth Action. The fathers had framed a Profession of Faith, and cried out that he was a heretic who would not sign it. But the legates protested that it was not proper, and demanded that it should be amended, so as to be thoroughly consonant with the Epistle of the Pontiff, saying, "If it does not agree with the letter of the Apostolic and Most Blessed Pope Leo, order a rescript to be given to us, that we may return; and there let the Synod be completed." The bishops yielded, thereby showing that they held no heterodox notions as to the reformability of a Papal decree by a General Council, and that their examination of the Epistle to Flavian was merely for a better understanding of its contents.

The defenders of the doctrine that a General Council is superior to the Roman Pontiff bring forward another testimony to their theory from Pope St. Leo. In a letter (No. 120) to Theodoret, written after the Council of Chalcedon, the Pontiff thus alludes to his Epistle to Flavian. "When certain persons, incited by the author of dissension, entered upon a war of contradiction, there came about a greater good from the Dispenser of all good things. . . . the truth itself more clearly shines forth, and is more firmly held, when, that which faith has first taught, an examination afterwards confirms. The value of the sacerdotal office is really resplendent, when the authority of superiors is so respected, that in nothing appears diminished the liberty of inferiors." According to our opponents, the Pontiff here acknowledges that after his Epistle had been communicated to the bishops of Chalcedon, doubt was yet legitimate, and that an examination was held upon its contents which resulted in its confirmation. This objection has already been, at least implicitly, answered. Do its propounders think that St. Leo had forgotten his instructions to his legates, that nothing written in the letter to Flavian should be questioned in the Synod? But looking into this letter to Theodoret, we find the Pontiff affirming that the Lord Himself had defined the truth in his Epistle to Flavian. Did he believe that there was any deficiency of authority in the definition by God? We hear that the doubts alluded to were incited by the demon, and this certainly shows there was no foundation for them. And of what nature was this examination, which "confirmed" the teaching of the Pope? The approbation of others does not necessarily imply their superiority. In this very matter of the authority of Councils, St. Chrysostom (hom. 52) holds that the consent of the world confirmed the decrees of Nice, but were those decrees fallible until that assent was given? Facundus (b. 7) says that antiquity added weight to the Council of Ephesus. And the Council of Chalcedon itself, an assemblage of 600 bishops, presided over by the legates of the Holy See, underwent "confirmation" and "approbation," by order of the emperor Leo, and not only at the hands of bishops, but from such monks as were conspicuous for sanctity (1). It will be said that these prelates only gave a testimony as to their faith, when they "examined" and signed the decrees of Chalcedon. And just so, we answer, did the fathers of Chalcedon, when they "examined" and signed the Pontifical Epistle to Flavian.

(1) LIBERATUS; c. 14. FACUNDUS; b. 12.

CHAPTER XXIX.

THE ACACIAN SCHISM.

The seeds of the great Greek schism of the 9th century were sown several centuries before the baneful crop finally matured, and bore its poisonous fruit. If a mistaken idea of one's own dignity is often dangerous to the individual man, it is just as dangerous to a community whose leaders foster that spirit for the gratification of their own ambition. When the clergy, and through them the people of Constantinople, clamored for an ecclesiastical recognition of the dignity of "the younger Rome," their consciences certainly acquitted them of any designs on the peace of Christendom. But when they had obtained that recognition; when, in spite of the repugnance of far-seeing Rome, their bishop had been accorded an ecclesiastical rank above that of the venerable sees of Alexandria and Antioch; they but too often found that the newly-acquired pre-eminence was only an excitant to an appetite appeasable only by universal domination. At the time of which we are about to treat, the successor of the humble suffragan of Heraclea had not yet dared to claim the style of "universal patriarch," but he often exhibited an arrogance which caused the other patriarchs to chafe, and rendered the Supreme Pontiff chary of contributing in any way to his vanity. Under the Providence of God, it was only because the Byzantine empire was not yet sufficiently corrupt to give him the opportunity, that Acacius did not anticipate the work of Photius. As it was, he succeeded in inaugurating a schism which desolated the East for thirty-seven years. A sketch of the political history of the time will be necessary, that the reader may understand the full significance of the events which we are about to relate.

Upon the death of the emperor Marcian in the year 457, a military tribune named Leo, a Thracian by birth, was proclaimed his successor by the army; and, through the exertions of two powerful patricians, Aspar, and his son Ardaburus, the senate confirmed him in the dignity. Leo was a firm Catholic, and hence, from the beginning of his reign, he insisted upon an exact observance of the decrees of Chalcedon, which the Eutychians used to evade in every possible manner. In the year 468, having concerted measures with the Western emperor, Anthymius, for the repression of Genseric the Vandal, he despatched a fleet to Africa under the command of Basiliscus, his brother-in-law. Through the cowardice of Basiliscus, the expedition failed, and the leader paid the penalty in exile. In the meantime, Aspar, to whom in a measure Leo owed his throne, had become hostile to his cause, and to oppose him, the emperor raised an Isaurian general named Zeno to the consulate, and gave him his daughter in marriage. But the inferiority of Zeno soon forced Leo to seek a reconciliation with Aspar, and he fulfilled his promise to make Ardaburus Cæsar. However, in a short time he put both father and son to death for conspiracy. Leo died in 474, leaving as successor, a five-year old grandson, Leo II., son of Zeno by the princess Ariadne. Zeno became regent, and the imperial child dying, he donned the purple. But Basiliscus, the cowardly brother-in-law of Leo I., now came to the front, and in the year 475 (1) he mounted the throne. Looking around for friends to secure his precarious tenure of power, he thought he might rely upon the Eutychians, if he could bind them with ties of gratitude. He therefore issued an Encyclical, in which he presumed to abrogate the decrees of the Council of Chalcedon, and many bishops subscribed to it. Acacius, bishop of Constantinople, now came forward as the champion of the Church. But the event proved that he was incited, not by a pure zeal for religion, but by inordinate ambition. Among the canons of Chalcedon, as we have seen, was the famous 28th, giving to the "younger Rome" the second place in the hierarchy. Were this canon abrogated, Acacius would be indeed humbled, and to save it, he now posed as the strenuous defender of all the decrees. That we are guilty of no injustice to Acacius in denying that he respected all the religious decrees of Chalcedon, is fully proved by his satisfaction with the edict which Basiliscus afterwards issued, in which, while revoking the Encyclical, that emperor says nothing about the honor due to the religious enactments of the fourth Council, but is very precise about the restoration to Acacius of his suffragan dioceses.

(1) So holds Muratori; Pagi assigns the rebellion to the year 476. But there are many laws extant which were promulgated by Zeno in 476: therefore, he had recovered his crown in that year.

When Acacius saw that the newly born dignity of his see was endangered, he used all his influence to excite resistance to the Encyclical. He doffed the brilliant robes of his office and appeared only in garments of sombre color; his episcopal throne, and even the altar, were draped in mourning. The people, who were, as a rule, thoroughly orthodox, were soon on the verge of sedition. They persuaded the mystic, Daniel the Stylite, to come down from his column, and to preach in the capital; he denounced all manner of evils to the tyrant, and produced such an impression that finally Basiliscus yielded. Throwing himself at the feet of the ascetic, he implored pardon, recalled the Encyclical, and confirmed the patriarchal privileges of Constantinople. But his retreat was of no avail. Zeno returned from his exile in Isauria, and though Basiliscus tried hard to win over the Catholics to his side, he was soon deposed and sent into Cappadocia to die of starvation. Acacius had now gained his point; it remains to be seen how his true character showed itself in his relations with the dissensions which were at this time rending the churches of Alexandria and Antioch. A retrospect is now necessary.

When Dioscorus was deposed from the see of Alexandria, Proterius was elected to fill the vacancy. But many of the people still clamored for Dioscorus, and so violent were they in their demonstrations, that Proterius was forced to employ a military guard for his protection. Shortly after his accession, Proterius condemned a certain Timothy Ælurus, and a deacon called Peter Moggus, who, out of sympathy for the deposed Dioscorus, refused to obey the new bishop. When the news of the death of the emperor Marcian arrived in Egypt, the Eutychians thought it safe to invade the patriarchal see. During the festivities of Holy Week of the year 457, a ferocious horde entered

Alexandria, broke into the baptistery of the church whither the bishop had fled, barbarously killed him, burned his body, and scattered his ashes to the winds. Some of them went so far as to devour portions of the burnt flesh (1). Leo I. had now become emperor, and the Alexandrian clergy besought him to punish the murder of Proterius, and to expel Timothy Ælurus, whom the heretics had thrust into the patriarchal chair. The Eutychians also had recourse to the throne, announcing that they received the Councils of Nice and Ephesus, but repudiating that of Chalcedon, and demanding the confirmation of Timothy Ælurus. Leo referred the question to Anatolius of Constantinople, who held a Synod of all the bishops then in the capital, and vindicated the Council of Chalcedon, and condemned Timothy. Anatolius sent an account of his action to Pope St. Leo, and this Pontiff wrote several letters to the emperor, urging him not to grant the demands of the Eutychians, who wished for another General Council to reconsider the decrees of Chalcedon. The emperor at length put a temporary end to the Alexandrian troubles by exiling Timothy to the Chersonese. Another Timothy, called Salophaciolus, was now legitimately elected to the see of Alexandria, and ruled in comparative peace until the year 461, when Timothy Ælurus reappeared, and the lawful bishop was expelled by the Eutychians. When Pope Simplicius heard of these events, he wrote to Acacius, and made him Apostolic legate, that he might the more efficaciously labor for the expulsion of Ælurus, and for the denial of the demand of the heretics for another Council. Ælurus finally poisoned himself, in the year 478, and the Eutychians replaced him with Peter Moggus. The latter was expelled from the see by order of Zeno, and the legitimate bishop, Timothy Salophaciolus, restored. Upon his death in the year 482, Timothy was succeeded by John Talaja, but this prelate was opposed by Zeno, incited by Acacius, whose anger had been aroused against Talaja, because he had not been formerly notified of the election. Talaja had written to the Pope and the patriarch Calendion of Antioch, and his omission of a notice to

(1) EYAGRIUS; b. 2, c. 8.

Constantinople, certainly appeared to indicate, in the mind of Acacius, that he agreed with Rome in rejecting the famous 28th canon of Chalcedon. Acacius now suggested to Zeno that it would be a good thing, in the interests of peace, to restore Peter Moggus to Alexandria, as he was in reality acceptable to all, and would readily support the Henoticon which Zeno had just issued (1). John Talaja was therefore deposed, and Peter seated in his place. In answering the letters informing him of the state of affairs, Pope Simplicius said that, in consequence of the serious allegations brought against Talaja (2), he had not yet sent him communicatory letters, but that he was astonished at the restoration of so pronounced a heretic as Peter Moggus; he would not restore Moggus to communion, even though he now professed the true faith, until he had done penance for his sins (3). In the year 483, Talaja appealed to Pope Simplicius, and the Pontiff wrote in his favor to Acacius. But this arrogant prelate would not forgive Talaja's seeming disrespect to his superior dignity. Pope Felix III., however, made Talaja bishop of Nola, which diocese he ruled for many years. Peter Moggus finally anathematized the decrees of Chalcedon and the Dogmatic Epistle of St. Leo, and fiercely persecuted the Catholics; notwithstanding which, Acacius persevered in his communion.

Having seen how Acacius conducted himself in reference to the dissensions of Alexandria, we will now give a brief sketch of his connection with an equally miserable condition of things in Antioch. One of the intimate friends of Zeno, at the time he was consul under the emperor Leo, was a certain priest named Peter, who was also surnamed Fullo, he having followed the fuller's craft while he was a monk. Settling in Antioch, Fullo began to preach the heresy of the Theopaschites, teaching, that is, that in the Crucifixion, the Divinity was affixed to the cross and placed in the sepulchre. Martyrius, the bishop, complained of him to

(1) This edict was suggested to Zeno by Acacius as a "unitive" measure, but it injured the Church very much, inasmuch as, while it condemned Nestorius and Eutyches, and approved the twelve Chapters of St. Cyril, it was silent as to Dioscorus, and said nothing about St. Leo's Dogmatic Epistle and the Chalcedon Definition of Faith.

(2) Acacius had charged him with violating an oath, taken never to accept the see of Alexandria; also with having obtained his election by bribery.

(3) Epist. 17

the emperor Leo, and that prince issued a decree prohibiting any monk from disputing on religious matters before the people. At length, Martyrius was exhausted by the tumults and seditions, which, under the protection of Zeno, the rebel continued to excite, and abdicated his see, saying, "I renounce a clergy without morals, a rebellious people, and a contaminated church; having preserved, in the meantime, my own sacerdotal dignity" (1). Fullo now seized the episcopal chair, but was soon deposed by a Synod. and exiled to the desert by Leo. Julian was elected to fill the vacancy, but when Basiliscus came to power, he ordered the restoration of Fullo, which caused Julian to die of grief. One of the first episcopal acts of Fullo was to consecrate a man very much like himself, a certain John, already under a Synodal censure, as bishop of Apame. But his people not receiving him, John was resolved to be a bishop somewhere, so he rose against Fullo, deposed him, and for three months was satisfied. But he was soon deposed by a provincial Synod, and Stephen was elected. In the year 479, this bishop fell under the murderous hands of a number of Eutychian schoolboys, who dispatched him with their sharpened writing reeds. Upon the election of Stephen "the Younger," Zeno (now emperor) sent his old friend Fullo into exile in Pontus. In three years' time, the see of Antioch was again vacant, and Calendion became bishop. And now Acacius had another opportunity to show the spirit that animated him. In the year 484, he presumed to depose Calendion, ostensibly because he was unfaithful to the emperor, but really because he held communion with Pope Felix and John Talaja. Acacius then brought out of exile the famous Peter Fullo, and restored him to his usurped see.

Having read this sketch of the iniquities of Acacius, the reader will not be surprised to hear that immediately upon the receipt of the news of the restoration of Fullo, Pope Felix III. held a Synod of 43 bishops, in which Acacius, Fullo, and Moggus were solemnly condemned. The sentence was made known at Constantinople by Tutus, "Defender" of the Roman Church, and secretly affixed to the pallium of Acacius while at the foot of the altar, by some unknown monk. Supported by the friendship of the imperial court, Acacius exercised his ministry until his death, which occurred in the year 488. But the schism did not cease with him. His successor, Fravitas, sent Synodical letters to Peter Moggus, asserting that he did not communicate with the Roman Pontiff; he sent others to Pope Felix III., saying that he held aloof from Moggus. Which was truth, and which a lie, matters little; it is certain that he refused to remove the name of Acacius from the dyptichs, and thereby entailed upon himself the loss of communion with Felix. After a three months' rule, Fravitas died, and was succeeded by Euphemius, who would not communicate with Moggus, restored the name of Felix to the dyptichs, and held a lengthy correspondence with that Pontiff, and with Gelasius, but as he "feared" to erase the name of Acacius from the Ecclesiastical Tables, he never attained to communion with Rome. After Euphemius, came Macedon, a prelate of orthodox faith and of pure life. He incurred the enmity of the court by his inflexibility, and the emperor Anastasius induced some children to accuse him of immorality, and then sent him into exile. About the year 514, serious attempts were initiated to reconcile the church of Constantinople with the Holy See, and they came from the Eastern emperor, moved by fear of a certain "Master of the Soldiery," Vitalian, who had drawn the sword in the cause of the faith. When Anastasius felt himself driven to the wall by Vitalian, he wrote to Pope Hormisdas, referring all questions of faith and the causes of all the exiled bishops to the Pontiff, and asking for a Council to restore peace to the Church. Hormisdas sent four legates to the capital, with instructions not to accord ecclesiastical communion to the Oriental prelates or to the emperor, unless they subscribed to the faith of Chalcedon, and to the epistles of St. Leo against Nestorius, Eutyches, and Dioscorus. He also enjoined an explicit condemnation of Acacius and Peter Moggus, called the causes of all exiled bishops to the Apostolic See, and ordered the immediate restoration of all exiled orthodox prelates to their sees. Hormisdas also promised the emperor that he would attend the coming Council, waiving the rule of the Roman Pontiffs never to attend Oriental Synods unless by means of their legates. Athanasius dismissed the Papal legates, saying that while he condemned the persons and dogmas of Nestorius and Eutyches, and received the faith of Chalcedon, yet he could not accede to the condemnation of Acacius, for fear of scandalizing the Eastern churches; he hoped, however, that a future Council would settle everything. Hormisdas repeated his efforts for peace in the following year, but the arrogant emperor replied, "We can bear being injured, but not being ordered." In the year 518, the emperor Justin (the Elder) wrote to Pope Hormisdas, asking him to send legates to Constantinople, to finally reconcile that see with that of Peter. Accordingly, in 518, five Papal legates received the signatures of John, bishop of Constantinople, and of the emperor, to a formula of faith sent by the Pontiff. The condemnation of Acacius was accepted, and thus an end was put to the schism.

(1) LIBERATUS; Breviary, c. 18.

CHAPTER XXX.

THE Palmaris SYNOD, AND THE CAUSE OF POPE SYMMACHUS.

Pope Symmachus, a Sardinian by birth, and, at the time of his election, archdeacon of Sumana, ascended the Papal chair on Nov. 22, 498. Italy was at that time dominated by Theodoric the Goth, who having been sent in 488 by the emperor Zeno to crush Odoacer, had founded the line of Gothic kings which was to rule the peninsula until 553, when Narses would restore it to the empire. On the very day that Symmachus undertook the government of the Church, a grievous schism was inaugurated in Rome by the consecration of an anti-Pope, Laurence, of the title of St. Praxedes, whose election by a faction of malcontents had been procured by the money of Festus, a creature of the emperor Anastasius (1). Blood was shed in the streets, and Theodoric interfered, declaring that he should be regarded as Pontiff, who was first elected by a majority of votes. But the schism was not easily healed. Festus, aided by the senator Probinus, accused the Pontiff of various heavy crimes, and sided openly with the Laurentians. The schismatics went so far as to urge Theodoric to appoint a Visitor to Rome, whose province it should be to investigate the charges against Symmachus. Peter, bishop of Altino, was accordingly sent to exercise the ungracious office of inspector into the doings of the Holy See, to the indignation of the Pontiff and the disgust of the faithful. A Synod was convoked by Peter in 501, but the Pope refused to attend it, or in any way countenance it. Theodoric, at this time, was devoting all his energies to the consolidation of his power, and, although an Arian, was desirous of conciliating the Romans. He therefore endeavored to put an end to the schism which his officious representatives had originated. He desired that another Synod should be held, and the Pontiff willingly co-operated. The first session was celebrated (502) in the Julian Basilica; the second in that of the Holy Cross; and the third in the vestibule of St. Peter's, the entrance to which, being designated as palmaris (excellent), has given its name to the whole Synod. Immediately upon entering the Council, Symmachus gave thanks to Theodoric for having furthered the meeting, and openly declared that it had been called by the Pontiff's own desire. In the first session, it was shown that the schismatics had been guilty of violence towards Symmachus, and had wounded many of his attendant clergy. When the Synod referred this crime to the cognizance of Theodoric, that Arian monarch gave an example to Catholic sovereigns as to their duty in treating ecclesiastical causes: "It was for the discretion of the Synod to prescribe what should be done in an affair of such moment; and for the sake of reverence to it, the king had nothing to do with ecclesiastical affairs. He committed to the will of the bishops, to decide what was the more useful, whether to attend to the affair in question, or not; provided that the venerable Council arranged that peace should be enjoyed by all Christians in the Roman city." The Synod then decreed that the cause of Symmachus should be referred to the divine judgment; that he should be regarded as pure of crime, and innocent of the charges brought against him; that he should enjoy all the rights of the Supreme Pontificate, in and outside of the city. As to the schismatic clergy, it was resolved that they should, in mercy, be allowed to retain their benefices, if they gave satisfaction to the Pontiff; if any of them should presume to officiate, without the Papal sanction, they should abide by the canonical penalties. The schismatics did not submit to the decrees of the Palmaris Synod; they sought to bring it into contempt by distributing among the people copies of an inflammatory circular entitled "Against the Synod of Unbefitting Absolution." To counteract this document, Ennodius, a deacon of Ticino, wrote an "Apology" for the Synod; and in another council, held in 503, the fathers decreed that the said writing should be regarded as possessing Synodical authority (1).

(1) Pope Anastasius II., the predecessor of Symmachus, had sent legates to the emperor Anastasius, to induce him to abandon the cause of the Acacians. At the same time with the legates, there arrived at Constantinople, a messenger from Theodoric, in the person of the patrician Festus. This nobleman persuaded the emperor that he could procure from Pope Anastasius a subscription to Zeno's Henoticon; hence the legates failed in their mission. But when Festus came to Rome to carry out his design, he found that another Pontiff, and one whom he could not hope to influence, was on the throne. He looked around for an instrument and selected Laurence.

Launoy (2) adduces the history of this Palmaris Synod to

In this 5th Symmachian synod, the Pontiff excommunicated the emperor Anastasius, as an Acacian schismatic, and as a communicant with the heretical enemies of the Council of Chalcedon. Rendered furious by this apostolic act, Anastasius published a diatribe against Symmachus, in which, among other injuries, the Pope was styled a Manichean. In answer, Symmachus wrote an Apologetic Epistle, in which occur the following noteworthy passages: "You say that, the Senate conspiring with me, I have excommunicated you. I indeed have so done, but have only followed the reasonable example of my predecessors. We have excommunicated Acacius, not you; if you recede from Acacius, you will not partake of his excommunication. Have nothing to do with his excommunication, and then you will not be excommunicated by us; if you unite yourself with him, you are excommunicated by yourself, not by us. . . . Let us compare the honor of the emperor with that of the Pontiff; the former is as far from the latter, as are the human affairs, which the emperor directs, from the divine, over which the Pontiff presides. You, O emperor, receive baptism from the Pontiff; from him you receive the sacraments, you ask his prayers and beg his blessing, and beseech absolution. You administer human affairs, he dispenses divine things to you. . . . Perhaps you will retort that we should be subject to all the powers that be. We do indeed accord to every power its due respect, and until it raises its will against that of God. . . . Do you defer to God in us, and we shall defer to God in you. But if you do not defer to God, you cannot use His privilege, whose laws you despise." The student of Liturgy will note that it was this Synod which decreed that the "Glory to God on High," instead of being sung only at the nocturnal Mass of Christmas, should be sung on all Sundays and Feasts of Martyrs. Some authors have ascribed this Hymn to Pope Symmachus, but we know that it already existed in the time of St. Athanasius. See the latter's book on Holy Virginity.

(2) As we will frequently, during the course of our work, have occasion to combat the views of this eccentric writer, it may be well to note the opinion which Reiser, a famous Protestant author of his day, entertained of him. In a work published at Amsterdam in 1685, entitled, "John Launoy, a Witness and Confessor of Evangelico-Catholic (i. e., Lutheran) Truth," we are told that he was a "doctor of the Sorbonne, justly celebrated among his prove that a Roman Pontiff may be cited for judgment in an episcopal Council. The fathers of this Synod, however, were of a different opinion. In the Acts, we read that the bishops of Venice, Æmilia, and Tuscany, met Theodoric at Ravenna, on their way to Rome, and asked why they should be compelled, in their old age, to make such a journey. "The aforesaid most pious king answered that many horrid reports had reached him concerning the actions of Pope Symmachus, and that a Synod ought to judge as to the truth of the hostile accusations. The aforesaid bishops suggested that he who was accused ought to convoke the Synod, knowing that the merit and principality of the Apostle Peter had first given him a singular power over the churches, and that afterwards, following the commands of the Lord, the authority of venerable Councils had recognized it; nor was it in any way shown that the bishop of the aforesaid See was subject to the judgment of his inferiors. But the most powerful prince signified that the Pope himself had shown, by his letters, his consent to a convocation of the Synod. His Gentleness was then requested to furnish the letters sent by the Pontiff, and he ordered that they should be given without delay." To escape the force of this testimony, Launoy replies that by the term "inferiors" in the cited Acts, we are not obliged to understand the bishops of the Church. Symmachus himself, as well as his predecessors, designated the bishops as his brethren, colleagues, co-ministers, fellow-priests, and brother-bishops. Symmachus, insists Launoy, was so far from thinking that the bishops were his inferiors, that he wrote (1): "As in the Trinity there is a one and individual power, so, among the various bishops, there is but one priesthood." Again, the bishops of the Roman Synod did not say to Symmachus: "We are not your judges; judge you yourself. Like the Prophet, you can say to God: 'To Thee alone have I sinned.'" On the contrary, these prelates heard the accusations, and pronounced judgment according own: a diligent and irreconcilable enemy of the Roman Curia, and of all that is therein done and shamelessly taught, against Scripture and orthodox truth." In a reprint of Launoy's epistles, issued at Cambridge in 1689, Saywell premits a plea for the reformation of Anglicanism, "in which are treated the authority and use of Catholic tradition and General Councils, according to the explanation of Launoy."

(1) Epistle to Æonius of Arles.

to the evidence before their tribunal. But Launoy neglects to observe that the bishops of the Roman Synod show, in their remark to Theodoric, that they applied the term "inferiors" to themselves, and not merely to the clerics, senators, and people. Passing by the fact that they called "inferiors" those whom the king wished to judge the Pontiff's cause, who were certainly themselves, and no others, we note that they assign as a reason for their assertion, the sublime dignity of Peter and the power over the churches given him by the Lord. But this power was over the bishops as well as over the priests and people, over the sheep as well as the lambs. Were it otherwise, the Lord, on account of "the merit and principality of the Apostle Peter," would not have "given him a singular power over the churches," but only one common to the other bishops, and merely equal to their own. Nor do the words of Symmachus, which Launoy cites from the letter to the bishop of Arles, prove anything for the Gallican theory. The priesthood certainly is one, but there are in it, by the institution of Christ, certain grades of dignity and power, the chief of which is the Supreme Pontificate. The conduct of Pope Symmachus in reference to the bishops of Arles and Vienne shows that he regarded them as "inferior" to himself; when a controversy arose as to the relative position and privilege of these churches, he cited both prelates before his tribunal, judged the cause, and ordered both to observe the decrees of Pope St. Leo (1). Cæsarius of Arles regarded himself as "inferior" to Symmachus, when he wrote to him: "Just as the episcopacy takes its source in the person of Blessed Peter the Apostle, so it is needful that your Holiness should clearly indicate, by appropriate regulations, what each church should observe." The Oriental schismatics regarded themselves as "inferior" to the Pontiff, when, begging him to dissolve the excommunication which, as followers of Acacius, they had incurred, they declared: "Not only the power of binding is given you, but also, that you may imitate the Master, the power of loosing. . . . wherefore, we beseech you to cancel our later sentence, as Christ our Saviour and

(1) Epist. 2 and 9.

Leader cancelled the old one on the cross." Nor is the equality of the bishops with the Pontiff demonstrated by the judgment on Symmachus pronounced in the Roman Synod. For it is clearly shown in the Acts that the prelates did not judge until they were convinced of the consent of the Pope to such action. The mind of the bishops is fully illustrated in the Apology of Ennodius of Ticino, to which they gave Synodical authority: "God wished the causes of other men to be decided by men; but He reserved to His own tribunal, without question, the Ruler of this See To one only was it said 'Thou art Peter,' &c. By the voice of the holy Pontiffs the dignity of this See is made venerable throughout the world; for wherever there are any faithful, there submission to it is practised, and it is called the Head of the whole body. It seems to me that to this (dignity) refers the saying of the Prophet: 'If this is humbled, to what help can you recur?'" That the mind of the bishops, in this matter, was the same as that of Ennodius, is shown by the Acts of the Fifth Synod, in which action was taken against those who contemned the Palmaris Synod. The prelates decreed: "Let the book be brought before us, and in our presence read and approved, which was written with Synodical authority by Ennodius, against those who presumed to mutter against the 4th Synod.' Which having been read, and unanimously approved, the Holy Synod said: 'Let these be preserved for future times, and let them be observed by every one, and in every point. Let this book be regarded by all as entirely Synodical, and let it be placed between the Actions of our Fourth and those of our Fifth Synod; and let it be held the same as the Decrees of these Synods, because it has been written and approved by the Synodical authority.' To which things the thrice Blessed Pope replied: 'Let it be done according to the will of you all, and as you judge; let the book have Apostolic authority, and let it be placed, as you say, among the Apostolic Decrees, and let it be held by all as are held the other Apostolic Decrees.'"

That the bishops of those days were fully persuaded that the Supreme Pontiff was not amenable to their tribunal, is also indicated by the manner in which the prelates of Gaul received the news of the celebration of the Palmaris Synod. Perhaps they did not know that Symmachus had given his consent to the holding of the assembly, but, at any rate, the following complaining letter was sent, in their name, by Avitus of Vienne, to the senators Faust and Symmachus : “ While we were anxious and fearful for the cause of the Roman Church, feeling that our State tottered when its Head was attacked, . . . there was brought to us a copy of a sacerdotal decree, which the bishops of Italy, assembled in the City, had issued concerning Pope Symmachus. Although the assent of a large and reverend Synod rendered this constitution worthy of observation, we nevertheless knew that Pope Symmachus, if he had been accused in the world, ought to have received consolation from his fellow-priests, rather than judgment. . . . we cannot easily understand with what reason or law a superior is judged by his inferiors. . . . the same venerable Synod reserved for divine examination the cause which, saving the reverence due to it, it had rashly undertaken. . . . Which being known, I, a Roman senator and a Christian bishop, do solemnly call upon you. . . . that you do not less respect the See of Peter in your Church, than you do the height of power in the City. . . . If anything weakens in other priests, it may be strengthened. But if the Pope of Rome is called into question, not merely a bishop, but the episcopate, seems to totter. . . . He who governs the fold of the Lord will give an account of his care of the lambs entrusted to him ; for the rest, it is not the province of the flock to terrify the shepherd, but of the Judge.”

But why, it may be asked, did Pope Symmachus allow his case to be submitted to the Palmaris Synod, if he did not recognize its authority in the premises ? Simply because, in certain circumstances, it may become the duty of a person high in authority to see that no stain is inflicted upon his character ; to guard against any loss of reputation which would render his rule less efficacious ; to provide, in fine, against any scandalizing of the weak. Thus, more than once have Roman Pontiffs wished even the emperors to attest their innocence of crimes imputed to them. St. Sylvester, accused of sacrilege, referred his cause to the tribunal of Constantine. St. Damasus, in similar circumstances, laid his case before Gratian. We read in the Book of Lives of the Pontiffs that Pelagius I. wished to vindicate himself, before the people, of the charge of having conspired against the life of Pope Vigilius. Anastasius tells us, in the Life of Leo III., that the Pontiff brought together a large number of bishops and abbots, both Romans and Gauls, in the church of St. Peter, to certify to his innocence of certain crimes laid at his door ; that the prelates declared : “ We do not dare to judge the Apostolic See, which is the head of all the churches of God. For by it, and by its Vicar, we are all judged ; it, however, is judged by no one. Such has been the ancient custom.” The spirit which animated the Roman Pontiffs, when they sometimes permitted their actions to be discussed by their inferiors, was well illustrated by St. Gregory the Great (1) : Certainly Peter had received the power of the heavenly kingdom, that whatever he should bind on earth, &c . . . And because he had entered unto the Gentile Cornelius, having been impelled by the Spirit to do so, the faithful took issue with him. Nevertheless, this same prince of the Apostles did not answer the complaints of the faithful by appealing to his power, but by reason ; he explained the thing in detail. If, when he was accused by the faithful, he had thought only of the power which he had received over the Church, he could have replied that the pastor should not be reproved by the flock committed to his care. But had he alleged anything as to his power, when the faithful complained, he certainly would not have been a teacher of meekness.”

(1) Book 9, epist. 36.

CHAPTER XXXI.

CONTROVERSY OF THE THREE CHAPTERS, AND THE FIFTH GENERAL COUNCIL.

A brief sketch of the history of those personages, whose aberrations gave rise to this controversy, is necessary, that the student may grasp its bearings in an intelligent manner. The prime cause of the dispute, although it occurred after his death, was Theodore, bishop of Mopsueste in Cilicia. In his youth, he was a protege of St. Chrysostom, and it was owing to the remonstrances and tender exhortations of this holy doctor, that he did not abandon his ecclesiastical aspirations for the allurements of a secular life (1). He was a man of erudition, and was very zealous against heresy; indeed, he was accused of being too fond of violence in that matter. Yet he did not himself escape contagion, and he communicated the poison to Nestorius, and was also the prime originator of Pelagianism. It is said that he taught two Persons in Christ, with only a moral union between them; also, that the Holy Ghost proceeds only from the Father; again, that original sin is not communicated to all men. He made a new liturgy which is used by the Nestorians of to-day. According to Lardner (2), he showed himself unfavorable to the Divinity of our Lord. Some Protestant critics have affected to doubt that Theodore really taught Nestorianism, but the great respect of the Nestorians of all times for his memory (they honor him as a saint) is suspicious. Only a few fragments of his works have come down to us. He died in the communion of the Church, but the Fifth General Council condemned his works as infected with Nestorianism. Theodoret, bishop of Cyr, in the province of the Euphrates (386-458), was also instrumental in giving rise to the controversy of the Three Chapters. He was learned and eloquent, and a voluminous writer. A friend of Nestorius, he at first thought that this heresiarch merely expressed himself badly, but that his sentiments were orthodox. Opposed, however, to St. Cyril of Alexandria, whom he called an Apollinarist, he wrote against the Anathematisms, but afterwards recognized the mistake. He was cited before the Council of Chalcedon, and there he anathematized Nestorius, and was pronounced a Catholic. But unfortunately his writings against St. Cyril remained, and as they were composed in the heat of argument, they were often inaccurate in expression. Hence it was that these writings also were condemned by the Fifth Council. The third unconscious cause of much trouble was Ibas, bishop of Edessa, who, in a letter to a certain Persian, named Maris, denied that the Word took flesh from the Virgin Mary. He also attacked St. Cyril, and defended Theodore and Nestorius, but, in time he also was received as a Catholic by the fathers of Chalcedon. At the period of which we are about to write, many bishops believed that it was necessary to condemn these three men, because the Nestorians were pretending that their works had been approved at Chalcedon. The Eutychians, also, on their side, were anxious to procure the condemnation of these writings, in order to check the Nestorians; the great patron of the "Acephalous" Eutychians was Theodore of Cæsarea, who assured the emperor that these heretics would come into the Church if the condemnation were effected.

(1) Letters of Chrysostom to "The Fallen Theodore."

(2) Credibility of the Gospel History, vol. II., p. 399.

A glance at the ecclesiastical history of the time is now necessary. Upon the death of Pope Agapetus (536), the Roman clergy were influenced by the threats of Theodatus, king of the Goths, to raise to the Pontificate Silverius, a son born to Pope Hormisdas (d. 523) before he received orders. War was being waged between Theodatus and the emperor Justinian, and the Goth relied upon the fidelity of Silverius. Scarcely had the new Pontiff been enthroned, when he received from the ex-prostitute, now the empress, Theodora, a request to abrogate the decrees of Chalcedon against the Eutychians. As Silverius intrepidly refused her demand, the empress soon excogitated an impious scheme for the attainment of her end. There was residing at the imperial court a certain deacon of the Roman Church, named Vigilius, whom Pope Agapetus had sent to Constantinople as legate. This ecclesiastic had already promised Theodora that if she would secure his elevation to the Papacy, he would further her wishes in all things; hence the wily woman turned now to him as a willing instrument. She furnished him with letters to the imperial general, Belisarius, then at Ravenna, and in them the latter was informed as to her designs. Proceeding to Rome, Belisarius accused the Pontiff of a design to deliver the city to the Goths, seized his person by treachery (1), and sent him to Lycia. He finally died in the year 538, whether by the sword or not, is unknown. The intruder Vigilius now became the legitimate Pope, for the Roman clergy, anxious to avoid a schism, canonically elected him to the vacancy. Then was seen a change which certainly seemed the work of God. This weak and ambitious man, who had scrupled not to stain his priestly character while an intruder, had no sooner become the true successor of St. Peter, than he became a model of Pontifical firmness. He wrote to Justinian, declaring that he "received the four General Councils, the Dogmatic Epistle of St. Leo, and the Decrees of his predecessors."

The controversy of the Three Chapters occurred during this Pontificate, and the following is a synopsis of its history. Pelagius, Apostolic legate at Constantinople, during the Pontificate of Agapetus, and Mennas, patriarch of that city, had influenced the emperor Justinian to issue an edict against certain doctrines of Origen. This condemnation greatly offended Theodore, bishop of Cæsarea, and he tried to induce the emperor to condemn three certain actions of the Council of Chalcedon. This Synod had received Ibas of Edessa and Theodoret of Cyr into communion, without any inquisition into their writings, and thus it seemed to approve of their attacks on St. Cyril, and hence, said the Eutychians, it lessened the authority of the Council of Ephe-

(1) The Pope had fled for safety into the basilica of St. Sabine, and the stepson of Belisarius promised on oath that if he would grant an interview to the general, his person would be respected. When he was seized, Silverius was stripped of the Pontifical insignia, dressed as a monk, and thus thrust into exile. In a short time, Justinian ordered his restoration, but Belisarius delivered him to Vigilius, who exiled him to the isle of Majorca.

sus. It had also restored Theodore of Mopsueste. Now Theodore of Cæsarea and the Acephali heretics saw that if these actions at Chalcedon were condemned, the authority of that Council would be greatly impaired, to their own very great benefit. This was the secret of the controversy; the Acephali desired to bring the Council of Chalcedon into disrepute. The word "Chapter," when it occurs in the title, and throughout the course of this dispute, means a certain act of the Council; so that when the condemnation of the Three Chapters is spoken of, allusion is made to an annulling, so far as it could be effected, of the Acts of Chalcedon according to communion to Theodore of Mopsueste, Theodoret of Cyr, and Ibas of Edessa. Justinian was about to issue an edict against the Acephali, when their secret friend, Theodore of Cæsarea, influenced him to rather condemn the three actions of Chalcedon which alone, said Theodore, kept the Acephali from receiving the Council's decrees and injured the peace of the Church. In the year 543 was issued the imperial decree abrogating the three Chapters; condemning, therefore, Theodore of Mopsueste, the teacher of Nestorius, and the enemy of Origenism (which was the tender point of the Cæsarean prelate); condemning also the epistle of Ibas of Edessa, written to Maris, and reprobating the writings of St. Cyril against Nestorius, while praising Theodore of Mopsueste; condemning finally the writings of Theodoret of Cyr, which attacked the Anathematisms of Cyril and defended the person of Nestorius. Justinian sent a copy of his edict to each of the patriarchs for their assent and signature. Those of Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem, yielded to fear and subscribed; Mennas of Constantinople also signed, but on condition that his act would be void if the Roman Pontiff should disapprove of it. Many bishops subscribed, but deposited a protest with Stephen, the Papal legate, to the effect that they had been compelled by threats of deposition (1). The emperor in vain tried to procure the signatures of Stephen, and of Dacius of Milan, who was then in the capital. Among the many bishops who refused to sign the edict, was Pontianus, who wrote to Justinian in a manner which showed that he well understood the animus of those who had prompted it : " At the close of your epistle we discovered that we were expected to condemn Theodore, and the writings of Theodoret, and the epistle of Ibas, which did not a little grieve us. Their sayings have not reached us. And if they had come down to us, and if we read therein some apocryphal things against faith, we might surely reject those sayings, but yet we would not precipitately condemn the authors. If they were still living, and had not retracted their errors, most justly could they be condemned. But now, to whom shall be cited our sentence of condemnation ? There is no room for correction. However, most pious emperor, I fear lest, with the pretext of this condemnation, the Eutychian heresy may raise its head, and that while we attend to lesser matters, we may come into collision with a greater heresy. And why should we wage war with the dead, when no victory can ensue from such a contest ? They have already stood before that Judge, from whom no one appeals. Through Him then, in whom you honor and cherish us, we beseech your Clemency, that peace may endure all your days, and that, while you seek the condemnation of the dead, you may not kill the many living who will disobey you, for you will be forced to account for it to Him who is to judge the living and the dead." Whether many of the responses to the imperial edict were so simply sublime, and to the point, as this of the noble Pontianus, we know not, but Justinian came to the conclusion that he would not succeed unless by meeting the universalepiscopate, face to face, in the imperial city. He therefore asked for a Synod, alleging the need of bringing the Acephali back to the fold, but in reality to obtain the condemnation of the famous Chapters.

(1) FACUNDUS; b. 4, c. 4.

Pope Vigilius, who had been as iron in his firmness in resisting the imperial demand, thought best to attend this Synod, though it was contrary to the traditions of the Papacy to attend such a meeting in person, and although he hesitated to leave his immediate flock, then in danger from the Gothic invader. He left the Eternal City in the year 545, but remained in Sicily for a year, both because he desired the Synod to be held in that island, and because he wished to be near Rome in case it was troubled by the barbarians. He arrived in Constantinople on Jan. 25, 547, and was worthily received by Justinian. He immediately, in spite of the empress Theodora's love for them, promulgated a decree against the Acephali (1), and suspended the patriarch Menna; soon, however, at the request of Theodora, and owing, probably, to the saving clause which the patriarch had affixed to his signature to the edict, the suspension was revoked. In the beginning of the next year, 548, the emperor obtained from the Pontiff permission for a discussion upon the Three Chapters in a Synod of seventy bishops, but as there was very little harmony among the prelates, Vigilius reserved the question to himself, and issued a decree styled Judicatum. In this document, he condemned the Three Chapters, "saving, in all things, the respect due to the Council of Chalcedon," thus avoiding any reflection on the restoration of Theodore, Theodorete, and Ibas, and condemning anything wrong in their writings. Far from being a harbinger of peace as Pope Vigilius had fondly hoped, this Judicatum proved a firebrand. Throughout the West, the Pontiff was accused of failing in respect to the decrees of Chalcedon, and the Africans went so far, in 550, as to pronounce him anathema. In such a state of affairs, both Pope and emperor deemed a General Council necessary, and letters were sent to the principal sees in all the provinces, convoking the Council in Constantinople. Very few of the Western bishops seemed willing to attend, and as the Pontiff was averse to any decided action in their absence, a new trouble arose. In vain did Justinian try to persuade Vigilius to unite with the Eastern prelates (of whom he felt sure) in condemning the Three Chapters. At the suggestion of the irrepressible Theodore of Cæsarea, the emperor issued, in 551, in his own name, a condemnatory edict, and ordered it to be placarded in various basilicas. When the Pope heard of this high-handed proceeding, he threatened to excommunicate all who would obey the edict. This action of Vigilius so enraged the emperor that he ordered his arrest, and it would have gone hard with him, had not the very soldiers refused to execute the imperial mandate. Justinian then solemnly swore to respect the person of the Pope, but there was good reason to distrust his sincerity, and Vigilius fled to Chalcedon, and took sanctuary in the basilica of St. Euphemia. The constancy of the Pontiff was not unrewarded, for the emperor withdrew his edict, and the bishops, who had signed it, begged pardon for the injury "done to his Holiness and the Holy See." Vigilius returned to Constantinople, and renewed his consent to a General Council, but providing that the East and the West should be equally represented. The Council met in May, 553, with an attendance of 165 bishops, but the Pontiff refused to attend it, or to accredit legates to it, on account of the small number of Western prelates present. Nevertheless, the Synod proceeded to an examination of the Three Chapters. When the fifth session had been held, the Pope sent to Justinian a document containing his decision as to the question at issue. He had already, for the sake of peace, withdrawn the Judicatum, but this new decree, styled a Constitutum, was essentially of the same tenor. He condemned the errors of Theodore of Mopsueste, but spared his name; he declared that nothing should be undertaken in reference to Theodoret or Ibas, since the Council of Chalcedon had refused to pass judgment upon their writings; he commanded finally that all should act in the matter of the Three Chapters in accordance with this Constitutum. This document is dated May 14th, but it is doubtful whether the emperor received it before the end of the Synod, or intentionally suppressed it; at all events, the seventh session was held on the 26th of May, and then Justinian adduced the Judicatum of Vigilius, and the anathemas pronounced against its opponents, as proofs that the Pope had condemned the Chapters. Then the Council, in its eighth session, definitively condemned them, in these words: "We condemn and anathematize, together with all other heretics who have been condemned and anathematized by the four aforesaid Councils, and by the Holy Catholic and Apostolic Church: Theodorus, who was bishop of Mopsueste, and his impious writings; and whatever Theodoret wickedly wrote against the true faith and against the twelve Chapters of St. Cyril, and against the first Synod of Ephesus, and what he wrote in defence of Theodore, and of Nestorius. We also anathematize the impious Epistle which Ibas is said to have written to Maris the Persian, in which he denies that God the Word took flesh from the ever Virgin Mary, the holy Mother of God, and was made man ; and in which he calumniates Cyril of holy memory, who taught the truth, as like unto Apollinaris. . . . and defends Theodore and Nestorius, and their impious dogmas and writings. We therefore anathematize the aforesaid Three Chapters, that is, &c." Then follow fourteen anathematisms, and it is to be noted that in the twelfth, the Council condemns the name, as well as the writings of Theodore ; but in the two last, it condemns merely the writings of Theodoret and Ibas.

(1) ST. GREGORY THE GREAT; b. 2, epist. 36, to the Bishops of Istria.

Pope Vigilius confirmed the 5th General Council, and hence it acquired the quality of œcumenicity, which, during its sessions, it certainly wanted, owing to the absence of Papal legates. Some writers have held that Vigilius at first refused to confirm the Synod, and was therefore exiled by the emperor ; that after five years he yielded. But this is proved false by the confirmatory epistle, which says that it was: " Given on the 6th of the Ides of December, in the 27th year of the reign of our lord the ever august Justinian." This date is of the year 553, scarcely six months after the close of the Council. Again, the defenders of the Three Chapters are silent as to this exile, and it would have been an excellent argument for their cause, if they could have alleged that the Pontiff did not willingly and freely condemn them. The confirmatory decree of Vigilius was addressed to " Eutychius, Archbishop of Constantinople, and the entire previous Holy Synod," and reads as follows: " If wisdom requires that what is (justly) complained of, should be withdrawn, and we ought not to be ashamed to publish that which an after-study of the truth shows to have been omitted in the beginning, how much more proper is it to follow such a course in ecclesiastical discussions? Especially since the fathers, and notably the Blessed Augustine, who excelled in the study of Scripture and was a master in Roman eloquence, revised his writings and corrected his sayings, supplying that which he had omitted and afterwards discovered. We also, incited by such examples, have never ceased, in the controversy of the above-mentioned Three Chapters, to investigate the truth in the writings of the fathers. We therefore anathematize and condemn the aforesaid Three Chapters; that is, the impious Theodore of Mopsueste, together with his impious writings; and whatever Theodoret wickedly wrote, and also the Epistle said to have been written by Ibas, in which the aforesaid blasphemies are contained. We also subject to the same anathema whoever believes that at any time these Chapters ought to have been received or defended, or whoever shall try to subvert this condemnation. Whatever has been hitherto done, either by me, or by others, in defence of the aforesaid Three Chapters, by this present writing we declare null and void."

Several questions are to be considered before we can dismiss this controversy. First, we must examine the justice of the decree issued by the Fifth Council in condemnation of the Chapters. We will commence with Theodore of Mopsueste. There can be no doubt of the heretical nature of some of his teachings. In his Symbol, he says that Christ was merely man; that He was the Son of God only by adoption; that there were two Persons in Christ, only morally, not hypostatically, united. This Symbol was condemned, in its 6th Action, by the Council of Ephesus, and is styled by St. Cyril "the first bubbling forth of Nestorian impiety" (1). In his book on the Incarnation, he says that the Word assuming, and the man assumed, are one only as man and wife are one. Among the petitions sent to Proclus of Constantinople, asking for the condemnation of Theodore, is one from the clergy of Armenia and Persia, in which they represent him as asking, "How can God and man be one, in real unity? He who saves, and he who is saved? He who was before all ages, and he who appeared, coming from Mary?" And then they demand that as Nestorius was condemned at Ephesus by name, and Theodorus unnamed

(1) Epist. to Proclus.

(since his errors were condemned), so this real author of the heresy be now reprobated by name. Rabbula of Edessa says to St. Cyril, that Theodore "first declared that the Holy Virgin was not the Mother of God." Leontius declares that Theodore prepared a liturgy for the Mass which was full of blasphemy, that he composed virulent commentaries on many books of Scripture. It is certain that Theodore was regarded as a heretic in his own church of Mop-sueste long before the Fifth Council, for in a Synod held there by order of Justinian, the clergy testified that, as far back as their memory went, the name of Theodore had been expunged from the dyptichs, and in its place that of St. Cyril substituted.

As for the writings of Theodoret, they were manifestly heretical, for they attack the doctrines approved by the Council of Ephesus, and patronize Nestorius, a condemned heretic. In his epistle to Andrew of Samosata, Theodoret thus speaks of the Council of Ephesus: "Egypt again madly rages against God, and wars with Moses and Aaron and His servants; the greater portion of Israel is in union with the enemy, and few indeed are the sane who suffer in the cause of piety. Everything venerable for piety is down-trodden. They who were deposed, exercise the sacerdotal ministry, and those who deposed them, groan at home (1). The Egyptians, Palestinians, Pontians, Asiatics, and the Westerns, play at holding a Synod." In his epistle to Domnus of Antioch, he exhorts the patriarch to prevent approbation of Cyril's anathematisms by the coming Council. In another epistle to Domnus, written after the death of St. Cyril, he thus insults his memory: "At last, indeed, the wicked man is dead. The good and the benign migrate before their time; the bad lead a long life. . . . Your Holiness should order the corpse-bearers to place an enormously heavy stone on his grave, lest he come here again to show his unstable will. Let him take his new dogmas to hell; there let him preach, as he so likes to do, day and night." As for Theodoret's sympathy with Nes-torius, we need adduce only the following (1): "Your Holiness knows that if one should anathematize, without restriction, the doctrine of this most holy and venerable bishop (Nestorius), it would be the same as to condemn piety itself.

(1) The saintly groaners are, of course, John of Antioch and his worthy followers, whose exploits we have narrated when treating of the Council of Ephesus.

The Epistle of Ibas was also justly condemned by the Fifth Council, because it accused the Synod of Ephesus of precipitation in condemning Nestorius; it vituperated the doctrine of St. Cyril, approved at Ephesus; it praised Theodore of Mopsueste as a preacher of truth and a doctor of the Church; and it finally contains doctrine per se Nestorian. The first point of accusation is proved by the words "They deposed Nestorius from the episcopacy, without any investigation." The second is shown by the following: "A contest ensued between those two men, Nestorius and Cyril, and they interchanged injurious language, which was a scandal to the hearers. Nestorius said in his books, that the Blessed Mary is not the Mother of God, so he was thought by many to belong to the sect of Paul of Samosata, who said that Christ was a mere man. Cyril, however, refuting the words of Nestorius, was slippery (2), and was found to have fallen into the error of Apollinaris. . . . They brought forth and approved the Twelve Chapters written by Cyril against the constituted doctrines of the true faith, and consented to them as agreeing with the faith." As for his praise of the Mopsuestene, the following is sufficiently pointed: "The blessed Theodore, preacher of the truth, and a doctor of the Church, not only while living attacked the heretics in the cause of faith, but after his death supplies in his books spiritual arms to the sons of the Church. He who dares everything has presumed to openly anathematize him, who, for zeal of God's cause, not only turned his own city from error to the truth, but taught the distant failing churches with his erudition." That he also taught Nestorianism is certain, for he asks, "How is it possible to receive the Word, which is from the beginning, for the Temple which was born of Mary? . . . No one dares to say that one is the nature of the Deity and the Humanity, but he confesses the Temple and the Inhabitant therein, who is the one Son Jesus Christ." This distinction of the Temple, born of Mary; and the Inhabitant—the Eternal Word, was a favorite with Nestorius, nor is its heresy at all diminished in the case of Ibas, because he avows one Person. Nestorius also declared that there was but one Person in Christ, but one morally, not consubstantially. Facundus (1), a most energetic defender of the Three Chapters, says that "The assertion that there is one Person, does not exclude the subterfuges of the Nestorians, who, when they saw the innumerable testimonies of the fathers proving that God the Word and the assumed Man were one in Person, thought, or affected to think, that this signified the dignity of authority; so that Jesus Christ may be said to have borne the Person of the Word in the same manner as did the Apostle, writing to the Corinthians, II, 2, &c."

(1) Epist. to Andrew of Samosata, in Marius Mercator.

(2) The text has "lubricavit."

The Fifth General Council has been severely condemned by certain critics for its anathematization of Theodore of Mopsueste. He had died in the communion of the Church; indeed, he had, while living, never been deprived of it. For nearly a century he had been beyond the judgment of men, and it savors of indelicacy, at least, to inveigh against the dead. Such sentiment as this would be praiseworthy, and would certainly be respected by the Church, if the weighty interests of the living, and of future generations, did not carry her out of the realm of sentimentality. Several instances of regard for the dead can be cited, which at first sight seem to rebuke the Fifth Council for cruelty, so far as in it lay, to Theodore. Thus, St. Dionysius of Alexandria, when obliged to condemn the millenary doctrines of the dead bishop Nepos, spared his memory, because he had departed this life in the communion of Holy Church. But this case is very different from that of the Mopsuestene prelate. The error of Nepos had never been condemned by the Church; the question was obscure, and well disputed, and several of the fathers coincided with him. But Theodore taught doctrines already proscribed in the cases of Paul of Samosata, and Nestorius, and he attacked some of the principal points of doctrine, which were defended by all the fathers. The moderation then, which in the case of Nepos, and similar ones, was commendable, would have been out of place in that of Theodore. Pope St. Leo certainly tells us (1) that "there is no necessity to discuss the merits and acts of those who have thus died; for the Lord our God, whose judgments cannot be comprehended, has reserved to His justice that which the sacerdotal ministry could not carry out." But St. Leo here alludes to the soul's state in the other world; the passage does not at all affect the Church's right to pass judgment on the acts committed under her jurisdiction. It is said that Theodore died in the peace of the Church. So far as we can tell, he did not, for though he nominally belonged to the body of the Church, he persisted in his heresy, and deserved open excommunication, to the very last. Hence, Benignus of Heraclea accuses of lying those who said that Theodore died in the communion of the Church: "He dies in the communion and peace of the Church who up to the hour of death preserves and teaches the true dogmas of the Church; that Theodore did not preserve and teach the true dogmas of the Church is certain from his blasphemies." St. Cyril did not expressly anathematize Theodore at Ephesus, but his moderation proves nothing against the Church's right to do so. And Cyril's great object was the conversion of those who were devoted to the memory of the Mopsuestene bishop, and that object was better served by leniency towards his person.

(1) Book I., c. 3.

We now approach the question, whether or not the Fifth Council, in its treatment of the Three Chapters, contradicted the Council of Chalcedon. In this latter assembly, Theodoret and Ibas were received as orthodox, and Theodore of Mopsueste was not condemned. It is not difficult to show that the two Councils stand in no need of conciliation. In the first place, the fathers of the Fifth Council expressly profess their veneration for the decrees of Chalcedon, and in their subscriptions to the Acts, use the words, "receiving the four Holy Synods, that is, of Nice, Constantinople, Ephesus

(1) Epist. to Theodore of Forum Julium.

I, Chalcedon, and what was defined by them." St. Gregory the Great alludes to the apparent conflict between the two Synods, and he says (1): "As we sincerely cherish you, so much the more do we grieve, because you put faith in ignorant and foolish men, who not only do not know what they say, but can scarcely understand what they hear We declare, upon our conscience, that nothing was moved concerning the faith of the Chalcedon Council, and in nothing was it violated; but whatever was done in the time of the aforesaid Justinian, was done without any prejudice to the faith of the Council of Chalcedon." But it is not true that one Council approved that which the other condemned. With regard to the epistle of Ibas of Edessa, which was condemned by the Fifth Council, it was not received by the fathers of Chalcedon as orthodox, nor could it have been, since the Chalcedon synod approved of the judgment given against Ibas at Berytum. In this judgment, Ibas was compelled to anathematize Nestorius, and to receive the Ephesian decrees. Now, as in the epistle to Maris, the Synod of Ephesus is vituperatively treated for its alleged unjust condemnation of Nestorius, it is plain that the Chalcedon fathers, approving the judgment of Berytum, could not have accepted the epistle as orthodox. Ibas was welcomed at Chalcedon; his writings were not. He was received as a Catholic, because he had contradicted the errors in his epistle. "Anatolius, bishop of Constantinople, said: I now put aside any suspicion about him (Ibas), because he consents and subscribes to the decree on faith now given by the Holy Council, and to the epistle of the Most Holy Leo, Archbishop of Rome." So say the records of Chalcedon; they also tell us that Juvenal of Jerusalem said, in the matter of Ibas, "The divine Scriptures command us to receive those who are converted. Therefore we receive those who return from heresy; I therefore consent that the most reverend Ibas, as he is now orthodox, and has sought our clemency, should preserve his episcopacy, because he is old.' Again, Ibas was not restored to his diocese, before he had anathematized Nestorius. When ordered to do so, he replied, "I have already anathematized Nestorius and his dogma in writing, and I now anathematize him ten thousand times."

(1) Epist. to Theodolinda, Queen of the Lombards.

Nor can we trace any dissension between the Fourth and Fifth Councils in the matter of Theodoret. The fathers of Chalcedon were exceedingly opposed to his writings, for when he entered the Council chamber, there resounded through the hall cries of "He is no bishop," and "Theodoret has attacked Cyril; we condemn Cyril, if we receive Theodoret." After the termination of the sessions on faith, he was ordered to anathematize Nestorius, and although he hesitated for a time, he finally did so. If the Chalcedon Synod did not demand from him an explicit condemnation of his own writings, it was because he had implicitly given one by subscribing to the fifth Action, in which, after the condemnation of Nestorius, the fathers received "the epistles of Blessed Cyril, bishop of the Alexandrian church, and the synodical letters to Nestorius and others in the East." So the affair is explained by Pope Pelagius II. (1).

The case of Theodore of Mopsueste shows no more difference between the two Councils than do those of Ibas and Theodoret. Because the Council of Chalcedon did not condemn Theodore, it does not follow that it believed his writings innocuous. Nor should we believe so, because he is praised by Sts. Gregory of Nazianzen and Chrysostom, and by other fathers. In the first place, this praise is not so sure, for there are good reasons for denying the authenticity of the epistle of Chrysostom cited by Theodore's partisans, and the praise of Nazianzen seems to have been meant, not for the Mopsuestene Theodore, but for another. But if this praise is authentic, we may answer with Benignus of Heraclaea, who, taking the place of the archbishop of Thessalonica in the fifth session of the Fifth Council, said, "It is of no avail to those who act wickedly, that it sometimes happens that some persons write in their favor, either through ignorance or presumption, or even by a kind of condonance. For St. Basil wrote some things for Apollinarius, but that did not free him from condemnation. And Athanasius wrote several epistles to Apollinarius, as to one holding the same faith; nevertheless, even after the death of Apollinarius, he wrote entire books against him, when he had found out his blasphemies; and those things which he wrote when he deemed the faith of Apollinarius his own, were of no profit to the latter. And even Leo of holy memory, Pope of ancient Rome, both received Eutyches, and wrote in approval of him, though he afterwards condemned and anathematized him as a heretic." In fine, those who praised Theodore, did so for one thing; the Fifth Council condemned him for another. Before we dismiss the question of the agreement of the Fourth and Fifth Councils in this matter of the Three Chapters, we would call the attention of the reader to the following passage of Pope St. Leo (1): "If anything which does not pertain to faith is reported to have been done by those brethren whom I sent in my place to the Holy Synod, it will be of no weight whatever; for they were sent by the Apostolic See to be defenders of the Catholic faith, by the destruction of heresy. For whatever is offered for episcopal examination, beyond the special causes for Synodal Councils, may bear some reason for adjudication." In these words, observes Pope Pelagius II. (2), "permission is plainly accorded to reconsider whatever was there done about persons, and outside of causes of faith." Even then, if the Fifth Council had reconsidered the action of the Fourth in the matter of Theodore, Theodoret, and Ibas, there would have been no essential difference between the two Synods, for, to use the words of Pelagius, "The special cause of Synodal Councils is faith. Whatever, therefore, is treated of, outside of faith, can be, according to the teaching of Leo, recalled to judgment." But we have said enough to show that the Fifth Council merely completed, in the case of the condemnation of the Three Chapters, a work which, for prudential reasons, the Fourth had left in abeyance.

(1) Epist. to the Bishops of Istria.

We must now treat of the action of Pope Vigilius in this controversy. It would not be very strange if a Pontiff who entered upon his sublime office under such malignant auspices as those which frowned upon Vigilius at the outset, should have proved a very weak Pope. But we have seen that a miracle, at least of grace, was worked in his case. The truculent schismatic was transformed into the zealous Pastor, and at no time during his stormy Pontificate did he betray a spirit unequal to martyrdom, had duty called him to it. His manner of action, during the controversy of the Three Chapters, has been attacked by Protestants, Jansenists, and all enemies of Papal supremacy. We shall pass over the accusation made by the first class, that is, that Vigilius erred in faith, for it is sufficient to be only moderately versed in the records of his time, to know that he abhorred all heresy, especially that of Nestorius and that of Eutyches. The Jansenists, however, have insisted that Vigilius erred in a "dogmatic fact." How they could do so, unless they were thoroughly blinded by prejudice, we are at a loss to understand. It is of the nature of a dogmatic fact of this kind that in a writing there be defined as existing, either a truth or an error. Now, neither in the Judicatum, nor in the Constitutum, did Vigilius act unless upon persons. Pope Pelagius II. says (1) that during the reign of Justinian, certain Chapters were discussed, "outside of faith," and "no action taken, unless on persons." Gregory the Great says (2) that "action was taken only in regard to certain persons." And Vigilius himself, in his epistle confirming the Fifth Council, expressly asserts the same. Again, in order to prove him guilty of an error in matter of dogmatic fact, the Jansenists should show that Vigilius at some one time approved of the writings in question. This they cannot show, for the whole course of events proves that the Pontiff wished to leave the Chapters just as they were left at Chalcedon, neither condemned nor approved. The foes of the Papacy accuse Vigilius of fickleness. First, they say, he defended the Three Chapters, and then he condemned them. But it is false that he defended them; he simply ordered, and for good reasons, their being left in the condition that had seemed good to the Fourth Council. Let us take a glance at the course of events. When the emperor

(1) Epist. to Marimus of Antioch.

(2) To the Bishops of Istria.

(1) Epist. to Childebert, King of the Franks.

(2) Epist. to the Bishops of Istria.

Justinian presumed to condemn the Three Chapters, Vigilius threatened with excommunication, not only the imperial meddler, but all who would subscribe to the edict. And why? Apart from the crime committed by Justinian, there were powerful reasons why the Pontiff should take such a resolution. All the Occidentals, and a goodly number of the Orientals, were indignant at what they regarded as an attack on the Council of Chalcedon. Their mind is seen in the epistle which the clergy of Italy gave to the legates of the Frankish king Childebert, who were setting out for Constantinople to protest against Justinian's sacrilegious violence on the Pontifical person: "The most blessed Pope Vigilius going to Constantinople, or, that the truth be declared, being almost dragged there, they began to expect his condemnation of certain chapters, by which condemnation the Holy Synod of Chalcedon would be in every way broken up. But when Pope Vigilius would not consent to this thing, they acted so violently, that he cried out in the assembly, 'Although you hold me captive, yet you cannot make captive Blessed Peter the Apostle'" (1). It then appeared to the Pontiff that both parties might be pacified by such a condemnation of the Chapters as would leave intact the dignity and authority of the Fourth Council. Hence he drew up the Judicatum, and in the Encyclical which he issued on the condemnation of Theodore of Cæsarea, he declares his motive to have been the desire of peaceful unity, "For the last five years," he says, addressing the obstinate Acephalus, "we have shown our patience, granted us by the divine favor, both to you and to those who have been seduced by you. First indeed, when, in order to repress scandal, we condescended to the wishes of certain parties, whose minds we thought might be pacified by some arrangement (2), and whom you had been exciting for many years. We thought to order some things medicinally for a time, but under the condition that, all disturbance being quelled, no one should hereafter, either by word or letter, presume to touch the matter." But Vigilius had hoped in vain. The Africans, Illyrians, Dalmatians, and others, persisted in defending the Chapters, and even two deacons of the Roman Church, Rusticus and Sebastian, accused the Pontiff of despising the Council of Chalcedon. Vigilius therefore withdrew his Judicatum, and ordered all discussion of the Chapters to be avoided until a General Council could be assembled. This we are told in the epistle of the Italian clergy already cited: "Although the Africans, Illyrian, and Dalmatians did not acquiesce in the Pope's action, nevertheless Vigilius was soon urged again to condemn the Chapters, without any mention whatever of the Council of Chalcedon. But he was unwilling to do this, and saying that he was pressed too strongly, he told the most serene prince that there should come bishops from all the provinces, five or six from each, and that after a tranquil discussion the affair should be peacefully arranged, because, without the consent of all, he could not acquiesce in what called the Synod of Chalcedon into question and caused scandal in his brethren." It is no wonder that the Pope refused to attend the Council. Not only were there scarcely any Western prelates present, but the votes of the bishops were not free. We learn from Liberatus (1) that bribes were given and accepted; that those who refused to condemn the Chapters were deposed and exiled, and that many fled for safety. When, however, Vigilius perceived that the Council would certainly condemn the Chapters, he feared still more for the peace of the Church, and issued his Constitutum, in which he contended for the sparing of the persons, at least, of those in question. But in this document he launched no anathema against those who disagreed with him. Finally, he confirmed the Fifth Council, and decreed anathema against those who would hereafter defend the Chapters. This he did "after an investigation of the truth, and the Lord revealing." He saw that the Nestorians greatly abused the Chapters, and he knew that the Western bishops, with few exceptions, would obey his decree, even though their prejudices were hurt. In fine, the time had come to settle forever a question which was a continual menace to the peace of Christendom. If it is a mark of inconstancy to act with prudence, and to change when one's better knowledge demands such a course, then Vigilius was fickle, and with him St. Augustine and many other great men who deemed such a proceeding eminently proper.

(1) Councils of Gaul, v. 1, p. 294.(2) The text has "dispensatione."

(1) Breviary, c. 24.

In his search for facts to support the theory of the supremacy of a General Council, Bossuet (1) seizes upon those we have narrated, and asserts that they manifest a belief in that theory, on the part of both Vigilius and the Fifth Council. That this conclusion is not warranted by the facts, is easily shown. When Justinian was urging, with all his power, the bishops of the Council to condemn the Chapters, his prime argument was the example of the Pontiff. But if the Council regarded itself as superior to the Pope, why did the emperor use such an argument? Again, Vigilius showed his authority over the Council, when, having promised Justinian to give his opinion within twenty days, he ordered, through the deacon Pelagius, the assembled prelates to decide nothing: "Keeping the ancient and regular order of things, not to attempt to utter anything before the promulgation of our, that is, the Apostolic See's sentence, lest there should again arise occasion for the trouble which has been allayed." This language is not that of an inferior. And so far was it from the mind of the Council to establish anything contrary to the will of the Pontiff, that the fathers rather allege his example as their reason for condemning the Chapters. In the seventh session, Justinian insisted that Vigilius was favorable to the condemnation, and while he carefully withheld the Constitutum, which would have proved the contrary, he ordered Constantine, questor of the palace, to read several epistles of the Pope which appeared to be of that tenor. Hence, in the eighth session, the Council condemned the obnoxious Chapters, and "because," say the bishops, "it has happened that the most religious Vigilius, now residing in this imperial city, has been present at all that was done about these Three Chapters, and has frequently condemned them, both in writing and without writing." Finally, Vigilius did not regard the Fifth Council as canonical; much less then did he deem it his superior. When the patriarch Eutychius requested him to come to the Council, he replied, as we read in the Acts of the first session, that it was his pleasure that the controversy should be discussed "in a canonical Synod," for he regarded the absence of the Western prelates as militating against its universality. And he not only refused to attend, but in the Constitutum so carefully suppressed by Justinian, he declared its acts null and void. Even when he decided to confirm the condemnation of the Chapters, he showed that he regarded the Synod as of no value until it received his approbation. For he says, "Those things have been safely carried out, which had to be defined by us, through the revelation of the Lord, and an investigation of the truth." He does not even style the assembly a Synod, but defines those as his "brethren and co-priests" who, holding the faith of the four General Councils, condemn the Three Chapters. The reader will also observe that it was only by the exertions of Pope Pelagius II. and St. Gregory the Great that the Fifth Council was received in the West; so far was the Gallican theory from the mind of the sixth century.

(1) Defence of the Declaration, p. 2, b. 12, c. 20.

When treating of the heresies of the first three centuries, we omitted, out of respect to his name, and because it is by no means sure that he erred in faith, to say anything of Origen. But if there ever was a man who should have prayed to be delivered from his friends, he was one. His disciples were so obstinate in upholding whatever he said, and were so persistent in quoting him as a teacher of their vagaries, that, especially since most of his works are lost, he must bear a brunt perhaps undeserved. We allude to Origen, because the Fifth General Council condemned a sect of heretics who rejoiced in his name. The Origenists appealed to the great master's writings when they contended that Jesus Christ was only the adoptive Son of God; that human souls exist before their union with bodies; that the pains of hell are not eternal; that even Satan and his fellows will one day be freed from punishment. The decree of the Fifth Council on Origenism was specially directed against certain monks of Egypt and Palestine. Catholic authors are not unanimous with regard to it. Alexandre strenuously contends that Origen was proscribed by the Fifth Synod (1), while the erudite Garnier (2) thinks that the proscription occurred in a Synod held five years previously by the patriarch Menna, and which is sometimes styled by old writers "the Fifth Council." The Origenists of whom we have spoken must not be confounded with an impure sect bearing the same name, founded by another and little known Origen. This sect condemned marriage, and allowed the grossest immoralities. Sts. Epiphanius and Augustine agree that the great Origen cannot be blamed for these teachings, as his works are remarkable for the praise of chastity.

CHAPTER XXXII.

PONTIFICATE OF ST. GREGORY THE GREAT.

Gregory was born at Rome about the year 540, of a patrician family noted for its sterling worth and eminent piety. Possessed of great wealth, he used it entirely for the glory of God and the good of humanity. In Sicily he constructed and endowed six monasteries, and in Rome he built the celebrated one of St. Andrew (on the Cælian hill), which now belongs to the Carmaldulose congregation of the Benedictine order. To this last establishment, having resigned the prefectship of the city in 573, Gregory retired for that study and religious contemplation so admirably promoted by the monastic life. Baronio contends that the future Pontiff entered the institute of St. Equitias, but the arguments of Dom. Mabillon (3), proving that the Benedictines rightly claim him as a companion, seem conclusive. Gregory was not long permitted to remain in the seclusion he dearly loved; Pope Pelagius II. drew him from his cell in the year 582, made him a deacon of Roman Church, and sent him

(1) Third Century, diss. 16.

(2) In his edition of the Breviary of Liberatus.

(3) Preface to 1st Benedictine Century, and the special dissertation on the Monastic Life of St. Gregory the Great.

as legate to Constantinople. During the five years of his embassy, he won the love and respect of the emperors Tiberius II. and Mauritius, while scrupulously discharging his duty as Papal representative (1). Recalled to Rome in 585, he begged permission to retire to his monastery, and it was accorded. But the plague of 590 having removed Pope Pelagius, the eyes of all fell upon the learned and holy monk as his successor. Elected to the Pontificate by the unanimous voice of the clergy, amid the joyful acclamations of the Senate and the people, he not only endeavored, by every means in his power, to induce the emperor Mauritius not to confirm the election (2), but betook himself to a hiding-place, that he might escape the honor. But the emperor immediately issued the confirmation, and his retreat having been discovered, the reluctant Gregory was consecrated on the 3rd of September.

We can only give a glance at this wonderful Pontificate, during which, for fourteen years, Gregory labored as few, even of the Popes, have labored. One of his first endeavors was to recall to the unity of the Church the defenders of the Three Chapters (3); he called them to a Synod, that their doubts might be solved, but they begged for delay, and Mauritius asked him not to molest them, on account of the terrible state to which northern Italy was reduced by the incursions of the Lombards. The Pontiff accorded the delay, but he exerted his influence successfully in preventing Theodelinda, the Lombard queen, from joining the schismatics. He then turned his attention to Africa, where the Donatists were again causing trouble. By energetic letters to the bishops of Numidia, he excited their zeal for the true faith. In epistles to the bishops of Arles and Marseilles, he prohibited the enforced baptism of Jews. A controversy having arisen in Spain as to the triple immersion, he approved both methods. He ordered that, in the island of Sardinia, where bishops were few, priests should confirm, in cases of necessity. He decreed that the married subdeacons of Sicily should not be advanced in orders. He turned his energies to the conversion of the Anglo-Saxons, but of that we shall treat in a special chapter.

(1) He converted the patriarch Eutychius, who had grievously erred in the doctrine of the resurrection of the body.

(2) This confirmation of a Pontifical election, in consideration of a certain sum of money, was the result of a usurpation by the Gothic kings, and had been retained by the emperor Justinian. It was finally abolished by Constantine Pogonatus (668-685).

(3) The bishops of Istria, headed by Severus of Aquileia.

One of the most interesting of Gregory's epistles was occasioned by the growing ambition of the see of Constantinople. The patriarch John "the Faster" having assumed the style of "œcumenical," the Pontiff wrote to him a stern, but prudent letter, in which occur the following passages: "I fear the hidden judgments of God, when I learn that the most holy John, a man of such abstinence and humility, has, through the seduction of his familiars, developed so much pride, that he tries to be like unto him who, arrogantly wishing to be like unto God, lost even the granted similarity. Certainly, the Apostle Peter is the first member of the holy universal Church; what are Paul, Andrew, John, but the chiefs of particular peoples? Under one head, all are members of the Church. . . . let your Holiness acknowledge, how much he must be inflated, who desires to be called by a name which no one, who was truly holy, presumed to assume. Were not the bishops of this Apostolic See, as your Fraternity knows, styled 'Universal' by the venerable Council of Chalcedon? And yet no one of them chose to be so designated, not one claimed the arrogant title." Indeed, so great was the delicacy of St. Gregory on this subject of titles, that he instituted the custom of the Pontiff's styling himself "Servant of the servants of God" (1).

St. Gregory was especially careful in the appointment of bishops. Among many instances which could be cited of this prudence, we select the following: John the Deacon had been chosen for the see of Naples, but the Pontiff rejected his name, because he had an infant daughter, thus proving that his continence was not of long duration. When three candidates were presented for the see of Ancona, he said of the first, "He is indeed learned in scripture, but he is broken with age;" of the second, "He is very watchful, but we hear that he does not know the Psalms;" and of the third, "We know him to be energetic, but what he is interiorly, we know not."

(1) JOHN THE DEACON; b. 4, c. 58.

Hearing that simony was prevalent in Gaul and Germany, the saint wrote to queen Brunichilda (1), "Let your Christianity diligently watch, lest in your kingdom any one be allowed to receive Holy Orders, on account of money gifts, personal patronage, or claim of kinship; but let him be chosen for the episcopacy, or for any other holy office, whose life and morals proclaim him worthy; for if the honor of the priesthood is sold, that simoniacal heresy, which was the first to arise in the Church, and was condemned by Peter, will revive, which God forbid, to the detriment of the strength of your kingdom." In a Roman Synod, he prohibited the giving of money, either for ordination, or for the pallium. And writing to Theodobert, king of the Franks, he says that one of the effects of simony is that "the good, if poor, are despised and prohibited to receive Orders. And while the innocence of the poor man is displeasing, the bribe doubtless recommends the wicked; for where gold is liked, so is vice."

St. Gregory manifested great interest in liturgical matters. He added to the Canon of the Mass the words, "And dispense our days in Thy peace, and deliver us from eternal damnation, and order us to be numbered in the flock of Thy elect." He decreed that the Lord's Prayer should be recited after the Canon; that the Kyrie should be sung; that the Alleluja should not be restricted to the Paschal time; that the subdeacon should assist at Mass in alb only. He instituted that majestic chant which, after him, we term the Gregorian. He was very solicitous about the Stations at the basilicas and the catacombs, and it was while performing this devotion that he delivered his twenty Homilies on the Gospels. So great, however, was his humility, that he would not permit his writings to be read in the Vigils and other nocturnal Offices. He says (2), "I was not pleased when my brother and fellow-bishop, Marinian, caused the Comments on Job to be publicly read in the Vigils, because that work is not for the people, and might do more harm than good to the uninstructed. But tell him to have read at the Vigils the Comments on the Psalms, which will teach morality to the secular mind. Nor do I wish that what I have happened to write, should be known to men while I am in the flesh. For I was much displeased when the deacon Anatolius, of blessed memory, obeyed the command of our lord the emperor, and gave him the book of Pastoral Rule, which my holy brother and fellow-bishop, Anastasius of Antioch, translated into the Greek language, and which, as was written to me, pleased him greatly. But it displeased me much, that they who have better books, should occupy themselves with unimportant ones." So far as he could prevent it, he would not allow his works to be read at the meals of his fellow-bishops. He writes to the bishop of Syracuse (1), "I hear that your Fraternity causes to be read at the table certain of my writings, and before strangers; this, it appears to me, ought not to be done, for some might impute to my vain glory, that which you do out of good feeling. Therefore, before visitors, let the sayings of the ancients be read, that the hearers may derive information from their authority."

(1) Epist. 5, b. 7.

(2) Book X., epist. 22.

In his intercourse with the emperor, Gregory always showed the respect due the civil authority, but he never, for a moment, forgot his own Apostolic duties. Events were already gradually precipitating a crisis which was soon to result in the introduction of the Pontiffs among the temporal sovereigns of the world, and the cares of civil administration were frequently forced upon Gregory. But as yet the Byzantine emperors were not so cruelly neglectful of the welfare, and even life, of their Roman subjects, as to force these to disclaim allegiance. The spirit of discontent, however, was developing itself, and hence our Pontiff was careful to show an example of respect to the imperial authority. When Mauritius promulgated a law, prohibiting admission to the ranks of the clergy or to the monastic life, of any persons owing service to the government; also ordering the monasteries to receive no soldiers or officers, Gregory approved of the first clause, but thought it should be so modified as to allow monasteries to receive those whose obligations they were willing to assume to themselves. As for the second clause, the Pontiff condemned it, and begged the emperor to abrogate it. "This Constitution," he says to Mauritius (1), "I tell my lord, has greatly astounded me, because by it the way to Heaven is closed to many, and what was till now permitted, is now prohibited. There are many who can lead a religious life, even when clad in the secular habit; but there are many who cannot be saved before God, unless they leave all things. Saying these things to my lord, what am I but dust and a worm? Yet, since I know that this Constitution is averse to God, the Author of all, I cannot remain silent before my lord. For power has been given by Heaven to the piety of my lord, over all men, in order that they may be aided who seek good things, in order that the way of Heaven may be made wider, in order that the earthly may be joined to the Heavenly kingdom. And behold, it is openly declared, that if a man has been once enrolled among the earthly soldiery, he cannot combat for our Lord Jesus Christ, unless his term has expired, or he is discharged for bodily infirmity. For these things, Christ will answer, through me, His and your most humble servant, saying: 'From a notary, I made you commander of the guards; from a commander's position, I raised you to that of Cæsar; from the station of Cæsar, I made you emperor; more than this, you are the father of emperors. I committed my priests into your hands, and you withdraw your soldiers from my service? Hence, by that same terrible Judge, I pray that all the tears, the prayers, alms, and fastings of my lord may not become obscured before the eyes of God omnipotent; but that your Piety, either by change or by modification, may temper the rigor of this law, for the army of my lord grows in strength against the enemy, in proportion as the army of God grows in prayer.'" Having satisfied his conscience by this protest, Gregory promulgated the imperial mandate; but, in his letters to the metropolitans, he undertook to modify the obnoxious clause—nor was Mauritius offended thereby—by ordering that soldiers should not readily be admitted as monks, and only after a three years' probation in the secular habit.

(1) Book VI., epist. 9.

(1) Book 2, epist. 62.

The Roman Pontiff, as we have said, was not yet, in the time of St. Gregory, a temporal sovereign, but we find him setting an example to all bishops, as to the protection they should, if possible, afford their flocks, when the ordinary civil authorities are too negligent or too impotent to extend it. Thus, he sent Leontius to the Nepesines as governor, giving him these credentials (1): "We have given to Leontius the care and responsibility of the city, that, watching over all which turns to your utility, and that of the State, he may arrange, &c. Whoever resists his orders, will be known as contradicting our dispositions." He sent as governor to Naples, the tribune Constantius, with orders to protect it. Writing to the Neapolitan soldiery, the Pope says (2): "Among other merits of an army, it deserves the greatest praise when it shows obedience to the necessities of the State, as we learn your devotion has done, showing a fitting example of military obedience by respecting our epistles, whereby we deputed the honorable tribune Constantius as governor of the city." He wrote to the bishop of Terracina that not even the clergy should be exempted from sentry duty (3): "Since we have heard that many excuse themselves from the watch on the walls, let your Fraternity be careful that no one be exempted from this duty, either in our name or that of the Church." St. Gregory having suggested to Mauritius the propriety of making peace with the Lombards, he was regarded as a simpleton, and received rather insolent letters from the emperor. In his reply, we note the following passages (4): "Since I am denounced as a simpleton, as having been deceived by the cunning of Arnulph, I am doubtless regarded as a fool; and that I am such, I myself avow. For had I not been a fool, I would not have come to bear the things which I suffer in this place, from the swords of the Lombards. As for my saying that Arnulph was heartily willing to come to terms with the State, I am

(1) Book VIII., epist. 2.

(2) Book XII., epist. 24.

(3) Book VII., epist. 20.

(4) Book 4, epist. 31.

upbraided as a liar. But although I am not a (good) priest, I know it is a grave injury to a priest, if, when serving the truth, he is thought to be a deceiver. And truly, if the captivity of my country were not momentarily becoming more intolerable, I would gladly be silent as to the contempt shown to me. But this greatly afflicts me, that what causes me to be charged with falsehood, also causes Italy to lie captive under the yoke of the Lombards. And while my suggestions are ignored, the forces of the enemy immensely increase. What wonder is it if your Piety deigns to honor those whom God Himself calls gods and angels? . . . what wonder if a Christian emperor deigns to honor the priests of the true God, when Pagan princes knew how to honor those priests who served gods of wood and stone? I suggest these things to the piety of my lord, not on my own account, but because of the entire priesthood; as for myself, I am a sinful man." At one time, St Gregory had made peace with the Lombards, but owing to the imprudence of Mauritius, war again ensued, and king Agilulph invaded the Duchy of Rome, took a large number of captives, and laid siege to the city. While the siege lasted, the imperial prefect and the general commanding were not more active in the defence than the Pontiff, but Mauritius, instead of thanking him, upbraided him because there had not been more corn in the city. The saint, nevertheless, had used the treasures of the Church to pay the soldiery, and to ransom the captive Romans (1). In an epistle to the emperor already quoted (2), the Pontiff says, "I had already received several wounds, when the arrival of my lord's orders brought me unhopèd-for consolations. If I can, I shall enumerate these wounds. The first was when the peace, which, without any detriment to the state, I had made with the Lombards of Tuscany, was broken; again, when the garrison was withdrawn from Rome. Many of them had indeed been killed by the enemy, the rest were stationed in Narni and Perugia; that Perugia might be held, Rome was abandoned. After this, a more severe wound was caused by the coming of Agilulph, when, with my own eyes, I saw the

(1) Book 4, epist. 34.(2) Ibi, epist. 31.

Romans with ropes around their necks, like dogs, led off to be sold in Gaul. And as for us who, by the mercy of God, remained safe from the enemy, we have been called culpable because the corn gave out, when we could not possibly have collected more. I have not been disturbed hereby for myself, because I speak from my conscience when I declare myself ready for anything, provided only I issue forth from these troubles with the salvation of my soul. But I have been greatly afflicted on account of the glorious heroes, the prefect Gregory, and the general, Castor, who, to the utmost of their ability, neglected nothing, but suffered greatly in the defence of the city; and yet they have fallen under the displeasure of my lord. But I plainly understand that it is not their conduct, but my person, that causes their trouble." At length, St. Gregory saw peace concluded with Agilulph, and on that score, his last days were happy.

That our Pontiff was a most learned, as well as a most holy man, his works, and the estimation in which they have ever been held, abundantly prove. He was unacquainted with Greek, according to his own acknowledgment (1); but this does not appear to have been much of a drawback. Our limits will permit of only a cursory glance at his works. His book of Morals, deduced from Job, was written at the instance of St. Leander of Spain, while our saint was Papal legate at Constantinople; it is admirably adapted to the wants of the preacher, and to him who seeks guidance in the care of souls. The Pastoral Book was occasioned by a reproof given the saint by John, archbishop of Ravenna, for having refused a bishopric. It fully treats of the duties of bishops, and was so highly appreciated during the middle ages, that we find many Synods enjoining its study and observance upon bishops. Thus, the Council of Tours, in 813, declares that every bishop should look at himself in it, as in a mirror. The Homilies on Ezechiel were delivered to the people, and taken down by notaries; the forty Homilies on the Gospels were some delivered by himself, and others dictated to notaries who read them to the people. Certain authors, both Catholic and Protestant, have denied that St.

(1) "We have written no work in Greek, nor do we know Greek." Book 6, epist. 29.

Gregory is the author of the Dialogues ascribed to him, but the weight of evidence is for the affirmative side of the question (1). The Antiphonary is a new arrangement of the ancient Antiphons of the Church, with the addition of many new ones. The Sacramentary is based on the codex of Pope Gelasius, and has been greatly modified by succeeding Pontiffs. There are Commentaries on the Book of Kings, on the Penitential Psalms, and on the Canticle of Canticles, attributed to St. Gregory, which seem to be unauthentic (2).

Modern incredulists, and other adversaries of the Holy See, have accused St. Gregory of virulent hostility to profane science, alleging that he forbade the study of letters to ecclesiastics; that his fanaticism caused him to procure the destruction of many monuments of Pagan Rome; that he burned the valuable library of the Palatine; that he was, in fine, the Attila of literature. As for the Pontiff's sentiments in regard to letters, John the Deacon (3) tells us that, under Gregory's rule, wisdom built for herself at Rome a visible temple, and that the halls of the Papal palace were resplendent with the glories of the seven arts; that not one of the court, from the highest to the lowest, ever betrayed the least barbarism in language or in dress; that study of the fine arts was the order of the day. The works of St. Gregory show that he was a learned man, and if, as is alleged, he sometimes appears to condemn the adventitious beauties of rhetoric (4), it is only because, as he himself tells us, he was more concerned for purity of doctrine and for exactness in dogmatic expression. He certainly did reprove a bishop for teaching rhetoric (5), but merely because he deemed the office of pedagogue beneath the episcopal dignity. And is it likely that a fanatical devotee of ignorance would have occupied the position of prefect of Rome, or that he would have been made legate to the cultivated court of Constantinople? Brucker (6) asserts that our Pontiff

(1) See ALEXANDRE; Cent. 6, chap. 4, art. 16. (2) Ibi.

(3) Life of St. Gregory, b. 2, c. 12. (4) Epistle to Leander, prefixed to the Morals.

(5) Epist. 54, to Desiderius of Vienne.

(6) Critical History of Philosophy, v. 3, p. 2, b. 2. "Among the many merits of this writer, to whom we owe the fullest, most complete, and most profound, history of philosophy yet seen, is that of wise moderation; he does not, like many Protestants, exercise a rabid fury towards everything Catholic. But on this occasion, he seems to have forgotten his wise impartiality. In the appendix he asserts that this otherwise good bishop expelled mathematicians from his palace, and that he burned the Palatine library. Bayle and Barbeyrac, hostile though they are to the Fathers, admit that the last accusation is baseless. It is founded solely upon the authority of John of Salisbury (d. 1180), who, in his Polycraticon, b. 2, c. 26, says that, "The most holy doctor, Gregory, who nourished and inebriated the whole Church with the honeyed rain of his preaching, not only ordered mathematicians to retire from his court, but, as is handed down from our forefathers, gave to the flames all the writings contained in the (library of) Palatine Apollo, among which the principal were thought to reveal to men the celestial mind, and the oracles of Heaven." But how is it that for more than five hundred years we find no mention of this accusation? Brucker answers that it was a tradition, "handed down from our forefathers," in the words of John of Salisbury, and that Catholics, who rely so much upon tradition, ought therefore to accept it. But Catholics, well replies Bergier (1), do not receive as tradition every hearsay, and Protestants, who reject even written traditions, ought not to accept one which is unwritten. Let us omit, however, for the moment, any question as to the authority of John of Salisbury. What does he assert? Firstly, that St. Gregory expelled mathematicians from his court. But who were these "mathematicians?" In the middle ages this term was principally applied to judicial astrologists, that is, to those who pretended to predict the future by a planetary investigation. Brucker and his imitators may have been grossly ignorant as to the literature of that time, but certainly they should have noticed that Salisbury himself informs us that he makes no reference to "mathematicians" in our sense of the word. He is attacking the false science of astrology, and alleges the authority of "the most holy doctor, Gregory," who, he says, not only banished the impostors from was not naturally acute, that he possessed no force of genius, and could not reason well. But while he was thus writing, there fell into his hands two books written in defence of St. Gregory, one by a Benedictine monk of Frisingen, and the other by the anonymous French author of the History of Eclecticism. Hence he resolved to again enter the field, and in a long, and, if I may so speak, very tedious digression of full forty pages, he undertook to refute the arguments of these writers, and to develop or confirm his previous assertions of our Pontiff's superstition, ignorance, and want of discernment." TORABOSCHI; Italian Literature, b. 2, c. 2.

(1) Dictionary, art. Gregory.

his presence, but even destroyed those writings "which were thought to reveal to men the celestial mind, and the oracles of Heaven."

As for the burning of the grand Library constructed by Augustus in the Palatine temple of Apollo (1), could such an event, so interesting to every votary of learning, have taken place, we will not say, without the lamentations of many, but without even a word of comment? And nevertheless, five centuries and a half elapse, during which a constant succession of chroniclers are busily recording even the trivialties of their time, and not a suspicion of such an event is hinted. The authority of John of Salisbury is not so incontestable as to justify us in yielding to his uncorroborated assertion, and in the face of this eloquent silence. Brucker praises his virtues, and tells us they procured his elevation to the see of Chartres. But virtue does not necessarily imply the power of critical discernment, and when Salisbury narrates things displeasing to Protestant ears, we hear nothing either of his virtue or of his acumen. The fact is, however, John of Salisbury was a bad critic; everything was grist to his mill. In the course of his works, many popular traditions are met, some of them simply ridiculous, and yet he approves them all. Coming from the pen of a Catholic bishop, what can be more absurd than his approval (2) of the story of Trajan's pardon from hell, thanks to the importunate prayers of Pope Gregory, "but only on condition that Gregory should never again intercede with God for an infidel"? But perhaps the strongest refutation of this calumny can be found in the evident futility of the act with the commission of which our Pontiff is charged. If St. Gregory burned the Palatine Library, he did so through false zeal for sacred letters. Now that zeal could not be satisfied by the destruction of one single library, and he would have in vain brought opprobrium upon himself. In Rome there were many other such collections, and in the monasteries of Italy, Gaul, Ireland, and Spain, the patient scribes were constantly multiplying copies of the dangerous classics.

(1) Some authors have thought that Salisbury intended to refer merely to the destruction of the astrological books, but the tenor of the passage seems to imply a burning of the entire collection.

(2) Polyeraticon, b. 5, c. 8.

The Roman Pontiff who would be so foolish and reckless as to burn the Palatine Library, would certainly have ordered the destruction of the classics in every monastery of the world (1).

St. Gregory is also charged with the destruction of many monuments of ancient Roman magnificence. But upon what testimony is this accusation put forth? Upon that of Amalricus, who lived in the 14th century, and whom the erudite and critical Muratori regards as a swallower of fables; upon that of Leo Urbevetanus, also of the 14th century, and whom Lamy accuses of credulity; upon that of Raphael of Volaterra, of the 16th century, whom Tiraboschi condemns as of little reliability (2). Where did these writers, of a period eight and nine centuries posterior to the age of Gregory, derive their information? In all the works composed during this interval, there is profound silence as to the imputed vandalism of our Pontiff; it is ignored by Gregory of Tours, Isidore of Spain, Ven. Bede, Lintprand, the deacons Paul and John, Anastasius the Librarian, all of whom are prolific with details of his reign. We are asked to believe that a Roman patrician, a member of a senatorial family, and a man of liberal education, one who had occupied the exalted pretorial chair over a people distinguished for their pride in their city, helped to consummate the work of devastation which the Northern barbarians had left incomplete. We are asked to ignore his lamentations, his overpowering grief (1), caused by the destruction of so many beautiful edifices, and to regard him as a prince of vandals. And how is his insanity explained? We are told that the fanatical Pontiff wished to remove from the Roman people any danger of relapse into idolatry. But in the time of St. Gregory the Great, the Romans were as far removed from any weakness of faith as they are to-day; perhaps, indeed, further removed than they are at present. While admiring the magnificent productions of ancestral genius, they were as free from any yearnings towards idolatry as any of their martyred forefathers. And would the Roman people have allowed this destruction of their city's glorious monuments? Procopius (2) (d. 565) says, "The Romans are more careful of their city than any people we know; everything belonging to their country they strive to preserve, and although they have suffered under the rule of barbarism, they have preserved the edifices of the city, and as many of its ornaments as they were able." Gregory was Supreme Pontiff, and had, as we have seen, almost royal power in the Roman Duchy, but the emperor was yet the acknowledged master. Would he have permitted this gross infraction of the Theodosian and Justinianic laws, which so strictly provided for the care of the ancient monuments? No emperor would have suffered such vandalism to be perpetrated, still less Mauritius, who was constantly at issue with our saint, and seized every opportunity to vex him (1). But we need no better defence of St. Gregory than is furnished by Rome at this day. When we look upon the great number of ancient monuments which, thanks to the fostering care and liberal expenditure of the Pope-Kings, yet subsist in the Eternal City, we must suppose that Gregory's successor did not gaze upon any traces of Papal vandalism. And we know that many of the ancient monuments have disappeared since the death of our Pontiff (2). Rome has withstood many vicissitudes during the last twelve hundred years. She has been sacked by the foreigner, and her treasures have been plundered by her own turbulent barons. Her Frangipani and Savelli have pulled to pieces many an ancient building to procure materials for a medieval fortress, and she has seen the Gallic invader weakening her admired masonries to provide metal for his cannon. And in spite of all this, the modern traveller is awestruck under the spell of her numerous monuments of ancient art. What, then, we would ask, must have been the extent and condition of these monuments, when Sabinian took possession of the Chair of Peter?

(1) Some writers of the 15th century asserted that St. Gregory endeavored to prevent the study of Tally and Livy. This seems unlikely, for these authors are probably the least offensive of any on the classic shelves. A condemnation of Horace, Catullus, and Tibullus, would have been much more consonant with the Pontiff's supposed severity. Tiraboschi (loc. cit.) speaks as follows of the authority of John of Salisbury: "Who is this writer? In the first place he lived six centuries after St. Gregory. Now some of the critics of our day conduct themselves, to tell the truth, in a very frivolous manner. They want every fact to be proved by the authority of writers contemporary, or nearly so, with the events in question, and if they come across a narration by a modern author, unaccompanied by such authoritative proof, they either reject the fact narrated, or place it on the list of doubtful events. I myself believe in so doing, but these gentlemen are not consistent. When they meet a story which, for some reason, they wish to credit, then any testimony, no matter of how distant an authority, is sufficient. Were John of Salisbury to narrate something creditable to St. Gregory, then we would hear that he is unreliable, but if he tells us something that would indicate the saint as a fanatic and an ignorant man, then he is a truth-telling and critical historian. . . . No other writer, during the space of nearly six centuries, says anything about St. Gregory's having burnt a library; at length an English author speaks of it, but gives no proof. Why should we easily believe him? And here precisely has Brucker been awaiting us. No, says he, Salisbury does not allege this fact without good proof (Appendix, p. 659); he says that 'it is handed down to us a majoribus;' therefore it was a perpetual tradition, doubted by no one; it was probably recorded in many books not now extant; a wise and learned man, such as Salisbury was, would not have asserted it without reason. Thus proceeds Brucker in his lengthy demonstration. But let me ask Brucker if he believes it true that St. Gregory freed the soul of Trajan from hell. He must laugh at my question. But suppose that I declare that this act of the saint is narrated by a writer of the 12th century. He will answer that it was precisely in those times of ignorance that such fables originated; that a writer, who seriously records such things, is a weak-minded, superstitious, ignorant man. Very well. This John of Salisbury, that man, as Brucker says (ibid.), who was learned beyond his time; that most celebrated author who was greatly esteemed by the University of Paris (ibid., p. 660); in whose writings there is not wanting critical acumen, and whom learned men set above all his contemporaries (p. 664); who, well instructed in dialectics was not so uncultured, as, like Gregory, to prefer to be accused of ignorance rather than acquire the art of reasoning properly; who under the tuition of the great professor of logic, William of Soissons, learned the elements of that science, and hence entered upon the right road of true erudition (p. 665); this very man, to whom Brucker gives all these praises, when he wishes us to credit the story of the Palatine library, narrates such a fact with the most admirable seriousness. . . . Does Brucker believe this tale? Let him then acknowledge that his John of Salisbury is not so critical as he would have us believe; that he narrates as certain things that common sense shows to have been impossible (and if time and space permitted, I could give many instances, for I have read the whole of Salisbury's book, in order to form an impartial judgment); that his 'it is said,' 'we read,' 'it is rumored,' indicate merely popular traditions that are without foundation. . . . Finally, in the two passages in which he speaks of this conflagration, John of Salisbury contradicts himself. In one place he says that the library given to the flames was that of the Capitol, in another, that it was that of the temple of the Palatine Apollo. It is certain that these were two different libraries, and they were very distant from each other."

(2) As critics, Muratori and Tiraboschi occupy a position second to none and immeasurably more eminent than that attained by the rank and file of the profession. Lamy's opinions are greatly respected by scholars.

(1) Homily 18, on Ezekiel.(2) Gothic War, b. 2.

St. Gregory died in 604, the fourteenth year of his Pontificate. His eulogy may be well condensed in the words of St. Ildephonse of Toledo, "In holiness, he excelled Anthony; in eloquence, Cyprian; and in wisdom, Augustine" (3).

(1) Although not a tyrant, Mauritius caused much trouble to St. Gregory. Thus, he left his Italian subjects a prey to the Lombards, in spite of the Pontiff's assiduous prayers for their relief. He also sustained the arrogance of the Constantinopolitan patriarch in claiming the title of "Œcumenical." We have already noticed the obstacles he threw in the way of military men, aspiring to the monastic life. He aided in every way the defenders of the Three Chapters, and so protected Maximus, a Dalmatian schismatic, that he was enabled to ridicule the Papal authority.

(2) See Fea's Dissertation on the Ruins of Rome.

(3) Ecclesiastical Writers.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

THE CONVERSION OF ENGLAND.

At the time of Christ's sojourn upon earth, Druidism was the religion of Britain; by whom, and when, the Gospel was first introduced into the island, is uncertain. Eusebius (1) says that the Apostles passed into Britain, and Gildas (2) seems to imply that the conversion took place under Tiberius. More modern authors have ventured to determine the name of the first Apostle of Britain. Parsons (3) contended that this glory belongs to St. Peter; Godwin (4) and Stillingfleet (5) ascribed it to St. Paul. Lingard (6) regards the arguments used by both Catholic and Protestant writers, in determining this question, as unworthy of attention. "The former," he says, "relied on the treacherous authority of Metaphrastes; the latter on the ambiguous and hyperbolic expressions of a few more ancient writers." It is certain that Christianity first took firm root in Britain, about the year 182, in the reign of Lucius, the great-grandson of Caractacus, and heir of some of the authority given that prince by Claudius. At the solicitation of Lucius, Pope Eleutherius sent Fugatius and Damian to instruct the Britons, and a flourishing church soon came into existence. The controversies which were the bane of the East, did not disturb the less polished and less inquisitive islanders, but they were not destined to be never assailed by heresy. Their countryman, Pelagius, succeeded in propagating his errors to an alarming extent, and it was only by the zeal of St. Germain l'Auxerrois and St. Lupus of Troyes, that the orthodox faith was sustained (7). But another formidable enemy now con-

(1) Dem. Evang., b.1, c. 7.

(4) First Conversion of Britain.

(2) Calamity, Destruction, and Conquest of Britain. (5) Brit. Orig.

(3) Three Conversions, v. 1.

(6) Antiquities of the Anglo-Saxon Church, c. 1.

(7) Sts. Germain and Lupus received their mission, according to Constantius, from the bishops of Gaul; according to Prosper, from Pope Celestine. These prelates met the Pelagian leaders in a Synod at Verulam, and after a day's useless debate, nothing was decided, but in the evening a miracle confirmed the teachings of St. Germain, and his opponents declared themselves converted. But the heresy soon burst out anew, and the holy Auxerrois resumed his labors—this time with permanent success. See Life of St. Germain, by Constantius, b. 11, c. 1.

fronted the British church. The piratical Saxons, who, according to Ptolemy (Claude), had been, in the second century, a small tribe of barbarians in the Cimbric Chersonesus, were now become a mighty power, and were dominant in the Germanic regions. The reader is doubtless familiar with the tale of the Saxon conquest of Britain. The natives resisted to the utmost, and the incensed invaders gave such vent to their fury, that the surviving Britons took refuge in the fastnesses of the western coast of the island. With them vanished civilization and Christianity; German barbarism and idolatry were conquerors (1). But wherever the fierce northern savage destroyed the worldly empire of Rome, he soon kneeled in adoration to the God of Rome. John the Deacon (2) gives us the following narration of the first steps towards the conversion of the Anglo-Saxons: "On a certain day, when many things were exposed for sale in the Roman Forum, and many persons had come there to buy, it chanced that Gregory, a man most worthy before God, passed along. Seeing for sale some youths of very fair complexion, of beautiful shape and charming features, and with shining hair, he asked the trader from what land he had brought them. He replied that they came from the island of Britain, the inhabitants of which all possessed similar brightness of countenance. Gregory asked whether the islanders were Christians, or still involved in the errors of Paganism; the merchant answered that they were not Christians, but yet held in Pagan chains. Then Gregory sighed heavily, and said, 'Alas! that the prince of darkness should possess such resplendent faces, and that such external beauty should be united to souls not bearing the interior grace of God!' Again he demanded the name of that people, and the merchant said that they were called 'Angles.' And he answered that they were well styled 'Angles,' as though they were 'Angels,' for they had angelic features, and should be fellow-citizens with the angels of Heaven." Impressed with this idea, Gregory besought Pope Benedict I. for permission to under-

(1) The ferocity displayed by the Saxons in this war was such that it would be incredible, if narrated only by the Briton Gildas, but the Saxon Chronicle corroborates his assertions.

(2) Life of Pope St. Gregory the Great, b. 1, c. 3. Venerable Bede gives the same account, b. 2, and says it was handed down as a "tradition of our ancestors." John the Deacon wrote in the 9th century, Bede in the 7th and 8th.

take the conversion of the Anglo-Saxons. He departed on his mission, but, says John the Deacon, "the Romans were displeased at his absence, and conspiring together, they approached the Pontiff in three separate crowds, as he was going to the Basilica of St. Peter, and shouted, 'Thou hast offended Peter; thou hast destroyed Rome, in dismissing Gregory.' " In consequence of this attitude of the Romans, the zealous monk was recalled to the city, and his subsequent election to the Papacy compelled him to entrust to others the accomplishment of his design. His first step in this direction was an epistle to Candidus, the administrator of the patrimony of St. Peter in Gaul, commissioning him to purchase a number of young Saxon slaves, to be sent to Rome, and there, if they proved fit, to be ordained, and sent as missionaries to their countrymen (1). The youths did not prove very bright, and the Pontiff turned to his quondam companions of the Cælian monastery for his instruments. Under the supervision of Augustine, a number of monks set out, bearing letters to the Gallic clergy, asking for interpreters to be assigned them, and also letters to the Frank princes, begging their protection on the way. They landed on the island of Thanet, in 597. We do not propose to describe the conversion of the Heptarchy; the reader will find the details in Lingard's apposite work, already cited, and from which we draw the material for this chapter.

In the entire history of Christianity, there is no instance of a change wrought in a converted people equal to that which the acceptance of the Gospel operated in the Anglo-Saxons. The various provinces of the old Roman Empire had long been subjected to the influences of a high civilization; these people were not merely barbarians, they were savages. When St. Patrick preached the faith to the Irish, he met a brave and sturdy, but yet a refined and gentle race. The Goths, Scythians, Lombards, and other barbaric nations, who entered the Christian fold, were endowed with sentiments of delicacy, if they are compared with the neophytes of St. Augustine. All the barbaric hordes who helped to disintegrate the great Empire, were valorous, but the Saxons were simply brutal. Other tribes desired the labor of their captives; the Saxons preferred to drink ale out of their skulls. The Christian missionary expected to be obliged to combat the sensual passions of his converts, but, if we are to believe the ancient chroniclers, he must have been appalled by the lust of the Saxon. The brute creation is unanimous in its love for its offspring; the Saxons were so greedy of gold that they sold their own children to the slave-dealers of the continent. Their theology knew but one sin, cowardice; it recognized but one virtue, courage. But with the advent of Christianity, this terrible picture vanished, and the Saxon was no longer a monster. In a short time, he too took up the work of the apostolate, and St. Boniface converted the Old Saxons, Franks, Hessians, and Thuringians; St. Swibert the Westphalians; Sts. Wilfrid and Willibrord the Frisians and the Hollanders; St. Willihad the tribes north of the Elbe. Piety became a characteristic of the nation. Nowhere were churches, hospitals, and monasteries more numerous, or better endowed, and nowhere were they attended by a more devoted clergy; the land came to be styled the "Island of Saints." Religion developed civilization, or rather created it; the useful, as well as the agreeable, was cultivated, and the Saxon barbarian was soon to be found only in history.

(1) Gregory's Epistles, b. 5, No. 16.

Protestants once held that the Anglo-Saxon church was a Papistical institution from its very foundation. Bale informs us that "Augustine was first sent to initiate the Anglo-Saxons in Papistical traditions; he introduced altars, vestments, masses, images, &c." (1). The same author delicately asserts that Augustine "brought nothing but Pontifical traditions and human dung" (2). Parker says that Augustine was "an apostle to the Angles, not of the Christian faith and of the divine word, but of ceremonies and Roman rites; and he taught them to be Romans and Pontificals, rather than Christians and Evangelicals" (3). But more modern Saxon scholars have discovered that the early church of their ancestors was not "Pontifical," but rather worthy of being numbered among Protestant organizations. Athelhard, archbishop of Canterbury, having asked of the bishops assembled in the Synod of Cloveshoe (y. 803) for a Profession of Faith, they answered (1): "Let it be known to your Paternity, that we believe as was first taught by the Holy Roman and Apostolic See, by the direction of the most blessed Pope Gregory." Hence, according to these investigators. St. Gregory also was a Protestant. It is not difficult, however, to prove that the faith of the early Saxon Christians was what Parker called "Roman and Pontifical." In the first place, if the Saxon church was not united with the Roman in identity of doctrine, how can we account for the strict communion between the two churches? How is it that Boniface, Swibert, Wilfrid, and other Saxon missionaries preached the faith of Rome, among the German barbarians, and founded churches in communion with Rome? What mean the professions of submission to Rome, the innumerable acts of devotion to the Holy See, on the part of the Saxon kings? But let us examine the doctrines of the Saxon church, as indicated by its practices.

(1) Cent. 13, c. 1.(2) Cent. 8, c. 85. The text has stercora.(3) Ant. Brit., p. 35.

It is certain that the early Saxon Christians agreed with Rome as to the necessity of the Sacrament of Baptism. Protestants, however, frequently assert that the ceremonies of the Roman Ritual were unknown, that the insufflation and unctions with oil and chrism were not in use. Yet Bede (2) mentions the insufflation; the Saxon Pontifical (3), prescribes the salt; Archbishop Ælfric (4) speaks of the unction with oil on the breast and between the shoulders, and of that with chrism on the top of the head; Alcuin (5), finally, gives the ceremonies in their entirety. That the anointings with chrism were regarded as sacred, is shown by the head being kept bound with a fillet for seven days (6). The only difference between the practice of the ancient and that of the modern English Catholics, in the ceremonies attendant on Baptism, seems to have been in the old custom of giving the Eucharist to the lately baptized infant (7).

(1) WILKINS; Councils, p. 162. (4) Saxon Laws, p. 172.

(2) B. 5, c. 6.

(5) Treatise to Adrian in Duchesne's Alcuin, part II.

(3) MARTENE, v. 1.

(6) BEDE, b. 5, c. 7.

(7) Saxon Laws, p. 172

With regard to Confirmation, we know that the child was presented to the bishop, and that he received the gifts of wisdom and fortitude to assist him in the spiritual warfare(1). As for the doctrine of the Real Presence of our Lord in the Eucharist, Anglican authors, such as Parker, Lisle, Usher, Whelock, Hickes, Carte, Littleton, and Henry, have endeavored to show that Transubstantiation was not the belief of the Anglo-Saxons. Philology and history have been tirelessly invoked, but among all the Saxon authors who flourished during the brilliant period preceding the Danish inroads, not a passage can be found denying the Catholic doctrine; among the writers of the dark period which followed the Danish devastations, there are some expressions which Protestants eagerly seize, but which Catholics as eagerly defend. The first testimony to which we draw the reader's attention is from the Actions of the Synod of Calcuith (816). From the earliest days of the Church, no temple could be dedicated unless it held the remains of a martyr; hence, a small portion, at least, of a martyr's relics, were deposited in every altar-stone. In England, however, it became so difficult to observe this law, that the Synod of Calcuith (2) ordered that when relics could not be obtained, the Blessed Eucharist should be preserved in the church. And why? "Because the Eucharist is the Body and Blood of our Lord Jesus Christ." But, replies the Protestant, such a disposition of the Eucharist does not necessarily imply a belief in Transubstantiation; the Saxons may have believed, as do some Protestants, that Christ is present at the act and time of Communion. The context shows that a permanent, abiding presence is understood; for, in the Protestant supposition, of what significance, more than any other substance, would be the Eucharistic host, in lieu of the martyr's relics? A permanent, not a transitory presence of our Lord is supposed by Bede (3) when he says, "When we celebrate the Mass, we again immolate to the Father the sacred Body and the precious Blood

(1) BEDE; Life of Cuthbert, c. 29 and 32. WILKINS; Councils, p. 252. Saxon Laws, p. 167.

(2) WILKINS; Council of Calcuith.

(3) Homily on the Eve of the Passion.

of the Lamb, with which we have been redeemed from our sins." Egbert, archbishop of York, who wrote in the beginning of the eighth century, compiled a Pontifical, which was preserved at Evreux; in the abbey of Iumiege, another Anglo-Saxon Pontifical was also extant in the time of Martene. From these two documents (1), we learn that at the ordination of a priest, he is endowed with the power of "transforming the Body and Blood of Christ." The pyx is called "the bearer of the Body of Christ," and a "new sepulchre for the Body of Christ." The corporale is "a piece of linen, on which the Body and Blood of Christ are consecrated, and in which they are wrapped up." The altar is declared to be consecrated in order that on it "a sacred virtue may turn the creatures chosen for sacrifice into the Body and Blood of the Redeemer, and transform them by an invisible change, into the Sacred Hosts of the Lamb, that as the Word was made flesh, so the nature of the offering being blessed, may be elevated to the substance of the Word, and what before was food, may here be made eternal life."

Among the works of the Saxon clergy which were composed after the Danish invasion, we find some translations and several sermons by Ælfric, a monk who had studied in the school of St. Ethelwold at Winchester, and who finally became archbishop of Canterbury. In treating of the Eucharist, Ælfric teaches that "the Eucharistic differs from the natural Body of Christ," and that "the former is indeed His Body, but after a spiritual, not after a bodily manner" (2). Lisle, Usher, Henry, and other Protestant writers, interpret this doctrine in their own favor, but Catholic disputants, and none better than Lingard (3), show that it is thoroughly consistent with Catholic orthodoxy. Among the many questions which the medieval scholastics delighted in raising, occurs, whether wisely or not, it is not for us to determine, one speculating upon the precise nature of Christ's Eucharistic Body. Haimo of Halberstadt held that, as a sign is excluded by reality, so the Eucharist contained no mystery or sign. Paschasius, Hincmar, and others, admitted both sign and reality, and added that the Eucharistic Body was the identical one which was born of Mary and suffered on the cross. A third school, represented by Ratramn or Bertram, a monk of Corbie, and Ælfric (1), rejected both the former opinions, and taught a triple distinction of the Body of Christ: viz., that born of Mary, the Eucharistic, and the mystical. Rabanus Maurus, archbishop of Mentz (2), one of this school, declares that the difference for which they disputed, was merely as to the external appearance; and Bertram, though trying to show that the natural is not the same as the Eucharistic Body, plainly admits their identity, when he says that Christ "changed the substance of bread into His own Body, which was about to suffer, and the creature of wine into his own Blood, which was to be shed on the cross." As to Ælfric's belief in the Real Presence, it is clearly indicated in his Sermon on the Sacrifice of the Mass, although Henry asserts that no ingenuity can reconcile his doctrine with that of Rome (3). The reader shall judge whether the Saxon prelate's notions upon the nature of the Sacramental Body imply denial of Transubstantiation, and whether his doctrine should be pleasing to Protestants. We give Lingard's translation; the Saxon text may be found in Lisle's edition of 1623 (4). "Much is there between the invisible might of the holy husel, and the visible appearance of its own kind. In its own kind, it is corruptible bread and corruptible wine; but, after the might of the divine word, it is truly Christ's Body and His Blood, not indeed, in a bodily, but in a ghostly manner. Much is there between the Body, in which Christ suffered, and the Body which is hallowed to husel. Truly the Body in which Christ suffered, was born of the flesh of Mary, with blood and with bone, and with skin and with sinews, in human limbs, and with a reasonable living soul. But His ghostly Body, which we call the husel, is gathered of many corns, without blood and bone, without limbs and a

(1) MARTENE: Ancient Rites (y. 1700).

(2) Sermon for Easter.

(3) Antiquities, note N.

(1) The Danish devastations had seriously affected the monasteries, and when, in the 10th century, St. Dunstan restored monachism in England, he was forced to import instructors from French establishments. Monks of Fleury and Corbie taught at Abingdon and Winchester, and there Ælfric received the ideas of Bertram.

(2) MABILLON; Cent. 4, v. 2.

(3) History, v. 2, p. 202.

(4) Also, see Whelock's Bede.

soul, and therefore nothing is to be understood in it after a bodily, but after a ghostly manner. Whatever there is in the husel, which giveth us the substance of life, that cometh of the ghostly might and invisible operation. For this reason the holy husel is called a Sacrament; because one thing is seen in it, and another understood. That which is seen, hath a bodily appearance; that which we understand, hath a ghostly might. Certainly, Christ's Body that suffered death, and arose from death, dies now no more; it is eternal and impassible. The husel is temporal, not eternal; corruptible, dealed into pieces, chewed between the teeth, and sent into the stomach. But it is nevertheless all in every part according to the ghostly might. Many receive the holy Body, but it is nevertheless all in every part according to the ghostly Sacrament. Though some men receive a smaller part, yet there is not more might in a greater part than in a smaller. Because it is entire in all men, according to the invisible might. This Sacrament is a pledge and a figure; Christ's Body is truth. This pledge we hold sacramentally, till we come to the truth, and then this pledge will end. Truly it is, as we said before, Christ's Body and His Blood, not after a bodily, but after a ghostly manner. Nor shall ye search how it is made so; but hold that it is made so." Had Ælfrie been surrounded by heretics, by men who denied the real and permanent Presence of Christ in the Eucharist, his expressions would doubtless have been more guarded, and he would have perhaps paid more attention to his own injunction at the close of the cited passage. However, in these words there is no source of comfort to a Protestant (1). All Catholics admit that in the Eucharist the Body of Christ does not exist after the manner of an ordinary, natural body, and some adjectives must be employed to express the different modes of existence. Bertram, Ælfrie, and others used the terms "naturally" and "spiritually;" the Council of Trent adopted the words "naturally" and

(1) We should observe that. Immediately after the above passage, Ælfrie, as a proof of the Real Presence, quotes two miracles, in which the sacred Flesh and Blood were manifested in the Eucharist. Whatever discredit may be given to these events, it can scarcely be believed that they would be cited as a proof of the Real Presence by one who denied Transubstantiation.

"sacramentally" (1). Ælfric certainly denies the identity of the natural and the Eucharistic Body of Christ; so do some of the most orthodox of Catholic theologians. We cite the more familiar Lanfranc, the energetic adversary of the first Sacramentarian, Berengarius (2), and Bossuet (3). Ælfric styles the Eucharist a pledge and a figure; so does the Catholic Church (4). It has been asserted that the teaching of Ælfric represents the belief of the Anglo-Saxons. This is true, inasmuch as the whole nation believed that, in the Mass, the bread and wine were changed into the Body and Blood of Christ. But his peculiar opinion, as to the nature of the Eucharistic Body, orthodox though it was, was not held by any other Saxon writers, either of his time, or of preceding or posterior days. On the contrary, the doctrine of the identity of the natural and Eucharistic Body was frequently taught, and seems to have been the national belief. We have already quoted Bede as saying that the Body of the Lamb, which is offered on the altar, is the one by which we were redeemed; and in another place (5), he says "His Blood is not now shed by the hands of unbelievers, but received to their salvation in the mouths of the faithful." Alcuin tells us (6) that "the Mystery of the Body and Blood of the Lord is not to be called an image, but the truth; not a shadow, but the Body; not a figure of things to come, but that which was once prefigured by types; for He did not say 'this is the figure of my Body,' but 'this is my Body, which shall be given for ye.'" In a MS. once belonging to king Canute the Great (7) our Lord is said to have declared to His Apostles that "He gave them His Body to eat, and His Blood to drink, that Body which He should give up to be crucified, and that Blood which He should shed for them." In another MS. (8) of the same date, it

(1) Some modern theologians cling to "naturally" and "spiritually." See VERON; Rule of Faith, c. 11.

(2) In his treatise against Berengarius, c. 18, the Norman prelate says that, if we consider the mode of existence of the Eucharistic Body, we may truly say that it is not the same body which was born of Mary.

(3) Bossuet asserts that "in one sense, and regarding only the substance, it is the Body of Jesus Christ, born of Mary; but in another sense, and regarding only the manner, it is another, which is made by His words."

(4) Office and Mass of the Holy Sacrament; Anthem at Magnificat, and Postcommunion.

(5) Homily for the Epiphany.

(7) Cott. MSS., Cal. a. 7.

(6) Caroline Books, 4, c. 14.

(8) Ibi, Tib. c. 1.

is said that "The Lord did not say 'take this consecrated bread, and eat it in place of my Body,' or 'drink this consecrated wine in place of my Blood;' but, without any figure or circumlocution, He said 'this is my Body' and 'this is my Blood.' And, that He might prevent all wanderings of error, He said, 'which Body shall be given up for you,' and which Blood shall be shed for you.'"

With regard to the Sacrament of Penance, Henry contends that auricular confession was first inculcated to the Saxons by archbishop Theodore, in the seventh century, and that it was unknown to them before that time. We might dismiss this assertion with the remark that St. Augustine certainly converted the Saxons to the faith of Rome, which just as certainly commanded auricular confession. But Henry, following in the steps of Inett (1), says that private confession, according to the account given of it by Egbert, archbishop of York (8th century) was unknown to such of the Saxons as were converted by the Irish missionaries. Now, Egbert (2) says nothing about the introduction of confession, and nothing about the customs of the Saxons who were taught by the Irish; he does say, however, that, from the time of Theodore, the people had been accustomed to a twelve days' preparation, by fasting, confession, and alms, for the feast of Christmas. This by no means implies that confession was only then introduced among them. St. Cuthbert (d. 687) was a pupil of the Irish missionaries, and before Pope Vitalian commissioned Theodore to take charge of the see of Canterbury (668), had spent months receiving confessions in that diocese (3). That auricular confession was practised by the early Irish Christians, we have already seen when treating of the mission of St. Patrick. Since, however, Egbert of York is quoted as ignorant of this practice, we would draw attention to this passage from his Penitential: "The time of duty comes every twelve months, when every man shall speak to his confessor, and avow to God and his confessor all the sins he has committed." Whelock (4) asserts that the Saxon church advised, but did not prescribe, confes-

(1) History of the English Church, v. 1.

(2) Institutions of the Church.

(3) BEDE; Life of Cuthbert; c. 9. and 16.

(4) History, p. 215, index, art. Confession.

sion; and yet he furnishes us with two Homilies, from which we extract the following passages: "The holy Scriptures frequently teach us to flee to the medicine of true confession of our sins; because we cannot otherwise be healed, except we confess with sorrow what we have unrighteously done through negligence. All hope of forgiveness is in confession. Confession, with true repentance, is the angelic remedy of our sins. . . . Truly no man will obtain forgiveness of his sins from God, unless he confess to some one of God's ministers, and do penance according to his judgment."

It would be very interesting to notice the system of public penance of the Saxons, their consecration of virgins and monks to the service of God, the ceremonies with which they dedicated their temples, the coronation of their kings, the benediction of their knights, and many other features which denoted a truly Catholic people, but our limits compel us to confine ourselves to the elucidation of such points as will show that the modern Anglican or dissenter comes from a Catholic ancestor. English Protestantism has preserved some tattered remnants of nearly every Catholic garment with which Albion was once clothed, but of one vesture there is not a thread. We allude to the doctrine of purgatory, to the practice of praying for the dead. And yet the most rabid of our opponents admit that this custom was universal before the fourth century; some grant that it existed in the second. Mosheim ascribes its origin to Platonism, but Bingham (1) made the discovery that when our ancestors prayed for the dead, they believed them to be already in heaven. Whelock (2) asserts that the Saxons did not believe in purgatory, but he uses only the argument derived from the fact that some homilists say that, after the general judgment, the virtuous will be rewarded, and the wicked everlastingly punished; while all Catholics admit that then purgatory will be no more. Whelock must have missed the following passage, taken from a Saxon sermon on the dedication of a church, and published by himself: "There are also many places of punishment, in which souls

(1) Antiquities of the Christian Church, v. 1, p. 758, v. 2, p. 440.

(2) Preface to the Archaionomia.

suffer in proportion to their guilt, before the general judgment, and in which some are so far purified, as not to be hurt by the fire of the last day." Among the devotions for the departed, we find the "belt of Lord's prayers," a species of rosary; the anthem, "O Lord, according to Thy great mercy give rest to his soul, and in consideration of Thy infinite goodness, grant that he may enjoy eternal light in company with thy saints;" and finally, the chief devotion of all, the offering of the Sacrifice of the Mass for the departed soul. We are told that the object of all these devotions was simply a thanksgiving to God for the happiness already enjoyed by the dead. But not so thought the bishops of the Synod of Calcuith, when they ordered prayers for themselves, after their deaths, "that by means of a common intercession, they might merit a common eternal kingdom with all the saints" (1).

Immediately upon the death of St. Wilfrid, the abbot Tatbert, of the great monastery at Ripon, ordered a mass to be celebrated, and alms to be given to the poor, for the repose of his soul; on his anniversary, all the abbots, of the many monasteries he had founded, were summoned, and a night was spent in vigil and prayer, while the next morning, a Requiem mass was sung, and a tenth part of all the abbey's cattle was given to the poor (2). Lullus, the successor of St. Boniface in the see of Mentz, received from the king of Kent and the bishop of Rochester, a common letter, saying, "It is our earnest wish to recommend ourselves and our dearest relatives to your piety, that by your prayers we may be protected till we come to that life which knows no end. . . . Let us then agree, that when any one among us enters the path which leads to another life (may it be a life of happiness!), the survivors shall, by their alms and sacrifices, try to help him in his journey. We have sent you the names of our dead relatives, Irmige, Norththry, and Dulicha, virgins dedicated to God, and beg that you will remember them in your prayers and oblations" (3).

(1) WILKINS; Council of Calcuith.(2) EDDIUS; Life of Wlfrid.(3) Epistles of St. Boniface, No. 77.

Invocation of the saints was practiced by the Saxons, and a pre-eminence was given to the Blessed Virgin. Bede tells us a hymn was sung each evening in her honor, and in the old Saxon Pontificals we find many of the hymns which are now read in the Breviary. Among the many homilies which have come down to us, occur several for the feasts of the Nativity, Annunciation, Purification, and the Assumption of Mary. St. Peter seems to have occupied the next place in the devotion of the Saxons, and many of their first churches were dedicated to God in his honor. Pilgrimages were made to his tomb, and the Saxons were the originators of "Peter's Pence." Sts. Gregory and Augustine, to whom they principally owed their conversion, were venerated as patrons of England; St. Boniface, shortly after his death, was made a third patron (1). But we need not develop this point. Protestants admit the "excessive superstition" of the Saxons in this matter, and generally regard their saints as either fanatics, canonized by ignorance, or profligates, owing their honor to the gifts which they lavished upon the monasteries (2).

The sentiments of the Anglo-Saxon church with regard to the supremacy of the Roman Pontiff now claim our attention. St. Peter is styled by Bede "the prince of the Apostles, the shepherd of all believing nations" (3); Alcuin calls him "the head of the chosen flock" (4); St. Aldhelm attributes to him as a peculiar privilege, "the royal power of binding and loosing" (5). Nor did these Saxon fathers think that St. Peter's power died with him, for Bede declares that the Roman Pontiff "holds the chief Pontificate in the whole world" (6); and Alcuin calls him "the head of all Christian churches" (7). The veneration of the Saxons for the successor of St. Peter is shown by the numerous pilgrimages made to Rome, in spite of all the difficulties of

(1) Epist. of St. Cuthbert to Lullus, in Epist. Bonif., No. 70.

(2) Thus Sturges and Rapin. See Lingard's Antiquities, c. 9.

(3) B. 2, c. 4. Homily on Vig. of St. Andrew.

(4) Epistle to Abp. Eanbald.

(5) Epist. to king Gerontius, in Epist. of Boniface, No. 44.

(6) B. 2, c. 1. Homily for Feast of St. Benedict.

(7) Epistles to Popes Adrian and Leo.

travel at that day ; besides crowds of nobles and prelates, the kings Caedwalla, Ina, Offa, Kenred, Siric, Ethelwulph, and Canute, went to Rome to implore the Papal benediction. The Pope's charter was considered of greater importance than that of the king, for the perpetuity of an institution ; hence the numerous Bulls creating or endorsing religious establishments, and threatening their violators with the punishments of Dathan, Abiron, and Judas. Certain modern writers have asserted that the Anglo-Saxon kings exercised a spiritual jurisdiction (1), but the records of the time furnish no proof of such exercise, or even of any claim to it. Wintred, king of Kent (692), says "it is the right of the king to appoint earls, ealdormen, shire-reeves, and doomsmen ; but it is the right of the archbishop to rule and provide for the church of God" (2). Sometimes, indeed, the king is called the Vicar of Christ, but the Saxon Laus explain the sense in which the term is applied. "The king ought to be a father to his people, and in watchfulness and care, the vicar of Christ, as he is called." The Anglo-Saxon monarchs claimed no right to establish, extend, or restrict, episcopal jurisdiction ; such pertained to the Papal prerogative. The first ecclesiastical partition of England was made by Pope Gregory the Great, and not by the kings of the Heptarchy, or by the missionaries. When events prevented the execution of the original plan, Pope Vitalian placed all the Saxon bishops under the jurisdiction of the archbishop of Canterbury ; sixty years afterwards, Gregory III. restored the primacy to York, and very soon, Adrian I. gave the metropolitan jurisdiction to Lichfield, which, though displeasing to the other prelates, was respected until withdrawn by Leo III. The Synod of Cloveshoe (803) says of this contest for precedence, "When the Apostolic Pope understood the injustice which had been done, he at once interposed his authority, and sent orders into England that the honor of the see of St. Augustine should be fully restored." But not only were the powers of the Saxon metropolitans circumscribed by Rome ; their election had to be confirmed by the Pontiff. The archbishops did not receive the pallium (1), as a rule, until they had presented themselves at Rome, and undergone an examination as to faith, fitness, &c. ; but St. Gregory had dispensed the Saxon primates from the laborious journey, and his immediate successors had continued the exemption. Abuses having crept into the Saxon church, and birth and wealth having sometimes influenced the choice of bishops, the Holy See, in the interests of religion, resolved to enforce the ancient discipline. The Saxon prelates murmured and demurred, but yet they submitted (2). The supremacy of the Roman See over the Saxon church, is also evident from the supervision constantly exercised by the Pontiffs over religious matters in the island. In 680, Pope Agatho summoned Theodore of Canterbury and his suffragans to attend a Roman Synod, called to check Monothelitism, but the British prelates begged to be excused on account of the necessities of their infant churches. The Pontiff granted the request, but demanded a Profession of their faith, appointing as Papal legate to receive it, John, abbot of St. Martin's. The bishops met the legate at Hethfield, and declared their acceptance of the œcumenical Councils, and of the condemnation of Monethelitism by Pope Martin I.; the legate then sent a copy of the Synodical acts to Rome (3). Some of the Canterbury prelates were wanting in activity, if not in piety, and reports reached Pope Zachary of Saxon immorality ; archbishop Cuthbert and his suffragans were therefore threatened with excommunication, if they did not enforce the canons. The Synod of Cloveshoe was convoked, and thirty reformatory canons were issued, affecting the morals of bishops, priests, monks, and laity. The Acts of this Synod describe the admonitory epistle of Pope Zachary in language which plainly denotes willing acquiescence in Papal supremacy. "Two letters of the Apostolic

(1) COKE ; Reports, p. 5.(2) WILKINS ; Councils.

(1) The pallium is a vestment sent by the Pope to archbishops, and until its reception, certain important functions cannot be performed by the said prelates. When the archbishop of Canterbury had received the pallium, he was called a legate of the Holy See. Thus Brithwald, although a Saxon and elected by the clergy of Canterbury, is styled by his own messengers, "archbishop of the church of Canterbury and of all Britain, sent from this Apostolic see." EDDIUS, Life of Wilfrid, c. 51.

(2) WILKINS, Councils, year 1031.

(3) BEDE ; B. 4 c. 18.

lord, Pope Zachary, were brought forward, and what he commanded, in his Apostolic authority, was plainly and with great diligence made known, and more clearly interpreted in our own language. For in these writings he familiarly admonished the inhabitants of our race in this island of Britain, and truly accused them, and finally, lovingly exhorted them; those, however, who would contemn all this, and would persist pertinaciously in their malice, he threatened with the certain sentence of anathema" (1). The 25th canon of this Synod is alleged by Henry to have been framed "to guard against the encroachments of the Popes." It reads, "If a bishop is unable to correct and amend anything in his diocese, let him bring it before the archbishop in Synod, to be openly corrected by all." Henry urges that this canon militates against appeals to Rome, but St. Boniface, who originally composed it, adds immediately after it, "for thus, unless I err, all bishops should make known to the metropolitan, and he to the Roman Pontiff, if they cannot correct their flocks, and thus they will be foreign to the loss of their souls" (2). In the reign of Pope Adrian I., the bishops of Ostia and Tudertum were sent as legates (3) to the Saxon church, with a code of laws for its use. They held a Synod in Mercia, and one in Northumbria; they published twenty canons, and exacted from each bishop a solemn promise to enforce them. Carte contends that this legation was merely a renewal of correspondence between the

(1) Henry discovers in the 2nd canon of Cloveshoe "a sufficient proof that the clergy of England were not yet disposed to bend their necks to the intolerable and ignominious yoke of Rome." Vol. III., p. 225. Premising that "probably" the synod was held at the suggestion of St. Boniface, and that its canons were chiefly taken from the synod of Mentz, he says that the Saxon prelates altered the canon on "the unity of the Church"; that while St. Boniface had professed obedience to the Pontiff, the Saxons make no mention of Rome. But the bishops of Cloveshoe expressly state that they assembled because of the command of Pope Zachary; and so far are the thirty canons from being derived from the nine of Mentz, there is scarcely a passage in which they bear resemblance. Finally, there is no canon, either of Mentz or of Cloveshoe, on the "unity of the Church"; there is one, however, on the "unity of peace," applying only to the subscribers, but which Henry has impudently falsified, firstly, by omitting the agreement to live in peace, which restricts the meaning of the canon to the signers, and secondly, by translating eos (themselves) "all the clergy in the world." The Acts tell us that "The prelates turned to each other with words of mutual exhortation. . . . and they entered into an engagement, that intimate peace and sincere charity should forever dwell among themselves, and that there should be a concord of all in all ecclesiastical rights, in speech, in word, and in judgment, without flattery of any person." There was no reason why the prelates of Cloveshoe should speak of their submission to Rome, but there was every reason for Boniface so doing, as he had been sent among the pagan Germans by the Pontiff.

(2) Epistle to Cuthbert, in Wilkins, p. 91.

(3) Hume misses this legation, as well as that of the abbot John, under Pope Agatho, when he says that Ermanfrol of Slon, three centuries afterwards, was the first Papal legate to Britain. History, c. 4.

churches of Rome and England, but the letter of the legates to the Pontiff shows that they were invested with authority. "We wrote Capitulars on each matter, and having arranged all things in order, brought them to their notice. With all due humility they received both your admonition and our littleness, and promised to obey in all things" (1).

The history of St. Wilfrid, bishop of York, furnishes an excellent proof of the supremacy of the Roman Pontiff over the early Saxon church, although Carte, and, imitating him, many other Protestant writers, try to evince the contrary. This prelate, owing to the impatient zeal of Theodore of Canterbury, on the one hand, and the wicked enmity of Egfrid and Ermenburga, king and queen of Northumbria, on the other, suddenly found his extensive diocese divided into three, and himself left without subjects (2). His remonstrances being treated with contempt, he took the advice of some of his episcopal friends, and appealed to Rome (3). Had Theodore held the views which some Protestants ascribe to the Saxon church, he would have ridiculed this appeal. But, on the contrary, he endeavored to first get the ear of the Pontiff, and when Wilfrid arrived in Rome (678), he found that Cœnwald, an envoy of Theodore, had already presented his side of the case. Nevertheless, Pope Agatho convened a Synod, composed of the suburban bishops and fifty of the Roman clergy, and listened to the plea of Wilfrid. The result was that Wilfrid was restored to his diocese of York, but he was ordered to choose from among his clergy a certain number of bishops to help him in its government; this decision was coupled with a decree of suspension against any cleric, and of excommunication against any layman, who would presume to oppose it. Wilfrid now returned to England, but Egfrid threw him into prison. It is to be noted that the enemies of the holy bishop did not deny the Papal right to interfere in this case. During the nine months of his confinement, they endeavored, by promises and threats, to make him avow that the presumed decision was a forgery, or at least procured by bribery. For several years Wilfrid was exiled from his diocese,

(1) WILKINS; Councils, p. 146.

(2) For details, see Lingard's Antiquities, c. 5.

(3) EDDIUS; Life of Wilfrid, c. 24.

but finally the primate Theodore repented of his conduct, and wrote intercessory letters for him to the kings of Mercia and Northumbria. Aldfrid, the new ruler of Northumbria, restored him to York, and for five years he administered its ecclesiastical affairs. But new persecutions arrived, and Wilfrid fled into Mercia (1). To settle matters, Brithwald, the successor of Theodore, called a Synod in Northumbria, to which Wilfrid was invited. When asked to abide by the decision of his metropolitan, Wilfrid replied that he would do so, "if that decision be not contrary to the canons, and to the declarations of the Apostolic See." Another appeal to Rome now ensued. Wilfrid conducted his own case before Pope John V., while his opponents were represented by a deputation of monks. Seventy times was the question debated, and after four months' discussion, the Pontiff decided in accordance with a compromise proposed by Wilfrid himself (2). This history of Wilfrid speaks so plainly in favor of the Papal supremacy over the Saxon church, that Carte uses every exertion to misrepresent it. Thus, speaking of the saint's first appeal to Rome, he refers to Eddius, c. 24, as proof that "Wilfrid's appeal appeared so new and singular, that it occasioned general laughter, as a thing quite ridiculous." But the fact is that Eddius, c. 24, says no such thing; he tells us that "the flatterers of the king expressed their joy in laughter," and adds the reason in the words of Wilfrid, "who laugh because of my condemnation." Carte also asserts that the king would not restore Wilfrid, because he deemed the Pontiff's course derogatory to the rights of the crown. But Eddius, c. 33, assigns as the royal pretext, the accusation that the saint had procured the Pope's decision by bribery. Carte quotes Eddius, c. 25, as authority for the assertion that the king offered Wilfrid a part of his old diocese, if he would deny the authority of the Pontifical mandate; but Eddius, c. 25, says this offer was made on condition that Wilfrid would deny the authenticity of the

(1) Wilfrid had been ordered by the king to surrender the monastery of Ripon, to which he was greatly attached, that it might be made a bishopric for another prelate. His enemies thought that he would refuse to obey, and would hence be ruined. Ripon had been greatly improved by Wilfrid, and its monks, the first Benedictines of the north of England, revered him as a father.

(2) Wilfrid resigned the greater part of his diocese, and secured the possession of his two favorite monasteries of Ripon and Hexham.

mandate. Carte contends, on the authority of Theodore's letter to king Ethelred, that the prelate of Canterbury was reconciled finally with Wilfrid, not because of his respect for the Pope's decision, but on account of his personal veneration for Wilfrid. But in this very letter to Ethelred, Theodore alleges the Papal mandate as the cause of his reconciliation. "Therefore I, the humble bishop Theodore, decrepit with age, suggest this to your Blessedness, because, as you know, Apostolic authority commands it" (1). In dismissing this episode of St. Wilfrid, we would remark that, about the same time, occurred the appeal of Egwin of Worcester to Rome, and with equal success. In fine, the use of appeals to the Holy See was, from this period, established among the Anglo-Saxons, and among the laws collected by archbishop Egbert for the clergy of York, there is a canon which formally declares their legality.

We shall now briefly touch upon a point, which, though merely of discipline, and therefore, if the Church were to so will, subject to change, is seized by many Protestant writers (2), as showing a great difference between the early Saxon church and that of Rome. It is asserted that the Roman Pontiffs enjoined celibacy upon the clergy only in the tenth century; that hence, for nearly five hundred years after their conversion, the Saxon clergy were allowed to marry. We shall treat of the origin of clerical celibacy in a special chapter, but as concerns the Saxon church, we would ask our opponents for some positive proof, however slight, that marriage was ever permitted to the Saxon clergymen. Inett, says Lingard, is the only author who has ventured to corroborate such an assertion by an appeal to contemporary authority, and he refers to the Penitentiary of Theodore, "which was published by Petit with so many interpolations that it is impossible to distinguish the original from the spurious matter." In this Penitentiary, we read that "it is not permitted to men to have females as nuns, nor to females (to have) men (as monks); nevertheless, let us not destroy the custom of the country (1)." How this passage can be construed as referring to marriage, we do not perceive; but, if we suppose that allusion is made to the double monasteries, those where both sexes were admitted, though with a separation, then the canon has a meaning, viz., the condemnation of such establishments. But the discipline founded by St. Augustine in England, is proved to have been celibitic, by the epistle of Pope St. Gregory the Great to the holy missionary, sent in reply to one asking for advice on many disciplinary points (2). The Pontiff says that "clerics, who are not in sacred orders, if they cannot contain themselves, ought to take wives." And the same is forcibly expressed by Ceolfrid, abbot of Weremouth (3), saying that clerics ought to crucify their flesh with its vices and concupiscences they should bind themselves, for the Lord, with tighter chains of chastity." Bede (4) tells us that "without that chastity which restrains one from the appetite for carnal union, no one should enter the priesthood, or be consecrated to the ministry of the altar; that is, unless he is either a virgin, or has dissolved the marital connection." Archbishop Egbert (5) says that "neither priests nor deacons can take wives." In his Penitentiary, he declares that "God's priests and deacons, and God's other servants, who should serve in God's temple, and touch the Sacrament and the holy books, should always observe their chastity." In the same work, although as yet Holy Orders had not been made a "diriment" impediment to Matrimony, degradation is pronounced against the priest or deacon who married. And it is also decreed that "if any man in orders, bishop, priest, monk, deacon, had his wife, ere he was ordained, and forsook her for God's sake, and received ordination, and they afterwards return together again through lust, let each fast, according to his order, as is written above with respect to murder" (6). Such was the discipline of the ancient Saxon church, and if, when the invasions of the Danes had nearly destroyed ecclesiastical as well as civil order, many of the clergy were guilty of its violation, the

(1) WILKINS; Ep. Theod. EDDIUS; c. 42.

(2) Matthew Tindall's translation of Rapin's History of England. HUME; Hist., c. 2. BURTON; Monast. of York.

(1) The parentheses are inserted by us, as necessary to the sense.

(4) Taber., b. 3, c. 2.

(2) Works, b. 12, epist. 31. BEDE; b. 1, c. 27.

(5) Extracts, can. 160.

(3) Epistle to King Naiton, in Bede, b. 5, b. 21.

(6) That is, for ten or seven years.

Church never approved of their conduct, but, whenever the nature of the times permitted her to attempt the restoration of order, she enforced the celibacy of her servants.

We have as yet only alluded to the British church, which, at the time of St. Augustine's arrival among the Anglo-Saxons of the heptarchy (1), was leading a precarious life in the mountains of Wales. If we may credit the assertions of Gildas, their countryman and contemporary, the British clergy of the sixth century had fearfully fallen from the sanctity of their profession. The dignities of the Church were bought with presents, or seized by force, "and the fortunate candidate was more frequently indebted for his success to the arms of his kindred, than to the justice of his pretensions. Indolence had induced a passion for ebriety and excess; the patrimony of the poor was sacrificed to the acquisition of sensual gratifications; the most solemn oaths were sworn and violated with equal facility; and the son, from the example of his father, readily imbibed a contempt for clerical chastity" (2). This state of affairs was undoubtedly due to the relaxation of discipline, consequent upon the long and fearful wars with the Saxons. To remedy these evils, Pope St. Gregory invested St. Augustine with jurisdiction over the British hierarchy, but it was not easy to enforce a recognition of that jurisdiction. Augustine was a foreigner, and was connected with the hated Saxon; to bend to his authority seemed tantamount to subjecting themselves again to the barbarian. Again, the Roman missionary was of stern and uncompromising morality—no pleasing omen for their soft and enticing sins. However, St. Augustine directed himself to the task. Helped by Ethelbert, king of Kent, recently converted to the faith, he arranged a meeting with the British bishops at the frontier. For an entire day he exhorted, instructed, and threatened, and although a miracle is said to have somewhat touched their obstinacy,

(1) We use the word "heptarchy" in deference to custom, although England was, at that time, an "octarchy." Bernicia and Deira had not yet coalesced in the kingdom of Northumbria.

(2) LINGARD: Antiquities, c. 2. The pious indignation of Gildas may have caused him to color his picture very highly, but that it was substantially correct, one is led to believe by the treatment accorded by the Britons to Augustine. Their obstinacy can be accounted for, only in the supposition of their corruption.

Augustine prevailed no further than receiving a promise for another conference. Before the British prelates came to the second meeting, they consulted a certain holy hermit. This individual told them that if, at the interview, Augustine arose and advanced towards them, they might regard him as worthy of attention; but that they should condemn him, if he kept his seat (1). It happened that Augustine did not arise to meet the British bishops, and accordingly, they rejected his demands. These were: that they should conform to the general usage in computing the Paschal time; that they should use the Roman rite in Baptism; and that they should help to convert the Saxons. In his disappointment, Augustine exclaimed, "Know then, that if you will not assist me in pointing out to the Saxons the way of life, they, by the just judgment of God, will prove to you the ministers of death." The prophecy was fulfilled eight years after the death of the saint, when, in 613, the Pagan Edelfrid, king of Northumbria, attacked the British near the city of Chester. Before the onslaught of the Saxons, more than twelve hundred monks from the establishment at Bangor proceeded to the top of a neighboring hill, that they might, Moses-like, pray for God's blessing on the arms of their countrymen. Observing this movement, and divining its object, Edelfrid cried to his followers to attack the unfortunate brethren, "for," said he, "those who pray against us, fight against us." A British detachment under Brocmail, which had been ordered to defend the hill, disgracefully fled, leaving the monks to their fate. Only fifty re-entered their monastery. This melancholy event has been a rich morsel to certain moderns of the reformed persuasion, who, greedily swallowing the assertions of the fabulist Geoffrey of Monmouth (2), ascribe the massacre of the monks of Bangor to the revengeful intrigues of the Roman missionary (3). But Bede expressly declares that the battle of Chester took place, "Augustine having been, a long time before, transferred to the heavenly kingdom ;" and he assigns as a reason of the massacre, the appearance of the monks on the battlefield. Godwin tries to evade this testimony of Bede, by asserting that the passage must be an interpolation, since it is not found in king Alfred's Saxon version of the historian. But it is found in all the Latin MSS., even in that of More(1), written within two years from the death of Bede. Again, Godwin forgets that the version of Alfred is more of a synopsis than a translation, for the royal scholar often omits entire passages, and nearly always abridges the text. In the very place in discussion, he omits the flight of Brocmail, and the date of ordination of Justus and Mellitus.

(1) BEDE; b. 2, c. 2.

(2) Geoffrey of Monmouth (1100-1154), bishop of St. Asaph, was author of a Chronicle of the Britons, professedly a translation of an older Welsh work, but so filled with legend as to possess little historical value. Geoffrey's prime object was the exaltation of his British ancestors at the expense of their conquerors' reputation; hence the above assertion.

(3) BALE; Cent. 13, c. 1. PARKER; p. 48. GODWIN, p. 33.

It has been asserted that the ancient British church had never recognized the supremacy of Rome, and that it refused to receive from St. Augustine the "new dogmas" of saint-worship, purgatory, confession, &c. As for Roman supremacy, Bede, Gildas, and other authors, furnish many proofs of its having been acknowledged by the Britons. It was to Pope Eleutherius that king Lucius (y. 182) applied for the means of instruction for his people. In the year 429, when St. Germain of Auxerre and St. Lupus of Troyes passed into Britain to combat Pelagianism, the former was legate of Pope Cœlestine. According to Gildas, the communion of the Britons with the Roman See had never been broken, which certainly shows that the head of that See was obeyed as the chief pastor of the Church. As for the "new dogmas," Bede informs us that the Britons admitted the orthodoxy of St. Augustine's doctrines, and both he and Gildas declare that, from the time of their conversion to the days of the Roman missionary, their faith had never been corrupted, unless, temporarily, by Arianism and Pelagianism.

(1) LINGARD ; Antiquities, c. 2.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

THE MONOTHELITIC HERESY, AND THE SIXTH GENERAL COUNCIL.

The events of which we are now about to treat are of the utmost interest to the student, for they gave rise to a most important controversy, viz., that regarding the alleged heresy of Pope Honorius. We shall consider this question in a special chapter, but before entering upon it, it is necessary to sketch the nature of the heresy which was its occasion, and to speak of the Council which condemned that heresy. The prime error of the Monothelites was the assertion that in Christ there is but one operation, and one will. They held that human nature was so united to the Word, that, although it was endowed with a mind and the faculties belonging to itself, yet it did not exercise its own action; action in Christ was one, proceeding from the Word as from a principal cause, and from the humanity as from an instrumental cause. This heresy, as Petau remarks (1), was a progeny of Eutychianism, that is, of the defenders of one Nature in Christ. Cyrus, bishop of Alexandria, one of the leaders of the Monothelites, says that Christ "operates with one theandric operation those things which belong to God, and those which are human." Macarius, bishop of Antioch, another leader, in a long Profession of Faith read in the Sixth Council, says, "Christ did not perform divine things as God, nor human things as man, but God being made man, showed a certain new theandric operation," and he asserted the same of Christ's will. Contrary to this, the Church taught that in Christ there are two natural wills, and two natural operations, undivided, inconvertible, inseparable, and unconfused.

As Alexandre justly observes, the emperor Heraclius (d. 641) acted as accoucheur at the birth of the Monothelitic heresy, first, by his decrees against the Severian heretic,

(1) Dogmas, b. 1, c. 20.

Paul of Armenia, to whom Sergius alludes in his epistle to Honorius, read in the 16th Action of the Sixth Council; again, when he was deceived by the Jacobite patriarch, Athanasius, into sympathy for the new doctrine. The real parent of the heresy was Sergius, patriarch of Constantinople. Politics too had their share in its propagation, for Heraclius was greatly influenced in its favor by his hatred of Chosroes, the Persian king, who patronized the Nestorians; hence it was that the emperor leaned towards the Eutychians, natural foes of Nestorianism, not that he believed in the doctrine of one Nature, which had been condemned at Chalcedon, but because he did not perceive the equal danger of asserting one operation and will, and he thought that he might thus bring the Monophysites back to the fold. The first sign of the coming heresy was observed when, having talked with the Severian Paul, Heraclius issued an order, styled Jussio, against him, prohibiting the assertion of a double operation in Christ. In the year 633, Cyrus of Alexandria held a Synod, ostensibly for the conversion of the Eutychians, and he there issued nine chapters, the seventh of which asserted that, according to St. Dionysius, Christ operated both divine and human things, by one theandric operation. He had corrupted the text of his holy predecessor, inserting one where Dionysius had said a new theandric operation. These chapters Cyrus sent to Sergius, who congratulated him upon them, and asserted the same doctrine, "because every divine and human operation proceeded from one and the same God, the Incarnate Word." At this time, there lived at Alexandria a holy and learned monk named Sophronius, who in vain endeavored to influence Cyrus to abrogate his chapters, but when he had become bishop of Jerusalem, Sophronius held a Synod of the bishops of Palestine, and sent out a Synodical letter in which he plainly asserted the doctrine of two operations. When Sergius received this letter of Sophronius, he devised a means for preserving, yet so as to hide, his error. He sent to Pope Honorius the letter which was afterwards read in the twelfth Action of the Sixth Council, and in which he suggested that neither of the words "one" or "two"

should be used in regard to Christ's operations, as they gave so much scandal to the simple, but that it should be said that the one only Son of God operated both divine and human things. Honorius answered Sergius, praising him for trying to avoid the scandal of simple souls, and concluding in these words: "Let your Fraternity teach with us these things, as we with one mind teach with you, exhorting you, that abandoning the new words "one" or "two operations," you teach with orthodox faith and Catholic unity that the one Lord Jesus Christ, Son of the Living God, True God in two Natures, operated both divinely and humanly." In another epistle to Sergius, Honorius decreed that, "the lately introduced use of the words 'one or two operations' should be left out in teaching, because it is unsuitable to think or to explain whether the Mediator between God and men, the Lord Jesus Christ, is or was of one or two operations." This letter has caused some to hold that Pope Honorius erred in faith; others have condemned him for allowing silence where silence was culpable. We shall treat the question in the next chapter. Pope Honorius died in October, 638; his successor was Severinus. About the end of the year 638, Sergius composed a decree for Heraclius, called an Ecthesis or "Exposition," which was issued in the name of the emperor. In this document the ostensible object is to command all to refrain from using the words "one" or "two operations," but, in parenthesis, as it were, the one will and one operation in Christ are asserted. When the new Pontiff sent, according to custom, his legates to Constantinople, to acquaint the emperor of his election, the Monothelites endeavored to impede his recognition by Heraclius, until he would promise to approve of the Sergico-imperial Exposition. The document was accordingly sent to the Exarch of Ravenna, with orders to obtain the Pontifical assent. That Severinus refused, we learn from Pope Martin I., in the Lateran Synod of 649. We gather the same from the Diurnal of the Roman Pontiffs, which contains the Profession of Faith which, before the Sixth Council, a new Pope was obliged to make: "We promise also to observe all the decrees of the Pontiffs of the Apostolic

See, that is, of Severinus, of John, of Theodore, and of Martin, against the new questions arisen in the imperial city, professing, according to the movement of the two Natures, so there are two natural operations; and whatever they have condemned, we condemn under anathema" (1). In the year 639, Sergius died, and was succeeded by Pyrrhus, a monk and a steady Monothelite, who immediately approved of the Exposition. At the same time the Holy See received a new Pontiff in the person of John IV. One of his first acts was the condemnation of Monothelitism and of the Exposition, but without mentioning any persons. When Heraclius heard of this condemnation, he wrote to the Pope, protesting that the Exposition was a production of the late Sergius, and that he now renounced all connection with it. In the meantime, Pyrrhus had fled for his life from Constantinople, having been attacked by the enraged populace on account of being suspected of having conspired with the empress Martina against the life of Heraclius and his eldest son Constantine. The new emperor, Constans, put into his place another Monothelite named Paul, who immediately wrote such a specious letter to Pope Theodore, successor to John IV., that the Pontiff congratulated him on his orthodoxy. However, some time afterwards, being hard pressed by the Pope's legate to send an explicit Profession of Faith to Rome, he wrote in such terms as to leave no doubt of his heterodoxy. The fugitive Pyrrhus had spent his exile in Africa, and occupied his time in sowing the seed of Monothelitism; but being defeated in dispute by the Abbot Maximus in full Synod, he acknowledged his error, ascribed it to ignorance, and set out for Rome with the victor. Here he abjured his heresy at the feet of Pope Theodore, as we learn from Theophanes and Anastasius. But he soon relapsed, and showed that he had played the hypocrite to secure the Papal influence in regaining his see. In the meantime, the intruding patriarch Paul, being threatened with excommunication, tried to save his position by suggesting to the emperor Constans an edict, in which silence was enjoined as to the number of operations and wills in Christ, but in which, to blind the Catholics, certain Monothelitic placards, affixed to the doors of the cathedral, were ordered to be torn down. Silence, he thought, as to the number of operations, would ensure a victory to his heresy. This instrument, which was called a "Type," was promulgated in 648, and had the fate of Zeno's Henoticon, and almost all imperial theological essays. It pleased neither Catholics nor heretics, and, if it was not condemned by Pope Theodore at the same time that he condemned Pyrrhus, it was certainly branded by Martin I. in 649. That we may at once be disburdened of the two worthies, Pyrrhus and Paul, we will state that both were excommunicated by Pope Theodore; that on the death of Paul(1), Pyrrhus regained the patriarchate of Constantinople by the favor of Constans, and died a Monothelite. Pope Martin I. commenced his reign in 649, and was immediately confronted by Constans with a demand for the approbation of the Type. The Pontiff's answer was the call of a Synod of 105 bishops, and the condemnation of Monothelitism and its professors, and that of the Exposition of Heraclius, and the Type of Constans himself. The reward of the Pontiff's firmness was the crown of martyrdom. Taken prisoner in Rome, he was first exiled to Naxos, then thrown into a dungeon at Constantinople, and finally transported to the Chersonese, where he succumbed to torture and disease in the year 655.

(1) From this document, Pagi concludes, and with some reason, that Severinus condemned the Monothelites in a Synod. At that time, the Pontiffs were accustomed to issue their decrees synodically.

During the remainder of the reign of Constans, things prospered with the Monothelites, but with the advent of Constantine Pogonatus, came a change. Having beaten back the Saracens, made peace with the Bulgarians, and otherwise ameliorated the temporal condition of the empire, this sovereign, like a true Byzantine monarch, turned his attention to the arrangement of ecclesiastical affairs. But fortunately he was sincerely desirous of unity, and, for once, such meddling was productive of unmitigated good. Inquiring of Theodore of Constantinople and of Macarius of Antioch what was the real cause of dissension, he was told that certain new words had been introduced, either ignorantly or rashly, into theological terminology, and that the innovation had produced a dangerous schism. Constantine then sent his secretary to Rome, asking Pope Donus to send his legates to Constantinople, and also to forward all books and documents which would be useful in settling the dispute. In the meantime, he called a General Council. The letters of Constantine were received by Pope Agatho, who had succeeded Donus in the Holy See. This Pontiff, in the year 680, sent as legates to the Council the priests Theodore and George, and the deacon John. In the previous year he had caused various Synods to be celebrated in the principal churches of the West, as preparatory to the great Council. The most important of these were held at Rome, at Milan, at Arles, and in England; and in all, Monothelitism was condemned. The Sixth General Council, called Third of Constantinople, was opened on Nov. 7. The number of bishops is not certain, for while Theophanes and Cedrenus make it 289, the last Action was subscribed by only 166. During the first eleven Actions, and the last, the emperor was present, but only as the Defender of the Faith and a preserver of order (1). That Pogonatus attempted nothing unbecoming a layman, is evident from his own words, thus recorded by Pope Gregory II. (2): "Nor shall I sit with them as an emperor (literally, "as a commander"), nor shall I speak imperiously; but, like one of themselves, I shall execute what the bishops order. Those who speak properly, we shall admit; those who talk badly, we shall expel, and send into exile. If my father should in any way pervert the pure and inviolable faith, I would be the first to anathematize him." His signature to the proceedings of the Council comes after those of the bishops, and whereas each bishop signs: "I, bishop of . . . defining, have subscribed," Pogonatus uses the phrase: "We, Constantine, in Christ God, King and Emperor of the Romans, have read and consented." Because

(1) While Paul was dying, Pope Martin was being dragged in chains through the street by the public executioner, and was expecting sentence of death. Constans visited Paul, and told him the state of "his enemy." Stricken with remorse, the heresiarch besought the emperor to spare the life "of so good a Pontiff. This fills up the measure of my iniquities." Epist. of Anastasius to the Westerns.

(1) With regard to the convocation and presidency of the Sixth Council, the reader may apply, mutatis mutandis, what we have said, regarding such matters, when treating of previous Councils. See Alexander's Diss. I., in 7th Cent., with Roncaglia's comments.

(2) Epist. to Leo the Isaurian.

we sometimes read that the emperors "presided" at Councils, we must not understand that they occupied any other than an honorary position. In the Actions of the Seventh Council, we read that the empress Irene "presided."

The following is a summary of the Actions of the Sixth Council: In the 1st Action, the Papal legates announced the object of the Council to be the refutation of the heresies introduced into the Church by the later patriarchs of Constantinople. Macarius of Antioch replied that the doctrines enumerated were not new, but taken from the fathers and from definitions of the Councils. Codices of the Five General Councils were then introduced and consulted. The first Action of Ephesus was read, because Macarius asserted that in it was taught the doctrine of one will in Christ; he was found in error. In the 2nd Action, the Acts of Chalcedon were read, and Macarius was refuted by Pope St. Leo's Dogmatic Epistle. In the 3rd Action, when the Acts of the Fifth Council were read, a dispute arose as to an epistle of Mennas of Constantinople to Pope Vigilius, in which one will was asserted. The Papal legates declared the letter not authentic, and when a comparison of codices was made, and the different ones found to vary, the document was excluded. Then were read some letters of Vigilius to Justinian and the empress Theodora, and the legates cried out, "God forbid!" "Vigilius never asserted one operation," "This book has been falsified." The fathers then ordered the corrupted passages to be suppressed, although they anathematized the book as presented (1). In the 4th Action, was read the Dogmatic Epistle of Pope Agatho to the Council, in which the Pontiff declares that "The Apostolic Roman Church has never turned from the way of truth into any path of error whatever," and asserts the Catholic dogma as to the two wills and operations in Christ. In the 5th and 6th Actions, the emperor urged Macarius to put forth such testimonies of the fathers as he believed to warrant the assertion of only one will in Christ. He did so, but the legates insisted that the quoted passages applied only to the divine will. The 7th Action was taken up by the recitation of testimonies of the fathers proving that there were two wills and operations in Christ. The emperor then demanded of the Constantinopolitan and Antiochian patriarchs whether they consented to the definition of Pope Agatho; they requested a copy of the definition, and time for consideration. In the 8th Action, arrived the crucial moment for the Monothelites. When George of Constantinople was asked for his final decision, he declared that he accepted the definition of Pope Agatho, and all of his suffragans made the same submission. Then from the episcopal benches arose the acclamation, 'Many years to George, the orthodox patriarch!' The fathers then proceeded to the examination of Macarius of Antioch. After some tergiversation on his part, he was ordered to categorically answer whether he admitted two natural wills and two natural operations in Christ, and he answered that he would not admit them, "even if he were cut limb from limb, and thrown into the sea." Strange to say, he coupled his firmness with an admission that he had corrupted and twisted the sayings of the fathers of the Church, in order to prop up his tottering heresy. When the bishops heard this shameless avowal, they exclaimed, "It does not become the orthodox to mutilate the sayings of the fathers; that is fit for heretics." Finally, from all sides burst forth the cries of "He has shown himself a heretic. Anathema to the new Dioscorus. Evil years to the new Apollinarius. Let him be stripped of the Pallium!" In the 9th Action, Macarius was deposed from his patriarchate; the bishops and priests who abjured Monothelitism were forgiven, on condition that they submitted to the Council a sworn Profession of Faith. Most of the following Actions are of minor importance, with the exception of those in which occur the anathemas to Pope Honorius, and they will be quoted when we examine the alleged heresy of that Pontiff. The 14th Action, however, is worthy of mention. In it were read the books of Mennas to Vigilius, and of Vigilius to Justinian and Theodora. All the bishops pronounced them suppositions, or corrupted by the Monothelites. Hence they exclaimed, "Anathema to the books which are said to have been sent by Vigilius to Justinian and Theodora, and which have been proven false." In the 17th and 18th Actions, was promulgated the Definition of Faith, and anathema pronounced on all who taught one will and one operation in our Lord Jesus Christ.

(1) Judging from the controversy agitated in 677, between Theodore of Constantinople and Macarius, and from the Greek codex, it would seem that the legates used an imperfect copy. However, the legates were forced to interfere, because, says Baronio, when the reader came to the anathema against Theodore of Mopsueste, launched because he did not avow one Person in Christ, it was found that a falsifier's hand had added, "and one operation." As for the anathematization of Vigilius' book, see the 14th Action.

The assembled prelates sent a Synodical Letter to Pope Agatho, requesting his confirmation of their decrees. "We have manifested with you," they say, "the resplendent light of the orthodox faith; wherefore we pray your paternal Holiness to confirm our action by your honorable rescripts." But news of the death of Pope Agatho and of the election of Leo II. having come to Constantinople, the emperor gave the returning legates letters to the new Pontiff, also asking for the confirmation of the Council. Pope Leo conceded the confirmation, in a letter to Pogonatus, saying: "And because the Holy Synod issued a Definition of the true faith, the same as that reverently held by the Apostolic See of Blessed Peter the Apostle, whose office, although unworthy, we fill; therefore, we, and through us, this venerable Apostolic See, concordantly and unanimously consent to and confirm it, by the authority of Blessed Peter, that its teaching may acquire firmness from the Lord Himself upon the solid Rock, which is Christ. Wherefore, just as we receive and preach the five General Councils of Nice, Constantinople, Ephesus, Chalcedon, and Constantinople (II.), which all the churches of Christ approve and follow, so we receive with equal veneration, as following in their footsteps, and as their interpreter, the Holy Sixth Council lately held in the imperial city under the pious auspices of your Serenity; and we declare it worthily numbered with them, as congregated by one and the same grace of God; and we decree that those priests of the Church of Christ, who faithfully assembled in it, are to be numbered among the holy fathers and doctors of the Church."

Thirty years after the celebration of the Sixth Council, the emperor Philippicus Bardanes, led by the predictions of a Monothelite astrologer, undertook to infuse new life into the dying heresy, and during the two years of his reign, the orthodox had much to suffer. But Monothelitism soon ceased to subsist as a separate heresy, its followers incorporating themselves with their cousins, the Eutychians (1).

It has been asserted that the Acts of the Sixth Council were vitiated by the Monothelites. If we could receive that opinion, the defence of Pope Honorius, which we shall undertake in the next chapter, would certainly be much simplified, for by far the strongest argument against his orthodoxy is deduced from the anathema pronounced against him, according to these Acts, by the fathers of the Council. However, the weight of evidence is in favor of the genuineness of the Acts as they have come down to us. It is certain that the Acts which we possess are the same that the Papal legates brought from Constantinople, and it is not to be supposed that the Monothelites would have been able to palm off vitiated copies upon the legates. Supposing, which is not at all likely, that the legates would have received the copies destined for the Holy See from the hands of heretics, the error would have surely been discovered upon their arrival at Rome, unless we believe that they were asleep during that important moment when the Council was anathematizing the Monothelites and all who aided them. And it would be something unique in the annals of falsification of codices, which annals are quite extensive, if the Monothelites were so lucky as to see their work alone survive, and the Catholics so unfortunate as to possess not even one codex of the genuine Acts. Again, we learn from the letters which Pope Leo II. sent to Constantine Pogonatus, to the Spanish king Ervigius, and to the bishops of Spain, that this Pontiff was fully persuaded that Honorius had been condemned by the Sixth Council. The Seventh General Council manifested the same belief. In the Eighth Council was read an allocution delivered by Pope Adrian II. to a Roman Synod, and in that document the Pontiff affirmed that the Holy See had consented to what was done against Honorius in the Sixth Council. Baronio is convinced that the Acts were vitiated, and he names the culprit, the patriarch Theodore of Constantinople. According to the great annalist, Theodore erased his own name from among those of the condemned, and substituted that of Honorius. For, he says, in the Sixth Council all the Monothelite patriarchs were condemned by name ; yet that of Theodore does not occur. We know he was a Monothelite, for Anastasius tells us (1) that Constantine told the fathers of the Council that Theodore had subscribed to the Profession of Faith issued by Macarius. This argument is specious, but it seems to have escaped the observation of Baronio that the Council named the dead patriarchs, to condemn the heretical ones, and to put the names of the faithful ones in the diptychs. But it did not name the living, unless they had shown themselves pertinacious in heresy, and of this obstinacy there is no proof in the case of Theodore. He was absent from the Council, Constantine having expelled him from his see, and we do not know that he was cited by the fathers. The assertion of Anastasius as to Theodore's subscription to the doctrine of Macarius is corroborated by no other authority, and even if he had signed it, we need not therefore conclude that he should have been condemned by name in the Council. He might not have been obstinate, and might have been awaiting the decision of a General Council. And it is no light argument that such was his case, that he was afterwards restored to his see by the same anti-Monothelite Constantine who had deposed him, and that the restoration was made without his offering a new Profession of Faith. Finally, Theodore could not have interpolated the Acts which the legates brought to Rome. The legates left Constantinople a few months after the termination of the Council, and Theodore was not called from exile to his see until the death of the intruder George, which did not occur, according to Theophanes, until three years later.

(1) Mosheim and other more recent writers have contended that when Monothelitism was banished from Constantinople, it found a home among the fastnesses of Mount Lebanon, and seduced the heroic Maronites from the faith of Rome. Mosheim even asserts that St. Maro himself was a Monothelite. For a refutation of Mosheim in this matter, see PALMA: Lectures, chap. 70, Cent. 7.

Before we close this chapter on the Sixth Council, we would say a few words as to a conclusion drawn from its Acts by Bossuet (1), in support of the Gallican theory of the supremacy of a General Council over the Roman Pontiff. The Sixth Council formally condemned the Monothelites, although the Popes Martin I. and Agatho had already launched their anathemas against them. But where was the necessity, asks the bishop of Meaux, of a condemnation by the Council, if the decision of the Roman Pontiff was definitive? Again, the Council submitted the Dogmatic Epistle of Agatho to an examination; therefore, the fathers claimed the right to judge the Pope. And the very anathema launched against Pope Honorius shows that the Council regarded the Roman Pontiff as subjected to its jurisdiction. To this opinion of Bossuet, we first oppose the epistle of Agatho to Pogonatus, which was read in the 4th Action. In it the Pontiff declares that he observes all that was defined by his predecessors and by the General Councils, and that he studies "that of those things which have been regularly defined, nothing shall be diminished, added, or changed, but shall be preserved intact, both in word and meaning." He then speaks of the instructions given to his legates, and says that "they were enjoined not to presume to add or change anything; but to simply narrate the tradition of this Apostolic See, as it has been established by the preceding Apostolic Pontiff." Had the Council regarded itself as superior to the Pope, would it not have resented such instructions? But Agatho goes on to explain why he wishes nothing to be changed or added: "Peter received the spiritual sheep of the Church from the Redeemer of all, with a triple injunction to feed them. By the favor of his protection, this Apostolic Church has never deviated in any way from the path of truth; and the whole Catholic Church of Christ, and the General Councils, have followed his authority in all things, as that of the Prince of all the Apostles." Asserting, therefore, the inerrability of his See, Agatho could not have submitted his definitions to the examination of the Council. We can also adduce the Synodical Epistle sent by Agatho and the Roman Synod to the Council. In this letter, after an assertion of the constant freedom from error enjoyed by the Roman See, the Pontiff and synodal fathers say, "This is our perfect science, that with our whole mind we preserve the limits of that Catholic and Apostolic faith which the Apostolic See has always held and delivered you are not to dispute about uncertainties, but to proffer certain and immutable things in a compendious definition We therefore receive as concordant with our Apostolic faith, as co-priests and co-ministers of the same faith, as spiritual brethren and our fellow bishops, all those who sincerely wish to teach what is contained in this Profession of Faith drawn up by our humility. But those who will not acknowledge these things, we look upon as enemies of the Catholic and Apostolic faith, and guilty of perpetual condemnation; and unless they will have corrected themselves, we shall not suffer such to enter the society of our humility." Had the Sixth Council regarded as illegitimate the claims here put forth, it would assuredly have protested against them, but, on the contrary, it acknowledged the supreme authority of Pope Agatho. Writing to the Pontiff, the Council ascribes the crushing of Monothelitism to his epistle, and acknowledges the letter as an emanation from the prince of the Apostles: "We regard as divinely sent from the supreme height of the Apostles, the letter sent by your Blessedness to the most pious emperor, through which we have repressed the lately arisen heretical sect of multifold error." And in its letter to Pope Leo, successor to Agatho, the Council avows its obligation to obey the dictates of St. Peter: "We have looked upon the Prince of the Apostolic chair, Peter, the bishop of the first See, divinely showing to the eyes of our souls the mystery of the whole dispensation For the whole Christ was described in those his sacred letters, which with willing minds we have sincerely received, and as though they were Peter himself, have taken to the embrace of our souls." And in its epistle to the emperor, the Council says of the epistle of Pope Agatho: "The parchment and ink were seen, and through Agatho Peter spoke." As for the examination of Agatho's epistle, which Bossuet contends was made by the Council, the same reply may be given that we gave to a similar objection in the case of the epistle of St. Leo to the Council of Chalcedon. An inquisitorial and judicial examination is one thing, an investigation for the sake of information is another; the latter, not the former, was undertaken by the Council. As to the condemnation of Monothelitism by the Council, even after the Pontifical definitions, there was no superfluity of action in such a repetition. It was necessary for the Council to manifest the adhesion of the Church to the doctrine taught by the Apostolic See, and that could be done in no better way than by a condemnation of the heresy in question. It was proper also to show the Monothelites, in the most solemn manner possible, that the whole Church was against them. The anathema launched against Pope Honorius does not prove, as Bossuet asserts, that the Pontiff, as such, was subject to the jurisdiction of the Council. For, as we shall show in the next chapter, if Honorius erred, he did so as a private individual. We contend that he did not err at all, and the absurdities which follow from the supposition that a Pope, even as a private individual, can fall into heresy, form a good argument for those who believe in his personal, as well as official, freedom from liability to error in matters of faith. We will now proceed to examine into the alleged heresy of Pope Honorius, and among the errors of Bossuet and his school in this matter, it will be seen that a place must be accorded to the assertion that the Sixth Council regarded, and anathematized, Honorius as a heretic.

(1) Life of Agatho.

(1) Defence of the Declaration, p. 2, b. 12, c. 24.

CHAPTER XXXV.

THE ALLEGED HERESY OF POPE HONORIUS.

Of the few illustrative cases adduced by the opponents of Papal infallibility to support their theory, two stand out in bold relief, for they alone merit any serious attention. Of these, we think that the case of Pope Liberius affords no real difficulty to the impartial student, but we must admit that the case of Honorius is not so simple. In it, we have to deal with letters in which our opponents discover doctrines manifestly heretical; we hear the clear voice of an Œcumenical Council anathematizing the Pontiff in the same breath that it draws when condemning those whom we willingly abjure. Such a case is not to be hastily treated. It has occupied the best minds of the two schools, into which, before the last General Council, our theologians and historians were divided. Anything new bearing upon it will probably never be discovered; every document has been thoroughly criticized, every argument well ventilated, every prejudice analyzed. To Protestant authors the cause of Honorius has been a mine which needed little delving for the extraction of its treasures. Most attractive was the picture of a Roman Pontiff teaching a doctrine which the veriest tyro in theology knows to be anti-Catholic; yet more entrancing was the scene in which was heard a General Council, confirmed by a Pope, and therefore, to all Catholics, infallible, branding as a "heretic" one of those Heads of the Church generally regarded as themselves infallible. Ultramontanes and Gallicans alike should be overwhelmed by such a fact, and it was well developed. Gallicanism has now passed into the realms of history; the Council of the Vatican has rendered it forever a thing of the past. But, just as no one could be styled a dogmatic theologian, if, though knowing what is the teaching of the Church, he were unable to prove its soundness, so no one will be well versed in the meaning of history, unless he connects his facts with their causes, consequences, and correlatives—unless, in fact, he is able to reason upon them. It is not sufficient, for one who wishes to converse intelligently upon matters of Church history, to know that the Church teaches that no Pope can err in faith; he must be able to prove that no Pope has ever so erred. With the first argument he will convince his own brethren; but it is only with the second, furnished by matter-of-fact history, that, very frequently, he will convince an outsider. For this reason, we enter upon the defence of Pope Honorius.

Of the many Catholic authors who have defended Honorius from the charge of heresy, we may first cite Cardinal Baronio. His theory is that of the vitiation of the Acts of the Sixth Council. If that idea were tenable, our case would require no further defence, but, as we have seen in the last chapter, the Acts must be accepted as authentic. The eminent annalist then asserts that the Sixth Council declared that it condemned the Monothelites according to the tenor of the sentence of Pope Agatho; we know, however, that Agatho did not proscribe Honorius. Therefore, concludes Baronio, the Synod did not condemn the Pontiff. Unfortunately, this argument must also be excluded, because Agatho only mentioned the originators of the heresy, while the Synod went further, and, to say nothing of Honorius, condemned Macarius, Stephen, and Polychronius. The next argument of Baronio is deduced from the silence of the Papal legates while a Roman Pontiff was being condemned, and it would mean much if adduced against an adversary holding that Honorius was anathematized as a formal heretic, but it has no weight with one who acknowledges that the Pontiff was guilty merely of false prudence and of giving comfort to a budding heresy. Again, these particular legates might have been culpably silent in such an emergency, for while we cannot agree with Alexandre that they were "idiots," yet we know from Agatho's epistle to Pogonatus, read in the fourth Action of the Sixth Council, that the Pope excused himself for sending men so little versed in theological lore, pleading as a reason the dearth of science just then prevalent in Italy, owing to the terrible state of political and social matters (1).

The erudite Jesuit Garnier, in his 2nd Dissertation affixed to his edition of the Diurnal of the Roman Pontiffs, defends Honorius from the charge of heresy, but contends that he was condemned for "imprudent economy" in the Monothelite matter, inasmuch as he wished for silence as to the number of operations, when the good of religion demanded that the two operations should be openly defended. Speaking of Baronio's theory, Garnier says, "Baronio satisfied few learned men, although he piously brought to bear, upon what he believed the only possible way of defending Honorius, the entire strength of his great genius and learning." A great number of authors lay the principal stress of their defence upon the fact that the epistles of Honorius were private, and not dogmatic. Their views are well expressed in an anonymous work cited by Alexandre (1) entitled Gaul Vindicated. "However the case of Honorius may be regarded," says this writer, "it is certain that his error, if any there were, would not injure our cause; for who does not know that the letters of Honorius to Pyrrhus and Sergius, on account of which he is accused of heresy, were private, not public and dogmatic, and that in them Honorius defined nothing, but simply manifested his mind and private opinion? That Popes may err in such epistles, I do not deny, nor does it enter the question; for everything done or said by a Pontiff is not an oracle or above human frailty; only when he acts as Pontiff, or, as the schools put it, when he teaches ex cathedra. The letters sent by Honorius to Sergius were private, not addressed to the faithful, nor do they decide anything; for although, by the law of contraries, there should be or not be two wills and two operations in Christ, yet Honorius wishes neither view to be asserted, but only two with their own operations, which surely is not a decision, but a leaving the question unsettled. However, not in every case, nor in every writing, do we proclaim the Pontiff infallible; but only when he acts as Pontiff and teacher of the Church, that is, when he performs some act which pertains to a Pontiff alone, and such is not the writing or answering of letters, for that is permitted to every bishop, and to every private person. For as this privilege of infallibility is meant for the public good of the Church, God wished to assign it to the office, not to the person, and to have it present, only when a Pontifical duty was being performed." The reader will find in Mamachi (2) a list of the authors who have treated all sides of this question, We shall, however, draw his attention to Orsi (1), to Thomassin (2), to Alexandre (3), and to Palma's Lectures. The pious and scholarly Cardinal La Luzerne (4) has presented the Gallican view of the matter in his usual masterly and courteous style, and as that view has been put forth by no one, not even by Bossuet, in so forcible a way, we shall take occasion to notice his objections. The opinion of Alexandre is presented in the propositions that Honorius was condemned in the Sixth Council; that he was justly condemned as an "author of Monothelitism;" that, however, he can be "truly and piously" excused of heresy. If there appears to be a contradiction between the second and third of these propositions, it is to be noted, in justice to Alexandre, that in his treatment of the second proposition, he leans to the theory of Garnier, and does not follow out the idea conveyed by the word "author."

(1) The Pontiff also says that his legates are not to argue, but to see that Monothelitism, already condemned by Rome, be condemned by the Council.

(1) Seventh Cent., dissert. I., in note 1.

(2) Origins and Antiquities, tom. 6.

Proceeding now to the defence of Pope Honorius from the charge of heresy, we must first observe that we find it difficult to account for the energy displayed by Gallican writers in this matter. Unlike Protestants, they were in no position of rebellion to Church authority, were actuated by no hatred to the Papacy, and hence were not naturally led to attack Rome for any reason or for no reason. What had they to gain? Their favorite theory of the fallibility of the Roman Pontiff could not be strengthened by proving the heresy of Honorius, for it is certain that the epistles to Sergius and Pyrrhus were private and not dogmatic. Unless they could show that these letters were sent by the Pontiff as dogmatic teaching, intended for the whole Church of Christ, their labor would be vain. That the letters were private, we now proceed to show. And in the first place, the adversaries of Honorius should bear the burden of producing proof in this matter, not we, for when a man in power writes a letter, no more than that of any other person is it presumed to be official, unless it carries with itself the marks of official character. Thus, when an absolute monarch issues an edict, its phraseology will reveal that obedience is demanded; when a constitutional sovereign emits a decree, the paper is countersigned by the minister whose department it concerns. Now, in the letters of Honorius and in the circumstances of their issuance, not only is there an absence of any indication of their being official, but there is positive evidence of their private character (1). He tells Sergius, "that no one should presume to teach one or two operations in Christ, when neither Scriptural nor Apostolic letters, nor a Synodical examination are seen to have determined the matter." Such language could not be used by a Pontiff, if he were teaching whether or not there were two operations. Again, in accordance with the doctrine that it is not by inspiration, but by assistance, that the Holy Ghost preserves the defining authority in the Church from error, the Roman Pontiffs have always, when defining doctrine, had the previous aid, either of a Synod or of some of the Roman clergy, whose duty it was to thoroughly examine the matter. In this very question of Monothelitism, the Pontiffs who succeeded Honorius (2), viz., John IV., Theodore, Martin, and Agatho, took no action until they had held Synods. That Honorius held no Synod, and took no counsel with his clergy, before writing these letters, is patent from the very disputes as to his meaning which were rampant so shortly after his death; some of his advisers must have been living, if he had used any. And the Sixth Council never speaks of the letters of

(1) Authority of the Roman Pontiff, p. 1, b. 1.

(3) As above.

(2) Dissert. 12 on Councils. (4) Declaration of the French Clergy in 1682, p. 3, c. 17.

(1) In his Animadversion on the propositions of Alexandre, Roncaglia asserts, as a proof of the private nature of these letters, that they were unknown in the West up to the time of the Sixth Council, which certainly could not be the case with dogmatic epistles. He says they must be regarded as having been long unknown in Africa, from the fact that the Synods of Carthage, Numidia, and Mauritania, held against the Monothelites, anathematized Sergius, Pyrrhus, and Paul, but said nothing of Honorius. A denunciation of some kind against Honorius would have been made, as was afterwards done in the Sixth Council, had his epistles been known. As for Europe, he asks how it was that under the Pontificates of Honorius, Severinus, John IV., and Theodore, no Monothelite quoted them as did his brethren in the East. This argument would be a good one, for forty-seven years elapsed between the writing of the letters and the meeting of the Council, if history were in its favor. But it will not hold as to the African churches, for the quoted Synods were held during the Pontificate of John IV. (639-641), and the letters were written in 633. Considering the nature of the times, six or seven years of ignorance as to the existence of the letters would not prove their non-official character. Important communications between the churches were often years on the way. When the African fathers sent their legates to Constantinople to inquire into the Nicene canons cited by Pope Zosimus, they were three years absent. Nor will Roncaglia's argument hold good as to Europe. It is strange that he should have forgotten that Pope John IV. sent a letter to the emperor complaining of Pyrrhus for "scandalizing the entire West," by spreading far and wide the letters of Honorius, and interpreting them in a Monothelite sense. We shall have occasion to notice this letter hereafter.

(2) Severinus reigned only two months.

Honorius as ‘ Synodical,’ while it applies the epithet in the case of all the epistles which were indited after or in a Synod, as those of Sophronius, Sergius, and Macarius. But not only did Honorius send these letters in a thoroughly unofficial manner; in the documents themselves there is nothing to indicate that they were meant for others than Sergius and Pyrrhus. When, however, the Pontiffs send dogmatic epistles, they signify that these are meant for the Universal Church. Finally, we have a most conclusive proof that the letters of Honorius were private, not dogmatic, in the epistle of Pope Agatho to the emperor, which was read in the fourth Action of the Sixth Council: “This is the rule of the true faith, which, both in happy and in evil days, this Apostolic Church of Christ, the spiritual mother of your most tranquil empire, has strongly held and defended; that Church which, by the grace of the omnipotent God, is proved to have never wandered from the path of Apostolic tradition, or to have depravely succumbed to heretical innovations according to the divine promise of Christ our Lord, the Saviour, which He made to the Prince of His Apostles. . . . Let your tranquil Clemency therefore reflect that the Lord and Saviour of all, whose faith this is, who promised that the faith of Peter should never fail, ordered him to confirm his brethren; and it is known to all that this has always been confidently done by the predecessors of my Little-ness, the Apostolic Pontiffs, whose footsteps that Little-ness, although unequal to the task, desires to follow, on account of the office conferred upon it by the divine mercy.” Now Pope Agatho was aware of the prejudice subsisting against Honorius in the East, on account of these very letters. Had they been the dogmatic teachings of a successor of that Blessed Peter whose faith could never fail, and not the mere private utterances of an individual, would Agatho have been so shameless as to boast that his predecessors had never failed in confirming their brethren? No—the Pontiff knew, and the Council, which heard and approved this epistle, knew, that whatever the letters of Honorius contained of imprudence, or even, if you will, of heresy, was from the mind of the individual Honorius, and was not the authoritative presentation of a doctrine on the part of the universal teacher. Here then we might conclude the defence of Pope Honorius, for it is plain that the prerogatives of the Holy See are not affected by his letters to the Monothelites. But it is well to ascertain, so far as the light of history will guide us, whether indeed one of the Roman Pontiffs was personally guilty of heresy. The accusations against Honorius are based upon the contents of his letters to Sergius; let us therefore read and examine the documents.

From the first letter, read in the twelfth Action of the Sixth Council, our adversaries select the following passages : " We have received the letters of your Fraternity, and by them have learned of the introduction of new disputes as to terms by a certain Sophronius (once a monk, and now, as we hear, made bishop of Jerusalem) against our brother Cyrus, bishop of Alexandria, who teaches to the converts from heresy one operation of our Lord Jesus Christ ; and having examined the copy of the letter sent to the same Sophronius, and seen that your Fraternity has sufficiently, providently, and circumspectly written, we praise the remover of a novelty in speech (1), which might cause scandal to the simple-minded We ought not to wrangle about these ecclesiastical dogmas (2), which neither the Synodal nor canonical authorities seem to have explained, that is, to presume to preach one or two wills in Christ God, when neither Scripture nor Apostolic letters, nor a Synodical examination, held for the purpose, have appeared to decide. That our Lord Jesus Christ, the Son and Word of God, by whom all things were made, is Himself one, operating divine and human things, the sacred writings plainly show. Whether, however, on account of the works of the Humanity and Divinity, one or two operations ought to be proclaimed and understood, these things do not belong to us ; let us leave them to the grammarians, who are accustomed to display to the young their choice derivations of words. We exhort your Fraternity to preach with us, as we do with one mind with you, in orthodox faith and Catholic unity,—avoiding the use of the introduced terms, one or two operations—that there is one Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of the Living God, most true God in two Natures, operating divinely and humanly.” And in another part of the same epistle, the Pontiff says : “ Whence we acknowledge one will in our Lord Christ, because the Divinity assumed our nature, not our fault ; that nature, certainly, which was created before the sin, not that which was vitiated after the fall. There was not then assumed by the Saviour a vitiated nature, which fought with the law of His mind. For another law in His members, or a different contrary will, was not in the Saviour.” These are the words of Pope Honorius, which, considered together with the action of the Sixth Council in his regard, and the “ weakness of the defence,” caused the learned and sincere Cardinal de la Luzerne, as he himself says, to abandon his early opinion that the Pontiff fell into a simple error of fact, and to range himself with those who charge Honorius with heresy.

(1) "Novitatem vocabuli."

(2) "Dogmata hæc ecclesiastica retorquere."

It has been contended that this epistle was corrupted by the Monothelites ; that, in the last of the quoted passages, Honorius did not say, “ one will,” but “ a new will.” But Pope John IV., in his Apology for Honorius, the Popes Leo II. and Adrian II., and the 6th, 7th, and 8th Councils, accepted the passage as it stands. Nor do we wish to reject it, for there is not a more orthodox passage in the whole patrology. Honorius plainly asserts that as Christ, in becoming man, assumed our nature, as it was before the fall of Adam, He did not incur any of our frailties, and hence had in his soul and members no two contrary and conflicting wills and inclinations, as have those who bear the effects of original sin. But there is no need for us to thus paraphrase the text ; its intended meaning is obvious on the instant that the eye strikes the sentence. But La Luzerne answers that Honorius cannot be understood as speaking of the one will of Christ's Humanity, as it would be absurd to suppose in man two faculties of will. While no theologian has ever been guilty of this absurdity, yet all, from the Apostle down, have ever spoken of the law in the members disputing the empire of the soul with the law in the mind. This, and nothing else, is the meaning of Honorius: "There was not assumed by the Saviour a vitiated nature, which fought with the law of His mind. For another law in His members, or a different contrary will, was not in the Saviour." As Palma remarks, the sin of Monothelitism consisted in its explanation of the Eutychian mistakes upon the two wills and operations in Christ; for the Eutychian heresy, when developed as to the will and operation of our Lord, inevitably brought out the assertion of one will and one operation. Hence, St. Leo the Great said to his legate Julian, "His flesh was not of another nature than ours, nor in a way different from that of other men did He receive His soul, which excelled, not in diversity of kind, but in sublimity of virtue; for He had nothing contrary in His flesh, nor did a discord of desires generate a strife of wills. His bodily senses flourished without the law of sin, and the truth of His affections, being under the control of the Deity and of His mind, was neither tempted by allurements, nor yielded to attacks." After quoting this, and a similar passage taken from St. Leo's epistle to Flavian, Palma well demands whether, if it was right for St. Leo to thus urge the Eutychians, Honorius could not, in almost the same controversy, speak as he did about the one human will of Christ.

La Luzerne asserts that Pope Honorius, in his epistles to Sergius, talks as though it were a matter of complete indifference whether one or two wills be proclaimed; else, why enjoin silence as to the terms? It is true that the Pontiff advised silence, but it was to be practiced only until competent authority should decide the matter, and to avoid scandal to the simple-minded. He by no means signified that he did not believe it necessary to acknowledge two operations in Christ. On the contrary, he said to Sergius: "We must confess that both Natures are joined in the one Christ by a natural unity, operators and operating in communion with each other; the Divine indeed, operating the things that are of God, and the Human working the things which are of the flesh; not dividedly, or confusedly, or convertibly, teaching that the Nature of God is converted into man, or the Nature of man into that of God, but confessing the integral differences of the Natures." Can the Catholic doctrine be stated in clearer terms? And before Honorius spoke of the advisability of silence, he told the patriarch that "we ought not to define one or two operations, but instead of 'one operation,' as some say, we ought to truly avow one operator, Christ the Lord in the nature of each; and instead of 'two operations,' removing the term 'two operations,' we ought rather to teach the two Natures, that is, the Divinity and the Humanity, in the One Person of the Only Son of God, each operating its own, inconfusedly, undividedly, and inconvertibly." There is no need of paraphrasing or of explaining these passages. The Catholic doctrine as to the two wills and operations is so plainly stated, that far from helping the cause of the Monothelites, the heresy is completely subverted by them, for, "each operates its own, inconfusedly, undividedly, and inconvertibly," in which phrase there is certainly not only no implication of any Theandric operation, but an explicit assertion of two distinct ones.

But although it is plain that the epistles of Honorius are thoroughly orthodox, there remains as evidence against the Pontiff the condemnatory action of the Sixth Council. We have shown in the last chapter that the theory of Baronio as to the vitiation of the Acts is untenable. It therefore becomes necessary to reconcile the orthodoxy of Honorius with the clearly denunciatory language used by the Council against him. In the 13th Action, the fathers say: "Reconsidering the dogmatic epistles which were written by Sergius, once patriarch of this imperial city, which may God preserve, both to Cyrus, who was then bishop of Phasis, and to Honorius, once Pope of ancient Rome; similarly also the epistle from him, that is, Honorius, written to the same Sergius, and finding them entirely different from the Apostolic teachings, and the definition of the Holy Councils and of all reliable fathers, and following the false doctrines of heretics; we in every way reject them, and execrate them as noxious to the soul. And we have decreed to throw out from the Church of God the names of those whose impious dogmas we execrate, that is, of Sergius, once bishop of this imperial city, which may God preserve, who undertook to write on this wicked dogma; of Cyrus of Alexandria, of Pyrrhus, of Peter, and of Paul, who died in the bishopric of this city, which may God preserve, and who thought similarly to them; . . . We have also decided to eject, together with these, from the Holy Catholic Church of God, and to anathematize, Honorius, who was Pope of ancient Rome, because we find, from the writings he gave to Sergius, that in all things he held the latter's view, and confirmed the impious dogmas." In the 16th Action, the fathers exclaimed, "To the heretic Sergius, anathema; to the heretic Honorius, anathema; to the heretic Theodore of Pharan, anathema." In the 18th Action, they cried, "To Nestorius, Eutyches, and Dioscorus, anathema; to Apollinaris and Severus, anathema; to Sergius and Honorius, anathema; . . . to all heretics, anathema; to all who taught, teach, or will teach, one will and one operation in the dispensation of our Lord Jesus Christ, anathema." In the Prosphonic, or Acclamatory Address to the emperor, they say, "We have thrown out of the ecclesiastical limits superfluous novelties of speech, and their inventors, and deservedly anathematize them; that is, Theodore of Pharan, Sergius, Paul, Pyrrhus, and Peter, who held these of Constantinople, and also Cyrus, who was bishop of Alexandria, and with them Honorius, who was bishop of Rome, because he followed them." Finally, in the Synodical epistle to Pope Agatho, the fathers say, "We have afflicted with anathema, according to the sentence already pronounced upon them by your letter, Theodore, bishop of Pharan, Sergius, Honorius, Cyrus, Paul, Pyrrhus, and Peter." The action of the Sixth Council certainly tells strongly against the fair fame of Honorius; the persistent association of his name with those of such noted heresiarchs as Eutyches, Dioscorus, Sergius, and Pyrrhus, assuredly indicates on the part of the fathers of the Council, a feeling of great bitterness towards his memory, while the explicit use of the term, "heretic" in his regard, would appear to settle the question. And nevertheless, this action of the Council does not prove that Honorius was a heretic. The mere application of the term "heretic" does not show that the individual designated did not defend the orthodox doctrine. What then did the Sixth Council mean by branding Honorius with such a stigma? For stigma the name of heretic certainly was, and in those days a terrible one. There is no need of conjecture as to the meaning of the fathers; their meaning and object are explained by those who were well acquainted with both. Pope Leo II. confirmed the Acts of this Council, after hearing from the Papal legates all that had been done therein, and he tells us that Honorius was condemned for weakness and neglect; in fine, as a favorer or helper of heresy,—a terrible reproach, indeed, for one in his position to receive, but very different from that of formal heresy. In his confirmatory epistle, sent to Constantine Pogonatus, Pope Leo says, “We also anathematize the inventors of the new error, that is, Theodore, bishop of Pharan, Cyrus of Alexandria, Sergius, Pyrrhus, Paul, and Peter, ensnarers, rather than guides, of the church of Constantinople; and also Honorius, who did not illumine this Apostolic Church with the doctrine of Apostolic tradition, but allowed it, while immaculate, to be stained by profane betrayal.” And in his epistle to the bishops of Spain, the same Pontiff says, “Those, however, who contended against the purity of Apostolic doctrine, departing, have indeed been visited with eternal condemnation; that is, Theodore of Pharan, Cyrus of Alexandria, Sergius, Pyrrhus, Paul, and Peter, Constantinopolitans; with Honorius who did not extinguish the incipient flame of heretical dogma, as befitted Apostolic authority, but, by neglect, nourished it.”

The conduct of Honorius had greatly helped the cause of the Monothelites. He had conceded to Sergius that which the cunning patriarch foresaw would be most opportune for the dubious fortunes of his party, namely, silence as to the terms “one or two” operations. It was not a question of terminology, but of a truth, for the specification of which those numerals were necessary. The use of those terms was even more to be required than, three hundred years before, had been the use of the word homoousion in the matter of Arianism; for in those days, there were many who disliked the word, but held the orthodox doctrine, while in the case of the wills of our Lord, if a man rejected the "two," it was patent that he admitted but "one." The imprudence of Honorius is the more remarkable in that he really gained nothing for the cause of quiet, by the concession of silence, since, at the very time he allowed it, he insisted upon the teaching of the true doctrine, couched in terms very nearly as clear to the simplest mind as those that were permitted to be kept in abeyance. He meant well, but he should have remembered the words of Cælestine I. to the French bishops: "I fear lest to be silent as to this matter, may be to connive at it; I fear lest they talk the more, who permit such things to be said. In such matters, silence is suspicious. . . . The cause is properly our own, if we favor error by silence." As he yielded to a false idea of prudence, to what was really a moral cowardice, the fathers of the Sixth Council regarded Honorius as a Pontiff who had neglected his duty, and who therefore became worthy of censure, even of anathema.

The secretary employed by Pope Honorius to draw up the epistles to Sergius was a certain abbot John, and St. Maximus Martyr tells us, in his letter to Marinus and in his dispute with Pyrrhus, that John thus spoke to a mutual friend, the abbot Anastasius, about the Pontiff's words: "We said there was one will in the Lord, not in the Divinity and Humanity, but in the Humanity alone. When Sergius wrote that some were asserting two contrary wills in Christ, we answered that Christ did not have two contrary wills, of the flesh, that is, and the spirit, as we have after the fall, but one only, which naturally affected the Humanity." Cardinal La Luzerne rejects the authority of abbot John, as of one anxious to make his own apology. Such reasoning is not only frivolous, but unworthy of the eminent author. The high-toned and sincere-minded prelate must have been deeply affected by the society of the skeptical courtiers who formed but too large a part of the court-circles of Louis XVIII. and Charles X., when he came to the conclusion that no man can ever be heard in his own defence. The unsupported word of an accused person is of no value when contradicted by positive evidence ; but when it tallies minutely with the testimony before the tribunal, it is of great account. And the assertion of the Papal secretary is corroborated, as we have seen, by the letters themselves.

No person could have better understood the letters of Honorius than Pope John IV., who was elected six years after they were written. His letter to the Emperor Constantine, son of Heraclius, is so pointed, and so illustrative of our subject, that we shall transcribe a good portion of it : "All the West is scandalously disturbed because our brother, the patriarch Pyrrhus, has sent letters hither and thither, teaching certain new doctrines, outside the rule of faith, and ascribing the same views to Pope Honorius of holy memory, whereas such were entirely foreign to the mind of the Catholic Pontiff. That your Benignity may be acquainted with the whole affair, which occurred only a little while ago, I shall narrate it. The patriarch Sergius, of revered memory, informed the aforesaid Roman Pontiff, of holy memory, that certain persons were teaching two contrary wills in our Redeemer, the Lord Jesus Christ. The aforesaid Pope learning this, he replied that as our Saviour was one and indivisible (1), so He was conceived and born in a manner wonderfully above that of the entire human race. As to the dispensation of His Incarnation, he also taught that our Redeemer, just as He was perfect God, so He was perfect Man ; and that, being born without sin, He renewed the pristine nobility of the image, which the first man lost by the fall. The Second Adam, therefore, was born, having no sin, either in His birth, or in His conversation with men. For the Word being made Flesh in the similitude of the flesh of sin, assumed all of ours, but took none of the vice of guilt which is derived from the fall. and therefore our Lord Jesus Christ deigned to have one will, natural to His Humanity, according to the original formation of Adam ; not two contrary wills, such as we feel we now have, who are born of the sin of Adam. Whence, knowing that in His birth and life there was no sin, we properly say, and truly avow, that there is one will in the holy dispensation of His Humanity; and we do not teach two contrary wills, of mind and of flesh, as rave some heretics, as though He were a mere man. . . . Therefore, my aforesaid predecessor, when teaching the mystery of the Incarnation of Christ, said that there were not in Him, as in us sinners, contrary wills of mind and of flesh. Converting this to their own views, some persons have suspected that he taught one will, of both Divinity and Humanity, which is in every way contrary to the truth." This letter of Pope John IV. goes so straight to the point, that La Luzerne finds but one way of escape, and that is, to throw it out of court altogether. And why? Because it was written by poor abbot John, once more Pontifical secretary. La Luzerne shuts his mind to the plain fact, that the responsibility and authority of a letter accrue not to the scribe, but to the master. Such reasoning as this would preclude the citation of nearly all public documents, for, in all probability, since the origin of written communications, not one per cent. of them has been executed by the hands that signed them. The cardinal also forgets that if abbot John is accountable for the letter of Pope John IV., he should also bear the responsibility of the letters of Honorius.

1 The text has monadicus.

St. Maximus Martyr (1) in his Dialogue with Pyrrhus, furnishes us with the following defence of Honorius. "PYRR. What have you to say about Honorius, who, writing to my predecessor, openly taught one will in our Lord Jesus Christ? MAX. Who shall properly interpret the meaning of that epistle? He who drew it up, at the side of Honorius, and is yet living; among other good things, conspicuous for the pious teachings with which he has illumined the entire West? (2) Or shall we hear the Constantinopolitans, speaking from their hearts? PYRR. He who composed it. MAX. That same person, writing, this time, at the side of Pope John, says to the divine Constantine, then emperor, 'We said there was one will in the Lord, not in the Divinity and Humanity, but in the Humanity alone. For when Sergius had written that some asserted two contrary wills in Christ, we replied that Christ did not have two contrary wills, in the flesh, that is, and in the spirit; but only one, which is naturally an essential note of His Humanity.' That it was thus, is evidently shown by the mention made of flesh and members, which cannot be attributed to the Divinity."

(1) St. Maximus was one of the most strenuous opponents of Monothellism. His Dialogue with Pyrrhus is an account of the dispute which the holy abbot held with the heresiarch, while the latter was in exile in Africa. When exiled by Constant to Byzla, he held a famous conference with the imperial emissaries, Theodosius, bishop of Casarea, and two patrieians; afterwards, he held another before the emperor in the palace at Constantinople. His three disputations have come down to us and are among the most precious records of the time. The Monothellites thrice procured his exile: his right hand was chopped off, his tongue plucked out, and he finally died in his third exile in 657.

(2) Abbot John, whose authority La Luzerne would ignore.

Anastasius the Librarian, in his Preface to John the Deacon, thus vindicates Honorius: "There has come to our hands an Apology of the Roman Pontiff, John IV., for Pope Honorius, who was asserted by calumniators to have written that there is but one will in our Lord Jesus Christ. I think that this Apology sufficiently excuses him, although the Sixth Council anathematized him as a heretic, and smote him, already judged by God, with the javelin of reprobation; for a man does not become a heretic because he is deceived by error, but when he chooses wrongly, and is contentiously pertinacious therein. But who is there to tell us whether he really wrote that epistle? Although we do not ignore that St. Maximus, in his letter to Marinus, tells us it was written by the most holy abbot John. But granted that he (Honorius) was the dictator, who will interrogate him upon it?"

We will now bring this dissertation to an end. We have seen that there is no heresy in the letters of Pope Honorius; that, even if there were, they are not dogmatic teachings of a Roman Pontiff, addressing the Universal Church, but simply the private utterances of the writer; that, finally, Honorius was not condemned by the Sixth Council for heresy, but for neglect of duty.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

THE TRULLAN OR "QUINISEXT" SYNOD.

This Synod, many of the canons of which were rejected by the Holy See, and to which the same authority has always refused the stamp of œcumenicity, is regarded by the Greek schismatics as an appendix of the Fifth and Sixth General Councils. Hence its name of "Quinisext." It is also styled "Trullan," from the fact of its having been held in a domical hall of the imperial palace at Constantinople, troullos being Lower Greek for tholos, a dome. It was convoked by the Emperor Justinian II., and the reason for its celebration is mentioned by its members in their Allocution to the sovereign: "Since the two Holy and Universal Synods (5th and 6th) edited no holy canons—unlike the other four Holy Universal Synods—by which men would be led to abandon an evil and abject manner of life, and to return to a better and higher one, therefore we, assembled by order of your Piety in this ruling and God-revering city, have issued some holy canons." Where, asks Pagi (1) did the Greeks learn that a General Council must necessarily issue disciplinary canons? The date of the Trullan Synod is uncertain. Baronio contends that the year 692 is the right one, and his opinion is received by the erudite and critical Zaccaria (2); Alexandre adduces a plausible argument to show that 688 is the date. As to the presidency of the Synod, the eminent Oratorian assigns it to the Constantinopolitan patriarch Callinicus, and he is followed by Christian Lupus, who holds that the signature of Paul, the successor of Callinicus, which is read in the codices, was substituted for this latter prelate's, he having been regarded as an infamous man. Palma, after Pagi, remarks that this assertion of Lupus is gratuitous, and that, furthermore, it is certain that the patriarch Paul succeeded Callinicus in 686, and reigned until 693. Paul, therefore, as the old codices testify, and as Blastres asserts (1), was presiding officer of the Trullan Synod.

(1) Criticisms on Baronio, y. 692, no. 8. (2) Polemical History of Holy Celibacy, c. 9.

Historians have differed as to the question whether or not any Papal legates attended this Synod. There ought to be no doubt in the matter, for it is certain that if any Pontifical legates had been on hand, they would have, by virtue of their office, taken precedence of the patriarch Paul, and presided over the assembly. Yet Balsamon asserts that the Synod was attended, "in the name of the whole Roman Synod," by Basil, metropolitan of Crete, and by the bishop of Ravenna; and furthermore, Balsamon adds that "there were present not only these, but the bishops of Thessalonica, Sardia, Heraclea in Thrace, and Corinth, who were the legates of the Pope" (2). That the learned and generally reliable Balsamon is here mistaken, is proved, firstly, in reference to the prelates of Thessalonica, Sardia, Heraclea, and Corinth, by the fact that the Synodical decrees were not subscribed by them. Where their signatures might have been placed, we read "The place of the Thessalonican (bishop)," &c., which shows that they were absent, and that the decrees, as was customary in such cases, were to be sent to them for subscription. As for Balsamon's assertion that Basil of Crete, who did subscribe, represented "the whole Roman Synod," this representation does not imply any legatine authority, in the proper sense of the term. Basil was at that time Papal Apocrisiarius, or ambassador, at the Byzantine court, and as such, represented, in some respects, "the whole Roman Synod," but that office did not qualify him, without a special delegation ad hoc, to act as Papal legate at a Council. Constantine Pogonatus, after the 6th Council, had in vain requested Pope Leo II. to give plenipotential powers to the Papal ambassador; Basil, therefore, possessed no legatine authority at the Trullan Synod. Anastasius the Librarian certainly informs us that "the Emperor Justinian having ordered a Council to meet in the imperial city, the legates of the Apostolic See came to it, and being deceived, subscribed." (1) But this passage also may be explained as referring to the nuncio Basil, who, with some other Papal ambassador, attended the Synod. Again, as Pagi observes, this same Basil is styled a legate in his subscription which is read in the 18th Action of the 6th Council. At that time also he was Papal Apocrisiarius at the Byzantine court, but in the 6th Council, as we learn from the letters of Pope Agatho and of Constantine Pogonatus, he was not joined with the regular legates.

(1) Preface to the Nomocanon of Photius. (2) Commentary on the Nomocanon

The Greek schismatics entertain a particular esteem for this Trullan Synod, and affect to consider it as a continuation of the 6th Council, so as to be warranted in regarding it as œcumenical. Their reason is to be found in its anti-celibitic and other anti-Roman canons. Some of the canons, however, are most worthy of praise. Thus, the sixth prohibits priests, deacons, and subdeacons, from contracting matrimony after their ordination. The seventh rebukes the arrogance of such deacons as presumed, in certain localities, to take precedence of priests. The eighth commands the annual assembling of provincial Councils. The ninth forbids clerics to keep wine-shops. The fourteenth assigns 30 years as the age at which one may become a priest; 25 for a deacon; 40 for a deaconess. The twentieth suspends a bishop who dares to publicly teach in another diocese than his own. The twenty-sixth suspends a priest who, through ignorance, assists at an illicit marriage. The thirty-second condemns the Armenian custom of not mixing water with the wine to be consecrated. The thirty-third condemns the Armenian system of restricting the priesthood to a certain caste. The forty-second represses the wanderings of hermits, and orders them either to remain in their solitudes or to enter a monastery. The forty-fifth condemns the custom, in vogue in certain convents to this day, of dressing as a bride, and ornamenting with silks, &c., one about to take the veil. The sixty-fifth rebukes the superstition of dancing around bonfires at the time of the new moon. The sixty-eighth orders that copies of the Scriptures or of the works of the Fathers be never sold to merchants, unless such copies are moth-eaten or otherwise ruined. The sixty-ninth debar all laymen from access to the sanctuary, the emperor alone, when offering gifts, excepted. The seventieth nullifies the marriage of an orthodox person with a heretic; but declares that the union of infidels is not to be dissolved, if the converted party wishes to cohabit as before, and if the infidel consents to cohabit "without injury to the Creator." The seventy-fifth ordains that "inordinate vociferations" be abolished in church-singing. The ninety-first subjects abortionists to the same penalties as homicides. The hundred-and-sixth excommunicates women who excessively dress and adorn their hair. The hundred-and-eighth declares adulterous the marriage of one betrothed to a third party.

(1) Life of Pope Sergius I.

Of the 102 Trullan canons, the Holy See rejected the following: The third, which received the eighty-five Apostolic Canons and the Apostolic Constitutions. The thirteenth, which attacked the law of clerical celibacy, and anathematized those who debarred priests and deacons from the society of their wives. The fifty-fifth, which condemned the Western custom of fasting on the Saturdays of Lent. The sixty-seventh, which condemned the eating of blood. The eighty-second, which prohibited the representation of the Saviour in the form of a Lamb.

Justinian II. sent the 102 Trullan canons to Pope Sergius I., begging their confirmation. What followed is best learned from the narrative of Anastasius the Librarian: "The blessed Pontiff would not satisfy the emperor, nor would he receive those volumes, or allow them to be read. He spurned them as of no authority, choosing rather to die, than to consent to error. Then the emperor sent his cruel sword-bearer, Zacchary, with an order to take the Pontiff to the imperial city. But the mercy of God interfering, and the blessed Peter, prince of the Apostles, helping, the hearts of the Ravennese and Pentapolitan soldiers were touched, . . . and they would not allow the Pontiff to be removed from Rome. A great number of the soldiers having come together, the frightened Zacchary thought he might be killed, and hence he ordered the city gates to be closed, and trembling, took refuge in the bed-chamber of the Pope, begging him with tears to be merciful. The Ravennese having entered the city by St. Peter's gate, the populace rushed to the Lateran, anxious to see the Pontiff. They then threatened to break down the doors if they were not opened. In despair Zachary now hid himself under the Pontiff's bed, and fairly lost his senses. But the Pope comforted him, telling him not to fear," &c. Anastasius then relates how Sergius was joyfully acclaimed by the people, and how the wretched minion of the Byzantine sovereign was opprobriously expelled from the Eternal City.

During the Pontificate of John VII. (705-707), Justinian II. again endeavored to procure a confirmation of the Trullan canons. The Pontiff, fearful of offending the emperor, did not openly condemn the obnoxious decrees, but, mindful of his duty, he did not receive them, but contented himself with returning them by the hands of the messengers who had brought them. The Pontificate of Sisinnius was of only twenty days' duration, but during that of his successor, Constantine (708-715), Justinian again pushed his favorite project. As we learn from Anastasius, the Pontiff visited Constantinople, and was most reverently received, but the silence of all Greek authors as to any confirmation of the obnoxious canons is a proof that the emperor did not gain his object. But the affectionate and reverential treatment accorded to Pope Constantine by Justinian seems to show that the Pontiff approved of such of the Trullan decrees as were not averse to the ancient decrees of the Holy See. That this was also according to the mind of Pope John VIII. (872-882), is gathered from Anastasius, in his Preface to the Latin version of the Seventh Council, which he dedicated to that Pontiff: "Your Apostolate discerning. the Church receives only such rules of the Holy Councils as are not contrary to the right faith and to approved customs and which in no way whatever conflict with the decrees of the Roman See. Therefore, those regulations which the Greeks declare to have been issued by the Sixth Council, and those of this Synod (7th), are so received by the chief See, that none of them are to be accepted which are found to be contrary to the olden canons, to good morals, or to the decrees of the holy Pontiffs of this See."

In fine, the Holy See has never approved of the 3d, 13th, 55th, 67th, and 82d Trullan canons. It must be remembered, also, that the Trullan Synod was a particular and national, not a General Council, and that hence, even though its canons had been approved by Rome, the discipline enforced by them would not therefore necessarily obtain in the Universal Church.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

ISLAMISM.

Mohammed was born at Mecca in the year 570, of poor, but respectable parents. Losing them when yet a child, he was brought up by his uncle, a merchant, and with him made many journeys through Syria and other lands. When he was about 25 years old, he married a rich widow named Kadijah, in whose service he had formerly been; and being thus enabled to abandon mercantile pursuits, he turned his energies to the acquirement of power. He had picked up from a Nestorian monk, named Sergius, a limited knowledge of the Mosaic law and of Christian doctrine, and this served him as a basis for his new religion. For fifteen years he retired during the period of a month to a cavern of Mt. Hera, where he pretended to receive revelations from God, through the Angel Gabriel. When he thought that the Arabs were pretty well prepared to listen to him, his wife and Sergius having meanwhile prepared the way by their wonderful stories, he announced that he had been sent to revive the ancient religion of Abraham, of Ishmael, of Jesus, and the prophets. He commenced his propaganda in the year 612, and continued it until his death in 631, leaving already in the profession of the new faith nearly the whole of Arabia. His successors continued his missionary career in the style he had adopted, that is, by fire and sword on the one hand, and a pandering to human weakness on the other, until nearly all Asia and Africa acknowledged the truth of Islam. Very soon the new doctrine invaded Europe. The Byzantine empire, weakened by corruption, and still more by schism, offered but feeble resistance to the fanatical hordes who overran its fairest provinces. But through the indomitable energy of the Roman Pontiffs, the advancing waves of barbarism were checked by the Crusades, and, in more modern times, the Christian heroism of Poland and Hungary forced the followers of the prophet to abandon all designs on the West.

The doctrines of Mohammed are contained in the Koran, a book which the prophet said he received from the Angel Gabriel (1). According to him, the combined intellects of all the men in the world, aided by all the demons, could not have composed any one of its chapters; it is the greatest and most divine of all miracles. From amid a mass of fables, puerilities, and obscenities, taken, respectively, from the Jewish Talmud, the Apocryphal Gospels, and the Arabic romances of his day, we extract from the Koran the following principal doctrines of Mohammed: There is but one God, the Creator of the universe, the Judge of all men; God has no Son, for He needs nothing; when Jesus wished to be adored as God, He was rebuked by God, and excused Himself, saying, "Thou knowest that I have given to men only Thy commandment, that they should adore only Thee, my God and their own." (Sura 13 and 14.) Jesus was the Word of God (Su. 2); His Gospel was the Light and Confirmation of the Old Testament (Su. 12); He was divinely conceived, and born of Mary, a virgin sister of Moses (2), and at His birth, which took place under a palm tree, Mary

(1) The Koran is best known to English readers through the translation of George Sale whose deistical sympathies caused him to treat, in his preface, the Mohammedan doctrines with very great leniency. The best refutation of the Koran is that of Marracci (Entire Text of the Koran; Padua, 1698), professor of Arabic in the Propaganda at Rome, in the seventeenth century. This author makes no assertion that he does not corroborate with a text, and with testimonies from Arabic authors. Volney, in his Voyage in Syria and Egypt (made in 1783-85), although himself more than half infidel, says that the insensate teachings of the Koran are the natural cause of all the miseries experienced by the subjects of the Porte. Mohammed tells his followers, in the commencement of the book, that none of its points can admit of doubt, that a terrible punishment awaits all who will not accord it a full and hearty belief. One of the most salient characteristics of the Koran is its silence as to the interior virtues: there is no mention of the love of God and our neighbor, of mortification, of humility, of penitence.

(2) The reader need not be surprised at this anachronism, for the Koran is filled with such errors. Mohammed called himself "the prophet without learning."

fainted through pain, and was restored by eating of the fruit which Jesus, from the womb, called upon the palm to produce; He predicted His own death and resurrection; He was not crucified, God having substituted another in His place (Su. 29, 53, 11). The virgin Mary was devoted to God by her mother at the instant of her conception, and was the purest of all creatures; her maternity of Jesus was announced by the angels (Su. 29). Solomon received his wisdom from the demons, and was a great magician (Su. 1); Abraham received the law from God Himself, and built a temple at Mecca (Su. 2); God also gave the law to Moses (Su. 42); Ishmael was one of the prophets (Su. 11). The dead will arise at the last day (Su. 28). Paradise is a place of voluptuous enjoyment, a land watered by most limpid streams, and shaded by beautiful trees; the good who inhabit it are adorned with rings and bracelets, always have plenty to eat, and recline on magnificent couches; the region produces streams of sweet milk, the most generous of wines, and the purest of honey. But above all other joys, the houris are beautiful virgins, never deflowered by either men or devils, and are destined for the solace of the faithful (Su. 23, 28, 54, 57, 62, 65) (1). The wicked and unbelievers are to be tortured in everlasting fire (Su. 66). There is a Purgatory, and we should pray for the dead (Su. 29, 46). All living things came from one soul; men are derived from shade, demons from fire (Su. 15, 65) (2). Man is the victim of fate (Su. 50, 67). Adam fell, and hence came concupiscence into the world (Su. 30). The doctrines of the Koran are not to be disputed, and no proof is to be required of their truth; all questions about this book are to be left till the last day (Su. 9). The faithful are encouraged to battle for Islam; Paradise is only for the strong in war; those who fall in battle, are not said to die, but rather live in God (Su. 6); those who flee from the combat will be punished by eternal fire; especially against Christians should the true believers war; captives should be killed or reduced to slavery (1); the enemy who yields, is to be received into the faith; four out of the twelve months are to be devoted to war (Su. 6, 18, 19). Circumcision is commanded, but is not to be effected until the thirteenth year. A man may have several wives, according to his means, providing he is able to keep peace among them; wives may be repudiated or changed; one may not marry his sister, aunt, granddaughter, daughter-in-law, or two sisters (Su. 8, 9). An adulteress is to be imprisoned at home until death; a disobedient or sulky wife is to be whipped (Ibi). The word of an infidel has no value (Su. 6). The use of pork or of blood, and of wine, is prohibited (Su. 12, 3, 16). Frequent prayer, with the face turned towards Mecca, is enjoined; before it, if water is at hand, the face, neck, feet and hands, are to be washed; if there is no water, sand is to be used (Su. 3, 9). Friday is the special day for worship (Su. 72). Mohammed is more severe upon usury than are some Christian moralists (Su. 3). Revenge on an enemy is a sacred duty (Su. 60, 52). Once at least in his life every believer must make the pilgrimage to Mecca, unless prevented by absolute poverty (Su. 19). The religion founded by Mohammed (2), as Mosheim remarks (3) would have been somewhat different, had he met with no resistance in its propagation. The obstinacy of the Arabs in clinging to many of their ancient traditions, and the hope of attracting both Christians and Jews to his ranks, caused the impostor to tolerate much that was otherwise distasteful to him (4).

(1) Mohammed assigns a separate paradise to women, and it is remarkable that while he creates the houris for the delectation of men, he assigns no lovers to the gentle sex.

(2) Mohammed contradicts this doctrine in other places, saying that man was formed from the earth, and the demons from nothing.

It is not our province to enter upon a refutation of Mohammed's doctrines, but we may be allowed to draw the reader's attention to the following points: True religion is ordained for the contemplation of truth, and tends to the cultivation of purity of heart and to the leading of a good

(1) To the credit of Mohammed it must be admitted that though he warred for Islam, he showed no love for the use of torture. In this respect his successors were very different from him.

(2) Christians generally style this religion "Mohammedanism." The term is offensive to Moslem ears, and sounds to them very much as "Nazarenism" would to us. A Mussulman designates his faith as Islam, an Arabic word signifying "full submission to the will of God." Its formula, as announced by the muezzin from the minarets, is "Allah illah Allah: Mohammed resoul Allah"—"God is God: Mohammed is His prophet."

(3) Hist., 8th Cent., p. 1, c. 2, § 2.

(4) Le Noir rightly sums up the Mohammedan system as a tyranny of God over creatures, of man over woman, and of the strong over the weak. See his edition of Bergler's Dictionary for an excellent essay on this subject.

life ; while the spirit of Islam is of the earth, earthy, and tends merely to the brutal joys of lust and gluttony. True religion does not contradict itself, but the law of Mohammed is contradictory in nearly every one of its points. True religion is zealous for the majesty and dignity of God, while Islam attributes to Him many absurd, puerile and even wicked things. True religion does not use the art of lying as a means of propagation, while the Koran contains innumerable and shameless untruths (1). True religion does not oppose what it recognises as true and divine ; the Koran acknowledges the Gospel as true and divine, and yet opposes it most strenuously. True religion does not assert that God is the author of sin ; while Mohammed, by declaring that God created Satan out of a pestiferous fire (Su. 25), makes the demon evil by nature. From the very origin of Islam, there have not been wanting Christian authors to defend the truth against its attacks, but as the system was one which relied more upon the sword than upon argument for success, our writers generally confined themselves to the encouragement of the Christian peoples in resisting its inroads. However, there are many who combated it from a religious point of view. Thus, Pope Pius II. (1458-64) wrote a learned and elegant epistle to the Turkish sultan, Mohammed II. Cardinal Cusa dedicated to the same Pontiff three books entitled The Koran Sifted. The Greek Emperor, John Cantacuzene (d. 1400), wrote four Apologies for Christianity against the Mohammedans. The Dominican, Richard of Florence, gave an excellent Confutation of the Law of Mohammed. Cardinal Torquemada also wrote much on this matter. Among more modern writers, may be mentioned Guadagnolo, of the Minor Clerks ; Malvasia, of the Minors Conventual ; the Jesuits, Gonzalez and Luchesini ; and finally, the most satisfactory of all, Marracci, of the Congregation of the Mother of God. The reader may also consult with profit, Bergier, in his Dictionary : as also Cantù, passim, in his Universal History, and especially, in the Documents, art. Mohammed.

(1) In Sura 13, the Christians are said to adore Mary as a God. In Su. 15, Abraham is said to have been an idolater, and converted by studying the stars. In Su. 27, Mohammed calls upon God to witness that he was taken from Mecca to Jerusalem, and thence to Heaven, to receive a revelation. In Su. 47, he asserts that Christians attribute daughters, as well as a Son, to God.

The most casual reader of the Koran cannot fail to remark the gross ignorance displayed by its author. Geography, history, chronology, physics, and common sense, are equally ignored in his mixture of Talmud, Arabic romance, and Christian orthodoxy and heresy. Mohammed was not unconscious of his defects in matter of science, and he well knew that knowledge would be an enemy of his doctrine. Hence, he forbade his followers the study of letters and of philosophy, and for more than a century, this prohibition was strictly enforced (1); it was in accordance with this idea, that the caliphs burned the extensive library of Alexandria and all others they could reach. This hatred of science, on the part of the Arabian impostor, would seem, of itself, sufficient to preclude any possibility of sympathy from modern incredulists. Yet, so anxious are these gentry to apologize for everything not Christian, that they retort upon us by saying that Christ never made any profane studies, that His Apostles were ignorant, that the great St. Paul was an enemy of philosophy. They forget that Jesus had no need of study; that His Apostles were enlightened by the Holy Ghost, and that they successfully preached their doctrine before the most learned men of their day; that, as yet, infidelity has found no errors in their writings; that St. Paul was not hostile to true learning, but to that false philosophy which destroys the soul of man. It is sickening to be obliged to draw a comparison between Christianity and Islam, but the interests of truth compel us to the task. The opponents of Christianity are fond of asserting that the proofs for the divine origin of both religions are of the same kind; that a Christian cannot point to the wonderful propagation of his faith as indicative of its having come from God, since the spread of Islam was far more rapid, and nearly as extensive. In chap. 4, we have treated of the propagation of Christianity as a proof of its divinity; it is easy to show that rapid success, while it certainly can be predicated of Islam, cannot be adduced in favor of its claims to obedience.

(1) BRUCKER; History of Philosophy, v. 3.

We had occasion to remark, in chapter 4th, that in the age of Augustus it was as improbable, humanly speaking, that Christianity should escape destruction, as it was natural, among the Orientals, and at any time, that the law of Mohammed should be adopted by many. The Mohammedan system was conformable to the brutal instincts of depraved nature; therefore, humanly speaking, it ought to have prospered. Christianity, on the contrary, was diametrically opposed to the tendencies and genius of the age that witnessed its birth, and was a pronounced enemy of all that the carnal man held most dear; therefore, humanly speaking, it should have succumbed. To explain the propagation of Christianity, we must recur to the Providence of God; to explain that of Mohammedanism, the forces of nature are at hand, and furnish evident reasons by which to account for it. Christianity, therefore, rightly claims a divine origin, and hence, our obedience; Mohammedanism, however, plainly shows a human origin, and hence cannot demand our allegiance. And how different was the force against which Mohammed contended from that which was hurled against Christianity! In the days of the Arabian impostor, the Roman Empire was already tottering; in those of his successors, its military strength was contemptible. But in the early days of Christianity, Rome was at the zenith of her power, and it was all put forth against the rival of the state religion.

Few men have surpassed Mohammed in matter of luxury; still fewer have so impudently excused their turpitude. Not content with a plurality of wives, he arrogated to himself the right to take those of others; not content with the intercourse of his more mature slaves, he abused those of tender age. And he dared to justify these excesses as being expressly permitted him by God, composing, with that intent, the 33d and 36th chapters of the Koran. Although he prohibited promiscuous fornication to others, he wrote the 66th chapter to show that God allowed it to him. He was greedy, for he claimed for himself the fifth of all booty, and received bribes for judicial decisions; he even declared that God had given him the entire earth as his own. The very followers of Mohammed did not deny that, he was a hypocrite, perfidious, vindictive, and ambitious; they excused him for all, believing that in everything he was inspired by God (1). And this man is called the peer of Jesus Christ by certain of our infidels. Both were enthusiasts, it is said, both great religionists, both successful reformers, and the system founded by each is human.

The apologists of Mohammedanism admit that the false prophet gave no signs of a divine mission, that he not only performed no miracles, but that he declared he had not come for that purpose. To the people of Mecca, who demanded his divine credentials in the shape of a miracle, he replied that Moses and Jesus had worked them, and yet had converted but few; that miracles do not, of themselves, convince the mind. The followers of Mohammed, indeed, long after his death, attributed many miracles to him, but they are all unworthy of God, and are all unattested by eye-witnesses. Nor do enlightened Mussulmans lay any stress upon these alleged prodigies of the prophet; they cite only the rapid success of their religion as a proof of its divine origin. The miracles of Christ and His Apostles, on the contrary, are adduced by us as evidence of His divine mission; they are attested by eye-witnesses, and are admitted by Pagans as well as Christians; and finally, they are all worthy of God. But there is wanting in Islamism another sign of divine origin, which is possessed by Christianity, in an eminent degree, viz., a sound system of moral teaching. Although prescribing a multitude of external observances, such as purification before prayer, the pilgrimage to Mecca, circumcision, praying five times a day, alms-giving, the fast of the Ramadan (2); there is not a word of love of God and of our neighbor, of humility, of gratitude to God, etc. (3). Idolatry alone can exclude the Moslem from eternal happiness. Chastity is of no account, revenge is a duty, perjury is permissible. No law is more sacred to the

(1) MARRACCI, Preface to Koran, notes to Su. 66.

(2) During this fast, which lasts twenty-nine days, no one can taste food or drink during daylight. The fast is followed by three days of gluttony called the "Little Bairam."

(3) The angel Gabriel, disguised as a Bedouin, asked Mohammed, "Of what does Islam consist?" The prophet replied, "In professing one God, and me as his prophet; in observing the hours of prayer and the fast of the Ramadan; in alms-giving, and in the accomplishment of the pilgrimage to Mecca." And Gabriel answered, "Such it is."

Islamites than the following: "Fight the infidels until every false religion is annihilated; put them to death, sparing none" (1). Against the "infidel dogs" all injustices are not only permitted, but commanded, and wherever the law of Islam is untempered by fear of the "Frank," it is only by force of gold that the unbeliever can live in the land. And this is the moral code compared, to its advantage, with that of Christ, by certain modern writers. These authors carefully abstain from noting the baneful effects of Islamism. So thoroughly perverted is the imagination of a Mussulman, that he cannot realize the possibility of the least liberty of intercourse between the sexes, without crime as a consequence; hence, the captivity of women under the jailership of eunuchs. Some of our philosophasters make the climate responsible for this corruption. But has the climate changed since the time when Asia and Africa were Christian? In those days, the husband was not so diffident of the virtue of his wife as to keep her under lock and key. And how about Abyssinia, and other Christian communities which are afflicted with the same terribly demoralizing climate? They accord the weaker sex the same liberty that we practise, and with no evil results (2).

Perhaps the principal evil of Islamism, at least, the one which is most felt by Christians living in its midst, and by surrounding nations, is the doctrine of absolute predestination. Believing in remorseless fate, the Islamite does not take the same precautions that the Christian takes to ward off pestilence, famine, &c. The filth of Eastern cities, of most Eastern people in their persons, is too well known to need description. But no fear of plague can cause the Mussulman to forget that "What will be, will be; God is great" (3).

(1) Koran, Su. 8, v. 12 and 39; 9, v. 30; 47, v. 4.

(2) In Nubia, females are often nearly naked; sometimes, entirely so. Yet they are eminently modest and retiring.

(3) As we write these pages (1883), the European powers are said to be considering the propriety, or rather the necessity, of some regulation which will obviate the evils attendant upon the pilgrimages to Mecca, always a source of danger to the health of the world, on account of the filthy habits, enjoined by their law on these occasions, upon the devotees.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

THE PAULICIAN HERESY AND THE VENERATION OF THE CROSS.

About the middle of the seventh century, the Manicheans, who, since the days of Justin, had been severely repressed by the civil power, came to be known as Paulicians. The name was derived from one Paul, who, with his brother John, endeavored to revive the dying error of Manes at Samosata in Armenia. The successor of Paul, one Sylvanus, tried to reconcile his system with the language of Scripture, and always plentifully availed himself of the sacred books when teaching. Many, therefore, were led to believe that the resurrected Manicheism was pure and undiluted Christian doctrine. Schism soon broke the ranks of the Paulicians, and about 810 a bloody war occurred between the two factions of Sergius and Baanes; one Theodatus, however, succeeded in pacifying and uniting them. One of the distinguishing features of these sectarians was their opposition to all veneration of saints and their images, but especially to any veneration of the cross; a feature which won for them the friendship of the Mohammedan hordes, then being hurled over the imperial frontiers—in fact, the Iconoclast heresy of the eighth century was but a logical outcome of the sympathy between the Manicheans and the Islamites. The Paulicians and their descendants never wavered in their belief in the two Principles of Manes. They denied the divine maternity of Mary, but deluded the ignorant and simple by professing their belief in “the most holy Mother of God, into whom entered, and from whom came the Lord;” signifying, in their own minds, the heavenly Jerusalem, into which Christ opened an entrance for man. They denied Transubstantiation. They carried their aversion to any veneration of saints to an extravagant extreme, in the case of St. Peter the Apostle, asserting that his denial of Christ had damned him to hell. They held that it was right, in time of persecution, to dissimulate one's religion. The morals of the Paulicians, like those of all the Manicheans, were of a description that forbids mention (1).

We take the opportunity furnished by this notice of Paulicianism, to show the antiquity of the Catholic custom of venerating the Cross. Protestant authors insist that there is no vestige of our practice to be found in the records of the first three centuries (2). In the fourth and succeeding centuries the evidence of this veneration is so plain, that no Protestant writer of importance has ventured to impugn it. Were no other proof on hand than the reproach of Julian to the Christians of his day, it alone would suffice to show that, in the fourth century, the Cross was venerated more, perhaps, than it is in the nineteenth. "You adore," said the imperial apostate, "the wood of the Cross, you make a sign of it on the forehead, you cut it on the doors of your houses," and St. Cyril of Alexandria replies: "The Cross reminds us of Christ; we honor it because it reminds us that we should live for Him who died for us all" (3). But let us see whether the first three centuries furnish no proof that the early Christians venerated the Cross. Minutius Felix, towards the end of the second century, composed a Dialogue entitled Octavius, in which a Christian, Octavius, and a Pagan, Cæcilius, dispute on religious matters. In the course of the debate, Cæcilius says (chap. 9): "They who insist that the Christian worship consists in the adoration of a man punished for his crimes with death, and in the adoration of the fatal wood of the Cross, attribute to these wicked men altars worthy of them." And in chap. 12, he thus menaces the Christians: "There remain for you now, threats, tortures, crosses or gibbets, not for you to adore, but for you to be fastened upon them." And in chap. 29, Octavius replies: "You are far from the truth when you assert that we worship a criminal and his cross, when you think that we would regard as God a malefactor, or any mortal man. We neither desire nor honor gibbets, but you do make gods out of wood, and do adore, perhaps, crosses as portions of your gods." In this testimony of Minutius Felix, we observe that it was the opinion of the Pagan world of his time that the Christians venerated the Cross. Nor does the Christian apologist repel the charge; he simply denies that his co-religionists worship wood, as his adversary is wont to do. St. Justin, also of the second century, in his Apology, I., no. 55, says that the Cross is the most striking sign of the power of Christ, of His empire over the world; he recalls the words of Isaias, saying of the Messiah: "And the government is upon his shoulder," saying that here the Cross is signified. Tertullian writes, about the year 203: "In all our actions, when we enter or go out, when we put on our clothes, when we bathe, when we approach the table, when we go to bed, etc. . . . we sign the Cross upon our foreheads. This practice is not commanded by an express law of Scripture; but tradition teaches it, custom confirms it, and faith observes it" (1). Origen, writing about the year 226, says the same (2), and in another place he asks: "What do the demons fear? At what do they tremble? Without doubt at the Cross of Christ, on which they were defeated, on which their rule and power were overthrown. Fear and trembling come over them, when they behold the sign of the Cross confidently impressed upon us" (3).

(1) See CEDRENTUS; Compendium of Histories. EUTHYMIUS; Panoply, tit. 20.

(2) DAILLÉ; Worship of the Latins, Geneva, 1671, b. 5. (3) Against Julian, b. 6.

Claude of Turin, generally regarded by Protestants as one of their forerunners, used to object against our practice as follows: If every piece of wood, fashioned into a Cross, is to be venerated, because Christ hung upon a cross, then many other things must be venerated, which Catholics pass unnoticed. The Saviour was but six hours on the cross, while he was nine months in the womb of Mary; therefore, all young virgins should be venerated. So with cribs, for Christ lay in one; so with boats, for Christ slept on one; so with asses, for Christ rode on one; so with rocks, for Christ's body was laid in one; so with reeds, for Christ was beaten with them, etc. This argumentation is just about as logical as any adduced by the more modern of our adversaries. In this matter, just as in reference to his other errors the Tur-inese heretic was refuted by his contemporary, Jonas of Orleans (1). The reader will find every phase of this question admirably treated by Alexandre (2).

(1) Crown, c. 4.(2) On Ezekiel, c. 9.(3) Exodus, Hom. VI.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

THE ICONOCLAST HERESY, AND THE SEVENTH GENERAL COUNCIL.

From very early days war was often made upon the devotion of Catholics to holy images. Not only the Jews, but the Marcionites, Manicheans, and Theopaschites, misrepresented the Catholic doctrine on this subject, and endeavored to procure the banishment of all images from Christian temples. But the Iconoclasts (3) of the eighth century were the first to cause serious trouble in the Church because of image-veneration. The war was originated by the Jews of Arabia in the year 723. A certain influential Hebrew named Sarantapechys, addicted to magic, assured the caliph Jezid that he would have a long and happy reign, provided he would banish the images of Christ and His saints from his dominions. A decree to that effect was accordingly issued, and as the Christians refused to obey, it was forcibly executed by Jews and Mohammedans (4). Having succeeded so well in Arabia, the Jews now turned their attention to Constantinople (5), where Leo the Isaurian occupied the throne. This emperor was already, in a manner, bound to the Jews, for while he was yet an obscure soldier, two of their number had prophesied that he would mount the throne, and he had sworn to be counselled by them, if his ambition was gratified (6). When the people were informed of the edict of Leo, order-

(1) Veneration of Images, in Preface to Book II.

(2) Cent. VII. diss. 7.

(3) This word, meaning "image-breakers," is derived from the Greek words eikon (image) and klazein (to break).

(4) See the Relation of the monk John, vicar of the eastern bishops, read in the 7th Council.

(5) They were greatly aided by Constantine, bishop of Nacolia in Phrygia, whose impetuosity, during the persecution of Jezid, had led his diocesans to expel him, and who, coming to the capital, attained the favor of Leo.

(6) This we learn from the Greek historians, Cedrenus, Zonara and Constantine Manasses.

ing the removal of images from the churches, so fierce a tumult was excited among them, that the emperor thought it prudent to dissimulate. He accordingly declared: "I do not design that the images be altogether removed, but I order them to be placed in a more elevated situation, that they may not be kissed, and thus be treated with disrespect, while they are worthy of honor." St. Germanus, patriarch of Constantinople, used all his influence against the imperial innovations, but in vain (1). So great became the fury of the emperor against his Catholic opponents, that, in the year 726, he ordered the burning of the great library of the Imperial College, that he might destroy in its flames twelve of the professors, together with the rector, who would not join the Iconoclasts. By this horrible act were lost to the world 303,000 valuable volumes (2). There had been, for many years, over the Brazen Gate of the city, a statue of our Lord, and Leo ordered it to be removed. The people resisted with arms, and many of the imperial officers were killed; the women threw the agent of Iconoclasm from the ladder, after which they were themselves put to the sword. Executions and confiscations soon became the order of the day.

At this time the Pontifical chair was occupied by Gregory II., and the Isaurian deemed it prudent to request him to convoke a General Council to consider the image question. Among other things in reply, the Pontiff said: "You have asked that a General Council be called; such a thing seems to us to be useless. You are a persecutor of images, a contumelious enemy, and a destroyer; cease, and give us your silence; then the world will enjoy peace, and scandals be no more. Do you not know that this, your attempt against images, is a turbulent, insolent, and arrogant wickedness? While the churches of God are in peace, you fight, and raise hatred and scandal. Stop this, and be quiet; then will there be no need of a Synod." Leo went so far as to conspire against Pope Gregory. He sent emissaries to Rome with orders to destroy the statues of St. Peter, and to carry the Pontiff into exile, but the fidelity and affection of the

(1) Acts of St. Stephen the Younger, in works of St. John Damascene.

(2) See the Greek writers just quoted.

Romans frustrated his plans. With reference to this attempt, Gregory wrote: "If you insult us, and conspire against us, there is no need for us to descend to a contest with you. The Roman Pontiff will go out into the Campagna twenty-four stadia (1), and you may then come, and strike the winds." Gregory, however, tried to pacify the furious monarch, but he sent his legates into exile, where, as Pope Nicholas I. attests (2), they died. In the year 730, Leo determined to rid himself of the intrepid patriarch Germanus. Deposed from his throne, he was exiled and finally strangled, when nearly a hundred years of age (3). When Pope Gregory was informed of these events, he held a Synod at Rome, condemned the Iconoclasts, and excommunicated the Emperor Leo and the intruding patriarch Anastasius (4). In the year 731, Gregory II. was succeeded by a third Gregory in the See of Peter, and one of his first acts was to send a legate to Constantinople. So furious was the conduct of Leo at his reception, that the unfortunate man dared not deliver the Pontifical letters, and returning to Rome after his fruitless voyage, he owed his escape from degradation by the indignant Gregory to the prayers of the Italian bishops (5). A Synod of ninety-three bishops was held in 732 by Gregory III., in which was promulgated a Synodical Constitution, decreeing: "If any one hereafter, contemning ancient custom and the faithful practice of the Apostolic Church, shall prove himself a deposer and destroyer of, and a profaner and a blasphemer against, holy images, let him be foreign to the Body and Blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, and to the unity and society of the whole Church" (6). This decree was sent to Leo by the "Defender" Constantine, but the papers were torn up, and the legate imprisoned for a year. Notwithstanding this treatment, another legation was dispatched the following year, and this time the Roman Senate took care to remind

(1) The stadium was a distance of 625 feet. (2) Epistle to the Emperor Michael.

(3) This holy prelate was said by his contemporaries to possess the gift of prophecy. Once, while entering the imperial presence, his stole was trod upon by the emperor's chaucellor, Anastasius, and his own intruding successor. "Do not hurry," said Germanus, "the circus will wait for you." Fifteen years afterwards, Copronymus had the unworthy man flogged in the circus for treason.

(4) ADRIAN I. ; Epistle I. to Charlemagne.

(5) He also promised to prove more courageous on a second trial, but when Leo heard he was on his way, he had him stopped in Sicily.

(6) ANASTASIUS the Librarian, Life of Gregory III.

The Byzantine monarch of the necessity of being at peace with Rome, if he hoped to recover the Italian territories which the empire had lost. This embassy also met with insults, and the legates were detained for eight months. From this time until his death in 741, the fury of Leo towards the orthodox knew no bounds, and many martyrs succumbed to it.

With the advent of Constantine Copronymus (1) to the throne, the new heresy gained strength, for this prince forbade his subjects to call Mary the Mother of God, or to give to any martyr or confessor the title of saint. Hence it was that when Artabasdu, his brother-in-law, rebelled against Copronymus, the people gladly acclaimed him emperor (2). During the two years of his reign, Artabasdu restored the images, but in 744, Copronymus regained the throne, and Iconoclasm again triumphed. The Papal throne was at this time filled by St. Zachary, and he, in turn, endeavored to repress the rising heresy. When his legates arrived at Constantinople, the emperor was anxious about an ensuing campaign against the Saracens, and hence he received the embassy with respect, and dismissed it in hope. But when the war had successfully closed, he became more ardent in his hatred of images. He assembled, in 754, a pseudo-synod of 338 bishops, but took care not to invite or consult any of the patriarchs. On the last day of the conventicle, all the prelates went to the Blachernal church of the Virgin, where Copronymus himself ascended the pulpit, and proclaimed as universal patriarch of Constantinople, a certain Constantine, an heretical monk who had been bishop of Silæum in Pamphylia, but who, on account of crime, had been deprived of his see. The emperor and the new patriarch then proceeded to the Forum, and publicly proclaimed the heresy established in the pseudo-synod, and anathematized all the worshipers and defenders of images, especially Germanus of Constantinople, George of

(1) So called because at his baptism, which was performed by immersion, he had defiled the sacred font.

(2) Anastasius, the pseudo-patriarch, greatly inflamed the minds of men against Copronymus, after Artabasdu had succeeded, however, by swearing by the Holy Cross that he had said: "Do not think that Christ, whom Mary bore, was anything more than man; for Mary bore him, just as my mother bore me." This is learned from Cedrenus.

Cyprus, and John Damascene. The Definition of this Pseudo-Synod bears the title: "Definition of the Great, Holy and Universal Seventh Synod," and the legitimate Seventh General Council thus spurns the claim: "How can it be great and universal, when the bishops of the other churches have neither received it, nor agreed with it, but have anathematized it? It did not have the aid of the Roman Pope of the time, nor of the priests who are around him, either by his vicars, or by an Encyclical Epistle, as the Conciliary law requires. Neither was there the consent of the patriarchs of the East, that is, of Alexandria, Antioch, and the Holy City, nor of the co-ministers and high-priests who are with them. And how can it be the Seventh, when it does not agree with the preceding six holy and venerable Synods?" After the dissolution of his false Synod, Copronymus and his patriarch ordered the Blessed Eucharist to be brought forth, and then commanded the people to swear upon it that they would no more venerate images, but would execrate them as idols. The worthy emperor then perorated against the monastic system, for it happened that the monks were almost alone, among the clergy of the capital, in their repugnance to the imperial theology. He ordered that these "idolaters," whose cowl was a "vestment of darkness," should be stoned wherever met (1). Consistent in his monacophobia, he compelled his protege, the new patriarch, who had been a monk, to ascend the pulpit and declare that he threw off the cowl, that now he would wear a nuptial crown, that he would eat meat, that he would listen to sweet music at the imperial table, &c. But the poor man did not long enjoy all these, for having betrayed some of the blasphemies which Copronymus had privately uttered against Christ and His Mother, he was first exposed and flogged in the circus, and then decapitated (2). A Slavonic eunuch named Nicetas was then made patriarch. The rest of the reign of Copronymus was a continual horror. Few of the Pagan emperors equalled him in persecution of the faithful, and many of his prefects were worthy of their master. The prefect of Thrace, having collected all the monks and nuns in his jurisdiction, ordered them to be brought before him at Ephesus, and said: "Whoever of you desire to obey the emperor and me, let them put on these garments, and this very hour take spouses. All who refuse, shall have their eyes plucked out, and be transported to Cyprus." Many refused, and were martyred. This prefect was not satisfied with confiscating all the furniture of the monasteries and their churches, or with throwing the images and relics of the saints to the flames. All the works of the fathers, upon which he could lay hands, were also burned (1).

(1) Acts of St. Stephen the Younger.(2) Theophanes and Cedrenus.

In the year 767, Copronymus tried to win over King Pepin of the Franks to his heresy. Wishing also to obtain the restitution of the Exarchate of Ravenna, he offered his son Leo to a daughter of Pepin in marriage, and expressed his willingness to take the Exarchate in lieu of dowry. Lest the difference of religion should prove a bar to the match, he sent into France several of his accommodating bishops, that an examination might be had on the image question, and one also on the doctrine of the Procession of the Holy Ghost, about which the Greeks were complaining of the Occidentals. With the permission of the Holy See, as we know from an Epistle of Paul I. to Pepin, a Synod was held at Gentilly, near Paris. Eginhard, Ado of Vienne, Reginus, Aimoin, and the Annals of the Franks (Bertinian), speak of this meeting, but say nothing of its result. However, from the action of the French prelates in other Synods, we may suppose that the Iconoclast heresy was condemned, and the Procession of the Holy Ghost from the Father and the Son affirmed.

About this time, Cosmas of Alexandria, Theodore of Antioch, and Theodore of Jerusalem, held a Synod, composed of bishops of their patriarchates, from which a Synodical Epistle, condemning Iconoclasm, was sent to the Holy See. The document was delivered to the Anti-Pope, Constantine, whom Desiderius the Lombard had thrust into the Papal Chair. In 769, Pope Stephen III. held a Synod at Rome, in which, having nullified the acts of the Anti-Pope

(1) Ibi.

Constantine, the fathers condemned the Pseudo-Synod of Constantinople and its doctrine on images (1). In 775, Constantine Copronymus appeared before his Judge, and was succeeded by his son Leo. This monarch abstained from persecution for a while, but having discovered two sacred images in the possession of the Empress Irene, he renounced her society, and commenced a course similar to that of his father. But he died in 780, leaving the throne to his son Constantine, a boy of ten years, under the regency of Irene. One of Irene's first acts was the granting of permission to venerate images. In the year 784, the new patriarch, Tharasius, sent his Profession of Faith to Pope Adrian I., and begged him to call an Œcumenical Council. The Byzantine sovereigns also made this request, and urged the Pontiff to come himself, if possible, to preside. In 785, Pope Adrian sent a letter to the empress-regent, in which he urged her, if the images could not be everywhere immediately restored, to cause the rejection, at any rate, of the Acts of the Pseudo-Seventh Council. He also sent to Constantinople as his legates for the coming Council, Peter, archpriest of St. Peter's, and Peter, abbot of St. Saba's, but owing to the opposition of many of the imperial soldiery, the Council did not meet until the year 787 (2).

The Seventh General Council was held at Nice in Bithynia, and hence is sometimes called the Second Council of Nice. The first session was held on Sept. 24, and after seven sessions at Nice, the eighth and last was celebrated at the capital, for the convenience of the sovereigns, who wished to be present. There were in attendance 350 or 377 bishops. In the First Action, after the usual preliminaries, the fathers considered the cases of the bishops who had fallen into

(1) ANASTASIUS; Life of Stephen III.

(2) Theophanes and Cedrenus furnish us with an interesting account of an event which induced the Empress Irene to put an end, as far as she could, to Iconoclasm. In 784, Paul, then patriarch of Constantinople, being seriously ill, abdicated, and retired to a monastery. Irene was much grieved, and visiting him, asked the reason of his resignation. Weeping bitterly, Paul replied: "Would that I never sat on the episcopal throne of Constantinople, since this church of God is tyrannically governed, and being separated from the other sees, is devoted to misery and execration!" Much impressed, Irene sent to him several of the chief senators, to whom he said: "Unless you collect a General Council, and correct your errors, there is no salvation for you." They then asked him: "Why then, when you were made patriarch, did you promise, at your ordination, to never worship images?" Paul answered: "That is the cause of my tears: that has impelled me to repentance, begging God that He will not punish me as a Pontiff hitherto mute, and (solely through fear of you) not openly announcing the truth." Having said this, he expired.

heresy, especially of Basil of Ancyra, Theodore of Myra, and Theodore of Amorium, who made a solemn abjuration. In that of Basil, we read the following anathematisms: "To the calumniators of Christians, that is, to the image-breakers, anathema. To those who turn against the venerable images the Scriptural denunciations of idols, anathema. To those who do not salute the holy and venerable images, anathema. To those who compare the holy images with those of the gods, anathema. To those who assert that Christians treat the images as gods, anathema. To those who knowingly communicate with those who dishonor the venerable images, anathema. To those who say that any one else than Christ our Lord delivered us from idols, anathema. To those who spurn the teachings of the holy Fathers, and the Tradition of the Catholic Church, adopting the sayings of Arius, Nestorius, Eutyches, and Dioscorus, that unless we are taught by the Old Testament, we do not follow the doctrine of the Fathers nor the holy Synods, nor the Tradition of the Catholic Church, anathema (1). To those who say that the making of images is a diabolic invention, and not the Tradition of the holy fathers, anathema. To those who dare to assert that the Catholic Church has ever received idols, anathema." After the reading of these anathematisms, Basil and the two Theodores were received into the Council. Several other bishops, who had remained in heresy a long time, were remanded to another session.

In the Second Action, after the reading of the letters of Pope Adrian to the sovereigns and to Tharasius of Constantinople, the Papal legates said: "Let the most holy Tharasius, patriarch of the imperial city, tell us whether he consents or not to the Letters of the most holy Adrian, Pope of the elder Rome." Tharasius replied: "When the Apostle wrote to the Romans, approving of their zeal for the faith, he said: 'Your faith is spoken of in the whole world.' One must accept this testimony, and he who tries to resist it, acts unadvisedly. Hence, bishop Adrian of the elder Rome being one of those who merited to be strengthened by the aforesaid testimony, wrote expressly and truly to our pious sovereigns, and to our Humility, well asserting that he possessed the ancient Tradition of the Catholic Church. And we ourselves, searching the Scriptures, have syllogistically investigated; and what we have already avowed, we do avow and will avow, we consent to and confirm, and we will persevere in the meaning of the Letters which have been read, receiving images, according to the ancient Tradition of our fathers. And these we worship with an affectionate love, as being made in honor of Christ God, and of the inviolate Lady, the holy Mother of God, and of the Holy Angels, and of all the Saints, most clearly placing our faith and service in one only God." The Papal legates then asked the Council whether it received the letters of Adrian, and the fathers answered: "We follow, we receive, we admit." Then each bishop declared that he received the doctrine of respect to images, "according to the Synodical Letters of the most Blessed Adrian, Pope of the elder Rome" (1).

(1) This anathema was inserted because the Iconoclasts were fond of appealing to Scripture alone.

In the Third Action were read the invitations to the Council sent by Tharasius to the eastern patriarchs, and their excuses for not attending. These prelates give the following testimony to their belief in the authority of the Holy See: "It is to be carefully born in mind that no one of our bishops was present at the Sixth Holy Synod, because of the tyranny of the barbarians; but no prejudice accrued to the Synod on account of this fact, nor was it prevented from establishing and manifesting the right dogmas of truth; especially since the most Holy and Apostolic Roman Pope agreed with it, and was present through his legates. And now, most holy fathers, with the help of God, the same will happen. For if the faith of that Synod then resounded to the ends of the earth, so will be preached in every place under the sun that of the Synod now assembled, by the grace of God, and your intervention, and that of him who rules the See of the Prince of the Apostles.

(1) After the dissolution of the Synod, the patriarch Tharasius thus wrote to Pope Adrian, concerning the Pontifical Letters: "When we had all sat down, we made Christ our Head. For in the Holy See there was the Holy Gospel, teaching all the holy men who had met, 'Judge just judgments;' judge between the Holy Church and the novelties which have been introduced." And when the letters of your Fraternal Holiness were first read, all were awaiting them as spiritual food in the royal supper which Christ was preparing, through your Letters, for the banqueters."

In the Fourth Action were read many passages from the ancient fathers, approving the use of images. Then were read the Epistle of Pope Gregory III. to Germanus of Constantinople, and several letters of Germanus. New anathemas were pronounced on the Iconoclasts, and a Profession of Faith was signed by all the bishops. The Papal legates subscribed first, then Tharasius, then the vicars of the other patriarchs, finally the bishops.

In the Fifth Action, it was shown that the Iconoclast errors were derived from the Jews, Saracens, and Manicheans. The Papal legates issued the following decree: "To the most Holy Tharasius, Patriarch of Constantinople, the new Rome: We, Peter, Archpriest of the most holy Church of the Holy and praiseworthy Apostle Peter, and Peter, Priest and Abbot of the Monastery of St. Saba; both holding the place of Adrian, Pope of the elder Rome; do deem it proper, according to the opinion of all of us, yea, according to the ancient tradition of the Catholic Church, as all the holy fathers teach us, that there be brought among us an image to be revered, and that we do salute it And we suggest another Chapter: that all signatures, which have been given against venerable images, be anathematized or given to the flames." The Holy Synod answered: "Let it be brought; let it be so done."

In the Sixth Action, the Iconoclast Definition of the Pseudo-Seventh Synod was read, and condemned, chapter by chapter. On their arrival at a passage where it was asserted that only one image should be venerated, namely, that in which the Saviour placed Himself under the appearances of bread and wine, the fathers declared that this form of expression was foreign to the doctrine of the Catholic Church. For, although the fathers have called the bread and wine figures of the Body and Blood of Christ, this saying was meant in regard to them, as they are before the consecration; after the consecration, they are not an image, but really the Body and Blood of the Lord. The faith of the Iconoclasts in the Real Presence was sound, however, as can be shown by the context of the Definition, and by the very reasons they alleged for calling the Eucharist the only image of Christ (1). The following are the passages which some Protestant authors adduce as showing that the Iconoclasts denied Transubstantiation: "Let those rejoice and exult, and confidently act, who, with sincere souls, make the true image of Christ, and desire and worship it, and offer it for the salvation of body and soul; the one which the most holy Immolator and our God. . . . gave to His ministers as a figure and memorial of His own passion. For when He was about to deliver Himself up to a memorable and life-giving death, He blessed the bread which he had taken, and giving thanks, He broke it, and giving it, said: 'Take and eat ye this, in the remission of sins; this is My Body.' And in like manner, giving the chalice, He said: 'This is My Blood; do this in commemoration of Me.' As though, under heaven, there was no other figure or form He could choose to represent, like an image, His Incarnation." But in these words, the Iconoclasts do not call the Eucharist a mere image. They regarded the species of bread and wine as an image of Christ, when visibly and externally considered; but they also believed that the Eucharist was the substance of the Body of Christ, when considered intrinsically and as to its invisible nature; when, that is, it is an object of faith, not of the senses. For, immediately after the quoted words, they say: "As we have said, the Lord Jesus so operated that as He deified the Flesh He assumed, by its very union, with a sanctification as to nature, so He wished the Eucharistic bread, by the advent of the holy Spirit to be sanctified as a true image of His natural Flesh, to be made the Divine Body, by means of the priest, who separating the oblation from the common (kind), causes it to attain sanctification." As the Seventh Council said (2), the Iconoclasts, "dismissing what was false, touched the truth somewhat, when they said: 'to be made the Divine Body.' If it is only the image of the Body, it cannot be the Divine Body." But not only does the context of the objected passage show the faith of the Iconoclasts in the Real Presence; the same is proved by the very reasons they assign for styling the Eucharist an image.

(1) See Alexandre's Dissert. IV., Cent. 8.

(2) Refutation of the Pseudo 7th Synod, by Epiphanius the Deacon, read to and approved by the 7th Council. Action 6.

Alexandre thus describes their ratiocination : “ Every image which represents the Human Nature of Christ, separate from the Deity, favors the heresy of Nestorius, which divides the Natures, and introduces an addition of Person. But every image of Christ represents the Human Nature separate from the Deity, for the uncircumscribed Deity cannot be pictured. Hence it is sacrilegious to make such an image. Besides, they said, an external image, which is a thing subsisting by itself, cannot represent its prototype, unless as also by itself subsisting. But the Human Nature of Christ does not subsist by itself ; it is sustained by the Person of the Word. It therefore cannot be represented, unless by an image of the same condition, that is, which does not subsist in itself, but is sustained by the substance of the Son of God, to which it is personally united. Now the only image of Christ, of this kind, is the Eucharist. No other image therefore must be made or revered. And indeed, in their Definition, the Iconoclast synodals say : “ As that which He took from us is the matter alone of a human substance, perfect throughout, not properly figuring a subsisting person, in order that no addition of person may accrue to the Divinity ; so He ordered to be offered, the image, that is, the principal matter, the substance of bread, not figuring the form of man, lest idolatry might be introduced. And as the Flesh of the Lord, endowed, according to nature, with a mind, is anointed by the Holy Ghost with the Divinity, so the divinely-given image of His Flesh, that is, the Divine Bread, is filled with the Holy Ghost, as also the Chalice, holding the life Blood from His side. This, therefore, is shown to be the true image of the dispensation, which was made in the Flesh of Christ our God, which He, the true Vivifier and Former of nature, gave to us with His own voice.” The reasoning of the Iconoclasts was captious in the extreme, for although the image of a living man does not represent his soul, unless by implication, yet it by no means figures a body separated from its soul. Just so an image of Christ, though it does not, and cannot, figure the uncircumscribed Deity to our senses, yet it does not represent the human nature of our Lord separated from the Divine. That the Iconoclasts held the doctrine of the Real Presence, is also evident from the absence of any rebuke on this point in the writings of the fathers who took up the pen against them. The faith of the Church at that time, in this matter, was just what it always was, and is to-day. The reader will pardon us, if we are leaving our province, to adduce the following passage of St. John Damascene (1): "How shall this be done unto me, said the Holy Virgin, when I do not know man? The Archangel Gabriel replied: The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the Most High shall overshadow thee. And do you now also ask how the bread and wine, joined with water, become the Body and Blood of Christ? I answer you: The Holy Ghost comes, and effects that which exceeds the faculty of prayer and the understanding of the mind. Certainly, the Body truly united to the Divinity is that Body which was born of the Holy Virgin; not that the Body descended from heaven, but because the bread and wine are changed into the Body and Blood of God. If you ask how this is done, let it be enough for you to hear that it is done by the Holy Ghost, just as, through the Holy Ghost, the Lord made, from the Holy Mother of God, Flesh for Himself and in Himself. Nor is anything plainer to us than that the word of God is true, efficacious, and omnipotent; the manner is such that no reason can penetrate it. But it would not be futile to say that as bread, in food, and wine and water, in drink, are changed into the body and blood of the receiver, and are made into another body, so the bread and wine and water of Proposition are changed, by the invocation and coming of the Holy Ghost, into the Body and Blood of Christ; nor are they two, but one and the same Nor are the bread and wine a figure of the Body and Blood of Christ, but the very Body itself of the Lord, joined to his Divinity, for the Lord Himself said: 'This is' not a figure of, but, 'My Body'; not a figure of, but, 'My Blood.'"

In the Seventh Action was issued a Definition of Faith receiving and confirming the previous six Œcumenical Councils. It was then decreed that 'the figure of the life-giving cross, and the venerable and holy images, both painted and of stone, or of other proper material, should be set up in the churches, and put on the sacred vessels and vestments, on the walls and tables, in houses and along the streets: that is, the image of our Lord God and Saviour Jesus Christ, and of our inviolate Lady, the Holy Mother of God, and of the honorable angels, and of all the saints." It was declared that the souls of the faithful are excited, by the use of images, "to a remembrance of their prototypes, to a desire (to imitate them), and to give them a respectful devotion; not, however, to a true worship (latría), which is due to the Divine Nature alone; so that the homage of incense and lights should be extended to them, just as to the precious and life-giving cross and to the holy gospels, and other sacred objects, as was the pious custom of the ancients. For the honor paid to an image is shown to the original."

(1) Orthodox Faith, b. 3, c. 14. The Damascene is ranked by the Greeks with Peter Lombard and St. Thomas of Aquin. He died about 760.

The Seventh General Council edited twenty-two Canons for the restoration of ecclesiastical discipline, which had become somewhat relaxed during the Iconoclast troubles. The 1st Canon confirms the ancient ones, viz., the Apostolic, and those of the six preceding Œcumenical Councils. This Canon was not confirmed by the Holy See, because the Pontiffs always refused to recognize other than a certain number of the so-called Apostolic Canons (1). Again, the See of Rome always rejected the Constantinopolitan Canons, the 28th of Chalcedon, and the Trullan. The 2d Canon decrees that no one can be made a bishop who has not the Psalter by memory, and who is not thoroughly versed in the Scriptures. The 3d condemns the choosing of bishops, priests, and deacons by princes. The 4th prohibits bishops from receiving money or any kind of presents from their clergy, "because the children should not gather riches for he parents, but the parents for the children." The 7th Canon ordered that in all churches which had been dedicated, during the Iconoclast troubles, without the usual deposit of sacred relics, a remedy of the defect should at once be supplied; and commanded also that, hereafter, any bishop who would presume to dedicate a church without the use of relics, should be deposed. The 11th Canon decreed the appointment, in every church and monastery, of a steward or administrator. The 12th Canon deposed any bishop or abbot who would in any way alienate the revenues of ecclesiastical property. The 17th Canon forbade the erection of any church or ecclesiastical edifice, the money for which had not been certainly provided. The other Canons are of minor importance.

(1) The Holy See received the first 50 of these Canons, excepting the 46th and 47th, on the Baptism of Heretics, as was decreed by Stephen III., in Syn. Lat., act. 4, and by Urban II. in Epistle 17, given by Gratian, Dist. 32.

In previous chapters we have been obliged to defend the authority of the Roman Pontiffs over General Councils, from the attacks of those who contend that, in several instances, the bishops of the Universal Church, in General Council assembled, have subjected the Dogmatic Epistles of the Popes to a juridical examination. Now, just as in the case of the letters of Cælestine I. to the General Council of Ephesus, and in that of the Letter of Leo the Great to Flavian, read in the Council of Chalcedon, so in the case of the Letters of Adrian I. to the patriarch Tharasius, and to the sovereigns Irene and Constantine, writers of the Gallican school have insisted that the fathers of the Seventh Council submitted them to Synodical scrutiny and judicial criticism, before finally accepting them. As in previous instances, so here we have as opponents the Author of the Defence of the Declaration of the French Clergy in 1682 (1), and the learned Cardinal de

(1) With regard to this Defence, generally ascribed to the great Bossuet, the reader will please note the following remarks of the Marquis Maffei (Literary Observations, v. 5, p. 4): "Why did he (Bossuet) wait so long, before publishing this book? Why did he not, at least when dying, advise its publication? It would seem, either that he had not yet perfected it, or that he was not so well pleased with it as with his other books. That it has been interpolated by another hand, many suspect, from the fact that it remained hidden for 26 years after his death (and it was written 22 years before he died), being published only in 1730, when an angry faction was trying, by every art, not only to restrict, but to annihilate the Pontifical power. Are we to believe that Bossuet wrote the 12th chapter of this book, where he himself is so praised, and in which his Exposition of Faith is so exalted? How can we ascribe certain sentiments of this book to the prelate who, in a discourse to the Assembly of the Clergy in 1682, used this language: 'Let it not be said that the ministry of St. Peter ended with himself; that cannot end, which has to sustain an eternal Church. Peter will always speak in his See, as was declared by 600 bishops in the Council of Chalcedon. The Roman Church, taught by St. Peter, and by his successors, knows no heresy; she is ever a virgin, and the Roman faith is that of the Church.' With these sentiments accords badly the saying that the bishops have the right of judging, in first instance, of questions of faith, and that, when afterwards the matter is brought before the Pope, and he sends his decision straight to the bishops, they can, even without another Council, see whether it is proper, and approve or reject it, as they deem fit. For, if such is the case, if both the first and last sentence belong to the bishops, what remains for the Pope? If his Definition is to be thus treated, his authority is no greater than that of some curate or private doctor, whose opinion might be asked. We cannot understand how such a sentiment could come from an author who, in this very work, teaches that, according to the ancient maxims, serious causes of religion should, from every part of the Catholic world, be taken to Rome, and that every Christian Church owes obedience to the Roman Pontiff. In fine, in reference to some passages of this work, we might say what the learned Archbishop of Embrun, M^{onsieur} Tencin (afterwards Cardinal), said in regard to another: 'The la Luzerne. We have seen that in the 2d Action of the Seventh Council, the Papal legates demanded of the patriarch Tharasius whether he accepted the letters of Pope Adrian. From the answer of the patriarch, our opponents gather that he assented to the doctrine taught in those letters, not because of the authority of the writer, but simply because of the respect due to the utterances of a Church which had been so highly praised by St. Paul. The legates then asked of the fathers of the Council, "whether, or not, they accepted the Letters" of Adrian. In the phrase, "or not," says La Luzerne, lies the proof that the decree of the Pontiff was not regarded as irreformable. In reference to the mind of Tharasius when he answered the legates, his own words to Pope Adrian show that he respected, in the person of the Pontiff, the teaching authority of the Church. "When we had all sat down," he says, "we made Christ our head. For in the Holy See there was the Holy Gospel, teaching all the holy men who had met: 'Judge just judgments;' judge between the holy Church and the novelties which have been introduced. And when the Letters of your Fraternal Holiness were first read, all were awaiting them as spiritual food in the royal supper which Christ was preparing, through your Letters, for the banqueters, and in which, like an eye, you manifested the whole body of rectitude and the way of truth. Thus therefore the separated members were joined together, thus true constancy was confirmed, thus the Catholic Church acquired unity." Tharasius furnishes, in his reply to the legates, no argument for our adversaries, unless they are willing to admit that he thought he was free to differ from a Definition of Faith made by a General Council. For, just as he said he had syllogistically examined into the agreement of the Pontiff's Letter with the Scriptures and the teachings of the Fathers, so, although anathema had been pronounced against the Iconoclasts in the 2d Action, nevertheless, in the 4th, Tharasius persuaded the bishops to adduce in favor of their teaching the passages of Scripture posthumous works of Monsig. Bossuet can never have the authority of those published by himself. The posthumous ones appear to have been written in order to make the author contradict himself; so much so, that if Bossuet is the author, we may believe, either that he did not deem them worthy of the light, or that he did not revise them with that care, which made his pen formidable to heretics."

and sayings of the fathers which militated against the errors already condemned. This he did, not that the condemnation needed any corroboration, but, as he explained, "that by drawing from them (the Scriptures and Tradition), we may each give drink to the flocks committed to our care. Thus our voice will go into every land, and the strength of our words to the ends of the earth." We may also observe with Palma (1), that our adversaries should show that the bishops of the Seventh Council juridically examined the Letters of Adrian before they accepted them: "And even though we grant, which cannot be concluded from the words of Tharasius, that he only assented to the Letters of Adrian because the never-failing faith of Christ is in the succession of the Roman Pontiffs, and not because the definitions of each Pope, in matters of faith and morals, are infallible; yet the testimony of Tharasius would not show that the Council really examined the letters of Adrian."

In further illustration of our position, we would notice the Letters written by Pope Adrian before the Council, which certainly show that he regarded Iconoclasm as already condemned by himself, and that he wished the Council merely to carry his sentence into execution. We shall then look into the action of the bishops on the matter. In his first Epistle to the sovereigns, the Pontiff says of St. Peter: "He then, who was so pre-eminently honored, was worthy to confess the faith upon which is founded the Church of Christ. The blessing of reward followed the blessing of the confession, the preaching of which illuminated the Holy Universal Church For the very Prince of the Apostles, Blessed Peter, who first sat in the Apostolic See, left the principality of the Apostolate and of pastoral care to his successors, who are ever to sit in that Most Holy See; and to them he left, by divine command, the power of authority, just as it had been given to him by the Lord God our Saviour. According to the Tradition handed down by them, we ought to venerate the sacred image of Christ, that of His most holy Mother, and those of the Apostles and of all the saints I demand, and

(1) Lectures, c. 75.

I adjure you, that you order the same sacred images to be restored as of old in your imperial and God-preserved city, and throughout all the Greek dominions : observing the Tradition of this our most holy Roman Church, rejecting and spurning the wiles of the heretical and the impious, that you may be received in the embraces of this our Holy, Catholic, Apostolic, and irreprehensible Roman Church." It is evident then that the Pontiff ordered the restoration of all the images before the holding of the Council ; he styles as heretics those who refuse to obey ; which certainly does not indicate, on his part, a willingness to subject his Letters to a Synodical examination. And he finally commands that the Pseudo-Seventh Council shall be immediately condemned, in the presence of his legates. In his Epistle to the patriarch Tharasius, Pope Adrian explicitly declares that if his commands are not obeyed, the patriarch will be deprived of his throne. Here therefore is another instance, to be joined with those we have, on other occasions, adduced, of a Roman Pontiff prescribing what shall be done in an Œcumenical Council, and of his regarding as irreformable that which he has already decreed in the premises. And how did the Seventh Council receive these Pontifical injunctions ? By obeying them, and without any previous inquisition into their authoritativeness or their orthodoxy. In the very first Action, it was ordered that the Iconoclast bishops should be received by the Council only as heretics, or as persons abjuring heresy, and they were commanded to proffer certain anathematisms against their former errors and against the Pseudo-Council. This is shown by the Confession of Faith of Basil of Ancyra, read in the 1st Action : " I reject, and with my whole heart anathematize the Synod called the Seventh, which was convoked in obstinacy and in madness." And shortly after, he declared : " Anathema to the calumniators of Christians, that is, to the image-breakers." And in the Confession of Theodore of Ammorium, was pronounced : " Anathema to those who do not revere the venerable images anathema to all who hesitate, and do not heartily declare that they venerate the holy images." It is evident therefore that the Fathers of the Seventh Council, not only did not think that the Letters of Pope Adrian were to be juridically examined, but that they regarded it as their first duty to obey his orders, and to receive his doctrine.

At the conclusion of the Seventh General Council, the Holy See received a copy of its Acts, and a letter from the sovereigns Irene and Constantine, requesting their confirmation. Pope Adrian ordered the Acts to be translated into Latin, and to be deposited in the Pontifical Archives, but postponed the confirmation to a later date. His wish was to send a copy of the Latin version of these Acts to the French churches, that they might receive the attention of the many learned men who graced the court of Charlemagne. This laudable design of the Pontiff was the occasion of considerable trouble, and has given rise to a dispute as to the opinions of the French and German bishops of that day, in regard to the veneration of images. It happened that the party to whom had been committed the task of translating the Acts of the Seventh Council, so misrepresented the teachings of the members of that Synod, that, upon reading his version, the French bishops were led to believe that they were called upon to give to images an excessive, and even idolatrous, devotion. Hence it was that, about the year 790, there was issued a work, under the name of Charlemagne, which severely attacked the Seventh Council. This work, being composed of four books, and purporting to be by Charlemagne, is known by the name of the Caroline Books. In consequence, also, of this false idea of the meaning of the Seventh Council, its decree on image-veneration was condemned by a Synod of French and German bishops, held at Frankfort in 794. Protestant writers have seized upon the Caroline Books and the decrees of the Synod of Frankfort, as evidence of the Iconoclast belief of the French and German churches in the eighth century. Some Catholic authors, on the contrary, have ascribed the Caroline Books to a heretic of the time of Charlemagne, while others, also Catholic, have thought the author to have been a heretic of the 16th century (1). It can be shown,

(1) Alexandre, in his Diss. 6, Cent. 8, proves, against Surius and Bellarmine, that these Books were written either by Charlemagne, or by his order. He argues, firstly, from the Preface, where the author speaks of "his father, king Pepin." Secondly, from a Synod of

however, that the author of the Caroline Books was no Iconoclast; that he rejected the Seventh Council's decree because he falsely, or rather, mistakenly, supposed that the worship of Latria, due to God alone, had been authorized, by that Synod, as appropriate to images. The reader must know that Charlemagne and his compatriots were, about that time, so disposed in mind towards the Byzantine court, as to be ready to believe that its fickleness and levity were capable of any extravagance. During the early days of her regency, the Empress Irene had asked of Charlemagne the hand of his daughter Rotrude for her son Constantine; the offer had been accepted, and oaths of fidelity interchanged. But in 788, Irene changed her mind, and compelled Constantine, then in his eighteenth year, to marry an Armenian princess. Such a slight was not easily to be forgotten, nor were its perpetrators likely to be charitably regarded (1). When therefore it was reported that the "Synod of the Greeks" had encouraged idolatry, personal pique led Charlemagne to lend a facile ear to the rumor. In these circumstances were issued the Caroline Books. The French bishops were greatly influenced by the Latin version of a saying of Constantine, a Cyprian bishop, which appeared, in the reports of the Seventh Council received by them, couched in these terms: "I receive and honorably embrace the sacred and venerable images, according to the service of adoration which I give to the consubstantial and life-giving Trinity; and I separate from the Holy Catholic and Apostolic Church, and subject to anathema, those who do not thus think" (2). The word "adoration," so susceptible of various meanings, and several weak arguments, used by the Seventh Synod, which, by the way, was not yet regarded as Œcumen-

Paris, under Louis the Debonnaire, speaking of Charlemagne as the author. Thirdly, from Hincmar of Rheims, citing verbally the 28th Chapter of Book 4, and ascribing it to the same emperor. Fourthly, from the Vatican MSS., bearing the name of Charlemagne.

(1) In after years, ambition led Charlemagne to pocket this affront. In 802, he vainly offered Irene his own hand, that he might unite the Eastern and Western Empires. Irene was willing, but her courtiers were not.

(2) In the original Greek Acts, the saying of bishop Constantine reads very differently: "I receive and honor the holy images, but I give only to the Supreme Trinity the adoration of worship (latria)."
Pope Adrian, in his Apologetic Epistle to Charlemagne, explains the strong expressions of this prelate, just converted from Iconoclasm, by his natural wish to remove any doubts as to his orthodoxy. For the rest, says the Pontiff, the Council well understood the sense of his emphatic words. See chap. 9 of the Epistle.

ical, not having been confirmed by the Roman Pontiff, all joined to the sentence of the Cyprian bishop, and his own political prejudices, induced the Carolinian author to reject the Seventh Council's decree as he understood it. But it is evident that he did not reject the veneration of images, as it is understood and encouraged by the Catholic Church. In Book I., c. 2, we certainly read: "But in images, made by the labor of artists, which often excite admiration in the spectator, on account of the remembrance of deeds done, but always draw the worshiper into error; for it is not a slight error to adore, with the service of religion, other than Him who said: 'The Lord thy God thou shalt adore, and Him alone shalt thou serve.'" But we also read, in Book II., c. 31, while the author is comparing the legitimate with the pretended Seventh Council. "The one despised and removed the images forever from the churches; the other, not only decreed that they should be retained, but commanded that they should be suppliantly adored. The one threw them to the flames; the other honors them with incense. The one refused even to look upon them; the other would not cease to embrace them. The one dug away the ornaments of the ancient walls; the other honors them, newly restored, with offered lights. The one wished them to be abominated; the other allows them to be kissed. The one anathematized their possessors; the other those who do not adore them. Now since these two evils are contrary, and both far from the truth, let us take the royal path, walking, according to the Apostle, neither to the right nor to the left; not removing the images, according to the one, nor adoring them, with the other; but adoring God alone, and venerating His saints, according to the ancient Tradition of the Fathers and of the Church, keeping the images, if we wish, in the churches, as ornaments and memorials of deeds done." Under all this ill-disguised petulance, and aversion for the "Synod of the Greeks," the Carolinian author betrays no un-Catholic doctrine concerning images. The word "adoration" alone offends his ears, just as it offends our Protestant friends. He must have known the difference, however, between the adoration of latría (supreme worship) and that of dulia (inferior worship), and we are perforce of opinion that his Græcophobia was, for the moment, too violent to admit of the exercise of theological acumen or of common sense (1). But with all his repugnance to the use of the word "adoration" in connection with images, the question with him is really rather one of degree, than of the thing itself. It is certain that the early Gallic Church sanctioned the veneration of images (2), although it seems to have objected to the more ardent practices of the Orientals, such as genuflections before them, kisses, incensations, and burning of lights. The French clergy were much displeased with the Seventh Council for pronouncing anathema against those who would not give positive respect to images: "If any one does not salute the images in the name of the Lord and of His saints, let him be anathema;" nor did they relish the denunciation as "half-wicked," made by Epiphanius the Deacon in the 6th Action, of those who thought it sufficient to simply retain, but not honor, the images. Placed therefore between the two Definitions, that of the Copronymian Synod, and that of the 7th Council, not yet confirmed, they decided to take the middle path of neither rejecting nor adoring the images (3). We may also observe, finally, that the mind of the French clergy could not have been averse to all image-worship, since twelve of their most learned prelates had assisted at the Roman Synod held by Pope Stephen IV., and had sanctioned the same devotion (4); moreover, in the Synod held under Pepin at Gentilly, in the presence of the legates of the Byzantine emperor, the French prelates had distinctly condemned Iconoclasm.

(1) The tone of this author is prejudiced throughout his book. In fact, he is so addicted to carping, that his sincerity appears doubtful. He ridicules Irene and Constantine because, in accordance with the inflated style long in vogue at Constantinople, they call their mis-sives "Divine;" and because they say: "God has chosen us, who truly seek His glory." He finds fault with their phrase, "Through God, who reigns with us." He laughs at the Seventh Council, as having a woman, Irene, for a teacher. We say that the Carolinian author must have known the distinction made by the fathers, at least from the 4th century, as the Calvinist Daillé himself admits, between the adoration (supreme) of latría and that (relative) of dulia. The French clergy of his time, reinforced by the extensive immigration of the learned monks of Ireland, were more cultured by far than the Byzantine, and even these latter were familiar with the distinction. Originally, and in the grammatical sense, the terms latría and dulia were synonymous, but by their adoption into the theological vocabulary, they acquired different meanings.

(2) St. Gregory of Tours (b. 544), in his Glory of the Martyrs, b. 1, c. 23, speaks of a vision in which Christ ordered that his pictures should not present His figure in an uncovered state. Pope St. Gregory the Great rebuked Serenus of Marseilles for removing images from his churches. "It is one thing," said he (Book 7, cp. 111) "to worship a picture, another to learn from it what is to be adored prohibit not the use of images, but only their worship."

(3) Caroline Books, b. 2, c. 3.

(4) Anastasius the Librarian, Life of Stephen IV.

We now approach an event which Protestant authors, following in the footsteps of the celebrated Calvinist Daillé, have endeavored to present as another excellent argument against the antiquity of our devotion to images. In the year 794, Charlemagne caused to be held at Frankfort-on-Main, a Synod of about three hundred bishops, convened from Italy, France, and Germany, to consider the doctrine of Elipand and Felix, two Spanish prelates, who taught that Christ, according to his Humanity, was only the adoptive Son of God. At this Synod two Papal legates, the bishops Theophylactus and Stephen, were present in the name of Adrian I. After the condemnation of Elipand (of Toledo) and Felix (of Urgel), the Synod took up the question of images, and in its 2d Canon decreed: "There was brought before the fathers a question about the late (nova) Synod of the Greeks, held at Constantinople on the adoration of images, in which it was written that those should be anathematized who would not give service or adoration to images, as to the life-giving Trinity. Our holy fathers, refusing, in every way, such service and adoration, despised and condemned those who consented to it." In answer to this objection, Petau (1) replies that the bishops of Frankfort condemned, not the 7th Synod itself, but the strong expressions of Constantine of Cyprus, which they regarded, according to their badly translated copy of the Acts, as sanctioning the supreme service of latria to images. It is certain, however, that the bishops of Nice embraced the opinions of the Cyprian prelate; therefore, the reply of Petau is not satisfactory. Vasquez, Suarez, Bini, and others, give a no less dissatisfactory answer, one indeed, which is to be absolutely rejected. They contend that the Synod of Frankfort, when editing the above canon, had in mind, not the Seventh Council which restored image worship, but the Copronymian Pseudo-Synod, which abolished it. The 2d Canon of Frankfort, say these writers, condemns the Synod "held at Constantinople;" but the legitimate 7th Council was held at Nice; therefore, the latter was not condemned at Frankfort. But we must remember that the 7th Council was convoked for, and met at Constantinople, and would have there held its sessions, had it not been for the mutinous Iconoclast soldiery, fear of whom caused a removal to Nice; and that the last session of the Council was really held in the capital, that the sovereigns might be present. Hence, the bishops of Frankfort might quite naturally speak of the Seventh Council as a "Synod held at Constantinople." Again, the Frankfort prelates condemned "the late" Synod; now, while their term might well be applied to a Council celebrated only seven years before, as was the Seventh Council, it would scarcely be used in regard to one held forty years before, as was the Copronymian conventicle. Finally, the Synod of Frankfort distinctly asserts that it condemns and spurns those who consented to the giving of adoration to images; but of the two Synods in question, the Seventh Council alone answers to this description. It is clear then that another answer than that of Suarez, etc., must be given to Daillé and his imitators, alleging the authority of the Synod of Frankfort against the practice of devotion to images.

(1) Incarnation, b. 15, c. 13.

We must admit that the Synod of Frankfort rejected the decree of the Seventh Council; but we contend, with Baronio, Bellarmine, and Du Perron, that it was under a false impression with regard to the meaning of that decree; that, in fine, the Frankfort prelates, just like the author of the Caroline Books, did not condemn the doctrine of image-worship, as it is understood and taught by the Catholic Church, but merely the doctrine which would accord to images the supreme adoration of latría, which doctrine is condemned by the Church herself. This is evident from the words of the 2d Canon. In fact, the Profession of Faith, pronounced by Constantine of Cyprus in the Seventh Council, had been so abominably distorted by the incompetent translator, that it is no wonder that the indignation of the Frankfort prelates was excited against the Synod that received it (1). He is made to say: "I receive and honor-

(1) Anastasius the Librarian, who, by order of Pope John VIII., made a new version of these Acts, says of the translation which caused such trouble: "At nearly every step the translator ignored the idioms of each language, so that what was really intended, seldom or never be understood. . . . for this reason, it is despised by nearly all."

ably embrace the holy images, according to the service of adoration, which I give to the consubstantial and life-giving Trinity." Now, in the Greek text, the words "I receive and honorably embrace the holy images" are given in participles, and depend on what goes before, so that the whole sentence should read: "I, although unworthy, consent to these, and am of the same opinion, receiving and honorably embracing the holy images." Then comes the next part of the sentence, asserting the kind of adoration to be given to the Blessed Trinity: "and the adoration which is according to latría, I give only to the consubstantial and life-giving Trinity." Had the prelates of Frankfort seen a correct version of this Profession, there would have been no ill-feeling against the Seventh Synod, for their doctrine on the image question was not different from that of Rome, as is evident from the fact that communion between the Holy See and the churches of France and Germany was not suspended, even for a day. Nor did the churches of France and Germany cease to communicate with the Greeks. This is certainly a proof that the former did not think that the latter had erred in dogma; that they only regarded the discipline, sanctioned at Nice, as likely to be abused by the ignorant, and hence a dangerous one to tolerate. Indeed, the prelates of Frankfort did not condemn precisely the Definition of Faith of the Seventh Synod, which accorded to images an honor far inferior to the adoration of latría, due to God alone; they condemned what was said to have been asserted by Constantine of Cyprus in the Synod, namely, that images should receive the same honor as the Blessed Trinity. But is it not strange, one may ask, that the prelates of Frankfort entertained such feelings, as they certainly manifested, towards an Œcumenical Council? We must bear in mind that they did not regard the Seventh Council as universal; they looked upon it as a National Council of the Greeks. That such was the case, is proven by a number of testimonies from contemporary and proximately succeeding authors (1), and by the sentiments of the Caroline Books, which we know to have been precisely their own. In Book 4, chap. 13, the author compares the Seventh with the Copronymian Synod, and says: "They and their predecessors insolently desired to convene a Synod, and to associate it with the six venerable ones, calling it the Seventh Synod. But while both parties importunately tried this thing, neither attained the object of their ambition. . . . Both the brazen coin and the tin one (1) being not allowed to make up the number Seven, there remain only Six, which are illustrated by the perfection of the number, and by the brightness of Catholic erudition.' And in Chap. 28, "Among other mad things said to have been done or written in the same Synod, not the least of their hallucinations is the styling their Synod Œcumenical, when it neither preserved the universal purity of faith, nor was made up from all the churches." Nor is it at all strange that the Frankfort prelates did not concede the palm of œcumenicity to the Seventh Synod, for it had not been confirmed by the Roman Pontiff. When Pope Adrian I. answered the Capitular which the abbot Angilbert brought him from Charlemagne, he did not claim for the Synod any respect as a General Council; and the successors of Adrian constantly communicated with the French who rejected it, as well as with the English church, which labored under the same mistake as the French, in regard to the meaning of the Seventh Council (2). True to his theory that the Synod of Frankfort condemned, not the Seventh but the Copronymian Synod, Bini rightly asserts that these prelates would not have ventured to reject a Synod confirmed by Rome; he holds, therefore, that Pope Adrian confirmed the Seventh Synod. Now, while it is true that this Pontiff received the decrees of the Council, yet he did not solemnly confirm them in the usual manner, namely, by an Encyclical Letter to all the churches. To this fact, he himself is a witness in his Apologetic Epistle to Charlemagne: "According to our orders, they held this Synod, and restored the holy and venerable images to their ancient position. And as in our own.

(1) The Fulda Annals of the Franks, say of it: "The Pseudo-Synod of the Greeks, held for the adoration of images, and falsely called the Seventh, was condemned by the bishops." Similar language is used by Adhelm, in his Annals; by the Anonymous Author of the Life of Charlemagne in Duchesne's Olden Writers of the History of the Franks: by Hincmar, Ado of Vienne, Eginhard, the Saxon Poet, and many others.

(1) The author compares the Six General Councils to six golden coins, to which the Copronymites wished to join a brazen counterfeit, and the fathers of the Seventh Council a tin one.

(2) See Roger of Hoveden and Matthew of Westminster.

and in the Definition of St. Gregory, it was established, concerning images—so they avowed, in their Definition—to give them kisses and honorable salutation, but not, according to our faith, to give them a real latria, which belongs only to the Divine nature. However, we have given, as yet, no response to the same emperor concerning the same Synod, fearing they might return to their errors.” Drawing these reflections to a close, we conclude that the prelates assembled at Frankfort, like the author of the Caroline Books, were deceived as to the meaning of the decree on image-worship, issued by the Seventh Council, and that they rejected it, feeling themselves justified in so doing, because the want of Apostolic confirmation, on the part of the same Seventh Synod, was equivalent to a lack of binding authority. The mind of the French Church, however, in reference to the authority of that Roman Church which had just defended and sanctioned anew a relative worship of images, was very different from that which Protestant authors affect to discover. The utter devotion of that mind to the authority of the Roman See, is shown by the following passages from the Caroline Books, b. 1, c. 6: “Before we undertake a discussion of the testimonies absurdly cited by the Easterns in their Synod, we think it proper to show how the Roman Church was elevated by the Lord above the other churches, and how she is to be consulted by the faithful; especially since testimony is only to be taken from those Scriptures which she receives as Canonical, and since the teachings of no Doctors are to be accepted, but of those who have been received by Gelasius or other Pontiffs of that Holy See.” And having recited a passage of St. Augustine, the author proceeds: “As he prefers generally the Apostolic Sees to all others in the world, how much more is that See to be preferred to all, which was elevated above the other Apostolic Sees? As therefore the Apostles were eminent among the other disciples, and Peter was eminent among all the Apostles, so likewise among other sees is an Apostolic one elevated, and among the Apostolic the Roman. For this See was not put above the rest by any Synodical constitutions, but holds the Primacy from the authority of the Lord, saying: ‘Thou art

Peter, and upon this rock I shall build My Church.'” And then, after noting how the great St. Jerome, though consulted by Pope Damasus on points of erudition, consulted the Pontiff on matters of faith, he concludes : “ Whence we are to understand that the holy and learned men, who shone by the light of science and preaching throughout the world, not only did not leave the Roman Church, but, in times of necessity, implored her aid to strengthen their faith. Which, as we have said, and proved by examples, all Catholic churches ought regularly to do, that they may obtain aid for their faith from her, after Christ, who has neither spot nor stain, and who crushes the frightful heads of heresy, and confirms the minds of the faithful. And while many have receded from her holy and venerable communion, our church has never departed, but by her Apostolic instruction, and through Him from whom comes every good gift and every perfect one, she has ever received reverend blessings.”

From the time of the Seventh General Council, to the reign of Leo the Armenian, who mounted the Byzantine throne in 814, the Eastern churches enjoyed comparative peace. But this Emperor resuscitated the Iconoclast heresy, and those who resisted his efforts were punished with imprisonment and spoliation. With the advent to power of Michael the Stutterer, in 820, the Iconoclast hopes were raised to the highest pitch. No sooner had this Emperor crushed the seditions which troubled the commencement of his reign, than he dropped the mask of toleration at first assumed, and made open war on the orthodox. He also endeavored to deceive Pope Eugene II., and the Emperor Louis the Pious as to his real designs, claiming that he was only resisting the most superstitious of practices, and begging the influence of Louis with the Pontiff that an end might be put to religious discord in the Eastern empire. Yielding to these solicitations, Louis requested of the Pope permission to hold a meeting of bishops, at which the testimonies of the fathers, bearing on the image-question, might be ventilated. To this the Pontiff consented, and in 824, a meeting of bishops took place at Paris, the result of which was the sending to Louis a voluminous collection of citations from the fathers, divided, as follows, into Chapters. "First, against those who indiscreetly presume to remove images, not only from the churches, but from the sacred vessels. Second, as to our course of action in regard to the images of saints and historical pictures, it is laid down by that most holy, illustrious, and wonderful man, the most learned of the Catholic Church, Pope Gregory. Third, against those who revere and adore images with an undue worship, and call them holy, and say that through them holiness is acquired, as was inserted in that Synod of the Greeks. Fourth, the opinions of the Fathers on superstitious worship. Fifth, by what authority, and with what reason, are images to be adored, and incense to be offered them, when even the angels, or holy men, when living, would not be adored? Sixth, against those who defend the superstition of images by adducing its antiquity, seeking custom rather than the authority of truth. Seventh, the saints have always taught us, by their words and deeds, to avoid all superstition, or any other thing which might cause scandal to the weaker brethren. Eighth, because some have defended the adoration of images, by the fact of Jacob having adored his son Joseph, or at least the end of his rod we thought proper to show how this is explained by St Jerome and by St. Augustine. Ninth, against those who find evidence in the adoration of David by the prophet Nathan. in the Book of Kings. Tenth, against those who adore images because they call them sacred, and compare them with sacred vessels. Eleventh, against those who quote the two Cherubim in testimony. Twelfth, on the worship which the Greeks call latria. Thirteenth, against those, in that Synod of the Greeks, who say that they adore, with like reason, images and the life-giving cross. Fourteenth, against those who adduce the Sign of the Cross as proof that it is as licit to adore images as to adore the wood of the cross." In the Fifteenth, there are many testimonies of the fathers against the indiscreet adorers of images, and the Sixteenth explains "how was originated in the Eastern church, the warfare against images." To this Collection the bishops added the text of a letter which they wished Louis to write to Pope Eugene, and also the text of one which they would like the Pontiff to send to the Emperor Michael. In this latter epistle, they proposed as a means of peace, "That those who wished to have images in a fit place, and without any improper adoration, for the sake of pious memory and of sound doctrine, should have them; that those, however, who did not wish them, should not spurn with illicit contempt, either the images or their possessors." Louis sent this draft of letter, together with the Chapters just quoted, to Pope Eugene II., and he gave the following instructions to his envoys: "We therefore command your Carefulness, that before you say anything about these things to our Apostolic Lord, you will present the matter with great care, and extract and describe what you may find more apt to the present business, and offer it to him to read. Because, as you know, we asked his permission to have this Collection made by our bishops; and hence we cannot avoid showing him that which, by his permission, has been collected. Take the greatest pains, nevertheless, to show him such of these (chapters) as best pertain to the image question, and which he, or his, will not be able to reject. And do you reason with him so patiently and so modestly on this subject, that you may successfully avoid, by too much resistance, compelling him to fall into some irrevocable obstinacy. Rather than openly resist his remarks, be yielding to them, and thus you may lead him to the rule which is to be followed in the image-question." From all this, Protestant writers have concluded that the French bishops, in convention at Paris in 825, refused to accord images, not only the supreme adoration of latria, but even the relative and inferior honor which Catholics claim for them.

It cannot be denied that the language used by the prelates of Paris is very strong, and that it plainly indicates, on the part of the Western churches, a full persuasion that the Greeks of their day were exceedingly superstitious. We willingly admit that the strong language was not out of place, for there is good reason for believing that the accusation of superstition was well merited by many of the fickle, restless, and super-imaginative Byzantines of that day. But we do assert, firstly, that this meeting of bishops at Paris was not a Synod, and that therefore its authority was no greater than that of so many private individuals; secondly, that these prelates distinctly submitted their views to the authoritative judgment of Rome; thirdly, that they did not condemn the relative honor accorded to images by the Catholic Church. The first point is illustrated by the draft of the Epistle which the bishops desired Louis to send in his own name to Pope Eugene II., and which is found in the Acts of the meeting: "We however, not by convoking a Synod, but, as we asked of you and obtained permission to so do, by such conference with our friends, your children, as the multifarious cares of our kingdom would allow, considered what we should present to your Lovingness in this necessity, so that the people might be restored to concord by your Holiness, preserved orthodox by God." That, secondly, the Parisian assembly submitted their judgment to that of the Holy See, is shown by the Epistle sent to the Pontiff, by advice of the prelates, by the sovereigns Louis and Lothair, "as we knew that it was our duty to furnish all the help in our power, in matters pertaining to Divine worship, to those to whom God has intrusted the government of the churches and the care of the Lord's flock, so, when the Greek ambassadors informed us of their intention to wait upon you, we did not neglect to most carefully consider what aid, with the help of God, we might afford you. And for that reason, we asked of your Holiness, that it might be permitted to our priests to search for and to collect such passages of the holy fathers as would serve to elucidate the matter upon which the same ambassadors were about to consult you. And when, according to the permission given by you, these passages had been compiled, with such care as the short space of time allowed, they were sent to us to be read. Having read them, we have sent them by our legates, the venerable bishops Jeremiah and Jonas, to be read and examined by your Holiness. If your Paternity were to think fit, you might hold a profitable conference with these bishops, concerning the legation you are about to send into Greece, as they are very well versed in Sacred Scripture, and not slightly experienced in disputation. However, we have not sent these bishops, with the aforesaid Collection of opinions, into the presence of your Lovingness, that they should exercise, as it were, any magisterial functions, or be regarded as sent to teach; but because, as we have already said, it is our duty to furnish aid, in all cases, to your most holy See." Finally, we contend that the Parisian assembly condemned, only the superstitions of the Greeks, not the relative and inferior honor given by Catholics to images. These prelates, in fact, were laboring under the erroneous impression which affected the author of the Caroline Books and the Synod of Frankfort, namely, that the Seventh Council had decreed to images the same devotion as was given to the Holy Trinity. They wished to put into practice the wise suggestions of the great St. Gregory to Serenus of Marseilles; checking the temerity of the image-breakers, and repressing the superstition of the injudicious and the ignorant. To be convinced of this, it is sufficient to read the following passages from the episcopal letter to Louis and Lothair: "The images of the saints are not to be broken by foolish presumption; nor are they, to the injury of the saints, to be despised and abolished. Rather should they be preserved, superstition being removed, for sake of remembrance and of love, according to true religion, in memory of those whose images they are, as Blessed Gregory explained, in a sufficiently clear and Catholic manner your corrective words may be openly directed against those who have sent you the Epistle we have read (1), for its text shows that both factions should be condemned, that is, those who venerate the images with an undue and superstitious worship, and those who removed the same from the nearer places." And in chap. 15, of their Collection, the bishops say: "So far this is all for thee, who art an indiscreet worshiper of images; and for thee, who art their rash destroyer."

We have more than insinuated that many superstitions

(1) The bishops allude to the Epistle of the Emperor Michael the Stutterer to Louis.

had crept into use among the Greeks, in reference to image-worship. Indeed, it is only by supposing that such, unfortunately, was the case, that we can account for the extraordinary caution and strong language of the Westerns, of which we have had so many specimens. Although there is doubtless some exaggeration to be expected in such a quarter, we adduce a portion of the Epistle sent by the Emperor Michael to Louis the Pious: "Many of our ecclesiastics, as well as laymen, forgetting the Apostolic traditions, and transgressing the limits of their forefathers, have become inventors of evil things. First indeed they put out of the temples the honorable and life-giving crosses, and put images in their stead, placing lights and burning incense before them, holding them in the same regard as the honorable and life giving wood upon which Christ the True God designed to be crucified for our salvation (1). They sang before them, adored them, and sought aid from them. Many covered them with cloths, and made them sponsors for their children at Baptism. Others, when wishing to assume the monastic habit, rejected the service of religious persons who used to receive their hair, when cut off, and using instead the images, allowed, as it were, the locks to fall into their laps. Some, even of our priests and clerics, scraping the paint from the images, mixed it with the Oblations, and from this Oblation, after the celebration of mass, communicated them who wished. Some even placed the Body of the Lord in the hands of the images, whence the communicants might receive It. Some, despising the temple, used as altars the pedestals of images in common houses, exercising the sacred ministry upon them." Bel-larmine (2) and Christian Lupus (3) contend that these assertions of Michael are foul calumnies, but the superstitious propensities of the Greeks were noted by the Dominican friar, Pantaleon, who, writing in 1252, from the Dominican convent of Constantinople, said (4). "In the church of the

(1) The reader will notice the thoroughly un-Protestant devotion to the cross, which this Iconocast inculcates.

(2) Treatise on Image-Worship.

(3) Note to 7th Synod

(4) Cited by Alexandre, Cent. 8, diss. 6, § 10, from the Lyons Library of the Fathers, v. 27.

said palace (Constantine's), where are preserved the holy relics, the image of the Holy Mother of God behind the altar, which they called the Lady of the House (of God), is immediately locked up when the Lent begins, and so kept until Holy Saturday; the doors are covered with a cloth. The same is done to the shrines of Sts. Mantelles and Koramidius. They importune the image of the Holy Mother of God, that she may cause sons to be born, and by its means, they make a sponsor of her, in this manner: A garment is connected with the image, so that she may receive, as sponsor, the child from the hand of the priest. But that the image speaks, or promises fidelity for the child, or bears witness to the baptism, who will dare to assert, unless he despises God? Omitting no kind of superstition, and hating their true brethren, they make brethren to themselves of the unwilling saints."

There are several other arguments, adduced from writers of this period, which Daillè and his imitators are fond of citing as proof that the churches of the West, during the Iconoclastic troubles, were not unanimous in giving even an inferior honor to images (1). Thus, they quote sayings from Agobardus, archbishop of Lyons; from Jonas, bishop of Orleans; from Dungal, a learned recluse of the abbey of St. Denis; and Walfrid Strabo. As the arguments already adduced in the cases of the Caroline Books and the two episcopal conventions, apply also to these, we may omit any disquisition upon them.

Returning now to the history of Iconoclasm, we only observe that during the reigns of Michael the Stutterer and Theophilus, the orthodox had much to suffer, but with the advent of Theodora in 841, and the election of Methodius to the patriarchate of Constantinople, the war on images came to an end. In the West, about the year 823, Claude of Turin removed the images from the churches of his diocese, and wrote against their veneration, but he was refuted by Theodemir, Dungal, and others. Before the tenth century, the 2d Council of Nice was everywhere received as œcumen-ical, and the respect due to images everywhere recognized. In the twelfth century, the Valdensians, Albigensians, and other fanatics, revived the Iconoclast heresy; while at the time of the "Reformation," Calvin declared the veneration of images idolatrous. At first, Luther did not wish them removed, but the friends of the Confession of Augsburg accused the Catholics of ascribing a certain in-dwelling power to the images themselves. In many Lutheran churches, the crucifix and certain historical paintings are allowed. Erasmus thus protests against the frenzy of Carlostadt: "Whoever deprives us of painting, deprives existence of its greatest charms; painting is often a better interpreter than language. It is false that images are useless. Formerly there were images in the Jewish temples—cherubim, and fanciful images of men and animals. The images which adorn our Christian churches are not presented to the faithful for adoration—they are either elegant ornaments or pious memorials. Do you not believe that if the scenes of the life of Christ were painted on the sacred walls, such material representations would raise our minds to the contemplation of His life? Catholics never offer images to be adored, and the respect that they show is for the saints represented. Banish, then, since you will not have images, the Atlases and musicians, whom the artist uses to support a pulpit or a pillar; yea, remove the cock which surmounts the steeple" (1).

(1) Many Protestants quote Hincmar of Rheims in their favor, but Daillè declares that a diligent inspection of the MS., from which his words are cited, satisfied him that the passage is an interpolation by the Centuriators of Magdeburg.

(1) Epistles, b. 31, n. 50.

CHAPTER XL.

ORIGIN OF THE PAPAL DOMINION IN THE ROMAN STATES.

In giving this title to the following dissertation, we do so because we hold that the term "Temporal Power" is more appropriately applied to the authority of regulation and deposition which the Supreme Pontiffs once exercised, de jure and de facto, over the Christian monarchs of the earth. Few events have given rise to more bitter heart-burnings and more acrimonious discussions than those which commenced in the Papal States with the war of 1859, and culminated with the occupation of Rome by the Italian government in 1870. We do not propose to enter into a defence of the rights of the Holy See to the retention of its temporal domain; that has been done ably and sufficiently in every language of the Christian community, so that Catholics may be said to be of one mind in the matter. But our attention is claimed by the origin of the Pontifical sovereignty over the old Duchy of Rome and contiguous regions—as a purely historical theme, and one of great interest and importance, we cannot afford to omit it. The student of the middle ages is never surprised when he finds the subject matter of his researches involved in more or less of obscurity, and when he approaches the present question he will experience some difficulty in its solution. Modern writers have devoted much time to the matter, impelled by the audacious attacks of the enemies of Rome, but as yet their praiseworthy efforts have not succeeded in entirely dissipating the cloud which obscures our vision of the great events of the eighth century. In forming a just idea of this period, truth has been forced to contend with no ordinary passions. Party spirit and national vanity have taken the field, and thus we see French historians attributing to Pepin and Charlemagne far more influence in Roman affairs than those rulers ever pretended to possess, while, on the other hand,

Italian critics do not hesitate to detract from that praise which is really due to the Carlovingian kings as glorifiers of the Roman See. Nor, with so rich a prospect of facts for the buttressing of their tottering theories, could we expect any inactivity in those court-theologians and Cæsar-worshippers, who are perhaps the worst enemies of the Church; when these gentry go to the Rome of the eighth century, they can see there no sovereign but him of Constantinople, and in later days, they have eyes only for the Western emperor. In addition to these two classes of critics who may claim some of our respect and much of our attention, there is a third, made up of the sworn enemies of the royal dominion of the Pontiffs, in whatever shape it may be actuated, or by whatever arguments it may be defended. These men have covered the origin of the temporal domain with dirt, assigning as its causes, consummate ambition, unscrupulous chicanery, and low theft. We will now proceed to examine the origin of the Papal dominion in the Roman States, so far as the limited nature of our work will permit.

In the year 330, the Emperor Constantine transferred the seat of government from Rome to Byzantium, which from that time was styled Constantinople. The temporal influence of the Popes commenced to increase, nor did the Emperors complain; nay, they were too willing to be relieved of the weight of government in Italy. At the time of St. Gregory the Great, this power commenced to assume definite proportions; but even in the days of St. Leo the Great (440-461) it was remarkable. Before his election, Leo had been chosen by Valentinian III. as mediator between his general, Ætius, and Albinus the pretorian, whose discords were shaking the empire. It was during this reign that Attila fell upon Italy (452), and the safety of Rome was owing to the Pope's influence with the conqueror. Three years later, he in similar manner saved the city from the savage Genseric the Vandal. So accustomed had the people of Rome become to the tutelage of the Pontiff, that it was unsafe to leave them alone. Hence it was that Leo was unable to attend that Synod of Ephesus to which the crimes of Dioscorus gave the name of "Robber-Synod;" and that he could preside at the Council of Chalcedon only by means of his legates. Thus he explains his absence, in the first case, in his letter to the Empress Pulcheria, and in the second, writing to Marcianus and the œcumenical fathers. But we find the great Gregory exercising a power more nearly approaching that of a sovereign. Thus, he sent governors to the imperial cities, made treaties with the barbarians, recruited armies, and provided Rome with fortifications and provisions (1). Sisinnius and Gregory II. restored the walls of Rome. And so the de facto sovereignty of the Pontiffs progressed, until in the eighth century it became de jure. The true reason for its exercise was the abandonment of their duties by the Emperors of Constantinople, and the spontaneous movement of a miserable people imploring the succor of a loving father (2). So gradual, and, we may say, insensible, was the transition to a de jure state of government, that grave and earnest critics differ as to the time when the Papal dominion reached the second condition. Among others, Orsi, Bianchi, and Thomassin, hold that at least the Duchy of Rome recognized Gregory II. as king, in the year 726, when the image-breaking Leo the Isaurian provoked the Italians to revolt. The learned annotator of Baronius, Pagi, contends that the temporal sovereignty of the Papacy dates from the year 754, in the pontificate of Stephen II., when King Pepin of the Franks signed the treaty of Pavia, after the defeat of Astolphus the Lombard. De Marca is not content with those who defer the commencement to 774, when Charlemagne annihilated the power of Desiderius, and thus solidified the rule of the Popes; he asserts that down to the year 796 the Byzantine Emperors remained masters of Rome. He who wishes to change history for romance, will postpone still further the date of the foundation of the temporal dominion. Ranke certainly styles Julius II. "the founder" of the States of the Church (3), but his context shows that he uses this term in the sense of "restorer."

(1) Book I., epist. 72; II., 3, 29, 30, 31, 46; V., 36, 41; VI., 30; IX., 4, 6, 42, 43; Conf. Migne's Patrology, vol. 77.

(2) For a full and exact narration of the gradual progress of this de facto sovereignty, read the Origin of the Temporal Sovereignty of the Popes, published in the Roman CIVILTÀ CATTOLICA for the year 1860. This article is probably the most correct and the most exhaustive yet written upon the subject, and we are indebted to it for much of our information.

(3) Book I., c. 2.

Ranke also asserts that the donation of Pepin was the foundation of the whole dominion of the Popes. If any one wishes to defend the theory of the revolutionary government of Bologna of 1859, in which it was claimed that the Exarchate and the Pentapolis (1) became subject to the Popes only under Martin V. (1417-1431)—according to Ranke, under Julius II.—we need scarcely notice the sophism, for such, and a pure and simple one, it certainly must be called. From the time of the donation of Charlemagne to that of Pius IX., there is a constant succession of public documents which prove that the Romagna was ever claimed by the Holy See, and that its suzerain rights were acknowledged by international law. There were often periods when the Popes lost possession of this or that part of their territory, now owing to popular turbulence, sometimes on account of the arrogance of their vassal princes, and still more frequently because of the usurpation of the Holy Roman Emperors, nearly always ungrateful to the power to which they owed their dignity. But what does this prove? Certainly not that the conquests of Cæsar Borgia and Julius II. were the foundation of the Papal rule in these districts.

A careful examination of the records of the time convinces us that the first Roman Pontiff to place upon his brow the crown of temporal sovereignty was Stephen II., who reigned between the years 752 and 757, and the precise date of the acquisition was the year 754. Many had been the revolts of the Italians against the Eastern Emperors; often indeed had the Popes been forced in charity to the people to assume the direction of affairs, but they had always begged the discontented populations "to not fail in love and fidelity to the Roman Empire" (2). The rule of Byzantium had proved execrable for its impiety, and contemptible for its impotency (3), and Gregory III. had been obliged in the year

(1) The "Pentapolis" was the collective name of the five cities, Ancona, Rimini, Pesaro, Fano and Sinigaglia. In the Bolognese official Monitore of Oct. 6, 1859, appeared a Memorandum signed by Pepoli and Cipriani, in which one reason for the rebellion was given thus, "During all the middle ages the temporal sovereignty of the Popes was never exercised in the Romagna. It was subjected to the Holy See only in the fifteenth century."

(2) ANASTASIUS Bibl., in Life of Greg. II.

(3) The following fact will show that the Exarch (imperial representative at Ravenna) had very little influence. In the year 733, occurred a great battle between the revolted Ravennese and the Constantinopolitan troops, and so great was the number of Greek corpses thrown into the Patermo, that for six years the people would eat no fish taken therefrom. This victory was ever after celebrated by the Ravennese with processions and litanies, and 739 to make his famous appeal to Charles Martel, sending to him the keys of the tomb of the Apostles, and begging him to protect the Romans from the oppressions of the then barbarous Lombards; but as yet the Papacy recognized as legitimate the imperial sceptre, and when peace was concluded with Luitprand by Pope Zachary (successor to Greg. III.) it was signed in the name of the Emperor. Even Stephen II., up to the very time when he was compelled to turn his thoughts from the East to the West, acknowledged the obligation of obedience to Constantinople, for we find him turning to the infamous Constantine Copronymus in the year 753, and entreating him to protect his subjects from the Lombards, to "liberate the city of Rome and the whole Italian province from the bites of the child of iniquity." These facts compel us to reject the theory of Orsi and others that the temporal sovereignty of the Popes dates as far back as the time of Gregory II.

Of different calibres indeed were the emperors Copronymus and Justinian. It was scarcely to be hoped that the former would effect for Italy, against the Lombards, what the latter, supported by Belisarius and Narses, had accomplished against the Goths. In the year 751, news reached Byzantium that the last of the Exarchs had surrendered to the conquering Astolphus, but the emperor was too much occupied in image-breaking to pay much attention to the loss of his fairest province, and two years passed ere he wrote to the usurper and implored its restitution. In the meantime Astolphus had prepared to verify the title, "king of all Italy," which, one hundred and fifty years previously, his predecessor Agilulphus had stamped upon the iron crown. His lieutenant, Count Robert, had vainly endeavored to capture Rome, and had lost his life in the attempt, when the order was given to devastate the Campagna. Nepi was taken, all the castles destroyed and the churches burned. Pope Stephen II., who had been elected in March, 752, then made his last appeal to Copronymus, but this was as vain as by the decoration of the city, right under the eyes of the Exarch. Well may Muratori say that the Exarchs were obliged "to navigate as they best could." So nominal had become the authority of the Emperor, that, according to Balbo, in his History of Italy under the Barbarians, b. II., c. 25, the Exarch was often seen taking the part of the Pope against his majesty.

his prayers to the ferocious Lombard, with whom he tried every legitimate means of pacification. To whom could the Pontiff look for help? Nearly the whole of Italy lay at the feet of the oppressor. The Lombard hordes roved rampant from the Alps to the Volturno, Rome alone excepted; the days were gone, when the Spoletans successfully made common cause with the Eternal City against the barbarian; Venice, already ambitious of commercial prosperity, cared not to be embroiled with a powerful and probably successful conqueror; the few cities of lower Italy, whose insignificance the Lombard allowed yet to repose under the banners of Copronymus, were of no value in arms; the men of the Pentapolis were exhausted of all strength after their brave but futile struggle. In the exercise of that right accorded him by the will of the Romans, by the law of nature and by the imperial permission to ally himself with any willing defender (1), Stephen turned to the new peoples of the earth, and his prophetic eye selected the one whom we rightly call the first-born (2) of the Catholic nations of Europe.

The brave and generous Franks were at this time governed by Pepin the Short, the worthy descendant of Charles Martel and of Pepin of Heristal. The already great fame of this prince had been augmented this same year by an important victory over the Saxon barbarians, and his devotion to the Roman Church was well known (3). When Pepin received the letters of Pope Stephen, he resolved to hold himself at the Pontiff's disposal, and sent as ambassadors to Rome, the bishop of Metz and the duke Autcarus, who were charged to escort Stephen into France, as he had expressed a wish to treat personally with the French king. About this time the Emperor Copronymus sent a trusted courtier to the Holy See, begging the Pope to personally interview Astolphus and prevail upon him to restore his conquered Italian provinces to the empire. Stephen resolved to make an attempt upon the Lombard, thinking that the result might obviate the necessity of a journey into France. Accordingly, though quite infirm, on Oct. 14, 753, he set out for Pavia, accompanied by the French envoys, the imperial messenger, and a chosen body of Roman clergy and nobles. The interview took place, and resulted in the refusal of Astolphus to accede to the prayers of the Pontiff. Learning from himself the intention of the Pope to cross into France, the Lombard grew furious, but did not dare to impede the journey. The energetic pastor crossed the St. Bernard in midwinter amid much suffering, one of his suite dying from exposure.

(1) For this concession, see TROYA, Diplomatic Codex of the Lombards, no. 681.

(2) When Clodoveus or Clovis had been baptized by St. Remigius, he was the only Catholic sovereign in Europe, as the princes of Germany and of the British Isles were Pagans, while the Goths of Spain and Italy, the Burgundians, &c., and even the Byzantine emperor were infected with heresy. Hence arose for the French king the title of Most Christian, and for the nation, the style of First Child of the Church.

(3) He was bound by gratitude to Rome, for in great measure he owed his throne to the sanction given by Pope Zachary to his election by the Frankish counts. He was crowned at Soissons by St. Boniface, then legate of the Pontiff.

In the royal villa of Pontion near Chalons-sur-Marne, in the same plains which had witnessed the discomfiture of Attila, met the august personages whose deliberations were to decide the fate of the Hun's successor, and to give a new aspect to history. The result of the interview was a justification of the hopes of the Pope. The king swore to grant the desires of the Holy See, and in a solemn diet afterwards held at Quiercy it was resolved that on the 28th of April (754) the forces of France should march against the Lombards. In this general assembly of the notables of the kingdom, with the applause of all, was promulgated that treaty with the Holy See which, renewed and confirmed again and again by Pepin and Charlemagne, became one of the foundations of European public law in the middle ages. In this treaty or pactionis fœdus, king Pepin declares: "We promise to thee, Blessed Peter, keeper of the keys of the celestial kingdom and Prince of the Apostles, and for thee, to this thy beloved Vicar Stephen, excellent Pope and Supreme Pontiff, and to his successors for all time, with the consent and will of all the subscribing Abbots, Dukes and Counts of the Franks, that if the Lord our God shall through His merits and through holy prayer render us victorious against the Lombard nation and kingdom, we will give to thee forever and to thy Vicars, all the states and duchies and fortified places of the Exarchate of Ravenna, in all their integrity, as well as everything which by the concession of the Em-perors used to belong to the district, and which will be specially described below by defined boundaries, everything which is in any way established or found within said boundaries, which have been devastated, invaded, and subtracted, and have in any way been alienated, by the most wicked Lombard race, no power within the same limits being reserved to us and to our successors, unless only that we may gain prayers and the repose of our soul, and that by You and your people we be styled PATRICIAN OF THE ROMANS" (1). Here follow the boundaries of the territories ceded to the Holy See.

The expedition against Astolphus set out, and the Pontiff accompanied it. The pass of Susa was carried by the Franks, and after witnessing an immense slaughter of his followers, the Lombard king shut himself up in Pavia. But the spirits of the foe had so fallen, that Pepin soon reduced the place, and listening to the prayers of the Pontiff, accorded the defeated prince comparatively honorable conditions. Besides a rather small indemnity of war, he gave forty noble hostages for the fulfilment of the conditions of peace, the principal of which was the restoration to the Romans of the Exarchate, the Pentapolis, and all other places taken from them. But scarcely had Pepin recrossed the Alps, when the perfidy of Astolphus was made manifest. Not only did he refuse to comply with the treaty of Pavia, but he commenced new depredations, and even conspired for the assassination of Pope Stephen. The holy Pontiff, already suffering from an attack which in France had nearly sent him to the grave, was seriously affected by these misfortunes. He thrice appealed by letter to the French king, but that monarch delayed to act, perhaps because he was then dealing the final blow to the Saracens and sending them forever beyond the Pyrenees, perhaps because he confided in the ability of diplomacy to forestall any necessity of military procedure. In the month of January, 756, the Lombards began the siege of Rome, and

(1) The title of "Roman Patrician," in the olden time, was given to very few, and only for very distinguished services. Clovis had received the honor, and Pepin was anxious to bear a title which, as it then signified "Defender," would increase his consequence in the eyes of all Christian peoples. He received it from Pope Stephen on the day of his coronation by that Pontiff. He had already been anointed king by St. Boniface, but he wished to still further secure the prospects of his family, and so on July 28, the Pope performed the solemn function, conceding the same honor to the queen, Bertrada, and to the royal princes, Charles and Carloman.

it had lasted three months, when suddenly Astolphus broke up his camp and hurried towards the Alps to meet once more the advancing Franks. Forced again to shut himself up in Pavia, the perfidious monarch soon implored the mercy of the victor, who granted it after exacting a renewal of the former engagements and a large indemnity in money for his army. A new diploma was then issued by Pepin, confirming to the Pope the previous donation, and Fulrad, abbot of St. Denis, was sent as commissioner from city to city to receive the keys in the name of the conqueror, and to place them upon the tomb of St. Peter in token of homage.

These are the naked facts in regard to the origin of the Papal dominion. On the score of legitimacy, no European dynasty can show so good a record; in the history of the foundation of all other monarchies will be found either a defiance of the popular will or a shameless robbery of a legitimate claimant or a wanton shedding of innocent blood. "Like the Nile," says De Maistre, (1), "sovereignty likes to hide its head." This is true in more ways than one, but while it may be difficult to trace the precise origin of Pontifical rule, especially in the Duchy of Rome, we find nothing of which to be ashamed. The people of Rome and the Exarchate had been shamelessly abandoned by their Emperor; they appealed to their natural protector, to him who for many years had been their ruler in nearly all but name; a friendly power intervenes, ejects the usurper, and hands over the conquered territory, not to him whose imbecility, neglect and cowardice, had destroyed every claim to allegiance, but to him to whom the people principally owed their deliverance, and to whom—which should especially please those who idolize the popular will—the multitude wished the sovereignty to be given.

If the facts above related unfold the true origin of the Pontifical dominion in the Roman States, the Papal claims were founded principally, at least, so far as they depended upon written law, upon the cession by Pepin, and the justice of that cession can be deduced only from the right of conquest acquired by the French monarch. To the nostrils of most of us this right of conquest bears an unpleasant odor ; there arise memories of Poland and Ireland which render us reser- vative when it is put forward. Still, a generality should not be deduced from one or two particulars, and it should be remembered that public law does and always has recognized this right, and that in many cases it is in accordance with strict common sense. But little reflection is needed to discover one of those cases in the conquest of the Roman States by Pepin. And now for a few remarks upon the manner in which this king treated the imperial claims to the provinces which Byzantium had failed to protect.

(1) The Pope, b. III., c. 6.

In the preliminary proceedings at Pontion, and in the solemn deliberations at Quiercy, everything shows that the Pope, the king, and the Frank nobles, regarded the imperial authority in Rome as definitely forfeited. When the Pontiff presented his views and wishes, he did not speak as did Pope Zachary when he asked Liutprand for the restitution of Ravenna, that is, using the phrases proper to an agent of the empire. The sovereignty of Copronymus is entirely and formally ignored, and Stephen addresses Pepin in the name of an independent Italy, and in his own name, as the representative and protector of the Italian peoples. On his part, Pepin treats with the Pope as with a sovereign, his peer, or rather, he enters into obligations with St. Peter in the person of his successor. There is not a word of the Emperor or of his claims, unless indeed in one passage where he so speaks as to show beyond the possibility of a doubt that he regarded the power of the empire in Italy as at an end, because of the Emperor's own implicit abdication. This abdication he assumes as at least de facto from the concession made to the Pontiff, which gave him full permission to provide for the deliverance and safety of the Exarchate, etc., as he might deem best (1). Pepin's denial of the imperial claims is shown more forcibly in his treatment of Carloman, his own brother, when, fearing lest the Lombard would revenge upon his monastic brethren his own refusal to obey, the royal monk left his monastery of Monte Cassino, and crossing into France, endeavored to induce Pepin to abandon the projected expedition (1). According to Anastasius, he was met with a determined refusal, his royal brother being resolved "with his whole strength to combat for the cause of the Holy Church of God, as he had already promised the blessed Pontiff." And to the treaty of Pavia the subscribing parties were the Romans, Franks, and Lombards, no mention being made of any Byzantine representative. While Pepin was yet at Pavia, he was waited upon by Gregory, first imperial secretary, who begged him, in the name of Copronymus, to restore the Exarchate to the empire. The Frank angrily spurned the offered bribes, and answered that he had undertaken the campaign with no hope of human favor, but solely for love of St. Peter, and that no treasure could induce him to take from the Apostle what he had already given to him. It is plain then that at this time the imperial authority was no longer acknowledged in the Roman States. It had been spurned by the people as both inefficacious for good and accompanied by cruel tyranny. The Pope, who had ever respected it, and endeavored to reconcile the Romans to its yoke, was compelled in charity to his immediate flock, to yield to the pressure of circumstances and to recognize, in the premises, the right of revolt. The Emperor himself had forfeited all claim to the allegiance of the Romans by his neglect of the first and fundamental duty of a sovereign, the care of his people, that duty which forms the only reason of existence for any government whatever. The French nation, then the most powerful in Europe, and the most authoritative in the formation of public law, had rejected the imperial claims and given the conquered provinces to the See of Rome. The Lombards solemnly recognized the Pontifical dominion by the treaty of Pavia. From the year 754, a new era was inaugurated in the political world, and was started that long list of mitred kings, who, to say the least, have reigned more in justice and in charity, and made fewer mistakes, than any other dynasty on earth (2).

(1) Codex dipl. Longob., no. 681.

(1) Annals of Eginhard, an. 753.

(2) We would ask the reader's attention to the following remarks of Cantù: "The original of the donation of Pepin is lost; the act usually adduced is not genuine. But the chroni-

CHAPTER XLI.

TERRITORIAL MODIFICATIONS OF THE PAPAL DOMINIONS, FROM THE 8TH CENTURY TO THE PRESENT DAY.

The Roman Republic, moderated by the Popes (730-754).

From the year 731 to 741, occur the expressions "Republic of the Romans," "Republican Association," "Body of the Roman Army," etc. (1). The edict of Leo the Isaurian, issued in 730, ordering the destruction of sacred images, had produced a general revolt among the Italians, and the Popes vainly endeavored to keep the Romans in obedience to the clergy leave us in no doubt as to such a donation having been made. It embraced Ravenna, Rimini, Pesaro, Cesena, Fano, Sinigaglia, Jesi, Forlimpopoli, Forlì (with the castle of Sussubio), Montefeltro, Acragio, Montecatini, Serra, Castel San Mariano, Bobro, Urbino, Cagli, Lucull, Agubbio, Comacchio, Narni; some even include the district from Lunel to Suria, with Corsica. Some (PEISTER; History of the Germans, v. 1, p. 403. SPITTLER; Hist., v. 2, p. 83) have pretended that the donation conferred only the use of the properties comprised in the mentioned districts, and not the sovereignty, which they declare to have been reserved by Pepin to himself and his successors; or, if the sovereignty was included, it was not really transferred (SISMUNDI; Ital. Repub., v. 1). How can this be, when the Lombards and the archbishop of Ravenna, having quarrelled with the Pope, robbed him of his jurisdiction, and not of his properties? Again, we see the Popes appointing judges and other functionaries in the cities donated (Caroline Codes, nos. 51, 54, 75). When Charlemagne, in 784, wished to take some ancient columns from Ravenna, he asked permission from the Pope. The Pontiffs, at that time, speak of "our city of Rome, our Roman people," knowing that they have taken the place of the exarchs. Nay, it can be proved, that, before the donation of Pepin, the Popes exercised jurisdiction, by popular consent, in many of those territories. Pepin acknowledged this, when he styled his donation a restitution. At this point historians deem themselves inevitably obliged to digress, and talk about the ambition of the Popes, about their greed of power and of wealth, about the evils which accrued to Italy because—through the fault of the Pontiffs—she did not fall entirely into the power of the foreigner. I have thought it not only permissible, but a duty, whenever history commands me to do so, to say the contrary to what mere opinion or force may wish; for I have never felt sufficient sympathy with tyranny, to deem it always in the right, simply because it is the owner of armies and of thrones. In this very matter, I am content with an investigation into the facts of the case. Behold, on the one side, the emperors of Constantinople, illegitimate successors of the ancient Cæsars, who have acquired Italy by conquest, and who have treated her like a conquered land, depriving her of her olden privileges. On the other hand, you have foreign kings (if, as some hold, they were not foreign, because they were long in possession, and because they possessed no authority in foreign parts, then the Turk is no foreigner to the Greek) who swear and forswear, devastate cities, exterminate populations, put everything to fire and sword. In front of all these, behold venerable priests, chosen by the people and from the people, who pray, write, make processions, send embassies, go in person—and all this, merely to implore peace and justice; when they raise a handful of troops, it is for simple defence. Before these three parties, desirous of preserving or of conquering Italy, I notice millions of Italians, whose destiny is to be decided, and who have been despoiled by the emperor and the kings, now praying and weeping with the Pope. How much have they not suffered under the dominion of that Greek, distant, irresolute, arrogant, a tyrant over consciences, a dominion made worse by the greed of ministers, who were obedient even to the extreme of becoming assassins. If a hope of arising out of their misery remained to the Italians, they could place it only in that Pontiff whom, for a long time, the Romans had regarded as their representative, as the defender of their rights, the only consoler of the oppressed, as he was the only person who dared to demand justice from the oppressors; that Pontiff whose very character made him just and amiable, and who caused the nations to yet venerate the Roman name, which, through the fault of others, had come to be despised. The will of a people did not then have, nor does it now have, much weight in the scales of politics; but history ought to observe, which is the cause, the triumph of which lessens the griefs and injustices suffered by that multitude of men which it too much neglects; history, at least after the lapse of ages has quieted the passions, ought to be written with unalterable justice, and ought to be cursed when it does not sympathize with the oppressed."—Univ. Hist., b. ix., c. 13.

(1) *Respublica Romanorum*compages S. Reipublicæcorpus Christo dilectum exercitus Romanus. ANASTASIUS LIBR.: Life of Gregory III.

Byzantine government. Finally, Pope Gregory III assumed the direction of affairs in Rome and its Duchy, maintained their de facto independence against the exarch of Ravenna, and sought the aid of Charles Martel, making him Patrician or Defender of Rome (1). The confines of the Duchy of Rome were, at this time, nearly identical with those of the modern province of Campagna di Roma.

Donation of Pepin (754).

Pope St. Stephen II. went to France in 753, begged the aid of Pepin against the Lombards, and at the assembly of Quercy-sur-Oise, was made the treaty given in the previous chapter. King Astolphus having failed in his promise to restore the territories stolen from the Holy See, Pepin besieged the Lombard in Pavia, and compelled him to yield. By this restitution and the donation of Pepin, the Popes acquired the Exarchate of Ravenna, which included the territory embracing, in modern times, the Ferrarese, the Bolognese, the Romagna, the Duchy of Urbino, and part of the March of Ancona. The Lombards retained possession of the Marches of Camerino and of Fermo, of the Duchies of Spoleto and Benevento, and of Tuscany.

Donation of Charlemagne (774) and Voluntary Choice of the Spoletans and Anconitans.

Anastasius tells us that the Spoletans and Anconitans, the people of Fermo and of other districts, voluntarily gave themselves in subjection to Pope Adrian I. Dom Vaisette (Geog. Eccles., v. 3) holds that the Duchy of Spoleto was given by Charlemagne; Lamartinière (Hist. Dict.) places this donation at 778, after the death of a Frankish duke named Henry, who had received Spoleto from Charlemagne. The province of Sabina is spoken of by Louis the Compliant, as "having been accorded, in its entirety, to the blessed Apostle Peter, by a written donation of our father, the Emperor Charles." By the donation of Charlemagne, or by the will of the peoples, or by both—for these two theories are easily reconciled—the Holy See possessed, not only the Exarchate, between the Adriatic and the Appenines, and from the mouth of the Adige to Ancona ; but Parma, Reggio and Modena; Perugia, Spoleto, Sabina, the Marches of Camerino and Chieti (Teate); and all that part of Tuscany that lies south of the Cecina, together with the territory between the Tuscan line and the Tiber.

(1) Ibid., b. 2, c. 99. FLEURY; b. 42.

Contests of the Pontiff-Kings with Roman Factions and the Emperors.

During the tenth and eleventh centuries the Papal States present changes as varied as those of a kaleidoscope. Most of the cities and fiefs are in the hands of turbulent lords who regard themselves as independent ; the great Countess Matilda alone possesses nearly all of central Italy. In 932, Alberic was really sovereign at Rome, the Pontifical authority being confined entirely to spirituals. In 1028, the duke of Spoleto becomes a simple governor, named by the Emperor. In 1047, the Normans seize Benevento, but are expelled by Henry III., who cedes the duchy to Pope Leo IX., in return for the feudal rights of the Holy See in the bishopric of Bamberg. The Normans defeat the Papal troops who, under Leo IX. in person, try to recover Benevento, but the same Normans afterwards conquer the duchy for Gregory VII. The Pontiffs Gregory VII., Victor III., Urban II., Paschal II., Gelasius II., Innocent II., Lucius II., Eugenius III., Adrian IV., Alexander III. and Lucius III., are exiled from Rome either by factions, or by the Emperors, in the struggle about investitures. For a moment, Rome becomes a republic under Arnold of Brescia. But the temporal power grows stronger abroad. The Norman conquerors of the Sicilies, Croatia, and Dalmatia (1076), Hungary and Corsica (1079) Provence (1081). Spain (1074), Portugal (1142), Denmark (1159), become vassals of the Pontiffs and pay tribute to them. The Countess Matilda gives all her territories to Pope St. Gregory VII., but dying in 1115, war ensues between Rome and the Emperor, because of her will. In 1120, Duke William does homage to Pope Calixtus II. for the Puglia and Calabria. In 1208, the duchy of Ferrara falls into the possession of the House of Este. In 1209, the Emperor Otho IV. yields part of Matilda's territories to Pope Innocent III., but this concession is soon revoked. In 1210, Salinguerra, who has seized the lordship of Ferrara, receives from Otho IV. twenty-four great fiefs in the Romagna; excommunicated by Innocent III., he receives the investiture from the Pontiff. In 1212, this Pope forces Marquard and Conrad to surrender the Duchy of Spoleto and the March of Ancona; he recovers the Patrimony of St. Peter (1), but cannot deprive the archbishop of Ravenna of the government of that city. He entirely restores the Papal sovereignty of Rome, the senate being no longer chosen by the people; he abolishes the dignity of Consul, and gives the Prefect that investiture which he used to receive from the Emperor.

Municipal and Feudal Italy in the 13th Century.

The Pope was, at this time, sovereign de jure of The Patrimony, the Campagna, the March of Ancona, the Duchy of Spoleto, southern Tuscany, the Sabina, and the Romagna; but in the Romagna, the March, and the Duchy, all the cities had submitted to tyrants who pretended to hold from the Emperor, and in reality acknowledged no superior. Even in the Campagna, many powerful families divided the political authority, and were always at war with the Pontiff. In fine, the States of the Church were a confused assemblage of independent cities, corporations, and lordships. Around Bologna, ruled the Geremii; around Ravenna, the Polenta; around Rimini, the Malatesta; around Urbino, the Montefeltri; the Sabina and the Campagna were divided among the Orsini, Colonna, Frangipani, Savelli, and Gaetani families; Bologna, Ravenna, Commachio, Imola, Faenza, Forli, Cesena Rimini, Urbino, were free cities. From Innocent III. (d. 1216) to Benedict XI. (el. 1303) the Pontiffs were nearly constantly exiled from the Eternal City. During this period, out of nineteen Popes, thirteen were elected outside Rome, and were not allowed to dwell in their capital. In 1221,

(1) This term is often loosely applied to the Roman States in their entirety, but it should be used only in reference to that portion lying between the Tiber and the modern Tuscan frontier.

the Emperor pretended to confer the Romagna upon two counts of Hohenlohe. In 1229, the count of Toulouse ceded the marquisate of Provence to the Holy See. In 1273, Philip III. gave the Venaissin and half of Avignon to Gregory X. In 1275, the family of Polenta seized upon the Romagna, but in 1278, Nicholas III. obliged the Emperor Rudolph to admit that this province belonged to the Holy See, and the city of Bologna submitted to the Pontiff. In 1281, Martin IV. named John d'Eppe, counsellor of the king of Sicily, count of the Romagna. In 1288, Nicholas IV. made John Colonna marquis of Ancona. and Stephen Colonna, in 1292, was made count of the Romagna, by the same Pontiff.

Period of the Papal Residence at Avignon (1309-1376).

Clement V. withdrew the lordship of Ferrara from the Venetians, and the marquises of the House of Este became vassals of the Holy See for that fief. The duchy of Urbino was restored to the Popes, in 1322. Parma was re-acquired, in 1326. In 1320, Bologna revolted, and resumed its republican form of government. In 1347-48, republic at Rome under Cola di Rienzo. In 1348, Clement VI. bought Avignon from Jane, queen of Naples. In 1353, Innocent VI. sent the legate, Alvarez Alborno, into Italy to recover all the territories of the Church. In 1376, end of the "Babylonian Captivity" at Avignon. Gregory XI. returned to the Eternal City, and finding the Lateran a ruin, he fixed his court at the Vatican.

The Popes Recover their Influence in Italy.

In 1392, the republic of Perugia submits to Pope Boniface IX., but, in 1416, the condottiere, Fortebraccio, establishes a principality and holds it for life. In 1420, Martin V. takes Bologna from the Bentivoglio. In 1440, the Venetians reduce the republic of Ravenna. In 1442, Perugia submits to Eugenius IV., but nearly all the cities of the Patrimony, of the Romagna, and of the March of Ancona, revolt, and fall under the sway of independent lords.

Nepotism ; Alienation of Papal Territories.

In 1456, Calixtus III. creates his nephew Peter duke of Spoleto. In 1471, and 84, Sinigaglia and Mondavio are made principalities by Sixtus IV., in favor of his nephew, John della Rovere ; Imola and Forlì are given to another nephew, Jerome Riario, while Frederick of Montefeltro is made duke of Urbino. In 1497, Alexander VI. makes a duchy of Benevento, for his son John, and in 1501, he makes his son Cæsar duke of Romagna.

Consolidation of the Papal Dominion (1).

In 1503, Julius II. expels the Borgias from the Romagna, and from 1504 to 1506, he takes from them many places in the March of Ancona. He also deprives the Bentivoglio of Bologna, and the Baglioni of Perugia. In 1509, Ravenna, and in 1511, Parma and Piacenza, are restored to the Holy See. In 1515, Leo X. cedes Parma and Piacenza to Francis I.

(1) Cantù thus speaks of the change which, about this period, was effected in the government of the Papal States: "In accordance with the ideas of the Middle Age, so opposed to that absolutism of the State which has been introduced by the moderns, the Popes used to carry on their government in union with the people, that is, with the Roman Republic. When the Pontiffs were far away, this Republic so prevailed, that Cola cited the emperor and electors of Germany to account for their titles to the Roman people. It was the cardinal Albornoz (1353) who tried to establish a true sovereignty, after the fashion that was then becoming general ; he destroyed the petty lords, recovered the cities—glad to obey the Pontiff, rather than these tyrants—and with his Egidian Constitutions, he guaranteed many privileges ; taking care, nevertheless, to secure a free exercise of sovereignty, by means of a union of the provinces. These Constitutions remained the real public law of the Romagna, they were printed in 1472, and afterwards, with various additions. The Holy See, conforming itself to the ideas of kingscraft then becoming prevalent, endeavored to enlarge its prerogatives, while the provinces jealously clung to their own statutes: the Pontifical sovereignty remained, after the ancient manner, nominal, rather than despotic. Affairs continued in this state until the revolution of 1797, which dispossessed the Pope ; afterwards, the restoration of 1814 reinstated him. The adversaries of the temporal dominion endeavor to show that this government of the Popes used to be exercised, only in dependence from the imperial supremacy. Let us ignore all history, and accept this assertion of the royalists. But in 1804, the Holy Roman Empire had ceased to be, and all the powers that had derived from it were declared to be possessed of full authority : in the Congress of 1815 (Vienna), it was agreed that all mediate jurisdiction should cease, and that each government should enjoy full and independent sovereignty. Therefore, the Popes also became absolute masters of their State, as far as the kings were concerned. In regard to their people, the Popes should have respected the privileges conceded of old, and hitherto maintained. But these privileges had been abolished by the unlimited sway of the usurpers, accustomed to unconditional despotism ; and the restorers—enemies to history, as are all who wish to tyrannize—wished that, especially in Italy, no constitutions or written rights of the people should exist. Therefore they compelled the Pope to become an absolute king, just as they were, and it was then that the cardinal Consalvi, not adverse to the new ideas, caused the Pope to issue the motu proprio, which systematized the public administration under a general law, instead of the multifarious and partial ones of old ; from the centre had to issue all appointments of magistrates, edicts financial enactments ; of all the modern ravings, only one—the law of conscription—was not actuated, and yet that one was indispensable. If the others were to be kept in force. Absolutism, therefore, was an entirely new thing in the Papal dominions, and when Pius IX. initiated and blessed the Italian movement, he protested, in the Constitution of March 14, 1848, that he did nothing but 'restore some ancient institutions, which were, for a long time, the mirror of the wisdom of our august predecessors,' and that, 'in the olden time, our Communes had the privilege of governing themselves, under laws chosen by themselves, with the sovereign sanction.' Behold one of the thousand proofs that liberty is old, and despotism new ; but to-day, all moral and political sense being lost, the name of one is bestowed on the other."—Heretics of Italy, Discourse VIII.

of France. In 1519, this Pontiff re-acquires Urbino, and in 1520, Perugia. In 1530, Parma and Piacenza are re-annexed. In 1532, the March of Ancona is definitively annexed. In 1597, Clement VIII. takes possession of Ferrara, the ducal house being extinct. In 1626, the duke of Urbino gives all his territories to the Holy See, viz., the duchy of Urbino, the counties of Montefeltro and Gubbio, the lordship of Pesaro, and the vicariate of Sinigaglia. In 1663, the county of Avignon is seized by the French, but is restored in 1664; again seized in 1687, it is restored in 1690; seized, for the third time, in 1768, it is restored in 1774.

Treaty of Tolentino, Feb. 19, 1797.

By this treaty the Papal sovereignty lost the Bolognese, the Ferrarese, and the Romagna, which were incorporated into the "Cis-alpine Republic," and also the counties of Avignon and the Venaissin, which were reunited to France. In Feb., 1808, Napoleon I. occupied Rome; and in April the territories of Ancona, Macerata, Fermo, and Urbino, were united to the "Kingdom of Italy." In May, 1809, the rest of the Papal dominions were annexed to the French empire. The Congress of Vienna restored, in 1815, all the dominions of the Holy See, excepting Avignon and the Venaissin, which remained definitively united to France.

Unitarian Movement of 1859.

The Franco-Sardinian war against Austria, in 1859, entailed the evacuation of Bologna by the Austrians on June 12th, whereupon the Romagna rebelled against the Papal authority, and was annexed to the Sardinian kingdom in March, 1860. In the following summer, Umbria and the Marches revolted, and after the short campaign of Castelfidardo, Ancona capitulated to the Sardinians on Sept. 29. The Papal dominion was now reduced to the Patrimony, the Sabina, and the Campagna. On Sept. 20, 1870, Rome itself was occupied by the troops of Victor Emmanuel.

CHAPTER XLII.

ST. BONIFACE, APOSTLE OF GERMANY.

The student who is desirous of a knowledge of the first attempts to convert the tribes of Germany to the faith is referred to the learned work of Mamachi, entitled Christian Origins and Antiquities, b. 2, chap. 20. Of these early endeavors we shall only remark that but little progress was made until the eighth century, when these barbaric hordes were destined to be enlightened by some offshoots of their own race, some of that sturdy Saxon stock which had hurled its barbarism against the isle of Britain, but had there attained a knowledge of Christianity and of civilization. The first Anglo-Saxon who carried the cross into the home of his ancestors was St. Wilfrid. Landing on the coast of Friesland in 675 (1), he succeeded in converting several chieftains and some thousands of their followers (2). Wilfrid's mission among the Frisians was, however, only temporary, as he was on his way to Rome to plead his cause, his zeal having exiled him from England. The first permanent missions in Germany were established by Egbert, a Northumbrian priest who had been educated in Ireland. Confining his own exertions to the western islands, he at first sent Wigbert into Friesland, but in two years this missionary returned to Ireland with a lamentable tale of failure. The hopes of Egbert were soon revived by the news that the Franks, under Pepin of Herstal, had conquered South Friesland. He thought that as Pepin was a Christian, he would second the efforts of those who aimed at evangelizing, and therefore civilizing, his new subjects. St. Willibrord, and twelve disciples from Ireland, were therefore sent, to meet with better success than their predecessor (3). So numerous were the con-

(1) This name was applied to the Germanic countries bordering the North Sea.

(2) EDDIUS: chap. 25.

(3) From his infancy, Willibrord was educated by the Irish monks of Ripon, and he afterwards studied Scripture twelve years in Ireland.

verts of this apostolic band, that Pope Sergius consecrated Willibrord as bishop of Utrecht, making him metropolitan of Friesland, with authority to create a competent number of suffragans. Swidbert, one of these Saxon missionaries, labored among the Boructuarii, the inhabitants of the modern duchy of Berg. Adelbert, a royal prince of Northumbria, had great success in North Holland. Werenfrid converted the Batavi, a tribe that inhabited the island formed by the Rhine and the Wahal. Wiro (1), Plechelm, and Otger, labored among the people of Gueldres. But none of these warriors of the cross met with that success which crowned the efforts of him who was destined to be called the "Apostle of Germany." St. Boniface, according to English writers, who seem unconscious of any possibility of doubt in the matter, was a West Saxon, and born about 680 at Crediton in Devonshire. Certain Irish writers, however, and among them the learned Dr. Moran (2) as confidently assert that the great missionary was an Irishman. Marianus Scotus, a good authority in such a matter, plainly says that he was "Irish, both by father and mother." Considering, however, that his disciple, Willibald, first bishop of Achstat, tells us in the Life of Boniface that the saint studied, when about thirteen years of age, under Wolphard in the monastery of Exeter, and that he afterwards completed his scholastic course at Nutselle in Winchester, we would give England the credit of his training, and regard his nationality as uncertain. Although certain Protestant authors affect to sneer at what they call the ignorance of Boniface, he seems to have acquired such knowledge as the civilized world could at that time impart; for he was appointed a professor at Nutselle, and his school was greatly frequented. As the monasteries were then the only sources of knowledge in England, it is safe to conclude that the scholastic attainments of Boniface were superior to those of most Englishmen of the day. After his ordination to the priesthood, he became a member of the great council of the nation : and Ina, king of Wessex, gave him his confidence to such an extent that, had he been ambitious, he might have received the highest preferments. But the spirit of the Apostolate was alive in the heart of the young priest, and with the reluctant consent of his abbot, Wibert, he set out in 716, accompanied by three companions, for Friesland. But his mission was in vain. Pepin was dead, and his son Charles was opposed by a rival, while Radbode of the independent Frisians was profiting by the opportunity to reconquer the provinces which Pepin had annexed. Paganism was again triumphant in Friesland, and Boniface deemed it prudent to return, and to await in England a more propitious occasion. Soon, however, he set out for Rome to consult with Pope Gregory II., taking with him a recommendatory letter from Daniel, bishop of Winchester. The Pontiff was so impressed with the zeal of Boniface, that he advised him to make Germany the field of his labors, and dismissed him with letters to the princes whose territories he would be obliged to cross. Arriving in Thuringia, he found many nominal Christians who yet retained the habits of Paganism, and were led by a clergy, few in number, ignorant, and irregular in morals. He at once busied himself in the work of instruction and reformation, but hearing of the successes of the Franks in Friesland, he resolved to return to the people of his first choice. For three years he now labored under the direction of Willibrord, and it was only on the discovery that this prelate designed to make him his successor in the see of Utrecht, that he fled and betook himself to the country of the Hessians and Old Saxons.

(1) Irish writers claim Wiro as their countryman. Alcuin, however, styles him an Anglo-Saxon. Some Irish authors also claim Plechelm and Otger for Ireland.

(2) Moran quotes as proof the monuments published in reference to German history by Pertz, vol. 7; Chronicle of Mariannus, years 737, 745, 762, 765; Tentamen Vitae of St. Gall. Trithemius, he says, also refers St. Boniface to Ireland. See Early Irish Church, i. 3. c. 3. Lingard, who in many other cases carefully notes Irish claims to those he regards as Saxons, makes no allusion to any doubt in the matter. See Anglo-Saxon Church, chap. 13. Butler is similarly unsuspicious of any uncertainty on the point. See Lives.

In a few years, Pope Gregory II. heard that many thousands of these barbarians had been brought into the fold, and he summoned our saint to Rome in 723. When he was fully informed as to the state and needs of the German mission, the Pontiff resolved to confer upon Boniface the episcopal dignity. Willibald says that it was on this occasion that the Pope changed our saint's own name of Winfrid to that of Boniface, by which name he is now generally known (1). Having taken the usual oath of obedience to the Holy See (2), he returned to Hesse.

St. Boniface now set himself to the task of obtaining recruits for his little army of preachers. His letters to the bishops and abbots of England resulted in a reinforcement of many zealous assistants. "No motives," says Lingard, "but those of the purest zeal could have supported them under the numerous privations and dangers to which they were continually exposed. Bread, indeed, they were able to obtain from the gratitude of their neophytes, and the menaces of the Franks protected them from the insults of the vanquished barbarians, who refused to listen to their doctrine; but for clothing, and almost every other necessary, they were compelled to depend on the casual benevolence of their distant friends; and the fruits of their labors were frequently destroyed, and their lives endangered, by the hostilities of the tribes that still retained the religion and independence of their fathers. By one incursion no less than thirty churches were levelled with the ground" (3). In a few years were founded the great monasteries of Fritzlar, Amelburg, and Fulda, and the monks placed under the strict rule of St. Benedict. By their means, cultivated ground soon took the place of the forest, and cultivated minds were engendered among what soon began to assume the semblance of a people. Boniface did not neglect the training of women. He begged Tetta, abbess of Winburn, to send him some of her Sisters for so important an object, and so many English ladies volunteered, that he soon beheld the wild daughters of Germany under the humanizing influence of Lioba at Bischofsheim, of Tecla at Chitzengen,

(1) The saint's letters show that he used both names conjointly, many years before his consecration.

(2) The oath which was exacted, at this time, by the Roman Pontiffs, is preserved in the Diurnal of the Pontiffs. In the first part, the bishop swears to protect the faith, unity, and interests of the Church. In the second, he avows allegiance to the emperor, and promises to oppose treason, and to inform the Pope of any such he may discover. This second part was modified when the conversion of the northern barbarians changed the circumstances of the bishops in those parts. Thus, Gregory the Great caused the Lombard prelates to swear, instead of allegiance to the emperor to contribute to all just peace between their nation and the Roman empire. At the consecration of St. Boniface, another change was made. Many of the French bishops were living in an open violation of the canons; hence Boniface swore that he would not communicate with them, but would endeavor to reform them, and failing in this that he would denounce them to the Holy See. Mosheim takes occasion of this oath to carp at Boniface, as a flatterer of the Pontiff. Where the flattery lies, he would not be able to show. The saint merely obeyed a legitimate order, and one meant for that reformation Mosheim so lauds.

(3) Epistles of St. Boniface nos. 91 and 92.

of Walpurga at Heidenheim, of Chunihild in Thuringia, and of Chunitrude in Bavaria. In 732, Gregory III. mounted the Papal throne; and he soon sent the pallium to Boniface, and made him primate of all Germany. In 738, our saint visited Rome for the third time, and was appointed Apostolic legate to France and Germany. On his return, he paused awhile in Bavaria, at the request of Duke Odilo, to reform several abuses; he there established the sees of Salzburg, Freisingheim, and Ratisbon, the Pope ratifying the act in 739. About this time, he also founded the sees of Erford in Thuringia, Baraburg in Hesse (since translated to Paderborn), Wurtzburg in Franconia, and Achstat in Bavaria. In the year 751, St. Boniface took a prominent part in a most important revolution. The weak Merovingian kings of the Franks had for a long time held merely the royal title, while their "mayors of the palace" exercised the real power of the crown. Pepin resolved to do away with the shadow, and accordingly, Childeric, last of the race of Clovis, was relegated to a monastery, and Pepin hailed by the nation as king of the Franks. When St. Boniface, as Apostolic legate, was requested to crown the new king, he hesitated, but the estates of the realm applied to Pope Zachary, who had succeeded Gregory III. in 741, and that Pontiff answered that it was better that he should be king who really exercised the royal power. Pepin was then crowned at Soissons.

The thirty-nine letters which have come down to us testify to the indefatigable zeal of St. Boniface, and that he had always in view the greater glory of God. His epistles are all written in Latin, although the language in most parts of Germany was almost the same as that of the English Saxons of that day. In 754, the saint resolved upon a final effort to convert the Pagans of Friesland. Availing himself of the privilege granted by Pope Zachary, he consecrated as his successor in the see of Mentz, an English monk named Lullus. He then resigned his diocese, and Pope Stephen II. acquiescing, and confirming the nomination of Lullus, he took a few companions, and set out on his last mission. Miraculous success attended his labors, and several thousand idolaters were received into the Church. The eve of Pentecost was appointed for their confirmation, and the open plains of Dockum fixed for the assembly. Here he had pitched his tent, and was awaiting the arrival of the converts, when a horde of ferocious infidels appeared in the plain, and by their cries showed the hostility of their intentions. The attendants of the missionary wished to defend his and their own lives, but he exhorted them to remember that this was the day they had so long desired. The entire band, fifty-three in number, of whom two were bishops, three priests, three deacons, four monks, and the rest laymen, were then put to the sword. The only plunder found by the butchers consisted of relics and books, which they scattered about the fields. Three of these latter were afterwards recovered, and preserved in the monastery of Fulda; namely, a Book of the Gospels written by our saint, a Harmony of the New Testament, and a volume containing the letter of Pope St. Leo to Theodore of Frejus, the discourse of St. Ambrose on the Holy Ghost, and a treatise by this holy doctor on The Advantage of Death.

The courage, zeal, and success of St. Boniface were unquestionable, and his devotion to the Holy See so evident, that Protestant writers have not as yet endeavored, as in the cases of St. Patrick and St. Augustine, to prove that his doctrine was other than that of Rome. But his evident "popery" has been productive of attacks on his motives, and even on his good name. Mosheim (1) tells us that "Boniface merited the title of Apostle of the Germans, because of his many labors for Christ, nor will a fair-minded inquirer deem him unworthy of the name. But in many ways he departed from the example left us by the first and true Apostles. To say nothing of his zeal for the dignity and majesty of the Roman Pontiff, whose legate and minister he was, which equalled, if it did not surpass, his care for the glory of Jesus Christ, he did not always oppose superstition with the arms adopted by the ancient Apostles, but frequently subjugated the minds of men by force and by fear, and even by artifice and fraud. His letters betray an imperious and arrogant character, a cunning and deceitful spirit, an excessive desire to increase the prerogatives of the priestly order, and a profound ignorance of many things necessary for an Apostle, and of much that pertains to the true genius of the Christian religion." St. Boniface and his companions, according to Mosheim, were the preachers, not of Christianity, but of popery; rather than ambassadors of Christ, they were emissaries and slaves of Rome; in murdering them, the barbarous but patriotic Germans did a very natural and praiseworthy thing. The head and front of St. Boniface's offending is his popery. But what other system could he have preached? Certainly not that of Luther and Calvin, eight hundred years before its time. In the Catholic faith as taught by Rome he had been raised and trained; he as firmly held it, as did the millions of Christians of the time; it is absurd then to reproach him for teaching the same faith in the infant churches of Germany. Had he done otherwise, he would have indeed merited reproach as one false to his mission. If his letters breathe a spirit of devotion to the Holy See which appears extravagant to the colder hearts of our day, we must remember that this spirit was the very life of Christendom at that period; that in the eighth century the authority of Rome extended to more objects than it now embraces (1). As for the accusation that St. Boniface was more zealous for the dignity and aggrandizement of the Roman See than for the glory of God, all his acts go to show that he regarded the glory of God as principally increased, upon this earth, by those who obey the institutions which He founded. In common with all Catholic missionaries, he was convinced that the Pope was Christ's vicar on earth, and he could not preach the Christian religion, without inculcating respect for him upon whom, as upon the rock, was built the Church which had care of that religion.

(1) History, 8th Cent., p. 1, c. I, § 4.

(1) "The Pontifical authority reached its greatest development when Europe, devastated by the barbarians, was cut up into many sovereignties, fell into ignorance and into the anarchy of feudalism, lost her customs, her laws and her police, having for masters only ferocious and vicious soldiers, who knew no other right than that of the stronger. Of what use, in moving such men, would have been prayer, exhortation, paternal advice? Menaces and censures were necessary, force had to be opposed to force, and often one faction had to be armed to reduce another. If we attempt to judge those times by our own, if we persuade ourselves that those people could be governed as we now govern, we deceive ourselves, and all declamations based upon this principle are empty. The power of the Popes has become much more limited as things have changed, and as order has been re-established." BERGIER; Dictionary, art. Popes, § III.

St. Boniface is charged with having employed force and terror to convert the German barbarians. When Mosheim makes this accusation, one would expect some proof; for it is difficult to picture St. Boniface in the guise of a Mohammedan fanatic or of a Puritan trooper, as the German historian perforce incites us to do. Does he show us the English apostle forcing the barbarians into the Church, by means of the troops of Charles Martel? The sole protection which the Hammerer and his sons, Carloman and Pepin, gave to our missionary, was what was necessary for the foundation of bishoprics, monasteries, and schools. And where was the force of this world on that glorious eve of Pentecost, when the Friesland Pagans attacked him and his fifty-two companions, as he was about to confirm his neophytes in the faith? Some of his followers would fain have sold their lives dearly, but St. Boniface bade them meet their death as a thing long desired, for it was the gate of everlasting life. He had already said (1): "If it be the will of God, let us die for the holy laws of our fathers, that we may arrive with them at the eternal inheritance. Let us not be dumb dogs, sleeping sentinels, hirelings who fly at the sight of the wolf, but watchful and diligent pastors; preaching to the great and small, to the rich and poor, to every age and condition, being instant in season and out of season." Mosheim declares that St. Boniface made use of "artifice and fraud" to make converts; that he was "cunning and deceitful." Of artifice and fraud we can find no trace, nor does Mosheim produce any instance of such practices. If the Protestant historian designates as "frauds" the saint's veneration for relics, his preaching on indulgences, purgatory, miracles, etc., he should show us some probable ground for supposing that Boniface did not himself believe in them. This cannot be shown; nay, the saint gave the best proof of his good faith when he yielded up his life in attestation of it. If, as Mosheim alleges, St. Boniface was "imperious and arrogant," his letters ought to manifest something of such a spirit. But while they breathe zeal and Apostolic firmness, they are full of charity and of Gospel sweetness. He was strong in defence of the sacerdotal prerogatives, and so was St. Paul: "As long indeed as I am the Apostle of the Gentiles, I will honor my ministry." Rom. XI. v. 13. And: "Let no man despise thee." Tit. II. v. 15. It is certain that St. Boniface was far less domineering in his rule over the churches of his foundation, than were Luther and Calvin towards those whom they perverted. While yet in the fullness of his strength, he appointed a successor to his see of Mentz, and went off to continue his labors among the idolaters. For the rest, the authority which he claimed for bishops was simply that which was recognized as their right by the Christendom of the time. When Mosheim tells us that St. Boniface was "profoundly ignorant of much that pertains to the true genius of the Christian religion," he must mean that the saint was innocent of any knowledge of that genius which Protestantism was yet to develop. This is certainly true. Brucker ventures to blame St. Boniface for not having taught philosophy to the German barbarians; he finds fault with the Benedictine scholars for attributing erudition to the saint, and because they praise him for founding the schools of Fulda and of Fritzlar. No one contends that St. Boniface was a great philosopher, and if he had been, the Germans of that day could scarcely appreciate metaphysics before they had learned to read. But Brucker alleges a proof of our saint's ignorance which merits more than a passing notice.

(1) Epistle to Cuthbert of Canterbury.

This proof of ignorance lies in the fact, according to Brucker, or rather Aventin of Bavaria, that St. Boniface condemned his fellow-missionary, the Irishman Virgil (Ferghil) for having asserted the existence of Antipodes, that is, of men on the other side of the earth. If this accusation were well founded, it is no more a proof of ignorance in our saint, than would be, in the case of Brucker's idolized Luther, his want of acquaintance with the telephone. All the ancient philosophers, as well as many of the fathers of the Church, deemed the earth to be flat. Some (1) of the latter certainly manifest a knowledge of cosmography greater than that of their time, and show that they knew that the earth was round. Such was the opinion of St. Basil the Great, of the two Gregorys of Nyssa and Nazianzen, of Athanasius, and many others. But it is worse than hypercritical to blame St. Boniface for not being seven hundred years ahead of his time in matters of cosmography (1). However, there are several points to be considered before we grant even this excusable ignorance in our saint. The author (2) of a Dissertation printed in the Memoires of Trévoux, Jan., 1708, proves that the fact alleged by Aventin is not certain. The only foundation for it is in a letter of Pope Zachary to St. Boniface: "If it is shown that Virgil holds that there is another world, and that there are other men under this earth, another sun and another moon, convoke a synod, condemn him, deprive him of the priesthood, and expel him from the Church." But there is no proof that this order was executed. The accusation may have been found baseless, or Virgil may have proved the orthodoxy of his sentiments, showing that his words had been misinterpreted. At any rate, it is certain that Virgil lived thereafter in the friendship of the Roman Pontiff, and of St. Boniface; that he was made bishop of Salzburg, and that he was finally canonized; all which certainly proves that he was not condemned for heresy. Again, continues this author, St. Boniface was right in his condemnation of Virgil, if that missionary held, as other Antipodarians had held, that under this world there were other men, of a different species than our own, one, that is, not of the race of Adam, and not subject to the guilt of original sin. Such a paradox would have been contrary to Holy Writ, and it was in this sense only that St. Augustine rejected the theory of the Antipodes (3). "It is true," says Leibnitz (4), "that Boniface, Archbishop of Mentz, accused Virgil of Salzburg of error in this matter, and that the Pontiff replied to his letter in a manner which showed that he greatly leaned towards the

(1) PHILOPONTUS; Creation of the World, b. 5, c. 13.

(1) D'Alembert, in the great Encyclopedie, insists particularly on this proof of ignorance, both in St. Boniface and in Pope St. Zachary, to whom the case of Virgil was referred. See Vol. 1, Art. Antipodes. Also, Baronio, y. 744.

(2) F. Edward de Vitry, S. J.

(3) City of God, b. 16.

(4) Spirit of Leibnitz, v. 2.

views of Boniface, but we discover no consequences of the accusation. The two antagonists are regarded as saints, and the learned of Bavaria, who look upon Virgil as the apostle of Carinthia and the neighboring regions, have justified his memory" (1).

(1) "We should pause for a moment to consider, in this great man, one of those heroic lives that influence the destinies of nations. His life is a compendium of the revolution which fills many centuries. Wrapped in absolute barbarism, the Germans had been surrounded, for four hundred years, by the institutions of Christian society; bishops and monks had vainly endeavored to educate these ignorant tribes. How could the faith become mistress of these intellects enslaved by the senses? How could the faith subdue such irregular wills? Their old instincts were showing themselves in slaughter in robbery and in carousals; after thirty Catholic kings, the Franks were returning to idolatry; the sacrifices of Woden reddened the altar of Christ; and perhaps, in a short time, there would have remained only a slight remembrance of the Gospel, as of one more fable in the Mythology of the North. Such would have been the end of Christianity, had it been left to the free genius of the Germans. The barbarians could be educated only under guardianship. Their unruly spirits would bow only to the ascendancy of a great power; such was that of the Popes, who manifested that paternal character which is derived from their divine institution; who had the strength of ideas, who were accustomed to govern, and who had the prestige of time and distance and the majesty of the Latin name. By these means the Pontiffs had mastered the Franks, and through them, other peoples. It was a decisive moment when Gregory II. dictated to bishop Boniface the oath of fidelity. Rome then witnessed the fulfillment of what she had foreseen when Alaric restored, in pomp, the sacred vessels to St. Peter's basilica; she saw her empire again extended over the nations that had overthrown it; she saw a Saxon bishop kneeling, in the name of Germany, at the feet of a Roman citizen and arising, a legate of the Vatican—a proconsul of the new era, who was to introduce, without the aid of victors or of soldiery, the legislative genius of the old Senate among his people. For thirty-seven years Boniface carried out the designs of the Roman policy; an active correspondence with the Holy See, and twenty-four letters of Popes Gregory II., Gregory III. and Zachary, show us the fruitful docility of this great spirit. The northerners accepted the beneficent rule, imposed upon them, not by the eagle, but under the symbols of the dove and the lamb, and put an end to their four centuries of hesitancy between the Gospel and idolatry. The Apostolic legate renewed the unction on the brows of the Austrasian dukes; the Franks, confirmed in their mission, found themselves as God had wished them to be, defenders of the Church, continuators of the Romans, and an insuperable barrier to invasion. The past and the future, all times and all powers, appeared united to prepare the Catholic period of the Middle Age."—CANTÜ; History, Documents, art. Sts. Columbanus and Boniface.

APPENDIX.

CHRONOLOGICAL TABLE

Of the Roman Pontiffs, Emperors, Principal Councils, Ecclesiastical Writers, and Heretics.

FIRST CENTURY.

Popes. Date of Election.	Emperors. Date of Death.	Eccl. Writers.	Heretics.
St. Peter's See at Rome, y.	42 Augustus, y. Tiberius,	14 Denis the Areopagite. 37 St. Clement, Pope.	Simon Magus. Gnostics.
	Caligula,	41 Hermas.	Corinthians.
	Claudius,	54	Nazareans.
St. Linus,	66 Nero,	68	Ebionites.
	Galba, Otho, and Vitellius,	69	Nicolaites.
St. Cletus,	78 Vespasian,	79	Menander.
	Titus,	81	Hymeneus.
St. Clement,	91 Domitian,	96	Philetus.
	Nerva,	98

COUNCILS:

Jerusalem, 51 Antioch, (supposed) 58

SECOND CENTURY.

Popes. Date of Election.	Emperors. Date of Death.	Eccl. Writers.	Heretics.
St. Evarist,	100 Trajan,	117 St. Ignatius, of Anti-	Helcesaites.
St. Alexander,	109	och.	Saturnine, Basilides,
St. Sixtus I,	119	St. Papias.	Carpocrates.
St. Telesphorus,	127	St. Polycarp.	Adamites.
St. Hyginus,	139	St. Aristides.	Valentine, Apelles.
St. Pius I,	142	St. Quadratus.	Cerdo, Praxeas.
St. Anicetus,	157 Antonine,	161 St. Justin.	Marcion.
St. Soter,	168 Marcus Aurellus,	180 Athenagoras.	Ophites, Sethiens, and
St. Eleutherius,	177 Commodus,	192 St. Melito.	Cainites.
St. Victor,	193 Pertinax,	193 St. Apollinaris.	Quartodecimans.
		St. Irenæus.	Marcosians.
		St. Clement of Alex-	Tatian.
		andria.	Bardesanes.
		St. Theophilus of An-	Montanus.
		tioch.	Theodotians.
		Hermias.	Melchisedechians.
		Hegesippus.	Millenarians.

COUNCILS:

Sicily,	125 In the East,	160 Lyons, Ephesus,	Rome,	198
Rome,	140 Rome,	170 Corinth, Cæsarea	Mesopotamia,	198
Pergamus,	152 Hierapolis,	173 of Palestine,	197 Lyons.	199

THIRD CENTURY.

Popes.	Emperors.	Ecc. Writers.	Heretics.
Date of Election.	Date of Death.
St. Zephyrinus, 202	Severus, 211	Minutius Felix.	Noetus.
St. Calixtus I, 219	Caracalla, 217	Julius Africanus.	Novatians.
St. Urban I, 223	Macrinus, 218	Caius.	Rebaptizers.
St. Pontianus, 230	Heliogabalus, 222	Tertullian.	Sabellius.
St. Antherus, 235	Alexander, 235	Ammonius Saccas.	Patripassians.
St. Fabian, 236	Maximin I, 238	St. Hippolytus.	Paul of Samosata.
	Two Gordians, Max- imus & Balbin- us, Gordian III, 238	Origen.	Manicheans.
St. Cornelius, 251	Philip, 249	St. Dionysius (Alex.).
St. Lucius I, 252	Decius, 252	St. Dionysius (Pope).
St. Stephen I, 253	Gallus, 253	St. Gregory (Thaum).
St. Sixtus II, 257	Valerian, 260	St. Anatolius of Laodicea.
St. Dionysius, 259	Gallienus ; the 30 tyrants, 268
St. Felix I, 269	Claudius I., Aurelian, 270
St. Eutychian, 275	Tacitus, 276
St. Caius, 282	Probus, 282
St. Marcellinus, 296	Carus, 283
	Numerian, 284

COUNCILS :

Carthage, 215	Arabia, 249	Antioch, 253	Antioch, 264
" 217	Achaia, 250	Carthage, 253	Rome, 268
Alexandria, 223	Rome, 250	Antioch, 256	" 268
" 235	" 250	Narbonne, 257	" 269
Rome, 237	Carthage, 251	Alexandria, 258	Ancyra (Galatia), 273
Philadelphia, 242	Rome, 252	Rome, 260	Ancyra (Syria), 277
Ephesus, 245	Carthage, 252	Alexandria, 263	Mesopotamia, 277

FOURTH CENTURY.

Popes.	Emperors.	Ecc. Writers.	Heretics.
Date of Election.	Date of Death.
	Diocletian & Maxim- ian abdicate, 305	Arnobius.	Donatists.
St. Marcellus I, 308	Constantius Chlor- us, 306	St. Pamphylus.	Arians.
St. Eusebius, 310	Severus, 307	Lactantius.	Photinus.
St. Miltiades, 311	Galerius, 311	Eusebius of Caesarea.	Macedonians.
St. Sylvester, 314	Maxentius, Maximin, Licinius (East), 324	Hosius of Cordova.	Aerians.
St. Mark, 326	Constantine, 337	St. Hilary of Poitiers.	Apollinarists.
St. Julius I, 337	Constantine II, Constans, 350	St. Eusebius of Vercelli.	Collyridians.
Liberius, 352	Constantius, 361	Lucifer of Cagliari.	Priscillianists.
St. Damasus, 366	Julian the Apos- tate, 363	St. Athanasius.	Messalians.
St. Siricius, 385	Jovian, 364	The two Apollinarii.	Ithacians.
St. Anastasius I, 398	Valentinian I, Gratian, 393	St. Basil.	Helvidius.
	Valentinian II, 392	St. Ephrem.	Jovinian.
	Eastern Emperors.	Optatus of Milevi.	Vigilantius.
	Valens, 378	St. Damasus (Pope).
	Theodosius, 395	St. Cyril (Jerusalem).
		St. Gregory Nazian- zen.
		St. Gregory of Nyssa.
		St. Pacian.
		St. Philaster.
		St. Ambrose.
		St. Epiphanius.
		Rufinus.
		St. Gaudensius.
		Sulpicius Severus.
		Evagrius.
		St. Jerome.
		St. Augustine.
		St. Paulinus of Nola.

COUNCILS :

Elvira, 305	Neo-Cæsarea, 314	Alexandria, 321	Carthage, 333
Alexandria, 308	Alexandria, 315	Gangres, 324	Rome, 337
Carthage, 311	Palestine, 318	Rome, 324	Alexandria, 340
Rome, 313	Alexandria, 319	Nice (1st Gen.), 325	Antioch, 341
Aries, 314	Rome, 320	Rome, 325	Rome, 342
Ancyra, 314	Laodicea, 320	Alexandria, 330	Milan, 344 or 346

COUNCILS (CENT. IV).—Continued.

Antioch,	345	Alexandria,	363	Milan,	380	Milan,	390
Cologne,	346	Antioch,	363	Suragossa,	380	Carthage,	390
Sardica,	347	Laodicea,	364	Constantinople,	381	Constantinople,	390
Milan,	347	Illyria,	365	(2d Gen.),	381	Carthage,	393
Cordova,	347	Cæsarea,	365	Aquileia,	381	Hippo,	393
Jerusalem,	348	Rome,	366	Rome,	382	Cabarsussit,	393
Rome,	349	Sicily,	366	Constantinople,	382	Constantinople,	394
Jerusalem,	350	Tyana,	366	Sida,	383	Carthage,	394
Bazas,	351	Rome,	367	Constantinople,	383	Hadrumetta,	394
Rome,	352	Rome,	367	Antioch,	383	Caverre,	394
Poitiers,	355	Rome,	368	Nîmes,	383	Hippo,	394
Milan,	355	Rome,	369	Bordeaux,	385	Turin,	397
Ancyra,	358	Rome,	370	Rome,	386	Carthage,	397
Rome,	358	Illyria,	373	Treves,	386	Carthage,	398
Bimini,	359	Rome,	373	Zelle,	386	Carthage,	399
Achaia,	359	Valence, (Dauph-),	374	Antioch,	388	Alexandria,	399
Paris,	360	Gangres,	375	Toledo,	388	Cyprus,	399
Antioch,	360	Antioch,	375	Capua,	389	Constantinople,	401
Alexandria,	362	Antioch,	377	Carthage,	389	Rome,	401
Constantinople,	362	Rome,	378	Rome,	390	Toledo,	406
Paris,	362	Antioch,	379

FIFTH CENTURY.

Popes.	Emperors.	Eccl. Writers.	Heretics.
Date of Election.	Date of Death.
St. Innocent I., 402	Honorius, 423	St. Chrysostom,	Pelagius.
St. Zosimus, 417	Valentinian III., 455	St. Cyril (Alex.),	Nestorius.
St. Boniface I., 418	Maximus, 455	St. Prosper,	Eutyches.
St. Celestine I., 422	Avitus, 456	St. Vincent & Lerins,	Predestinationists
St. Sixtus III., 422	Majorian, 461	Paulus Orosius,	Peter Fulio.
St. Leo the Great, 440	Severus, 465	Prudentius,	Theopaschites.
St. Hilary, 446	Anthemius, 472	Cassian,
St. Simplicius, 468	Glycerius (deposed in), 472	St. Eucherius,
St. Felix II., 483	Julius Nepos (deposed in), 475	Claudian Mamert.
St. Gelasius, 492	Romulus Augustulus (deposed in), 476	St. Hilary of Arles,
St. Anastasius II., 496		Theodoret,
St. Symmachus, 498		Socrates,
		Sozomenus,
		St. Leo the Great,
		St. Maximus of Turin.
		St. Peter Chrysologus, Salvianus,
		St. Nilus,
		Synesius, Gennadius.
	Eastern Emperors. Zeno, 491

COUNCILS :

African, or of Carthage,	401	Rome,	417	Antioch,	436	Constantinople,	449
Alexandria,	401	Carthage,	417	Constantinople,	438	Britain (Gt.),	449
Ephesus,	401	Talepte,	418	Constantinople,	439	Rome,	449
Turin,	401	Carthage,	418	Riez,	439	Constantinople,	450
Milevi,	402	Rome,	419	Ephesus,	440	Milan,	451
Afr., or Carthage,	403	Ravenna,	419	Orange,	441	Arles,	451
Constantinople,	403	Carthage,	420	Vaison,	442	Chalcedon (4th Gen.),	451
Carthage,	404	Hippo,	422	Arles,	442	Arles,	451
African,	405	Antioch,	424	Rome,	444	Angers,	451
Italy,	405	Carthage,	425	Besançon,	444	Jerusalem,	451
Toledo,	406	Hippo,	426	Rome,	445	Arles,	458
Africa,	407	Constantinople,	426	Antioch,	445	Rome,	458
Carthage,	407	The Gauls,	429	Hierapolis,	445	Constantinople,	458
Carthage,	407	Rome,	430	St. Albans,	446	Tours,	461
Carthage,	410	Alexandria,	430	Wilkins,	446	Rome,	461
Ptolemais,	411	Ephesus (3d Gen.),	431	Two Spanish,	447	Spain,	464
Carthage,	411	Antioch,	432	Ephesus,	447	Vannes,	465
Braga,	411	Anazarba,	433	Astorga,	447	Rome,	465
Zerthe,	412	Rome,	433	Antioch,	448	Antioch,	472
Carthage,	412	Tarsus,	434	Tyre,	448	Ephesus,	475
Jerusalem,	415	Antioch,	434	Berytum,	448	Lyons,	475
Diospolis,	415	Thessalonica,	435	Constantinople,	448	Arles,	475
Jerusalem,	416	Armenia,	435

SIXTH CENTURY.

Popes.		Eastern Emperors.		Ecc. Writers.		Heretics.
Date of Election.		Date of Death.
St. Hormisdas,	514	Anastasius	518	Ennodius,		Incorruptibilists,
St. John I.,	523	Justin I.,	527	Paschasius (deacon),		Phantasiasts,
St. Felix III.,	526	Justinian I.,	565	Boetius		Therulstians,
St. Boniface II.,	530	Justin II.,	578	St. Fulgentius,		Tritheites.
St. John II.,	533	Tiberius II.,	582	Dionysius (the Little),
St. Agapetus,	535			Ferrand (deacon),
St. Silverius.	536			St. Cæsarius of Arles,
Vigilius,	537			Facundus,
St. Pelagius I.,	555			Cassiodorus,
St. John III.,	559			Liberatus,
St. Benedict I.,	573			St. Gregory of Tours,
St. Pelagius II.,	578			St. John Climacus,
St. Gregory the Great,	590			Fortunatus.

PRINCIPAL COUNCILS : *

Agde,	506	Carthage,	525	Orleans (V),	549	Braga (II),	572
Orleans (I),	511	Vaison,	529	Constantinople, (5th		Mascon (I),	583
Tarragona,	516	Toledo (II),	533	Gen.),	553	Mascon (II),	585
Gironne,	517	Orleans (II),	533	Paris (III),	557	Auxerre,	585
Epona,	517	Auvergne,	535	Braga (I),	563	Toledo (III),	589
Lyons (I),	517	Orleans (III),	538	Lyons (II),	567	Narbonna,	589
Lerida,	524	Barcelona,	540	Tours (II),	567	Saragossa (II),	592
Valentia,	524	Orleans (IV),	541	Lugo,	569	Seville (I),	599
Arles (IV),	524

SEVENTH CENTURY.

Popes.		Eastern Emperors.		Ecc. Writers.		Heretics
Date of Election.		Date of Death.
Sabinian,	604	Mauritius	602			Mohammed,
Boniface III.,	607	Phocas,	610	Anastasius Sinaita,		Monothelites.
Boniface IV.,	608	Heraclius,	641	John Moschus.		Paulicians.
St. Deusdedit,	615	Constantine,	641	St. Isidore of Seville,
Boniface V.,	618	Constans II.,	668	Sophronius,
Honorius I.,	625	Constantine (Pog.),	685	St. Maximus (abbot),
Severinus,	640	Justinian II. (dep.),	695	St. Hildephonse,
John IV.,	640	Leontius,	698	St. Julian of Toledo.
Theodore I.,	642			Marculphus.
St. Martin I.,	649			Theodore of Canter-
St. Eugenius I.,	654			bury.
Vitalian,	657			Adamnan.
Deusdedit II.,	672
Donus I.,	676
St. Agatho,	678
St. Leo II.,	682
St. Benedict II.,	684
John V.,	685
Conon,	686
St. Sergius I.,	687

PRINCIPAL COUNCILS :

Paris (V),	614	Chalons		Hertford,	673	Toledo (XIV),	684
Seville (II),	619	(sur Saone),	650	Toledo (XI),	675	Toledo (XV),	688
Rhems,	625	Toledo (VIII),	653	Braga (IV),	675	Saragossa (III),	691
Toledo (IV),	634	Toledo (IX),	655	Constantinople (6th		In Trullo, (Quini-
Toledo (V),	636	Toledo (X),	656	Gen.),	680	sext),	692
Toledo (VI),	637	Nantes,	656	Toledo (XII),	681	Toledo (XVI),	693
Toledo (VII),	647	Autun,	670	Toledo (XIII),	683	Toledo (XVII),	694

* The Councils now become too numerous to be all noticed in a compendium.

EIGHTH CENTURY.

Popes		Eastern Emperors.		Ecc. Writers.		Heretics.
Date of Election.		Date of Death.
John VI.	701	Apsimarus,	705	St. Aldhelm,		Iconoclasts,
John VII.	705	Justinian II.	711	Ven. Bede		Adelbert & Clement.
Sisinnius,	708	Philippicus.	713	St. John Damascene,		Ellipand of Toledo,
Constantine,	708	Anastasius II.	716	Aleuin,		and Felix of Urgel, St. Gregory II.	715	Leo the Isaurian,	741	St. Paulinus of
Gregory III.	731	Constantine Copro-		Aquila,
St. Zachary,	741	ninus	755	Etherius,
Stephen II (often not		Leo IV.	780	Beatus, counted, as he died be-		Constantine VI.	797	Paul (deacon), fore consecration),	752			Theophanes,
Stephen III.	752			Ambrose Autpertus,
St. Paul I.	757
Stephen IV.	768
Adrian I.	772
St. Leo III.	795
		Revival of Western Empire. Charlemagne proclaimed emperor by Pope St. Leo III, Dec.
		25, 799, but as the year was then counted from Christmas, this event is generally placed in 800.

PRINCIPAL COUNCILS:

Germanic, held ac-	Lestines,	744	Verneuil,	755	Constantinople, (7th.
cording to some, at	Soissons,	745	Compiègne,	757	Gen.)
Ratisbon; according	Cloveshoe	747	Bavarian, at Dingol-		Frankfort, to others, at Augs-	Verberie,	753	viaga.	771	Friuli,
burg,	742				791

CONTENTS OF VOL. I.

CENT. I.—VIII.

CHAP.	PAGE.
I. The Roman Pontificate of St. Peter the Apostle. - - -	1
II. The Heresies of the First Three Centuries. - - -	26
III. The First Persecutions of the Church. - - -	41
IV. The Rapid Propagation of Christianity a Proof of its Divinity.	59
V. Ecclesiastical Writers of the First Century. - - -	67
VI. The Conversion of Gaul, and the Question of the Arcopagite. -	85
VII. The Discipline of the Secret. - - - - -	96
VIII. The Controversy Regarding the Paschal Time. - - -	105
IX. The Controversy Regarding the "Fallen" during Persecution.	120
X. The Novatian Schism. - - - - -	127
XI. The Controversy on the Repetition of Baptism. - - -	132
XII. Paul of Samosata. - - - - -	143
XIII. The Conversion and Baptism of Constantine. - - -	150
XIV. Canonical Penance and Auricular Confession. - - -	160
XV. The Institution of Sacred Rites. - - - - -	165
XVI. Julian the Apostate. - - - - -	178
XVII. The Donatists. - - - - -	187
XVIII. Arianism, and the Council of Nice. - - - - -	196
XIX. The Council of Sardica. - - - - -	209
XX. The Alleged Heresy of Pope Liberius. - - - - -	220
XXI. The Council of Rimini. - - - - -	233
XXII. The Second Gen. Council—First of Constantinople. - -	240
XXIII. The Appeal of St. John Chrysostom to Pope St. Innocent I. -	246
XXIV. Pelagianism. - - - - -	253
XXV. African Appeals to the Holy See. - - - - -	264
XXVI. Nestorianism and the Council of Ephesus—Third General.	276
XXVII. The Faith Preached by St. Patrick. - - - - -	289
XXVIII. Eutychianism, and the Council Chalcedon—Fourth General. -	329
XXIX. The Acacian Schism. - - - - -	344
XXX. The Cœcilian Judgment in the Case of Pope Symmachus.	351

CHAP.	PAGE.
XXXI. Controversy of the "Three Chapters," and Fifth Gen. Council.	359
XXXII. The Pontificate of St. Gregory the Great. - - -	380
XXXIII. The Conversion of England. - - - - -	395
XXXIV. Monothelitism, and the Sixth Gen. Council. - -	419
XXXV. The Alleged Heresy of Pope Honorius. - - -	432
XXXVI. The Trullan Synod. - - - - -	449
XXXVII. Islamism. - - - - -	454
XXXVIII. The Paulician Heresy. - - - - -	463
XXXIX. The Iconoclast Heresy, and the Seventh Gen. Council. -	466
XL. Origin of the Papal Dominion in the Roman States. -	501
XLI. Territorial Modifications of the Papal Dominions. - -	512
XLII. St. Boniface, Apostle of Germany. - - -	519
APPENDIX: Chronological Tables, showing the Roman Pontiffs, Emperors, Councils, Ecclesiastical Writers, and Heresies, during Centuries I.-VIII. - - - - -	531

BW912 .P26 v.1
Studies in church history,

Princeton Theological Seminary-Speer Library

1 1012 00015 8396

Library of The Theological Seminary

PRINCETON • NEW JERSEY

PRESENTED BY

The Rev. Mr. Joel Schevers

BX 945 .P3 1886 v.2

Parsons, Reuben, 1841-1906.

Studies in church history

~~Wm H. Vance~~

STUDIES IN CHURCH HISTORY

BY

REV. REUBEN PARSONS, D. D.

VOL. II
CENTURIES IX-XIV

THIRD EDITION

“That a theologian should be well versed in history, is shown by the fate of those who, through ignorance of history, have fallen into error. Whenever we theologians preach, argue, or explain Holy Writ, we enter the domain of history.”—

MELCHIOR CANUS, Loc. Theol., B. XI., c. ii.

JOHN JOSEPH McVEY
PHILADELPHIA

1909

Imprimatur:

✠ MICHAEL AUGUSTINUS,

Archiepiscopus Neo-Eboracensis.

COPYRIGHT, 1895,
JOHN JOSEPH McVEY

STUDIES IN CHURCH HISTORY.

CHAPTER I.

THE MIDDLE AGES.

So wide-spread is the notion that the Middle Ages furnish no material for admiration, that their very name appears to be synonymous with all that is dark, cruel, and contemptible. The nineteenth century is pre-eminently well pleased with itself; the eighteenth—that is, the philosophasters who gave it its tone—vaunted that period as the bright one; the seventeenth and sixteenth complacently smiled at the prospect of an era of prosperity, universal and nearly unalloyed, finally opening to humanity. There were, undoubtedly, many and crying evils in the Middle Ages, especially in their first period—the Church had not yet entirely subdued our barbarian ancestors, and thoroughly assimilated them to her civilization. During the Golden Age of Leo X., men certainly had some reason for complacency with their time, and then, says Cantù, “came the Reformation, to increase the contempt for the Middle Ages. . . . all their institutions were regarded as so much ignorance and superstition. . . . Then came the philosophy of the last century, proposing to itself the demolition of the civil and religious hierarchies. . . . Both of these had been cradled and nourished by the Middle Ages; hence to combat that period appeared to be liberty, and to show one’s self an open enemy, not only to Catholicism, but to Christianity, was regarded as free-thinking” (1). Even among Catholics, we find many who look with distrust upon this eminently Catholic period, for the poison distilled by the Reformers, and by the infidel or semi-infidel historians of the last century, has been eagerly imbibed by many who are deceived by the speciousness of its disguise, and by the ignorant, who know not of the existence of an antidote. There is a certain charm, for many, about Voltaire, even when he says that an inquiry into the Middle Ages produces contempt (1); about Gibbon, when, overcome by his admiration for Pagan Rome, he feigns to lament the corruption of the ensuing centuries (2); about Montesquieu, when he calls "nearly all the medieval laws barbarous" (3); about Botta, finding fault with that miserable time, when society "was regulated by the threats and promises of a future life." We are not at all disgusted with the nineteenth century, nor do we consider the Middle Ages in every respect enviable. "Far from us the wish to pine away in useless regret, and to wear out our eyes weeping over the tomb of nations whose inheritors we are. Far from us the thought of bringing back times which have forever fled. We know that the Son of God died upon the cross to save mankind, not during five or six centuries, but for the world's entire duration. . . . We regret not, therefore, however we may admire, any human institutions which have flourished, according to the lot of everything that is human; but we bitterly regret the soul, the divine spirit, which animated them, and which is no longer to be found in the institutions that have replaced them." (4).

(1) CANTÙ; Universal History, 9th Ital. ed., Turin, 1862., B. 8, Preliminary Discourse.

The remark of De Maistre, that for the last three centuries, history has been a permanent conspiracy against truth, is now not quite so true as when he made it. That deliberate conspiracy of the enemies of Catholicism has no longer any effect, unless on the minds of the ignorant or the superficially informed. The labors of the Protestants, Ranke, Voigt, and Hurter, have changed, to some extent, the current of Protestant thought, wherever it has been unallied with ignorance or wilful blindness. What Ranke, in spite of himself (5), succeeded in partially doing for the Papacy of

(1) Essay on the Morals and Spirit of Nations, c. 23.

(2) Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, passim.

(3) Spirit of Laws.

(4) MONTALEMBERT, Life of St. Elizabeth of Hungary, in Introduction.

(5) SAINT-CYRÉN, in his preface to his second French edition of Ranke's work, says that the German author was not a little disappointed on seeing the preference accorded to his book by the Catholic public, and "at its having become an active organ of a propaganda in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, Voigt did more fully for the Popes of the eleventh, and Hurter almost entirely did for the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. The shelves of Catholic libraries had been always loaded with triumphant refutations of Protestant and infidel calumnies against the ages of faith ; every Catholic scholar had been well conversant with such works ; but the great mass of those outside the fold were in Cimmerian darkness as to the true significance of those ages. We could not have expected the prejudices of our dissenting friends to permit of their studying the pages of authors like Cantù, Christophe, Semichon ; but Providence ordained that they should be somewhat enlightened by some of their own brethren. However, the impression remains among the masses, to some extent among Catholics as well as among Protestants and infidels, that there is but little for men to learn from the Middle Ages ; that they were, pre-eminently, ages of barbarism, of ignorance, and of superstition.

There are two kinds of barbarism, remarks Condillac : one which precedes enlightened periods, and another which follows them. And, well adds Benjamin Constant, the first, if compared with the second, is a desirable condition. Deeply hostile to the ages of Catholic unity, to that period to which they would fain ascribe the adulteration of primitive Christianity, heterodox polemics have not adverted to the ungraciousness of an accusation of barbarism formulated against the Middle Ages by men who regard as enlightened the times which produced Henry VIII., Elizabeth, Cromwell, in England ; which tolerated the civil wars of the sixteenth century in France ; which have witnessed the modern wars of succession, and more than one Reign of Terror. And whence came the quota of cruelty, destructiveness, and injustice, which many complacent moderns regard as characteristic of the Middle Ages ? From the Catholic clergy, reply the ignorant and malignant, who ignore the innate barbarism of the Northern hordes and the posterior civilization of these by the same Catholic favor of the misunderstood authority of the heads of our holy Church . . . in spite of him, the divine face, which he tried to leave in shadow, has been illumined by the splendor of truth."

clergy. The fact is also ignored that, while nearly every ruin on European soil was made such by the Pagan invaders, or by the heretics of the sixteenth century, or by the impious of the eighteenth; nearly all the miracles of architectural skill and beauty now admired in Europe are the work of the Middle Ages, conceptions of Catholic minds, and results of Catholic generosity. We are frequently told that the Middle Ages were distinguished for oppression of the individual; but in those days originated the political constitutions of modern nations (1).

As for the barbarism so justly lamented when and where it did exist, blind injustice alone can ascribe it to the Catholic clergy, for they were always the first victims of the barbarians; their churches, libraries, and monasteries were sacked and burnt, the priests and monks often ruthlessly massacred. And how ungrateful is this charge, since it was this same Catholic clergy who transformed the devastating beasts into men and Christians, who repaired the damage inflicted, and preserved all of civilization that they themselves had not created.

(1) "I say nothing about the Canon Law, which was an immense advance in mercy and equity, and in which brute force was first opposed by discussion, baronial caprice by written law; in which, for the first time, all were declared equal before the law. But how great as legislators were Charlemagne, Alfred of England, St. Stephen of Hungary, St. Louis of France, and a few of the German emperors? Then England wrote her Charita, imperfect, yes, but not yet excelled or equalled, and which, although founded on feudalism, so well guarantees personal and real liberty. Then the commercial republics of Italy compiled a maritime code which is still in force. Then the various Communes provided themselves with statutes, which appear curious only to those who know nothing of those times and places. Then the republics of Germany, of Switzerland, and of Italy experimented with every kind of political regime, trying constitutions not at all academical—constitutions adopted, not because they were English or Spanish, but because they were opportune, peculiar, historical. Then the middle class, showing the best indication of strength—growth, caused by resistance—penetrated into the monarchy, giving to it life, force, and glory; and although the present and future importance of this class was not understood, it became the people, the nation, the sovereign. Observe the Congress of Pontida, or the Peace of Constance, or the nocturnal meetings under the oak of Truns or in the meadows of Rütli, where simple-minded men swear, in the name of that God who created both serf and noble, to maintain their customs and their country's freedom! Observe those Synods, in which religion makes herself guardian of the rights of man. Observe the people at the witten-gemot of England, at the French Champ de Mai, at the diets of Roncaglia, or at that of Lamego, where a new nation draws up the constitution of Portugal—more liberal than many modern ones—with a throne surrounded by a nobility not derived from conquest, not founded on possessions or bought with money, but conferred on those who have been loyal to Church and country, valorous in freeing the latter from the foreigner. And these laws were confirmed because they were good and just, conditions ignored by the ancient jurists, and forgotten by many modern ones." CANTU; loc. cit.—We learn from Tacitus (Customs of the Germans) that the ancient Germans met in parliament on certain days, in the open fields. Fredegarius (y. 776) informs us that the Franks continued the custom in the assemblies called of the Campi Martii, and afterwards of the Campi Maili. Landolph the Younger (c. 9 and 31) says that the archbishops of Milan met their vassals in similar diets. For such assemblies the Holy Roman emperors, as kings of Italy, chose the plains of Roncaglia, between the Po and the Nura, about three miles from Piacenza. According to Arnolphus (H. R. Empire, v. IV., b. 3, c. 4.) Henry II. met the first diet in 1047. The Acts of the parliament held at Roncaglia under Barbarossa are found in Pertz's Hist. Monuments of Germany, v. II.; Hanover, 1837.—TOSTI; History of the Lombard League, b. II., note A; Montecassino, 1848.

Until comparatively late days, few historians seem to have regarded the Middle Ages as worthy of serious investigation. According to many of these—generally successful—formers of public opinion, even the land of Dante and Petrarch was buried in ignorance the most dense, until the fall of Constantinople caused Grecian scholars to claim her hospitality; “not a painter had flourished before Cimabue, and no artist merited notice until the favor of some prince created Michael Angelo and Raphael; the Italians had lost even the remembrance of their ancient laws, until, during some devastation, a copy of the Pandects was unearthed; only a capricious jargon was written and spoken until the present Italian language was improvised, and—like armed Minerva from the brain of Jove—issued forth, wonderful virgin, to influence the entire universe.” (1). But with the indefatigable labors of cardinal Baronio, who, from the monuments of the Vatican, methodically and lucidly extended the Annals of the Church (and precisely therefore, of what was then the civilized world), new light was shed upon the intellectual condition of the Middle Ages (2). Much more knowledge was contributed by Muratori (3), a diligent and critical annalist to whom, more than to all other

(1) CANTU; loc. cit.—

—Hallam, although not addicted to criticism or to investigation of original sources of history, because he regarded such labors as “not incumbent on a compiler,” (View of the State of Europe during the Middle Ages, chap. i., note 1), nevertheless hit upon truth when he said: “Italy supplied the fire from which other nations, in this first, as afterwards in the second era of the revival of letters, lighted their own torches. Lanfranc, Anselm, Peter Lombard, the founder of systematic theology in the twelfth century, Innocentius, the restorer of jurisprudence, Gratian, the author of the first compilation of Canon Law, the School of Salerno, that guided medical art in all countries, the first dictionaries of the Latin tongue, the first treatise on Algebra, the first great work that makes an epoch in Anatomy, are as truly and exclusively the boast of Italy, as the restoration of Greek literature and of classical taste in the fifteenth century.”—Introduction to the Literature of Europe in the 15th, 16th, and 17th Centuries, vol. i., c. 2.

(2) Annals of the Church, from the Birth of Christ to the year 1198, Rome, 1588—1607, 12 vols. in fol. These Annals have been continued by 1st, the Polish Dominican Szovius (Rome, 1616), and augmented (Cologne 1621—1640), down to 1572; 2d, by Spodanus, bishop of Paniers (Paris, 1640); 3d, by Oderico Rinaldi, Oratorian, 7 vols. fol. (Rome, 1646—1663), from 1198, where Baronio ended, down to 1586; 4th, by Laderchius 3 vols. fol. (Rome, 1723—1737); 5th, by Augustine Theiner, Oratorian, prefect of the Vatican Archives, 8 vols. fol. (Rome, 1856), from 1572 to our days. Baronio does not always distinguish apocryphal from authentic documents, and he not seldom uses Greek versions of dubious sincerity—faults rather of his age than his own; but with the aid of the corrections by the Franciscan, Pagl. by Mansi (Cong. Mother of God), and by the Protestant Casaubon, his work is invaluable.

(3) Annals of Italy, from the birth of Christ to 1750, Milan, 18 vols, 8vo, 1753—56. — Writers on Italian Matters, from 500 to 1500, 28 vols. fol., Milan, 1723—51. The expense of this publication was defrayed by sixteen Italian gentlemen, who each contributed 4000 scudi.—Italian Antiquities of the Middle Age, from the fall of the Roman Empire until 1500, Milan, 6 vols. fol. 1733—43. — Extensian Antiquities, Modena, 1717—40, 2 vols. fol. When it is remembered that Muratori edited over fifty folio volumes, nearly fifty quartos, and innumerable octavos and duodecimos, it seems strange that more inexactnesses do not occur.

writers, modern historians must refer. Tiraboschi (1), Scipio Maffei (2), Du Cange (3), Tillemont (4), Pertz (5), Leo (6), J. Moeller (7), may be consulted with profit. As for English historians of the Middle Ages, several are pretentious, few recommendable. Robertson (8) is carried away by his contempt for this period, and, to use the words of Cantù, "infatuated with the present liberties of his country, he calumniates the time when the edifice was not complete, forgetting that just then its foundation was laid, and its grandeur prepared." "Hume," says the same judicious and impartial critic, "in order to flatter the Encyclopedists, then the dispensers of fame, too often adopts the weapons of contempt and ridicule, capital enemies of reflection; and, sceptical of generosity, understands liberty only under certain appearances. Endowed with reason, but with no imagination; a sceptic in history as in philosophy; evidently and unfortunately partial; he entirely misunderstands the Anglo-Saxon period, regarding the English constitution as already formed at the birth of the nation. Of what assistance can he be, therefore, in an endeavor to become acquainted with foreign peoples"? Hallam has eyes for governments, never for peoples; hence, while he follows the development of a constitution, he disconnects it from the sources of its origin. Gibbon, most renowned of English historians, "regarded," says Cantù, "with veneration by his school, and respected even by his opponents, is vastly erudite, shows great sagacity in discovering new sources, artfully groups facts and interprets intentions. What book, therefore, can flatter to a greater extent the convenient propensity to agree with an author? But reflecting readers perceive in his writings a continuous diatribe, inspired by the simultaneous prejudices of a Jew, a heretic, and a 'philosopher'—a diatribe permeated by two ideas, admira-

(1) History of Italian Literature.

(2) History of Verona.

(3) In his Glossary, and especially in his Notes to the text of Anna Comnena in the Writers of Byzantine History (Paris, 1640–50), printed at the Louvre by order of Louis XIV.

(4) History of the Emperors.

(5) Historical Monuments of Germany, from 500 to 1500, Hanover, 1826.

(6) History of the Middle Age (1830).

(7) Manual of the History of the Middle Age, from the Fall of the Western Empire until the Death of Charlemagne (Paris, 1837).

(8) Introduction to the Life of Charles V.

tion of Roman greatness and hatred for all religion." (1).

It is false that the Middle Ages were pre-eminently times of ignorance; that, as some have not hesitated to say, men had lost the faculty of reasoning. In this epoch flourished Abélard, Dante, Albert the Great, Thomas of Aquin. It is true that the hunting and soldiering barbarians at first disdained the peaceful triumphs of letters, and regarded the fine arts as a disgraceful inheritance of the people they had conquered; that, for a time, even the olden subjects—of the secular order—of Rome lost taste for the sublime and the beautiful. But then science found a friend in the sanctuary and in the cloister: and the clergy preserved, as a sacred deposit, the traditions of literature and art. As for moral science, have modern times surpassed Anselm, Lanfranc, Peter Damian, or Peter Lombard? As for practical science, do we know much more than did our medieval ancestors? We will mention a few of the improvements and inventions which we owe to these compassionate men.

I. The paper on which we write (linen) is, according to Hallam, an invention of the year 1100 (2); cotton paper was certainly used in Italy in the tenth century. II. The art of printing, or rather the press, was invented in 1436, either by Lawrence Coster, a chaplain in the Cathedral of Harlem, and a xylograph printer, or by the artisan Gensfleisch, called Guttenberg (3); but printing by hand was done in the tenth century. III. That music may be now called a science is due to Guido of Arezzo, an Italian monk, who, in 1124, determined the scale, hitherto uncertain.

(1) Abp. Martin Spalding, in his valuable Lecture on Literature and the Arts in the Middle Ages, regards Hallam and Maitland as superior to all other English writers on this period, but he well remarks that, compared with the labors of Muratori and Tiraboschi, "their works, learned and excellent as they are in many respects, are but pigmies." Miscellanea, vol. I., c. 4.

(2) Casiri, drawing up a Catalogue of the Escorial Library, says that most of its Mss. are of rag-paper, calling them chartaceos, in contradistinction to the membranous and cotton ones. At No. 787, he cites the Aphorisms of Hippocrates, Codex an. Chr. 1100, chartaceus, and does not deem it remarkable. Peter of Cluny, in a treatise against the Jews, speaks of books made from the shreds of old cloths.

(3) The Abbé Le Noir, in his adaptation of Bergier's Dictionary, analyzes the known facts concerning this invention, and thus concludes: "Coster, we believe, invented and first employed movable types. Guttenberg came across Coster's plans, perfected them, and with invincible patience endeavored to execute them on a grand scale. But, constantly needing funds, he was compelled to put himself in the hands of an adroit banker, Faust, who played upon him the trick he himself had practised on Coster, appropriated the invention, and gathered the profits."—The Chronicles of Feltre say that Pandlo Castaldi, a humanist of that city, taught his disciple Faust, in 1436, the use of movable types. Stereotyping, now the perfection of printing, was known and practised by Coster, though he knew not, of course, any way of casting the plates.

His solmisation, or the use of the ut, re, mi, fa, sol, la, was signified by means of the words of the first verses of the Vesper Hymn for the feast of the Baptist (1). Ughelli, in his Sacred Italy, proves that, in the ninth century, the Italians used pneumatic organs. iv. In the twelfth century, the mariners of Amalfi first applied the knowledge of the loadstone to navigation, inventing the mariner's compass, thus enabling subsequent Italian navigators to prosecute geographical discovery. v. It is amusing to learn that in those days of alleged ignorance, and hence carelessness of study, one of the most important aids to study should have been invented. To enable persons of defective eyesight to read, the ancients used a sphere filled with water, but about 1285 a Pisan monk, named Salvino d'Armato, invented spectacles. In a sermon preached in Florence, Feb. 23, 1305, the famous friar Giordano di Rivalta said: "Only twenty years ago were spectacles invented; I knew and conversed with the inventor." vi. By a people's language we can surely judge of their refinement and their intellectual calibre. Now it was in these despised Middle Ages that were formed and perfected the languages of modern Europe. Humboldt may have erred when he judged that grammatical forms are not the fruit of the progress made by a nation in analysis of thought, but he rightly admitted that these forms "are results of the manner in which a nation considers and treats its language." (2). And we are asked to believe that the densest ignorance and the grossest sentiments were the portion of the times which produced the sweet and philosophic Italian, the majestic Spanish, the graceful French, and the forcible English and German tongues (3). vii. Have modern times rivalled the Middle Ages in architectural

(1) Ut queant laxis, Resonare fibris, Mira gestorum. Famuli tuorum, Solve polluti, Labii reatum, Sancte Joannes!

(2) Letters on the Nature of Grammatical Forms. Paris, 1827, p. 15.

(3) "The Latin language began to decline even in the first century of our era, and its decay corresponded to that of the Roman empire and of Roman civilization. With the irruption of the barbarians, the corruption became so extensive that the old organism perished, and the relics could not be termed a new language. Christianity took hold of this raw material, placed therein the embryonic principles of new organizations, and fecundated them with the hieratic word, performing the two duties symbolized by the oriental myths of the cosmic egg and androgynism. Thus the modern idioms were born from the material of the old, informed and organized by the religious idea and by the sacer-skill and taste? With the exception of St. Peter's at Rome—itself a result of the spirit of that despised period—all the most magnificent structures of Europe, all the real triumphs of architecture, are of medieval conception and execution. Glass windows, too, introduced only in the fourth century, commenced to present beautiful colors in the early Middle Age; and in the twelfth century the Church began, by means of those wonderful window-pictures, to reach the hearts and intellects of such of her children as, perchance, were not penetrated by the words of her preachers. VIII. The system of banking, with its convenient bills of exchange, was originated by the Italians in the twelfth century. IX. In the year 650, wind-mills were invented; in 657, organs; the Greek fire in 670; carpet-weaving in 720; clocks in 760; in 790, the Arabic numerals were introduced; in 1130, the silk-worm was first cultivated in Europe: in 1278, gunpowder was invented: engraving in 1410; oil-painting in 1415. (1).

Jotal word. At first each of these idioms was a mere dialect, that is, a vulgar speech, rude, ignoble, private, unfit for public use and for writing, not yet possessed of a life of its own, independent of the ancient mother's. And just as the fetus becomes a man, the human animal an infant, coming out into the light and entirely separating from the maternal body, so a dialect is transformed into an illustrious language, fit to signify ideal things, through the work of noble writers who divert it from popular usage, and introduce it into the forum, the temple, the schools, and into the conversation of the learned—who develop its scientific and aesthetic powers, and who give it a being entirely distinct from its progenitrix. The first of modern dialects to run this course was the Tuscan, or, to speak correctly, the Florentine, which afterwards became the noble language of Italy, just as the Castilian and the Picard became the national idioms of Spain and of France. The Tuscan was already conceived before 1200, when Folcacchiero and Ciullo d'Alcamo dictated their rude sonnets; it was born with Dante, who first initiated the speech of the Arno into the public life of civilization and of learning, and rendered it, so far as literature is concerned, not only Italian, but European." GIOBERTI; Civil and Moral Primacy of the Italians, Capolago, 1846, vol. ii., p. 275.

(1). As an evidence of the intellectual decadence of the Middle Ages, it is alleged that then the science of eristicism was unknown. To this Canth replies: "I do not hesitate to assert that, of all the questions agitated since that time, perhaps not one was not raised during that period. Although the age of Leo X. believed Annus of Viterbo (a Chatterton of the 15th century) and that of the Encyclopædia in Ossian, the eleventh century questioned the authenticity of the Falsæ Decretals (of Isidore Mercator). King Liutprand and Bishop Agobard condemned trials by combat and the ordeals by fire and water, although these were upheld by prejudice, custom, and law; they also ridiculed the belief that witches produced tempests. The monk Virgilius (Ferghil) and John of Salisbury taught the correct mundane system and the existence of antipodes. Even in those days, both the spiritual and temporal rule of the Pope were attacked and defended; then war was made, by argument and by ridicule, on the abuses of monachism and on false piety; then were weighed the prerogatives of kings, and their titles to power; then were laid the foundations of civil order in such a manner as to produce the only constitutions which have long endured. Every system, dogma, and rite, found champions and opponents; and the political heresies of Arnold of Brescia and of Friar Dolcino, the philosophical ones of Origen and of Abélard, the religious ones of Photius and of the Albigenses, left nothing new for Luther and Socinus to pronounce. And what if we reflect that these rude ancestors of ours civilized half the world; that, by the translation of the Bible, modern languages were formed; that hymns were composed which have been sung by the most refined centuries; that entire nations were withdrawn from licentious and ferocious superstition? Undoubtedly, much was wanting; but deny, if you can, to Alexander the title of consummate general, because he would not have been able to conquer at Leipsic or to reduce Antwerp, or the title of poet to Homer because he was ignorant of geography and astronomy." (loc. cit.).

A very efficient reason for that aversion to the Middle Ages, which we may observe in most heterodox writers and in all devotees of materialism, is the fact that those days formed the golden period of monasticism—a system which is as much a part of the history of the human mind, as it is of ecclesiastical history, and which must necessarily find an enemy in the spirit of the world. Of eastern birth, and at first unacceptable to the westerns, the influence of St. Athanasius—who had studied its spirit during his exile—introduced it to Rome, and in less than two centuries it was spread throughout the empire. With the sixth century came the great monastic legislators, SS. Benedict and Columbanus; and new rules, providing every constituent of wise government, enabled the monks to survive the influence of barbarism to become the refuge of virtue and enlightenment. With the twelfth century, the world beheld an alliance hitherto deemed impossible—that of the religious state with the military profession. The genius of the age enabled the soldier to sanctify his valor, directing it against the enemies of the faith, and observing the monastic vows amid the duties and hardships of the field. The knights of St. John—afterwards styled of Rhodes, and finally of Malta; the Templars—in time degraded, but for a long period a glory of Christendom; the Teutonic Order—at first devoted to the care of the sick poor, but soon taking arms for the defence of Palestine and for the civilization of Northern Germany (1); the knights of St. Lazarus, of Calatrava, of (1). During the pontificate of Innocent III. (1198—1216), Christian, a Cistercian monk, had introduced Christianity into Prussia, and was made bishop of that region, on his visit to the Holy See, in 1214. Returning, he found his converts relapsed into idolatry, and at war with the Christians of Culm, having already destroyed over two hundred and fifty churches. Christian preached a crusade, and erected the citadel of Culm, finally compelling the Prussians to abandon idolatry. A new revolt of the barbarians prompted the bishop to institute the Military Order of Christ; but in 1224 the knights, five only excepted, were killed in battle. Christian then persuaded Conrad, duke of Mazovia, to implore the aid of the Teutonic knights; this prince ceded to the Order all the lands it could subdue. In fifty years Prussia, Lithuania, and Pomerania were conquered. "The vow of obedience observed by these soldier-friars," says Canth, "produced in them a discipline unknown to other governments, their wills being bound by honor and by religion. Into this sovereign Order the reigning families of Germany proudly enrolled their sons; in Prussia kings and princes served an apprenticeship to arms; respect gave strength to the Order, which soon reached the height of power, but afterwards fell into debauchery and tyranny." The last grand-master of the Teutonic knights, Albert of Brandenburg, yielded to the temptation of Luther to convert his power into a secular principality—a temptation which another Albert of Brandenburg, his kinsman and archbishop of Mainz and Magdeburg, had resisted (Epist. Luth. in Coehlaeus, y. 1526). He appropriated nearly all the property of the Order, united himself to the Princess Dorothy of Holstein, and divided Prussia with Poland, becoming tributary to the latter for the portion reserved to himself—thus founding the present kingdom of Prussia. Protestant writers find fault with the means taken by the Teutonic knights

St. James, of Alcantara, and many other associations, were probably the most efficient of all the human means used by the Roman Pontiffs in their struggle to preserve European civilization. With the thirteenth century came the Mendicant Orders, devoted to the combat against the errors and vices of the Albigenses and other innovators of the period. Since wealth had caused the discredit of many of the olden religious, SS. Francis and Dominick prohibited every kind of property, even in common, to their disciples; and although this severity lasted but a short time, these friars obtained and preserved, by their general virtue and zeal, the esteem of Church and State. What service did these religious render society? In the first place, agriculture, which may be styled the first of arts and the source of all real wealth, grew to be respected by our ancestors, because of the example of the monks. Fleury, speaking of the work of the monks in Germany, says: "They were useful in the temporal order, owing to the labor of their hands. They levelled the vast forests which covered the land. By their industry and their wise management the earth was cultivated; the inhabitants multiplied; the monasteries produced great cities, and their dependencies became considerable provinces. What were once the new Corbie and Bremen, now two great towns? What were Fritzlar, Herfeld, cities of Thuringia? Before the monks, what were Salzburg, Frisingen, Echstadt, episcopal cities of Bavaria? Where were St. Gall and Kempten in Switzerland, where were such towns as St. Gall? Where so many other cities of Germany?" (1). Secondly, the monks aided the poor and the oppressed. "For a long time," says Voltaire (2), "it was a con-to convert the idolatrous Prussians. Bergier thus replies: "It is falsely supposed that the crusades and military operations of the knights were primarily designed for the conversion of the infidels. Their object was to defend Christians against the attacks, insults, and violence of idolaters; to prevent the irruptions of these, and to repress their brigandage. Where was the crime? Christianity and the natural law both prohibit private violence, but they do not prohibit nations from opposing force with force. Whether the warriors be knights or soldiers, volunteers or mercenaries, religious or seculars, the question is whether or not Christianity condemns the use of arms in every case. The knights never became preachers, and the missionaries were never armed. The barbarians were ferocious beasts, who by force were first to be made men, before any thought could be entertained of Christianizing them: the former task was for the knights, the latter for the missionaries. It is said that these means were calculated rather to disgust than to convert the barbarians, but the fact is that they were converted, and that the entire North became and is Christian. . . . It is one thing to patiently suffer persecution at the hands of one's government, another to allow one's self to be killed by foreign barbarians, practising brigandage against the law of nations.

(1) Discourse iii., no. 22.

(2) Spirit and Customs of Nations, v. iii.

solation for the human race that these refuges were open to those who wished to escape Gothic and Vandal tyranny." Thirdly, the monks cultivated letters. Outside the monasteries few persons, in the early Middle Age, knew how to write; but within these walls patient laborers were constantly at work transcribing and perpetuating such monuments of intellect as the barbarians had spared. "I declare," wrote Cassiodorus to his monks of Viviers, "that of all bodily labors, the copying of books is the most to my taste." Without this labor, and without that jealous love of their libraries which caused the monks to say that "a cloister without a library is like a citadel without weapons," we would to-day possess not one monument of ancient lore. And what praise is not due to the schools of the monasteries? In these schools were taught, generally gratuitously, not only sacred science, but rhetoric, dialectics, astronomy, grammar, and music. History, especially, owes everything to the monks, who not only preserved all records of the far past, but minutely recorded the events of their own day. In all the great monasteries, an exact and able writer was appointed to keep this record, and after mature examination, the Chronicle was handed down to posterity. Italy owes all knowledge of her history to her innumerable cowed chroniclers; France is a similiar debtor to Ado of Vienne, William of St. Germer, Odoric of St. Evroul, both Aimoins, and Hugh of Flavigny; England to Bede, Ingulph, William of Malmesbury, and the two Matthews of Westminster and Paris; Germany to Regino, abbot of Prom, Witikind, Lambert of Aschaffenburg, Ditmar, and Hermann Contractus (1). In fine, so assiduously did

(1) "The sciences termed historical have a character very different from that of the sciences regarded as pre-eminently exact. The art of materially arranging facts is, for them, only a preparation; these facts, independent of their moral signification, are nothing of themselves. . . . The documents which preserve the souvenirs of humanity have a tendency to disappear, because they refer to events not identically renewed, as are the constant works of nature. This infinite diversity engenders immense difficulties of labor; to render history fruitful, there must be a unity of action in the grouping of facts, and a unity of opinion in the judgment formed. Subordination of agents in a common direction, division of the one task among many workmen—a division proportioned to the extent of the work, are primary conditions for every great historical undertaking. All such enterprises as are very exact and very extensive have been the work of religious bodies. In these bodies alone have been found men with a spirit of self-denial sufficient to renounce the joys of personal fame. . . . Here facts speak more eloquently than argument; the Revolution, by destroying the Benedictine Order, put an end to the great records of our history. Of these works, some, such as Christian Gaul and the Annals of the Order of St. Benedict, the Letters of the Popes, have not been resumed (they have, since the time of Lenormant); others have been continued by the Institute, but slowly and imperfectly. In confiding to the Institute the prosecution of the work of the Benedictines, and providing the monks of the Middle Ages cultivate letters and every branch of science, that the slow progress of these, during the early portion of that period, can be ascribed only to the then existing political situation of Christendom. Intellectual culture depends, for brilliant results, on the lot of states; only when government is somewhat settled, do men turn to the Muses. Nevertheless, very many of the medieval monks would have honored the reigns of Augustus or Pope Leo X. Science can show no more devoted or brilliant disciples than Gerbert (Pope Sylvester II.), Albert the Great, or Roger Bacon. Of the first, the inventor of the wheel and weight clock, and the projector of the telescope, D'Alembert well said that he who first used the wheels and weights, would have invented watches in another age; and if Gerbert had lived in the time of Archimedes, perhaps he would have equalled that mechanician (1).

Even the early Middle Age could not have been so ignorant as we are asked to believe, since every cathedral, as well as nearly every monastery, had its school and library, in accordance with canonical enactments. Hallam admits generously for its expenses, the State believed all had been done; despite the flinty of the academies, despite the often admirable zeal of the members, no equivalent has been found for the continuous, persevering, and multiple action of the monks. An equitable discernment has not guided the choice of editors; political considerations and momentary interest have entered into the task; and the consequence has been an unequal mass, an incoherent agglomeration of excellent and inferior volumes—and yet, there was a question merely of printing manuscripts. What would have been the result, if the Institute had undertaken the composition of great works like those of the Benedictines? I show only the exterior inconveniences of the actual organization of science; I do not push the lantern into its innermost recesses. I could have traced a deplorable tableau of the combats of vanity or of want against the councils of duty. When I see the governing powers occupying themselves with the secret vices which attack the intellectual calibre of the country; when I behold an attempt at a new organization, at the base of which there is a little honor, and much security for those who devote themselves to science, then I will admit that great historical works can be produced by a lay society." LENORMANT, Religious Association in Christian Society, Paris, 1844, § xix. The Benedictines to whose labors Lenormant alludes were indeed posterior to the Middle Ages, but the judgments of the author are strictly applicable to their medieval predecessors.

(1) MM. Ives Guyot and Sigismond Lacroix, in their History of the Proletaires, one of the most bitterly anti-Christian works of our day, are constrained to speak as follows, concerning the works of the Middle Ages: "A Benedictine monastery was a barrack for work and for prayer. But the time devoted to labor shows the special characteristic of the western monasteries. A monastery was an insurance company, and also an industrial and agricultural association. Certain works required great enterprise and a great cohesion of forces. At that time (the Merovingian period), credit did not exist; shares and stocks were unknown. But the monks established something similar. There was plenty of land, and the elements for its utilization were at hand; but men feared the desert, the swamp, and the forest, for the redemption of these was apparently above human strength. Then the monks came, like the American pioneers of our day. They selected a valley, or some propitious spot; they set to work, levelling the trees, draining the swamps, and founded an agricultural colony. All this the monks did by association. . . . They formed veritable industrial societies. . . . Among the most celebrated were the Bridge-building Friars (Fratres Pontifices), who daringly threw bridges over the torrents throughout Southern France. These constructed the Saint-Esprit bridge across the Rhone." Messrs. Guyot and Lacroix describe the vast possessions of the abbey of St. Germain-des-Prés, which had a radius of forty leagues around Paris (at the time of Louis le Débonnaire), and every foot of which the monks had reclaimed from the desert.

that "the praise of having originally established schools belongs to some bishops and abbots of the sixth century;" but—at least, so far as Ireland is concerned—it is certain that her schools were celebrated throughout Europe in the fifth century. As to the continent, we find the Council of Vaison recommending, in 529, the institution of free parochial schools. To cite only a few of similar decrees, there is a canon of the 3d General Council of Constantinople, 680, commanding priests to have free schools in all country places; one of a Synod of Orleans, 800, ordering the parochial clergy "to teach little children with the greatest charity, receiving no compensation, unless voluntarily offered by the parents;" one of Mentz, 813, commanding parents to send their children "to the schools in the monasteries, or in the houses of the parish clergy;" one of Rome, under Eugenius II., 826, prescribing schools in every suitable place. As to higher education, not only was it not neglected, but the most celebrated universities were founded and perfected in the "dark" ages. Most renowned were the Irish school of Bangor (Benchor)—with its thousands of scholars; and the other Irish schools founded at Lindisfarne in England; Bobbio in Italy; Verdun in France; Würzburg, Ratisbon, Erfurt, Cologne, and Vienna, in Germany. The great University of Bologna, an outgrowth of the law-school there established by Theodosius II., became so celebrated under Irnerius (d. 1140), that of foreigners alone more than ten thousand thronged its halls (1); The University of Padua frequently numbered eighteen thousand students. Famous also were the Universities of Rome, Pavia, Naples, and Perugia; of Paris; of Alcalá, Salamanca, and Valladolid; of Oxford and Cambridge; of Vienna, Cologne, Erfurt, and Heidelberg (2). And it must be borne in mind that in most of these establishments instruction was gratuitous; the zeal of Popes, bishops, emperors, kings, and other great ones of those times, found no more natural outlet than the endowment of these institutions. The celibacy of the clergy, well remarks Archbishop Martin Spalding, did more, perhaps, for this free tuition than anything else: "Clergymen whose income exceeded their expenses felt bound by the spirit, if not by the letter of the Canon Law, to appropriate the surplus to charitable purposes, among which the principal was the founding of hospitals and schools. The forty-four colleges attached to the University of Paris were most of them founded by clergymen." (1).

(1). The University of Bologna was a corporation of scholars, who were divided into two great "nations," Cismontanes (Italians) and Ultramontanes (foreigners), each having its own rector, who must have taught law for five years, and have been a student of the University, and could not be a monk. The students elected this rector, and none of the professors had any voice in the assembly, unless they had previously been rectors. In the faculty of theology, however, the professors governed. Popes Gregory IX., Boniface VIII., Clement V., John XXII., addressed their Decretals "to the doctors and scholars of Bologna."

(2). The thirteenth century was an unfortunate one for letters in Germany. Leibnitz says that the tenth was golden, compared with the thirteenth; Heeren calls it most unfruitful; Meiners constantly deplores it; Eichorn designates it as "wisdom degenerated into barbarism." But with the fourteenth century came a change. The University of Vienna was founded in 1364; that of Heidelberg in 1385; of Erfurt, 1392; of Leipsic, 1409; Würz-

But we constantly hear that, in the Middle Ages, the clergy systematically kept the laity in ignorance; that even the nobility were so uncultivated, that in the public acts of those times it is quite common to meet the clause: "and the said lord declares that, because of his condition of gentleman, he knows not how to sign (his name)." Charlemagne himself, it is said, knew not how to write. But are these allegations true? In the early period of the middle ages, undoubtedly, ignorance was the lot of the warriors who became the progenitors of most of the European nobles; but when these barbarians had become Christians and members of civilized society, is it true that they generally remained in that ignorance? The learned Benedictine, Cardinal Pitra (2), has proved that in nearly all monasteries there were two kinds of schools—the internal, for the youth who wished to become religious; and the external, for the children of the nobility. And do we not know how burg, 1410; Rostock, 1419; Louvain, 1425; Dola, 1426; Treves, 1454; Freiburg, 1456; Basel, 1459; Ingolstadt, 1472; Tübingen and Metz, 1477; Cologne, 1483. "Gerard Groot," says Cantu, "a student of Paris, founded, in 1376, at Deventer, his native place, an order every member of which was bound to help the poor, either by his manual labor or by teaching gratuitously. Very soon the order, associating thus the two passions of that day, piety and study, taught trades and writing in the monasteries which were called of St. Jerome, or of the Good Brethren, or of the Common Life; and in other places it kept schools of writing and of mechanics for poor children. To others it taught Latin, Greek, Mathematics, Fine Arts, and even Hebrew. In 1433, it had forty-five houses, three times that number in 1490; and in 1474 it established a printing-house in Brussels. Thomas à Kempis transported the system to St. Agnes, near Zwoil, where were formed the apostles of classic literature in Germany—Maurice, count of Spiegelberg, and Rudolph Langius, afterwards prelates: Anthony Liber, Louis Dringenberg, Alexander Heglius, and Rudolph Agricola." Univ. Hist., b. xlii., c. 29.

(1). Loc. cit., art. Schools and Universities in the "Dark Ages."

(2). In his History of St. Leger.

Abélard's retreat was filled with hundreds of young nobles zealous for knowledge? Vincent of Beauvais (y. 1250) writes that "the children of the nobility need to acquire expensive learning," and Giles of Romme says that "the sons of kings and of great lords must have masters to teach them all science, and especially the knowledge of Latin." The nobles could not have despised learning as much as they are said to have despised it, when they were so zealous in founding schools of learning. At Paris alone, six colleges were founded by noble laymen; that of Laon, in 1313, by Guy of Laon and Raoul de Presles; that of Presles, in 1313, by Raoul de Presles; that of Boncourt, in 1357, by Peter de Fléchinél; that of La Marche, in 1362, by William de la Marche and Beuve de Winville; that of the Grassins, by Peter d'Ablon, in 1569; and that of the Ave Maria, in 1336, by John of Hubant. The following remarks of a judicious critic (1), concerning the too general opinion as to the ignorance of the medieval laity, are worthy of attention: "The researches of M. de Beaurepaire concerning public instruction in the diocese of Rouen, the History of the Schools of Montauban from the tenth to the sixteenth century, and several other local monographs, not to speak of du Boulay and de Crévier, show what this assertion is worth. If the middle class and the peasants knew nothing, it was because they wished not to learn, for the olden France had no less than 60,000 schools; each town had its groupes scolaires, as they say in Paris; each rural parish had its pedagogue, its magister, as they style him in the North. In the thirteenth century, all the peasants of Normandy could read and write, carried writing materials at their girdles, and many of them were no strangers to Latin. The nobles were no more hostile to letters than were the peasants; they were associated in the poetical movement of the South—as Bertrand de Born, William of Aquitaine, and Bernard of Ventadour bear witness. The first chroniclers who wrote in French were nobles (and laymen)—Villehardouin and Joinville. In 1337, the scions of the first families followed the courses of the university of Orleans. As to the documents which they are said to have been unable to sign, 'because of their condition of gentlemen,' such papers do not exist, and we defy the paleographers to produce one containing the alleged formula. As to another proof of mediæval ignorance, recourse is had to the crosses traced at the foot of documents of the eleventh and twelfth centuries, and to the absence of signatures in those of the thirteenth ; but this pretended proof cannot stand the tests of diplomatic science. In those days, acts were not authenticated by written names, but by crosses and seals. The most ancient royal signatures are of no earlier date than that of Charles V. (d. 1380).''

(1). M. Louandre, in the Revue des Deux Mondes for Jan. 15, 1877, p. 452.

As to the pretended ignorance of Charlemagne, we prefer more ancient authority than that of Voltaire (1), the author of this assertion. Now, in the Acts of the Council of Fisme, held in 881, we read that the bishops exhorted Louis III. to imitate "Charlemagne, who used to place tablets under his pillow, that he might take note of whatever came to his mind during the night, which would profit the Church or conduce to the prosperity of his kingdom." It was the celebrated Hincmar who, in the name of the Council, drew up these Acts of Fisme, and he certainly is good authority in this matter, for he had passed much of his life in the society of Louis the Compliant, a son of Charlemagne. But is not the testimony of Eginhard, son-in-law of Charlemagne, to be preferred to that of the prelates of Fisme? Sismondi, who admits the extraordinary learning of the great emperor, is so impressed by the words of Eginhard, that he concludes that this prince acquired his knowledge by oral teaching (2). as indeed, owing to the cost of books at that time, nearly all students acquired an education. We would prefer the authority of the bishops of France, headed by Hincmar, to that of Eginhard; but the two testimonies do not conflict. Eginhard writes: "He tried to write, and used to keep tablets under the pillows of his bed, so that, when time permitted, he could accustom his hand to the forming of letters ; but he had little success in a task, difficult in itself, and assumed so late in life." Eginhard admits, then, that Charlemagne had some success in his endeavors, and we know that he could form his monogram ; that, with his own hand, he transcribed the songs which recounted the exploits of ancient kings. We are therefore led to accept the interpretation of Eginhard's remark as given by the erudite Lambecius, and since that author's time, by the best commentators, that therein there is no question of writing in general, but merely of a running hand. In fine, Charlemagne could write by means of what we style square or printed letters, and few of the olden Mss. are written in any other ; he found it difficult to write the running hand, and " kept tablets under his pillow, that he might practise," that style of writing ; he could write, but he was not a calligrapher. Such is the opinion of Michelet (1), of Henri Martin (2), of Guizot (3). Since Eginhard is adduced to prove the ignorance of Charlemagne, it is well to note what this chronicler, in the same chapter, tells us about the emperor's learning. Charlemagne spoke Latin fluently and with elegance ; Greek was just as familiar to him, but his pronunciation of it was defective. He was passionately fond of the fine arts. He assembled at his court the wisest men of the day, and very soon he equalled his masters in their respective branches. He began the composition of a grammar ; he undertook a version of the Gospel, based on the Greek and Syriac texts (4). He perfectly understood the intricacies of liturgy, psalmody, the Gregorian Chant, etc. During his meals, he listened to the reading of histories ; he was especially fond of St. Augustine's City of God. He preferred to attend the schools he had founded, rather than any kind of amusement. He compelled his daughters, as well as his sons, to cultivate the fine arts (5).

(1) Essay on Customs in Introduction; Annals of the Empire.

(2) History of the French, vol. 1., p. 318. Paris, 1821.

(1) History of France, edit. 1835, vol. i., p. 332.

(2) History of France, edit. 1855, vol. ii., p. 292.

(3) History of France, narrated to my Grandchildren, 1872, vol. i., p. 226.

(4) Lambecius, in his Commentaries on the Imperial Library at Vienna, (1655), b. ii., c. 5, speaks of a Ms., explaining the Epistle to the Romans, corrected by the hand of Charlemagne.

(5) The monk of St. Gallo, in his Cura Eccl., narrates that one day Charlemagne said to Alcuin : " How happy I would be, if I had twelve ecclesiastics as learned as SS. Jerome and Augustine ! " Alcuin replied : " God made only two such, and you want twelve ? "

But were not the Middle Ages excessively superstitious? To the mind of the average Protestant, who regards the Catholic religion as composed—to a great extent—of doctrines and practices not revealed and authorized by God, the Middle Ages must appear superstitious. In those days, says Montalembert, “when love had embraced heaven and its Queen, and all its blessed inhabitants, it descended again to the earth to people it in its turn. The earth which had been assigned for the dwelling of men—the earth, that beautiful creation of God—became also the object of their fertile solicitude, of their ingenuous affection. Men who were then called learned, and perhaps justly, studied nature with the scrupulous care wherewith Christians ought to study the works of God; but they could not think of regarding it as a body without superior life; they ever sought in it mysterious relations with the duties and religious belief of man ransomed by his God; they saw in the habits of animals, in the phenomena of plants, in the singing of birds, in the virtues of precious stones, so many symbols of truth consecrated by faith (1). Pedantic nomenclatures had not yet invaded and profaned the world which Christianity had regained for the true God. When, at night, the poor man raised his eyes to the blue dome above, he saw there, instead of the Milky Way of Juno, the road which conducted his brethren on the pilgrimage of Compostella, or that by which the blessed went to heaven. Flowers, especially, presented a world peopled with the most charming images, and a mute language which expressed the liveliest and most tender sentiments. The people joined the learned in giving to these sweet objects of their daily attention the names of those whom they loved the most, the names of the Apostles, of favorite Saints. or of Saints whose innocence and purity seemed reflected in the spotless beauty of the flowers (2). . . . The birds; the plants, all that man met on his way, all that had life, had been marked by him with his faith

(1) See the Natural Mirror of Vincent of Beauvais.

(2) The spirit of our day has seen fit to replace the sweet memory of Mary, as cultivated in the language of flowers, by that of Venus. Among many instances may be cited the modern Cypripedium Calceolus, which used to be called the “Virgin’s Shoe.”

and his life. This earth was one vast kingdom of love and also of science; for all had its reason, and its reason in faith. Like those burning rays which shot from the wounds of Christ, and impressed the sacred stigma on the limbs of Francis of Assisi, even so did the beams from the heart of the Christian race, of simple and faithful man, stamp on every particle of nature the remembrance of heaven, the imprint of Christ, the seal of love" (1). There were assuredly many instances of puerility, many acts of credulity, in the piety of the Middle Ages, and the Church took cognizance of and condemned them; but none of these abuses of faith are to be compared to the abuses of the "philosophy" of modern times.

Sismondi, Michelet, and even Henri Martin, following in the traces of more serious but mistaken historians (2), have found a proof of the superstition of the Middle Ages in the terror which is presumed to have seized upon Christendom, at the approach of the year 1000,—the date then generally assigned, say these writers, for the end of the world. Since most men believe that this world is to come, at some time, to an end, we might ask whether the term superstition can rightly be applied to any terror experienced at the expected consummation. But is it true, as Sismondi says, that at this period, "all humanity was in the situation of a criminal who has received his sentence; all bodily or mental labor ceased, for want of an object" (3), and as Michelet says, "The prisoner in his dungeon, the serf in his hut, the monk amid the mortifications of the cloister, entertained the terrible hope of the last judgment"? (4). Not one of the old chroniclers speaks of such a state of mind; nay, one of them, Thietmar of Merseburg, speaks of the year 1000 as one of enlightenment and glory (5). Let Hermann Contractus (1054), Lambert of Aschaffenburg (1077), Sigebert of Gembloux (1119), Vincent of

(1) MONTALEMBERT; loc. cit.

(2) BARONIO, Annals, y. 1001, no. 1;—The Benedictine Literary History of France, vol. vi., in preface.—LONGUEVAL, History of the French Church, vol. vii.—CAUMONT, Archæology.—AMPERE, Lit. Hist. of France, vol. iii.—BERGIER, art. World.

(3) Fall of the Roman Empire, vol. iii., p. 397; Paris, 1835.

(4) History of France, vol. ii., p. 132; Paris, 1835.

(5) Annals of his time, in Pertz, vol. v.

Beauvais (1250), Rollevinck (1480), be consulted, and no indication of the supposed terrors will be found. Trithemius, who flourished in the sixteenth century, is the first chronicler to mention them (1). Certainly, Michelet adduces the testimony of the Council of Trosly, in 909; but to say nothing of this Council having been held ninety years before the supposed panic, we will let the reader judge if the fathers spoke as though they feared a near end of the world. "For us who bear the title of bishops, the burden of the pastoral charge becomes insupportable, as the moment approaches when we must render an account of the mission confided to us, and of the profit we have amassed. Soon will arrive the terrible day when all the pastors will, with their flocks, appear before the Supreme Pastor" (2). But it is said that the public documents of that time are filled with such expressions as "the terrible day is at hand," and "the end of the world approaches." To this objection, a modern critic (3) replies: "The erudition of those (4) who thus object, is a little at fault. If they had consulted special works on diplomatic science (5), they would have learned that these expressions were not invented in the tenth century; they were used in the seventh century, and hence have no connection with the terrors of the year 1000." Certainly, remarks Barthélemy (6), a merely cursory view of the religious, political, and artistic state of the world at the end of the tenth century, would show that neither sovereigns, nor clergy, nor nobles, nor people, were buried in torpor. In March, 999, Pope Gregory V. died, but no anticipation of the imminent end of the world prevented the election of a new Pontiff. In this same year, the emperor Otho III. so little thought of the coming ruin of earthly things, that he created the kingdom of Poland. Then also, king Stephen of Hungary organized his provinces, and founded bishoprics and mon-

(1) Annals, vol. i., y. 1000.

(2) Council of Trosley, y. 909, in Labbe and Mansi.

(3) The Benedictine, Fr. Plaine, in vol. xiii. of the Review of Historical Questions, 1873, p. 147.

(4) MICHAUD; Crusades, vol. i.—ESCALOPIER; Preface on the Work of Theophylus.

(5) WAILLY; Elements of Palaeography, vol. i. p. 204.

(6) Historical Errors, vol. xiv., p. 206, Paris, 1881.

asteries; while Adalbert of Prague was civilizing the hordes along the Vistula and the Niemen. In Spain, the patriotic Christians were trying, as of old, to reclaim their country from the Saracens, with no idea that soon any country would be only a name. At Constantinople, no thought of a coming annihilation of all earthly grandeur caused any cessation of the usual usurpations of the Byzantine throne. Finally, the numerous Councils held during the last ten years of the tenth century show that churchmen gave no heed to the few visionaries who then, as in our day, proclaimed that the career of the Church militant was about to close. We may well conclude, therefore, that the silence of contemporary authors on a fact of such importance as the panic of the year 1000, the weakness of the arguments used to uphold it, the tenor of the documents of that period, and all the general ideas we can form concerning the state of the world at that time, furnish so many reasons for believing the terrors of the year 1000 to be a myth.

The Middle Ages cannot be regarded as a starless night; and even though they furnish nothing worthy of our imitation, there is much in them for us to learn. Then it was that were prepared those ameliorations which render modern society, in some respects, preferable to the ancient; "that period, says Cantù," "was one of gestation—inconvenient, certainly, but necessary, and it must be judged by its effects." The Middle Ages commenced in barbarism; they ended in modern civilization, which, as Guizot remarks, is merely a mixture of three elements—Barbarism, old Rome, and the Gospel. But, as Guizot did not observe, the part played by Barbarism and old Rome was comparatively small, they were obstacles rather than aids to the development of the modern Christian principle. The feudal system was barbarian; the debasement of the lower classes was a legacy from old Rome and old Germany; but to Christianity the Middle Ages owed the fusion of races, the abolition of personal slavery, the emancipation of women, chivalry, and the sacerdotal influence which protected the poor. The statistical researches of Dureau—

Delamalle, of Guérard, and especially of Count L. Cibrario prove that the Middle Ages formed an epoch of immense progress in public prosperity. It was then that industry and commerce founded the Communes; and so influential did the industrial and commercial classes become, that even in the thirteenth century their representatives sat in the States General of every country in Western and Southern Europe. Even then, the workingmen of Florence (il popolo minuto) claimed a share in the sovereignty snatched from the nobles by the wealthy bankers and manufacturers (il popolo grasso). The weavers and artisans of Ghent and Bruges could claim their privileges from the bourgeois with a firmness equal to that they showed in resisting the encroachments of the courts of Flanders. Industry certainly held a secondary place in a pre-eminently religious period, but, "though labor must be respected, devotion is a virtue. The soldier who gives his blood, and the priest who gives his entire self, occupy a more elevated plane than that of a man who hires out his muscle, and a far more elevated one than that of the manufacturer who seeks his fortune." (1).

CHAPTER II.

THE REVIVAL OF THE WESTERN EMPIRE UNDER CHARLEMAGNE.

At the death of Constantine, in the year 341, the empire of the West fell to Constantine the Younger and Constans; that of the East to Constantius. In 353. Constantius succeeded to the united empires. Julian followed Constantius, and then came Jovian. Valentinian, the next emperor, ceded the East to his brother Valens in 368, and until 476 the empire remained divided. In 476, Augustulus was deposed by the Herulan king Odoacer, the entire West was overpowered by barbarians, and the Roman empire survived only in the East. However, the valor of Belisarius and Narses enabled the Byzantine rulers to revive the Western empire, and in 556 Justinian's sceptre swayed over both sections. The Constantinopolitan sovereigns now exercised jurisdiction over the West until the eighth century, when their own lethargy, cowardice, and general corruption reduced their power in those parts to a mere name. We have already noticed the gradual formation of the temporal dominion of the Roman Pontiffs. (1). In the year 800, on Christmas day (2), Pope Leo III. put an end to even the nominal authority of Byzantium over the West, by placing the crown of a new Western empire upon the brow of the Frankish king Charles, now called the Great; "thus consummating," writes Cæsar Balbo, "the greatest event recorded in European history during more than a thousand years; an event which dominated history, at first in fact, and to our own days, at least in name." It is not our province to inquire whether Pope Leo III. had a "divine right" to transfer the empire of the West from the Byzantines to the Franks; whether, that is, from the fact that the Roman Pontiff, as supreme pastor of the Universal Church, is spiritual ruler over Christians of sovereign as well as of private rank, it follows that, when the interests of Christendom demand it, he can and ought to dispose of kingdoms and empires. It is sufficient for us to know that in the time of Leo III. this principle was recognized by Christendom. And no one will deny that the public weal required the change then made, even though that change had to be inaugurated at the expense of ancient and respected institutions. To say nothing of the miseries caused to Christendom by the Arians and Iconoclasts, the other evils which the Pontiffs and their subjects, both temporal and spiritual, were forced to endure, owing to the decline of the imperial power, rendered necessary, a restoration of that power in the person of one who would use it with strength and wisdom. For nearly four centuries Italy had been the bleeding prey, not only of barbarians, but of her Byzantine suzerains; the Eternal City had been sacked repeatedly by the foreigner, and her streets had flowed with citizen blood, the shedding of which could have been prevented by a strong and willing hand. A few months before Leo III. proclaimed king Charles the Defender of the Holy See, armed rebels had attacked the holy Pontiff during a solemn religious function, and after trying to pluck out his eyes and tongue, had left him for dead. For centuries the Byzantine emperors had trifled with the Holy See; some had even undertaken the assassination of its incumbent. The Lombards had indeed been defeated, but they waited for the Franks to recross the Alps, and then again they would pounce on their wonted prey. Any one of these reasons was sufficient to justify Pope Leo III. in trying the experiment of a new empire.

(1) FRUGIERAY: Is Christianity Hostile to Industry? Paris, 1844.

(1) Vol. I., chap. 40.

(2) At that time the year was calculated from Christmas day; but according to the present method of computation, the coronation of Charlemagne occurred in the year 799.

As to the ultimate utility of Pope Leo's action, even Catholic publicists differ. Whether or not the weary and soul-absorbing contest between the Papacy and the empire would have ensued, in some form or another, even though the Holy Roman Empire had never been excogitated, is doubtful; but it is certain that the struggle commenced almost with the blessing of Charlemagne's crown, and ended only in 1806, with the dissolution of the empire. That the institution was of benefit to the then nascent modern Europe, is certain. But Italy suffered much from the persistent, and too often criminal, interference of the new emperors, who were, as Cantù aptly describes them, "a heterogeneous element, which often impeded the progress of Italy, and finally degraded her" (1). Hence it is that many Italian publicists show themselves hostile to the Holy Roman Empire, in its very inception, and are disposed to blame Leo III. for want of foresight. Even the modern Neo-Guelph school, of which Cantù may be regarded, in historical matters, as the chief, frequently shows very plainly that its heart is not enlisted when it assumes the defence of Pope Leo's action. Cantù seems to regard Italy as having been "the necessary victim for European prosperity," and he calls on his countrymen to "bear the misfortune with decorum, and let those who profited by it not insult us" (2). And the great historian finds consolation in the fact that "the coming of the Northerners to this shrine of knowledge and of civil order helped to refine them." The learned Benedictine, Tosti, laments the coronation of Charlemagne by the authority of God, as Pope Leo phrased it. The Pontiff, thinks Tosti, should have said, "crowned by me," and then he would not have "made the imperial power depend on God," and his successors would not have discovered "how much exertion and how much blood it costs to make an emperor feel that between God and him there is a Pope." (1)

(1) Univ. Hist., b. 1x., c. 16.

(2) Ibid.

As to the nature of the transfer of the Western empire to the Franks, political and national predilections, as well as religious ones, have produced many and various theories. The question is very important; for upon the point of view from which we regard this transfer, will depend, almost entirely, the judgments we will form concerning the many intricate and tantalizing questions which will arise when we come to investigate the long and persistent struggle between the Church and the empire. In every conflict between the Roman Pontiff and the Holy Roman, or, as he came to be erroneously styled, the German emperor, just so surely as justice was nearly always on the side of the Holy See, so surely the emperor's pretensions were founded on a false assumption as to the nature of the transfer made to Charles by Pope Leo III. The root of every controversy between the Papacy and the empire was the imperial idea, more or less veiled, that the Pontiff was a subject of the emperor; that Pope Leo III., in his own name and that of his successors, voluntarily abdicated his temporal crown, or at least sank his position as an independent sovereign into that of a mere vassal to a diadem of his own creation. A few emperors, indeed, enunciated this theory in as many words. Now this extravagant supposition could be sustained only by another, equally unfounded; that is, that when Leo III. placed the imperial crown on the head of the Frankish king Charles, he conferred on that prince merely the imperial title, and nothing else which said Charles did not already possess—that, in fine, the Roman Pontiff was not the source of the imperial right. Hence it is that, concerning this historical question, a unity of thought prevails among Gallican, courtier-theological, Protestant, and rationalistic writers. The publicists of the old Gallican school, albeit generally men of great sanctity, were excessively devoted to their monarchy, and therefore they readily espoused any theory, not radically heretical, which tended to restrain the “encroachments” of Rome. The courtier-theologians, or aulici (as they are styled in the schools), either from a mistaken patriotism, or for the crumbs from the imperial table, were ever prompt in so shaping both religious and historical doctrine as to countenance almost any pretension of the crown. Protestants and free-thinkers naturally advocate any theory that will lessen the power or diminish the prestige of the Holy See. Chief among the apologists of imperial autocracy, and more or less followed by all of that ilk in modern times, is Mathias Vlacich, generally known as Flaccius Illyricus (1), against whom

(1) History of the Lombard League, Montecassino, 1848.—"When Rome and Italy lost the imperial presence, the idea of the empire weakened in minds which saw no escape from misery, no civil power to quell disorder. Oppressed by the barbarians, unprotected by public authority, the Romans turned to the Pope and to the Church, from whom alone came any comfort or aid, and all were persuaded that the right of the Roman empire—impotently exercised by the Byzantine sovereigns,—now resided in the theocratic empire of the Pontiffs. . . . In the necessity of having some one who would actuate this power, not only the Romans, but all the peoples, assented to the Papal disposal of the imperial dignity. The Pope was the sole magistrate in Rome who was a Roman; the clergy, patri-cians, and people concurred in his election. Therefore, the candidates for the empire were to bow before him, the only representative of Rome. . . . When his Pontifical person had been brutally profaned, Leo III. felt that, in such times, the liberty and dignity of his office required a continuous protection by the civil power. Hence he recalled Charles to Italy, and crowned him emperor. Fatal coronation! 'Life and victory,' cried the Pontiff, 'to the most pious and august Charles, crowned by God great and pacific emperor!' And with those words began the story of Italian misfortunes. With his right hand, Leo placed a golden crown on the head of that foreigner, and although unwittingly, with his left he laid one of thorns on the brows of unfortunate Italy. Better the barbarians than an emperor! The former desolated, indeed, but they did not kill the germ of regeneration; the latter gnawed into the marrow of Italian worth, and prostrated its strength. Amid the tribulations of anarchy, Leo hoped for a refuge in the new empire; his successors found it a tyranny. Would that he had said: 'Crowned by me!' But he preferred: 'Crowned by God', and thus made the imperial power depend from God; and his successors discovered, etc. . . . Leo fancied that in the shadow of the empire he would repose as in the bosom of God; he fancied that this supreme civil power would aid the Pontiffs in their task of regenerating the world with the Gospel; he fancied that the emperors would always bow before the Papal power from which alone they held their crown, and that they would ever be docile children of Holy Church. Perhaps, when Charlemagne first felt the pressure of the diadem, he responded heartily to the Papal intentions. But that a man, crowned in such a beatitude of thirsty ambition, could long think of Pope, of Gospel, or of God, let him believe it who can! . . . I do not think that Charlemagne ever dreamed of subjecting the Pontiff to himself, of destroying the liberty of the Church. He was a good Christian, if we shut our eyes to certain domestic and Adamitic faults. And some of his faults were not malicious; for instance, when he deputed abbot Angilbert to admonish Pope Leo 'concerning the integrity of his life, the observance of the canons, and the good government of the Holy Church of God', he was simply piously impudent. . . . That which the Pontiff imposed upon Charlemagne as a law, he and his successors termed a right; and every one knows what kind of a protector he is who forces you to accept his aid. The emperor, in order to protect the Church, had an opportunity to meddle in her affairs." Loc. cit., B. I.

(1) This author was born (1520) in Istria, and hence his surname of Illyricus. He became a professor of theology at Jena, but is best known as the originator, and one of the four principal authors of the famous Protestant work, the Centuries of Magdeburg. The other “Centuriators” were Lejeundin, Fabert, and Wigand, but all worked under the supervision of Flaccius.

Bellarmino wrote his valuable dissertation on the Transfer of the Empire from the Greeks to the Franks. Among Catholic writers who, with some modifications, agree with the Illyrian in this matter, are Thomassin (1), Francis Feu (2), Bossuet, and Alexandre. Bossuet admits that Charlemagne received the empire in the year 800, but contends that he derived his right from an election by the Roman people. Alexandre is careful to concede that "Charlemagne did not receive from Leo III. merely an empty title. He received a most ample dignity, corresponding to the sublimity of that title." We shall take Bellarmine as our guide in refuting the theory advanced by these authors; and in order to show that it was solely by the authority of the Roman Pontiff that the empire was transferred from the Greeks to the Franks, we shall first adduce the testimony of competent historians, and that of Pontiffs and princes who were well acquainted with their own rights.

Paul the Deacon, a friend of Charlemagne, after a narration of that prince's subjugation of the conspirators Paschal and Campalus, adds: "As a reward to Charles, Pope Leo crowned him emperor in the church of St. Peter" (3). Cedrenus (y. 1070), a Greek historian, says: "Legates came from Charles to Irene, demanding her hand, after Pope Leo had crowned him at Rome" (4). Zonaras, another Greek author (y. 1118), says: Charles having been crowned by Leo, and acclaimed as emperor of the Romans, the Franks became all-powerful in Rome (5). These authors make no mention of the Roman senate or people as having been instrumental in the advancement of Charles. Eginhard, son-in-law and chancellor of Charlemagne, speaks still more plainly: "Charles was so averse, at first, to the title of Augustus, that he declared that, although the day was one of festival, he would not have entered the church, if he had been aware of the Pontiff's intention" (6). The Annals of the Franks say: "Pope Leo placed a crown upon the head of Charles, and the Romans cried: 'Life and victory to Charles, crowned by God great and pacific em-

(1) Discipline, pt. III, b. 1, c. 29.

(2) Laws, q. 4, art. 4.

(3) Roman Affairs, b. 23.

(4) Life of Constantine and Irene.

(5) Ibid.

(6) Life of Charlemagne.

peror of the Romans ! ” (1). The reader will observe that the Romans acclaimed Charles as crowned by God, and that they did not call him emperor until after the coronation (2). Witikind of Corbie, writing in the beginning of the tenth century, says of Otho II., who was crowned in 969 : “ Although he was already anointed as king, and designated as emperor by the blessed Apostolic (Pope) ”. Here Witikind indicates the essential difference between the Holy Roman Empire and the kingdom of the Germans, or of the Franks, as the case might be. A confusion of these institutions is too often made, and while one may pardon it in a tyro in historical matters, it is inexcusable in a professed publicist. To name and instal the king of the Franks or the king of the Germans, was an affair of the Frankish or German electors : to name, or at least to confirm and crown the emperor of the Romans, was the right of the Roman Pontiff. This distinction is enunciated by Liutprand writing in the days of Otho I. (962-973) ; by Hermann Contractus, a contemporary of St. Henry (1014-1024) ; by Duodechin (1200), continuator of Marianus Scotus ; by Lambert of Aschaffenburg (1070). Otho of Frisingen (1146) must have had every opportunity to learn the nature of the imperial tenure, for he was related in the second or third degree to the fourth and fifth Henry, to Conrad, and to Frederick I. Now this author never gives the title of emperor to his grandfather, king Henry IV., until after his nomination by the anti-Pope Guibert, and then he declares that Henry “ was forcibly, rather than lawfully, elevated ” (3). According to bishop Otho, therefore, ardent imperialist though he was, only a legitimate Pope could make a legitimate emperor. Lupold of Bamberg (4), Æneas Sylvius (5), Platina (6), Trithemius (7), and a host of other writers, prove the strength of our position.

But what was the opinion of the early emperors on this matter ? When Charles the Bald contended with his brother Louis, king of the Germans, for the empire, he rushed

(1) Y. 801.

(2) Nothing but the acclamation of the already crowned emperor is attributed to the Romans by Aimon (820), Ado of Vienne (860), or Rhegino (908).

(3) B. vii., c. 11.

(4) Preface to Rights of the Empire.

(5) Compendium of Blondus.

(6) Life of Leo, III.

(7) Catalogue of Writers.

toward Rome, to receive the crown from Pope John VIII. According to Cuspinian, Rhegino, and Marianus Scotus, Louis endeavored to prevent this journey, even sending an army to intercept Charles, and when the latter had beaten this army and had gone on to Rome, Louis took his revenge by devastating the French border. Now if Charles and Louis had regarded the Papal action as a mere ceremony, why did the one so strenuously labor to prevent it, and why did the other take such pains, spend so much treasure, and run such risks for himself and dominions, to secure it? The emperor Albert (1298) most earnestly, but vainly, besought Pope Boniface VIII. to declare the empire hereditary in his family (1). Henry VII. (1308), formerly count of Luxemburg, begged Pope Clement V. to confirm his election. (2). Louis IV., excommunicated and deposed by Pope John XXII., (1324), constantly endeavored to secure the good graces of that Pontiff and of his successor, Benedict XII. Frederick I. (1154), speaking by the mouth of the bishop of Bamberg, begged of Pope Adrian IV. "to be promoted by him to the height of empire." The following passage of Albert Krantz (3), who wrote shortly before the Lutheran movement, illustrates the mind of the Redbeard on this subject: "The Pontiff tried, by condescension, to mollify the insolence of the Germans; he came to the royal camp with a retinue worthy of a Supreme Pastor. The king hastened to meet him, and is said to have held the stirrup, as the Pope dismounted, and taking him reverently by the hand, to have conducted him to the royal tent. The bishop of Bamberg then delivered these words of the king: 'Apostolic Pontiff, as we have long ardently desired an interview with your Holiness, so we now joyfully enter upon it, giving thanks to God, the giver of all good things, who has led us to this place, and made us worthy for your most holy visit. We wish you to know, reverend father, that the entire Church, collected from all parts for the honor of the kingdom, has led her prince to your Blessedness, to be promoted by you to the

(1) Chronicle of Albert of Strassburg.

(2) Conrad Vercer's Life of Henry VII.

(3) Saxon History, b. vi., c. 16 and 17 height of empire. He deserves this by his nobility, prudence, and fortitude ; by his fear of God, by the love of Catholic peace which reigns in his heart, and by a not ordinary devotion to the Holy Roman Church. You witness his reverent reception of your person ; how he has prostrated himself before your most holy footsteps. Therefore, venerable father, so act toward him, that what is now wanting in him of the fulness of imperial power, may be supplied by the munificence of your Blessedness'. When they had sat down, the Pope said : ' When the princes of the olden time came to ask for the crown, they were wont to allege some great deed to call for the good will of the Church. thus Charles, by crushing the Lombards ; Otho, by repressing Berengarius ; the last Lothaire, by restraining the Normans ; merited to receive the imperial crown. Similarly, then, let the most serene king restore to us and to the Church that province which is now usurped by the Normans ; we, then, will readily perform our part.' The princes then answered that, because of the great distance and the present weak condition of his troops, the king could not invade a great province. ' Let the Pontiff bless the king ; he shall not repent of being the first to confer a favor ; for when the princes shall have returned to their own dominions, they will return with their king at the head of more powerful forces, and will perform the Church's wishes.' The Pope then yielded, promising to grant their request." But even the Byzantine sovereigns recognized the Roman Pontiffs as the authors of the modern Western empire. When Michael Curopalates made peace and alliance with Charlemagne, he took care to have the treaty ratified by Pope Leo III. (1) When Emmanuel Comnenus heard of Barbarossa's contest with the Holy See, he twice offered Pope Alexander III. an immense sum of money, a large army, and even a union of the schismatic Greek Church with that of Rome, providing that the Pontiff would confer the Western empire upon him and his successors of Constantinople. (2). When the empire became vacant by the death of Albert, Philip the Fair of France resolved upon urging Pope Clement V. to restore the Holy Roman empire to the French monarchs. Hearing of this, and wishing not to offend Philip, the Pontiff wrote to the electors, pressing them to hasten their choice, and, if possible, to elect Henry of Luxemburg. (1). Philip and the electors, therefore, were of the opinion that the Holy See could transfer the empire from the Germans to the French, just as it had been previously transferred from the Greeks to the French, and from these latter to the Germans.

(1) ADO of Vienne, at year 812.

(2) BLONDUS, PLATINA, and NAUCHER.

That the Roman Pontiff was the source of imperial authority, is also shown by the actions and sayings of the Pontiffs. When the sons of the emperor Louis had deposed their father, and had taken his wife Judith from him, Pope Gregory IV. ordered the restitution of both throne and spouse (2). This he would not have done, had he not held that the empire was a dependency of the Holy See. When Charles the Bald endeavored to depose the emperor Louis the Younger, Pope Adrian II. threatened him with excommunication; Charles was much vexed, but he obeyed the Pontifical mandates (3). Pope Adrian IV., writing to the bishops of Germany, says: "The empire was so transferred from the Greeks to the Germans, that the king of the Germans cannot be called emperor and Augustus until he is consecrated by the Roman Pontiff, who promoted Charles, and gave him the great name of emperor." (4). When the Greek ambassador urged Pope Alexander III. to unite the two empires, the Pontiff replied (5) that he would not reunite what his predecessors had purposely separated. Innocent III., writing to the duke of Thuringia, says: "We recognize, as we ought, the right and power of electing a king, to be afterwards promoted to the empire, in those princes to whom we know, from law and ancient custom, that the right belongs; especially since that right and power were given by the Apostolic See, which, in the person of the magnificent Charles, transferred the Roman empire

(1) VERCFR.

(2) This is proved by Paul Æmillus, Marfanus Scotus, Regino, and Aimoin. Falsely, therefore, Sigebert asserts that Gregory IV. conspired with the sons of Louis against that emperor.

(3) AIMOIN; b. v. 24 and 27.

(4) AVENTINE Annals of the Bavarians, b. iv.

(5) PLATINA; Life of Alexander III.

from the Greeks to the Franks." Clement V., in the Fifteenth Gen. Council (1311), issued a decree concerning the oath taken by the emperors to the Pontiffs, which commences as follows: "The Roman princes, professing the orthodox faith, and venerating with prompt devotion the Holy Roman Church, whose head is Christ our Redeemer, and the Roman Pontiff, the vicar of the same Redeemer, have not deemed it unworthy to bow their heads to the same Roman Pontiff, from whom proceeds the approbation of the person who is to be located on the height of imperial power; (nor did they deem it unworthy) to bind themselves to him, and to that same Church which transferred the empire from the Greeks to the Germans, and from which Church was derived, by certain of their princes, the right and power of electing a king, to be afterwards made emperor: as is all shown by ancient custom, renewed in latter times, and by the form of oath inserted in the sacred canons." Pius II. (1460), writing to the sultan Mohammed II. (1), and exhorting him to become a Christian, promises him a just title to his dominions in the East: "We will call you emperor of the Greeks and of the East, and you will rightly possess that which you now occupy by force, and retain injuriously. . . .as our predecessors, Stephen, Adrian, and Leo, incited Pepin and Charlemagne against the Lombard kings, Astolphus and Desiderius, and having freed the empire from tyranny, transferred it from the Greeks to the liberators, so we will use your aid in the needs of the Church, and will return a favor received."

Alexandre relies greatly upon the fact that in the creation of the new Western Empire the Greek sovereigns were despoiled of no provinces; that, in fine, the Pontiff gave to Charles no dominions which he had not already in his power. This assertion is true, to some extent, (1) but the conclusion that Alexandre draws, namely that the Pontiff

(1) Epist. 396.

(1) We say that Alexandre's assertion is true, only to some extent. While Charlemagne, before his coronation, was lord of Gaul, Germany, Pannonia, and a small part of Italy, he did not possess Spain, the Apulia, Calabria, Sicily, Illyria, Africa, and other provinces of the Western Empire. We say nothing of Britain, for that province had been long independent, and as for his real possessions, none of them were his by Casarean right; some belonged to him by royal, others obeyed him only by patrician right. By the translation of the empire, however, Charlemagne obtained over his old dominions the right of emperor did not, "properly speaking, transfer" the empire from the Greeks, is incorrect. Until Pope Leo III. saluted Charles as emperor, the claims of the Greek sovereigns to their ancient Western dominions were, at least, in abeyance; the foreign conquests of the Frankish king were held only by the armed hand. But when the Frankish monarch was proclaimed emperor of the West, those claims were consigned forever to the realm of history, and public law regarded Charles as their inheritor. Flaccius especially insists that "by right and by force Charles had seized the Western empire, before Leo crowned him it is certain that Charles held the Western empire for more than twenty years before that Leonine—I had almost said, vulpine—coronation." But why, for twenty years, did Charles not don the imperial crown? Why do all historians date his empire from that Christmas day, when Leo III. and his subjects saluted him "Emperor of the Romans"? Simply because, down to that day, the empire lay with the sovereign of Constantinople. Some of the arguments adduced by the Illyrian apologist of German imperial autocracy are amusing. Thus, relying upon a passage of Lucius Florus, who wrote under Trajan, and who states that the Pharsalian victory of Cæsar was due to certain German cohorts, he asserts that the Roman empire of the Germans commenced rather at that time than with the coronation of Charles: "You may truly say that the empire was not acquired by German valor merely in the time of Charlemagne, for no one doubts that the Roman empire was born and founded at the battle of Pharsalia, fought by Julius Cæsar against Pompey. For there, says Lucius Florus, six German cohorts suddenly sent the numerous cavalry of Pompey flying to the mountains, destroyed many of the archers and light troops, and finally routed the veteran Pompeian legions, thus being, as all historians testify, the beginning and Augustus, and acquired, besides, a right to all the other territories of the old empire which had been usurped by others. And, what was of no small moment in those days, upon the emperor devolved all the titles, honors, and prerogatives of the old Cæsars, so that, as emperor, he took precedence of all other sovereigns, even though, as often happened, they were more powerful and far richer than himself. Again, we must remember that the imperial power was founded much more on opinion than on the incumbent's possessions. As Cantù remarks, Barbarossa, with a very limited patrimony, became very powerful, while Francis II., with an extensive inheritance, could not gain the empire.

and front of this victory." In this unmitigated nonsense, one cannot tell which to admire the most, the logic or the falsehood. The logic is as sound as would be that of a Frenchman who would claim a French empire over these United States because very many French regiments (not a few cohorts) fought for our independence. The assertion is false, for Appianus of Alexandria (1) and Dion Cassius (2) carefully enumerate the peoples represented in Cæsar's army at Pharsalia, and while mentioning Italians, Gauls, and Spaniards, say nothing of Germans. Appianus says that Cæsar placed his great reliance upon the Italian troops, and Cæsar testifies (3) that he relied upon certain three cohorts, and had foreseen their value in the battle; comparing, therefore, Appianus and Cæsar, we would conclude that the decisive stroke at Pharsalia was made by Italian valor. Again, Cæsar, the abbreviator of Livy, Plutarch, Patereulus, Lucan, Tranquillus, Eutropius, Orosius, and many other ancient writers, who carefully treat of the celebrated campaign against Pompey, make no mention of the Illyrian's Germans (4). We only introduce this ridiculous item that the reader may conceive some fair idea of the calibre of this chief of the Centuriators of Magdeburg. With the same purpose we quote the brilliant argument with which he would ascribe the foundation of the German empire to Arminius: "Under Augustus, the Germans captured two eagles from the Romans, in a most just war. Among other historians, the same Lucius Florus says: 'The army being destroyed, the Germans took two eagles from the Romans, and yet retain them.' These insignia, obtained by valor and by right of war, the German empire yet uses in protestation and defense of its right against all adversaries When, therefore, the Roman priest and other rivals of the empire wish to know its origin and right, let them contemplate that glorious ensign of the double-headed eagle." Bellarmine has the patience to examine this effusion at some length, but we will simply observe that Flaccius himself, in another place, (5) ascribes the origin of the double-headed eagle to the empire having been divided into the Eastern and Western.

(1) Civil War, b. ii.(2) Histories, b. xlv.(3) Civil War, b. iii.(4) BELLARMINÉ, loc. cit.(5) Cent. ix., c. 16.

Alexandre asserts that, long before the coronation of Charles, the Romans had sworn allegiance to him. That the Romans promised fidelity to Charles in his capacity of Roman Patrician or Defender of the Roman Church, just as Stephen V. caused them to swear fidelity to Louis the Pious, is true. But it is false that by this oath the Romans recognized Charles as their sovereign. From the year 754, as we have seen, when treating of the origin of the Pontiffs' temporal dominion, the Popes were de jure, as they had long been de facto, kings of Rome and its territories. In the treaty or pactionis fœdus made by Pepin with Pope Stephen III. at Quiercy, that monarch acknowledged the high dominion of the Holy See over the Papal States, "no power being reserved, within the same limits, to us and to our successors, unless only that we may gain prayers and the repose of our soul, and that by you and your people we be styled PATRICIAN OF THE ROMANS." This Patriciate, which was afterwards accorded to Charles, constituted the titular a defender of the Roman Church, but implied no supreme authority in the dominions of the Pontiff. Mabillon (1) gives us the formula according to which princes were accustomed to create Patricians: "We give thee this honor that thou mayest render justice to the churches of God and to the poor, and give an account thereof to the Most High Judge." Then, says the formula, the emperor (or other sovereign) puts a mantle upon the elect, and places a ring on his right fore-finger, and a golden circlet on his brow, and dismisses him. This formula certainly indicates no other power than that of Defender. That the Patriciate implied no other power, and that the oath taken by the Romans to Charlemagne regarded fidelity to him in his capacity of Defender, and did not imply in him any authority superior to that of the Pontiff, may be also gathered from the epistle sent to Leo III. by Charles, after the death of Adrian I., and from the course afterwards pursued by Leo. Sending Angilbert to Rome, Charles writes to the Pope that he had communicated to that ambassador "all that will seem necessary to you or to us, in order that, after consultation, you may determine what will be best for the exaltation of the holy Church of God, or for the stability of your honor, or for the firmness of our Patriciate. For, just as I made a compact with the predecessor of your Paternity, so I wish to establish with your Blessedness an inviolable agreement of the same faith and charity, so that the apostolic benediction of the holy advocates of your Apostolic See, God's grace giving it, may everywhere follow me, and that the most holy Roman See, God granting, may be ever defended by our devotion. It is for us, with the aid of the divine piety, to everywhere protect the Holy Church of Christ from Pagan incursions, and to defend it with arms from the devastation of infidels." Eginhard tells us, in his Annals, that then "through his legates Leo sent to the king the keys of the Confession of St. Peter (1) and the banner of the Roman city, with other gifts, and he asked him to send one of his chief nobles to Rome, who would bind the Roman people by oath to fidelity and subjection to him. For this purpose, was sent Angilbert, abbot of the monastery of St. Richerius." Speaking of this correspondence, Pagi justly observes: "Charles obtained what he wanted from the Pontiff, namely, the confirmation of his Patriciate, and the title of Defender of the Roman Church; not, however, the dominion of the city, which he did not seek, and about which there had been no question in the agreements with Adrian." (2) With reference to the oath of fidelity to king Charles, Flaccius says: "All historians, even the most favorable to the Popes, testify that Leo, immediately after his election, sent to Charles a legation with the keys of St. Peter, which are the Papal insignia, and the banners of the city, with eagles; and that he requested, according to the Synod of Adrian, his own confirmation, and that some one should be sent to bind the Romans to Charles by oath. This was a sign of extreme subjection. And when a dissension arose

(1) Bened. Ann., b. xliii., n. 2.

(1) The meaning of this is that the keys had been laid upon the tomb of the Apostles. On several occasions of emergency, the Popes performed this ceremony, when praying for assistance to the great ones of the earth. Epist. Greg., b. vi., n. 23.

(2) See Gentili's Origin of the Patricians, and Bianchi's Power and Policy of the Church.

between the Pope and the Romans, the Pope fled to Cæsar as to his superior; then also the Romans sent their accusers, so that both parties testified that he was their legitimate judge and lord. How despicable therefore is the vanity of these Papists who pretend that the slaves and chattels of Charles transferred the Roman empire to the same Charles, and that they feudally bound him as a vassal to themselves, so that now they compel the Cæsars to fealty, and even force them to most foul kisses of their feet." In another place (1), however, the same polite Illyrian says that Leo asked Charles to send some one to Rome to bind the Romans to allegiance, not to Charles, but to Leo himself. Then it was that, without the knowledge of the Senate, Leo sent to Charles the keys (the Papal insignia) and the eagle (the Roman imperial insignia), and when afterwards Angilbert came to Rome, he compelled the Romans to swear fidelity to Leo. (2) There was every reason why the Romans should promise allegiance to their Pontiff; there was none for such a promise to Charles. How could the Frank king exact or receive such an oath, unless he was prepared to violate the pact of Quiercy, whereby Pepin swore, for himself and successors, to claim no jurisdiction in the Papal dominions, but to be more than content with the style of Patrician? But, says the ingenious and ingenuous Flaccius, "A dissension having arisen between the Pope and the Romans, both appealed to Charles as their lord and judge." These two terms are found in no Annals of the time, as applied, even implicitly, by the Pope to Charles; but the royal Chronicler, Otho of Frisingen, (3) who was well versed in the history and spirit of the empire, says that Charles came to Rome, after the terrible conspiracy of 799, not to judge Leo, but to punish the malefactors; that Leo was judged by no one, but purged of imputed crime by his own oath.

We will not attempt to prove that Charlemagne did not receive the empire directly from God, or by hereditary right, or by donation from the Greeks; the curious reader may consult Bellarmine, who spends much time in evincing

(1) Cent. viii., c. 10.(2) Annals of the Franks.(3) B. vi., c. 30.

each of these points. But we will proceed to consider the theory of Bossuet, according to which the Holy Roman empire owed its origin to the Senate and People of Rome. Sigebert, Blondus, Lupold, Æneas, Vincent of Beauvais, and Onofrio Panvini, are adduced in support of this assertion. Sigebert lived three hundred years, the other cited authors from five to seven hundred years, after Charlemagne; their testimony, therefore, is not so conclusive as that of the contemporary writers whom we have already quoted in defense of our own position. But these six authors prove nothing against us. Sigebert and his follower, Vincent of Beauvais, attribute to the Roman people no other part than that of applause, in the coronation of Charles. Blondus merely asserts that the Romans prayed Leo to make Charles emperor. Lupold simply repeats the words of Vincent and Sigebert, but he also says: "Pope Leo, having considered all the good and worthy reasons for the transfer of the empire from the Constantinopolitan emperors to the Frankish kings, . . . the Romans acclaiming and requesting, anointed and crowned Charles as emperor and Augustus, by which anointing and coronation the said transfer was made." (1) And Lupold denies what he is alleged to believe, for, speaking of the opinion of some who said that the Roman people could make laws for the empire, and even transfer it, he says (2): "This answer, saving a better judgment, does not please me. For at the time of the said transfer, and even for a long period before it, the empire was not with the Romans, but rather with the Greeks; nor is it to-day with the Romans, but with the Germans. There is no reason therefore, why the Roman people, at the time of the transfer, should have had, or why they should now have, a greater right to transfer the empire than any other people possess." As for Æneas Sylvius, we have already seen, in the epistle which he wrote, as Pope Pius II., to the Sultan Mohammed II., that he held that his predecessors had transferred the empire to the Franks. Onofrio alone then, who lived seven hundred years after Charlemagne, can be adduced in support of the theory that the Roman Senate and people transferred the empire to the Franks. But, as Roncaglia, after Bellarmine, well observes, the Roman Senate and People very seldom indeed conferred the imperial dignity; the Cæsars nearly always were elevated, either by succession, by the reigning emperor, or by the soldiery. It is not likely that, at a time when the S. P. Q. R. were less than a shadow, they would have dared to elect an emperor, or that the world would have more than smiled at the puerility (1). The following passage from a letter (2), written by Louis II., great-grandson of Charlemagne, to Basil the Macedonian, who had complained because Louis was styled emperor, not of the Franks, but of the Romans, will farther illustrate our subject: "Your Fraternity is surprised because we are called emperor of the Romans, and not of the Franks. But you ought to know that, unless we were emperor of the Romans, we could not be emperor of the Franks. We received this title and dignity from the Romans, for the Frankish princes were at first kings, and afterward those only were styled emperors who had been anointed with the holy oil, by the Roman Pontiff, to that end . . . If you blame the Pope for his action, you must also blame Samuel, who rejected Saul, whom he had anointed, and hesitated not to consecrate David as king."

(1) Rights of the Empire, c. 4.(2) Ibid., c. 12.

CHAPTER III.

THE FABLE OF THE POPESS JOAN.

The story of the female Pope constitutes one of the most delicious morsels ever offered for the delectation of the credulous children of Protestantism. The Centuriators of

(1) Onofrio names only three emperors as chosen by the senate, viz., Nerva, Maximus with Balbinus, and Tacitus. As to Nerva, Onofrio cites Dion Cassius in proof, but Dion says no such thing. Aurelius Victor, in some of his codices, says that Nerva was proclaimed by the army, and Eutropius ascribes his elevation to the prefect of the prætorium. As for Maximus and Balbinus, elected indeed by the senate, against the will of the troops, the soldiers derisively called them "senatorial emperors," says Herodian, b. 8. and put them to death. Tacitus was chosen by the senate, but because the soldiers called for him. So necessary was it, in fact, for the election of an emperor to be acceptable to the army, that St. Jerome, in his epist. 85 to Evagrius, says that the troops made the sovereign.

BELLARMINE, loc. cit.

(2) BARONIO; year 871.

Magdeburg thought that such a disgraceful episode ought to convince the world that God wished to show that Rome had forfeited her rights (1); that, in the words of Calvin (2), the Pope was no longer a bishop. Among other notable Protestant authors who insist that the Popess was a reality, we may mention Spanheim, Lenfant, and Desvignolles. (3). But many Protestants of celebrity advise the rejection of the fable; e. g., Blondel (4), Leibnitz, Bayle, Casaubon, Jurieu, Basnage, Burnet, and Cave. Æneas Sylvius (5) seems to have been the first Catholic polemic to undertake a refutation of this story. The task was also assumed by Florimond de Rémond (6), Onofrio Panvini (7), Papire Masson (8), Bini (9), Aubert Miræus (10), Leo Allatius (11), Labbe (12), Bellarmine (13), Baronio (14), Parsons (15), Alexandre (16), and many others cited by Labbe (17).

Who was the first to publish to the world the story of the female Pope? Anastasius the Librarian, triumphantly reply the friends of the fable—Anastasius, an officer of the Papal court, and a contemporary of the Popess. But it is very strange that this contemporary, a resident of the Papal palace, should introduce so extraordinary a narrative with an on dit; we would suppose that such a witness would be able to speak of what he himself had seen and heard. But the fact is, Anastasius does not speak of the female pope. The Protestant Bayle thus deals with this alleged testimony: "If we were to find that one and the same manuscript informed us that the emperor Ferdinand II. died in 1637, and that he was immediately succeeded by

(1) Cent. IX. c. 20.

(2) Instit., b. iv., c. 7, § 23.

(3) Mosheim does not defend the truth of the story, but he asserts that "during five centuries there are six hundred testimonies to this extraordinary event; and until the Lutheran Reformation, no one deemed the story incredible, or ignominious for the Church." Cent. IX., p. 2, c. 2.

(4) Investigation of the question whether a woman sat on the Papal throne between the reigns of Leo IV. and Benedict III. (Amsterdam, 1649.)

(5) Epist. 130, to Cardinal Carvajal, dated Aug. 2, 1451.

(6) Refutation of the Popular Error concerning the Popess Joan, c. iii., no. 4.

(7) Notes to Platina's Lives of the Pontiffs.

(8) Bishops of the City of Rome.

(9) Notes to Councils.—Lives of Leo IV. and Benedict III.

(10) Notes to Sigebert.

(11) Refutation of the Fable of the Popess Joan.

(12) Cenotaph, etc.

(13) Rom. Pon., b. iii., c. 24.

(14) Annals, y. 853.

(15) Three Conversions of England, p. ii. c. 5.

(16) Cent. IX., diss. 3.

(17) Eccl. Writers. vol. I., p. 837 (Paris, 1664).

Ferdinand III., but that, nevertheless, Charles VI. succeeded Ferdinand II., and reigned for more than two years, after which Ferdinand III. was chosen emperor, we would insist that one and the same writer could not have penned all this—that copyists must have injudiciously joined things written by different persons. Only a crazy or a drunken man would tell us that on the death of Innocent X. he was at once succeeded by Alexander VII., and that Innocent XI. became Pope immediately after Innocent X., reigning more than two years, and being succeeded by Alexander VII. Yet such is the absurdity of which Anastasius the Librarian would have been guilty, had he written what is found concerning the Popess in some of the MSS. of his work. We must conclude, therefore, that another hand than his added the passages concerning this woman” (1).

The Centuriators of Magdeburg adduce Marianus Scotus (d. 1086) as an authority for the story of Joan. At the year 853, they assert, this author says: “Pope Leo died on the Calends of August, and he was succeeded by the woman Joan, who reigned during two years, five months, and four days.” But, we ask, did Marianus really make this assertion? If he made it, is his authority of sufficient force to nullify the arguments which, as we shall see, militate against the fable? It is by no means certain that the quoted testimony is from the pen of Marianus Scotus. According to the editor of Krantz’s Metropolis (Cologne, 1574), the best codices of Marianus do not contain this passage (2); and the learned Benedict XIV. advances most stringent reasons for his belief that the passage is an interpolation (3). Again, it is very curious, if not suspicious, that only the modern propagators of this tale adduce the authority of the Irish chronologist; indeed, down to Martin the Pole, who wrote two centuries after Marianus, all historians make Benedict III. the immediate

(1) Dictionary, art. Popess Joan.

(2) Leo Allatius observes that the Frankfort printers carefully omitted this note of the editor;—Florimond de Rémond (d. 1602), writing on the supposed testimony of Marianus, says: “Chronologies are special victims of the marginal notes of their readers; since there are in them, quite frequently, hundreds of omissions, these are supplied by the first comer, and often he makes great blunders. Do not we ourselves comment, again and again, on the Chronologies of the learned Pontac and Génébrard, because of their omissions or fancied defects? If one of these annotated Mss. should fall into the hands of a printer, how easily he would accredit the work of the glossarist to the author.”—Loc. cit., c. 5, no. 3.

(3) Canonization, b. iii., c. 10, no. 3.

successor of Leo. IV., thus leaving no room for the female who is said to have reigned "two years, five months, and four days;" which certainly shows that they were unacquainted with the passage of Marianus. But of what authority is Marianus? His frequent blunders should cause us to hesitate in accepting his unsupported assertions; still more care should we exercise ere we receive as true such things as become dubious under light from other sources. Alexandre gives many instances of anachronisms on the part of Marianus, but we shall notice only one, which is in connection with the present question. In the year 854, which, according to the quoted passage, ought to be the second of the Popess, Leo IV. founded the city of Leopolis, twelve miles from Centum Cellæ. In the following year, the emperor Louis visited Pope Leo IV. at Rome, and the Pope died soon after, on the 16th Calends of August. The entire period, therefore, which Marianus is said to assign for the Pontificate of Joan, was spent by Leo IV. in the Papal chair (1). The third argument in favor of the existence of the Popess is taken from Martin the Pole, penitentiary to Pope Nicholas III. This author died in 1270, that is, a hundred and eighty-four years after the death of Marianus, and four hundred and twenty-five years after the election of Benedict III. He is said to tell us that Joan was English by birth, but of German origin; that, during a solemn procession, she gave birth, when mid-way between St. Clement's and the Colosseum, to a child; that ever after the Pontiffs always went to the Lateran by another street, because of this hideous memory. St. Antonine, archbishop of Florence, praises the Chronicle of Martin, and says (2): "After this Leo, Martin put in his Chronicle Joan, by birth an Englishman, who sat in the chair of Peter two years, five months, and six days, and at his death, the Papacy was vacant for one month. This Pontiff, says Martin, is reported to have been a woman, who, when yet a young girl, was taken to Athens in male attire, by her lover; there she made such progress in learning, that her equal was not to be found, and when she afterwards lectured at Rome, she had great professors among her disciples. Being of great repute in the city, for both science and integrity, she was made Pope after Leo, but became pregnant by a servant. Ignoring the time of her delivery, she was one day going from St. Peter's to the Lateran, when she was taken in labor between St. Clement's and the Colosseum, and was delivered in the street. Dying in the child-birth, she is said to have been buried on the spot. As the Pope, in going to the Lateran, always avoids this street, many say that it is because of this detestable thing. (This Pontiff) is not put in the Catalogue, on account of the sex."

(1) ANASTASIUS the Librarian, Life of Leo IV

(2) Chronicles, p. ii., tit. 16, c. 1, § 6.

So far as St. Antonine is concerned, he shows that he places no confidence in the story, for he says: "If the report is true, we may cry out with Paul, 'O the depth of the riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God; how incomprehensible are his judgments!' It is said that a monumental sculpture was erected in the street where this took place, but Vincent, in his Historical Mirror, and John Colonna, say nothing about it." As for the testimony of Martin the Pole, we must observe, first, that he merely gives a rumor, and that he writes four centuries after the supposed event. Again, is it certain that Martin was the author of the alleged testimony? Suffrid, who caused Martin's Chronicle to be printed, at Antwerp, in 1584, observed that it had been greatly interpolated, and he also noted that the various codices greatly differed, and that in the Tongerloensian MS. the narration about Joan is put in an appendix, not in the body of the work. But the very words of the story, as said to have been written by Martin the Pole, betray the hand of an interpolator, and manifest an ignorance which renders the whole narration unreliable as evidence. Joan is said to have been taken, when yet a girl, to the schools of Athens, and to have there acquired a great reputation. Now, where were the famous schools of Athens, in the ninth century? What was the condition of Athens? As far back as the year 420, Synesius of Ptolemaide wrote (1): "There is now nothing splendid in

(1) Epistle 35.

Athens but the celebrated names of places, just as, after a sacrifice, nothing remains of the victim but its skin. Wandering around, you may gaze upon the Academy and the Lyceum, and the Portico which gave name to the sect of Chrysippus. The proconsuls have taken away the artistic productions of Thasius. In our day, Egypt teaches, she who received the seeds of wisdom from Hypatia. Athens was once a city, the home of learned men; now it is occupied only by apiarists." The schools of Athens were afterwards, to some extent, revived, but not during the supposed student-life of Joan. Cedrenus and Zonaras inform us that the emperor Michael III., after he had removed his mother Theodora from the government, allowed the Cæsar Bardas to restore the Athenian gymnasia, but Theodora was not relegated to private life until 856, while Joan is said to have died in that year. Equally absurd is the statement that Joan's talents caused her, a stranger, to be chosen Pontiff. It is certain that for many centuries the custom had obtained of raising to the papacy only a priest or deacon of the Roman Church, one trained, as it were, in view of such a contingency. A departure from this rule would scarcely have been made without grave reasons, and none such could be conjectured as subsisting in the case of Joan. Ridiculous indeed is the assertion that the supposed Pontiff gave birth to a child during a solemn religious function. If it can be believed that stupidity was so rampant, so universal, in the Roman court, that the sex and condition of this person could so long remain hidden, exposed, as every Pontiff must necessarily be, to the scrutiny of prelates, ministers, courtiers, physicians, chamberlains, and servants, we cannot believe that so successful an impostor, and so arrant a knave, would have possessed so much asininity of mind as to subject herself, at such a time, to the risks of a processional walk from the Vatican to the Lateran. Again, in this very mention of the procession to the Lateran, the interpolator of Martin's Chronicle betrays himself. He says that the Pontiffs avoid the street that was fatal to Joan, when they proceed to the Lateran. It is certain that the Popes did not commence to inhabit the Vatican before the reign of Boniface IX., who mounted the throne in 1389. (1)

The friends of this fable also adduce the testimony of Baptist Platina (d. 1481), who, having given the story almost in the supposed words of Martin, whom he cites, says that "there are those who say that, to avoid a similar error," the junior deacon investigates the sex of the newly elected Pontiff (2). Platina also speaks of a ceremony in which the new Pontiff is seated in a chair, "according to some," for this purpose, but says that it is his belief, however, "that the seat is prepared, that he who is raised to so eminent a position may know that he is not God, but a man, and subject to the necessities of nature; whence the name of stercoraria is given to the seat." To this argument, we may allow Platina himself to reply: "What I have written is commonly rumored, but the authors are uncertain and obscure; I have given the reports briefly and simply, lest I might seem to obstinately omit that which nearly all affirm. Let us then, in this matter, err with the crowd." These words do not imply any great faith in the story of Joan. As for the chair, which some think so eloquent, Belarmine (3) thus explains the matter: "We know from the Sacred Ceremonies, b. i., sect. 2, that in the Lateran Basilica there were three stone seats on which the new Pontiff was placed at his coronation. The first was in front of the entrance to the Church, and was common and miserable; in this the Pontiff was seated a short time, to signify that he was about to leave a humble for an exalted station, and then was sung from Kings, B. I., c. 2: 'He raiseth up the needy from the dust, and lifteth up the poor from the dunghill; that he may sit with princes, and hold the throne of glory.' And for this reason that seat is called stercoraria. The second seat was of prophecy, and was in the palace itself, and the Pontiff was placed thereon, in sign of his taking possession; there he received the keys of the Lateran palace. The third seat was not far from the second, and was similar to it; when he was seated here, he returned the keys to the giver, probably that, by such ceremony, he might be reminded of death, which would soon give his power to another. Of a seat for the investigation of sex, there is no mention whatever." (1)

(1) ONOFRIO PANYINI, The Seven Churches.

(2) "Pontificem ipsum dum primo in Sede Petri collocatur, ad eam rem poratorata, genitalia ab ultimo diacono attriectari."

(3) Roman Pontiff, b. iii., c. 24.

Sigebert of Gemblours (2) furnishes another argument to the propagators of this tale. In his Chronicle he is said to assert: "It is reported that this John was a woman, that she was known by one alone of her servants, and that, having conceived by him during her Pontificate, she was delivered. Some, therefore, do not number her among the Pontiffs." Again we are treated to a "report," but even this shadow of an argument is of doubtful authenticity. In the MS. of Gemblours, edited by Miræus, the quoted passage is wanting. Vincent of Beauvais (3), who, in treating of this period, transcribes Sigebert's text, word for word, does not give the slightest reference to any female Pontiff. Again, the quoted words do not tally with the following statement of Sigebert: "Benedict (III.) was the 102d Pontiff of the Roman Church. Being dethroned by a conspiracy of the wicked, the Papacy was invaded by Anastasius; but Anastasius was deposed by the legates of the emperor Lothair, and put in prison, while Benedict was honorably restored." We shall prove that Benedict III. succeeded Leo IV. in 855, in a few days after the latter's death. According to Sigebert therefore, as our adversaries would understand him, either Joan was Pope at the same time as Benedict III., or her reign must be accounted for by deducting more than two years from that of Leo IV. Sigebert, however, assigns eight years to Leo IV. (4).

(1) Blondel says that this ceremony was abolished at the accession of Innocent VIII.

(2) Sigebert, a monk of Gemblours, was a contemporary of Gregory VII., and died in 1112. He was a bitter enemy of this Pontiff, and hesitates not to lie, whenever his zeal for the imperial interests is excited. His Chronicle extends to 1111, and was continued by Robenus de Monte down to 1210. Among his writings are two books on Illustris Men, in which company he ranks himself, and gives a detailed account of his works.

(3) Vincent, bishop of Beauvais, a Dominican friar, died in 1250. His Historical Mirror treats of events down to 1244. It was continued by an unknown author down to 1494.

(4) Alanus Copus tells us that Molanus assured him that he had read the MS. of Gemblours, and that it contained nothing concerning the Popess. He was certain, he added, that, if this MS. was not the original of Sigebert's work, it was at least a copy of that original. Dialogues, I, c. 8. (Antwerp, 1573).—The Protestant Spanheim admits that the passage of Sigebert, as found in the Paris edition of 1513, is a parenthesis which can be cut out without entailing any injury on the narrative or the author's chronological calculations. He also avows that the questioned passage does not occur in the MS. of Leyden, which bears the date of 1154. The Female Pope, p. 52.

Proof for the existence of the Popess is also sought in a certain statue, representing a woman and infant, which was erected in memory of this fatal event, say our credulous adversaries, and was finally thrown by some Pontiff into the Tiber. Is it likely that the Popes would have allowed the erection of a memorial, to perpetuate the remembrance of so disgraceful an event? But the fact is, there was once a marble group, of evident antiquity, in the very street leading to the Lateran, and it was removed by Sixtus V. (1585-90), when that street, like many others, was widened and straightened. But in that group the most vivid imagination could find no indication of a design to represent the female Pontiff. It represented two persons indeed, but not a woman and infant; one figure was that of a man, thought by antiquaries to be of a Pagan priest, preceded by a well-grown boy, probably his attendant minister. (1). But there was once a statue of the Popess in a church at Sienna, and it was removed by order of Pope Clement VIII. (1592-1605), as we are informed by Baronio (2), who was the intermediary between the Pontiff and the Grand Duke on the occasion. The existence of this statue may show the prejudices or ignorance of the Siennese, but as a positive argument it is valueless in the face of the many contrary and more weighty reasons which militate against the fable.

Having examined the arguments adduced by the propagators of this story, we now proceed to show, by the testimony of contemporary and closely following authors, that Pope Benedict III. immediately succeeded to Leo IV., and that hence the two years and more of Pontificate, on the part of Joan, are an impossibility. Lupus, abbot of Ferrières, writing to Benedict III. (3), praises the virtues of his predecessor Leo, and hopes that they will be imitated by the new Pontiff. Here there is no suspicion of an intervening Popess. Ado of Vienne (d. 875) writes of the emperor Lothair: (1) "Resigning his temporal kingdom, he entered the monastery of Prumia; having taken the tonsure, and become a monk, he died in the year of our Lord 855, and the thirty-third of his empire. being there reverently buried by the brethren. . . . The Roman Pontiff Gregory died, and Sergius was ordained his successor; he having departed, Leo succeeded; this Pope dying, Benedict was placed in the Apostolic See, Lothair being already dead. . . . Pope Nicholas, a most religious man, died, and was buried in the vestibule of St. Peter's, not far from the remains of Benedict. Now Adrian succeeded in the order of bishops." Thus we learn from Ado that Leo IV. was succeeded by Benedict III., just after the death of Lothair, and we know that this death occurred on September 28, 855. To Benedict succeeded Nicholas, to Nicholas Adrian; where then was there room for Joan? Anastasius the Librarian informs us that Leo IV. died on July 17, 855, and that Benedict III. was installed on Sept. 29th of the same year. Where then are the two years of Joan? Hincmar of Rheims tells us (2) that he had sent messengers to Pope Leo IV., to beg for a certain privilege, and that, while on the way, they heard of that Pontiff's death, but nevertheless proceeded to Rome, and obtained the boon from the new Pope, Benedict III. Here again we find no interval for Joan's two years of Pontificate. Before the news of Lothair's death reached Rome, as we gather from the document itself, Pope Benedict III. issued a Diploma granting certain privileges to the monastery of Corbie. (3). As Lothair had died two months and twelve days after Leo IV., and this document speaks of him as yet living, it follows that Benedict succeeded Leo, at the furthest, in three months from the latter's death. Joan's two years of reign are again missing. Pope Nicholas I., immediate successor of Benedict III.,

(1) In his Table Talk, Luther says: "In a great street, that which leads to St. Peter's, I have seen with my own eyes the statue of a woman, clothed with the Papal insignia, and holding a child in her arms. The Pope never goes by that way It is of that Agnes, born at Mayence, sent to England as cardinal, thereafter recalled to Rome, crowned Pope, as successor to Leo IV., in 857, and delivered of a child in the street in which her image is erected Truly, I am astonished that the Popes allow it to remain; but it is there as a miracle of God, who strikes them with blindness."

(2) Epistle to Florimond de Rémond, given by this author in his Table of the Popess Joan, c. 22.

(3) Epistle 103.

(1) Chronicle, y. 855.

(2) Epistle 25.

(3) This Diploma begins: "Benedict, Bishop, Servant of the Servants of God, etc. Written by the hand of Theodore, Notary and Archivist of Holy Roman Church, in the month of October, 4th Indiction. Perfected on the Nones of October, by the hand of Theophylactus, seal-bearer of the Apostolic See, in the reign of Lothair, etc."

writes : (1) "Leo, Pontiff of the Apostolic See, who knew the desire of Hincmar, was taken from this life ; and when that Apostolic man, Benedict, of holy memory, had succeeded him in the Pontificate, the reverend Hincmar again prepared his arms, etc." There was therefore no Popess between Leo and Benedict. Photius, the father of the Greek Schism, a most bitter enemy of the Roman See, and yet a most learned man, would not have omitted to make capital out of the career of the Popess Joan, winding up, as it is asserted to have done, with so extraordinary a termination, had he known of it. Such an event could not have escaped his knowledge, for at the time it is said to have happened, Photius was secretary of state to the emperor Michael III. Now this learned, cunning, and vindictive schismatic, in a book written by him when his bitterness against Rome was fully developed, (2) distinctly enumerates the successors of Leo IV., down to that day, Benedict, Nicholas, John, and Adrian, without a hint of so acceptable an interregnum as that of a Joan would have been to his rebellious heart. Metrophanes of Smyrna, scarcely less bitter than Photius in his hatred of Rome, bears the same testimony. (3). The same is given by Stylianus, bishop of the Euphratesian Neo-Cæsarea, in the Epistle sent to Pope Stephen VI. by him and the confederated Catholic bishops of the East. In the first year of the Pontificate of Pope Formosus (891), Photius having been finally deposed, and peace been restored, for a time, to the Eastern Church, there was affixed to the main entrance of St. Sophia's basilica a Breviary or Synopsis of the Eighth General Council, in which the following passage occurs : "Down to this day, Photius has been openly condemned for forty-five years, by Pope Leo (and all the Popes) down to Formosus. For eleven years he was anathematized, while a secular and a layman, because he communicated with the excommunicated Gregory of Syracuse ; for other thirty-four years, after he had received holy orders, he was also anathematized. Popes

(1) Epistle 46.

(2) On the Procession of the Holy Ghost, against the Latins, b. 1. When Photius wrote this treatise, he had been many years an intruder in the patriarchal throne of Constantinople, and was fully and finally committed to the Schism.

(3) Divinity and Procession of the Holy Ghost.

Leo, Benedict, and Nicholas had condemned Gregory for various reasons. Both because of his other crimes, and because he had received orders from Gregory, Photius was anathematized by nine Roman Pontiffs, Leo, Benedict, Nicholas, Adrian, John, Marinus, the other Adrian, Stephen, and Formosus." Here we find the Church of Constantinople dividing the forty-five years which elapsed between the beginning of Leo's reign and that of Formosus among nine Pontiffs, whose names are given. Where will the patrons of the fable locate the two years and more of Joan? (1).

Pope Leo IX. (1049—1054), writing to Michael, patriarch of Constantinople, reproached that diocese in a manner which he would not have adopted, had he known that his own Pontifical chair had been contaminated as some Protestants would have us believe. His reproach is no other than that the clergy of Constantinople had raised a woman to the patriarchate: (2) "We would not wish to believe what public rumor hesitates not to assert, that the Constantinopolitan church, ignoring the First Chapter of the Council of Nice, has promoted eunuchs to her Patriarchal chair, and that once she even placed a woman in it. Even though the horror excited by so abominable a crime, so detestable a wickedness, did not prevent us, fraternal benevolence would cause us to doubt it. Nevertheless, when we consider your indifference to Canonical censures, in promoting eunuchs and mutilated persons, not only to the clerical state, but even to the episcopacy, we are of opinion that this may have happened."

(1) We may add the following testimonies as to the immediate succession of Benedict III. to Leo IV. The Synod of Tulle, y. 859, writing to the bishops of Brittany. The Roman Council of 863 (in Muratori, Italian Writers, vol. ii., pt. 2). Two contemporary catalogues of the Roman Pontiffs (in the Prolegom. to the Lives of Anastasius, vol. ii., pts. 18 and 20, edit. Vat.). The Annals of Weingarten (in the Historical Monuments of Germany, vol. i.). The Annals of Würzburg (ibid., vol. ii.). A Catalogue of the Pontiffs compiled in 1048 (in Ecard, Corp. Hist. Mid. Age, vol. ii.). The Annals of Einsiedeln (in Pertz, Monum. Germ. Hist., vol. v.). The Chronicle of Hermann Contractus (in Pistorius, German Writers, vol. i.). The Catalogue of Pontiffs to the reign of Honorius II. (in Muratori, loc. cit.). A Chronicle of St. Denis (in Bouquet, Collection of Historians of the Gauls and of France, vol. viii.). Not one of these works furnishes posterity with any trace of the alleged Popess. (2) Bellarmine thinks that perhaps this remark of Leo IX. give rise to the fable of Joan. "As there was a rumor that a certain woman had been made patriarch of Constantinople, after a while the name of the place was omitted, and people talked of a female 'œcumenical' patriarch; then some persons, who hated Rome, asserted that the woman had been the Pope of Rome; probably the report (in its new dress) arose about the time of Martin the Pole." Roman Pontiff, b. 3, c. 24. This idea is not incredible, for, as Bellarmine says, "the Centuriators of Magdeburg insert more incredible things. Martin only said that this woman was an Englishwoman, of Mentz origin, and the Centuriators tell us her name was Gilberta; they say her father was an English priest, and that she was raised as a monk at Fulda, and wrote books on magic." Whence this information?

Summing up what has been observed in this matter, we have shown, firstly, that Marianus Scotus, who is, according to the propagators of the fable of Joan, the first recorder of the tale, is not undoubtedly in its favor; that there is good reason to suppose that his works have been interpolated; that, granting that he did narrate the story, his authority is not great enough to justify us in rejecting, in his favor, the many positive arguments which militate against the truth of the tale. Secondly, we have seen that the Chronicles of Martin the Pole and of Sigebert have been certainly vitiated: that St. Antonine and Platina are unfavorable to the story, and that they simply record it as said to have been told by Martin. Thirdly, we have proved that the fable cannot be incorporated into history because of any reasons deduced from the examination theory, or from the existence of certain statues said to have commemorated the disgraceful death of Joan. Fourthly, we have shown that the story bears intrinsic marks of its own falsity. Fifthly, we have adduced the testimony of contemporary and closely following authorities, who all agree that the Pontificate of Benedict III. immediately succeeded that of Leo IV., and that therefore, after Leo, there could not have been, on the part of Joan, "a reign of two years, five months, and four days." But it may naturally be asked, what could have given rise to this tale of a female Pontiff? Erudite men have been able only to conjecture. Mosheim, as we have said, admits, in an affectation of impartiality, that the story is certainly not well founded. But he says it must have owed its origin to some extraordinary event which happened about that time, that it is incredible that, for five succeeding centuries, a number of historians should narrate the affair, in almost the same language, if it was entirely destitute of foundation. We have seen that what he regards as incredible has not occurred. As for this "some extraordinary event" which must have happened, according to Mosheim, the reader may rest assured that there happened, in the Middle Ages, few, if any such, that were not recorded by the indefatigable, though often injudicious, chroniclers of the time. The science of criticism was not well developed in those days, and the chronicler was generally so ambitious for material, that he put into his annals whatever he read or heard, historical facts or monastic gossip. No event, sufficiently "extraordinary" to give origin to such a story as that of Joan, would have been unacceptable or too prurient for insertion, as experience will show the reader, if he gives some time to the perusal of these monuments. (1). John Aventinus, (2) derives the story of Joan from the career of John IX. (898—900). Theodora, mother-in-law of Albert, prince of Etruria, who then was powerful in Rome, procured the election of this Pontiff, and as she always exercised much influence over him, the story went around, says Aventinus, that a woman was Pope of Rome. Onofrio Panvini (3) thinks that the fable originated among the Romans, who detested the vices of John XII. (956—964), and who styled his mistress Joan the real Pontiff of Rome. The opinion of Bellarmine we have already given. Baronio (4) deems the easy-going course of John VIII. in the matter of Photius the origin of the story. Leo Allatius finds its source in the Annals of the Franks and the Chronicle of Sigebert, where is described the condemnation, in the time of Leo IV., of a certain Thiota of Mentz, a pretending prophetess, etc. (5)

We will close this chapter by citing the opinions of two celebrated Protestant polemics, than whom modern heresy has produced no more able, or more bitter, foes of the Roman Church—Jurieu and Blondel. The former says: "I do not think that we are very much interested in evincing the truth of this story of the Popess Joan. Even though the Papal See had been surprised into accepting for its head a woman, believing her to be a man, it would not, in

(1) "But this is a foible of Protestants: when there is question of a fact favorable to the Roman Church, the most convincing proofs will scarcely persuade them; but if there comes up an event which is injurious to Catholicism, the weakest probabilities will engender their confidence in it; if they dare not affirm it, they must have the consolation of being doubtful about it. This disease is common to all incredulists."—BERGIER, art. Popess Joan.

(2) Annals of Bavaria, b. 4.

(3) Notes to Platina.

(4) Annals, y. 879.

(5) In the year 1845 Bianchi-Giovini published a Critical Examination of the Acts and Documents relating to the Fable of the Popess Joan, in which taking up the story from its first appearance, he carefully weighed all the authorities for and against its truth. Good critics opine that he so exhausted the subject, and so evidently manifested the absurdity of the tale, that no one will ever again presume to seriously adduce it. The reader will find much information concerning this question in the Notes of Gennarelli to the edition of the Diary of Burckhardt, published at Florence, in 1854. See the part on Innocent VIII., p. 82, note 1.

my opinion, have suffered much. The advantage we might draw from such a fact would not compensate us for the great trouble we would have to prove it. In fact, I find, from the manner in which the tale is narrated, that it gives more honor to the Roman See than that See merits. It is asserted that this Popess had made excellent studies; that she was learned, able, and eloquent; that her many gifts won for her the admiration of Rome; that her election was unanimous, although she had appeared among the Romans an unknown foreigner, without any friends, or any other support than her own merit. I contend that much honor is given to the Roman See by the supposition that it promoted an unknown young person, merely because of personal worth." (1) Blondel remarks: "Many have tried to redeem the romance of Marianus from the suspicion accruing to it from the silence of all authors of the two following centuries, by supposing that the writers who lived during the period from 855 to 1050 refrained from narrating the story, because of the shame it heaped upon them. They preferred, it is contended, to change the records of the Papal succession by an affected silence, rather than to contribute, by noting an odious truth, to preserve the execrable memory of a woman who had dishonored the Holy See. But those authors who lived at Rome, such as Nicholas I. and Anastasius the Librarian, would have been foolish indeed, if they had deemed it possible, by their silence, to bury a disgrace which is supposed to have so astonished, scandalized, and angered the Romans that they could be appeased only by perpetuating their just indignation with the erection of a commemorative statue, with an appropriate arrangement of their processions, and with the use of hitherto unknown, and very indelicate, ceremonies." (2)

(1) Apology for the Reformation, vol. ii., Jurieu agrees with Florimond de Rémond, when this author says (loc. cit., c. xi., no. 5) that "even though this misfortune had befallen the Church, since the woman was elevated by deceit, and by so parading an apparently holy life as to blind everybody, the crime was hers and not of the electors, who were in good faith, and cannot be charged with any part in the fraud."

(2) Loc. cit., p. 78

CHAPTER IV.

THE GREEK SCHISM : ITS FIRST STAGE UNDER PHOTIUS, AND THE EIGHTH GENERAL COUNCIL.

At the death of the emperor Theophilus, in 841, the Byzantine throne was occupied by the empress Theodora as regent for, and, according to the will of Theophilus, co-sovereign with, their son Michael III., then only six years of age. Theodora immediately restored the images to the churches and ejected the Iconoclast John from the patriarchate. To her son Michael she assigned as tutors two worthy patricians, Manuel and Theoctistus, whose aid she also used in the administration of the government. During the fourteen years of her reign the empire prospered greatly, but in the year 855 the intrigues of her brother Bardas deprived her of power and started the series of events which were destined to ultimately prove the ruin of the empire, as well as a serious injury to Christendom. Bardas may rightly be called the father of the Greek schism. A difference having arisen between Manuel and Theoctistus, Bardas profited by it to secure his own advancement. Manuel foresaw the storm, and retired from the court. Theoctistus was not so fortunate. Having rebuked Bardas for many crimes, among which was that of incest with his daughter-in law, his death was the consequence of his zeal. Bardas soon became all-powerful with the emperor, and as Theodora's severe piety and inflexible justice were too great a check upon the passions of the youthful prince, he gave a ready ear to Bardas' suggestion that she should be relegated to private life. Fearing even worse than deposition, Theodora convoked the Senate, rendered an account of the financial state of the empire, lest her administration should be calumniated, and abdicated the throne. Not satisfied with this, Bardas persuaded Michael to force his mother to take the veil, saying that she might otherwise marry again and raise a progeny which would some day claim the sceptre. The aid of Ignatius, who had succeeded Methodius in the patriarchate, was besought in vain ; but Petronas, another brother of the empress, was amenable to Bardas' scheme, and he found some wretched ecclesiastic who cut the hair of Theodora and her daughters, and invested them all with the monastic habit. Bardas was now made Curopolates, and soon afterwards Cæsar. (1). Henceforth he was real master of the Byzantine empire, the nominal sovereign passing his time in debauchery, spending the immense sums which the prudence and economy of Theodora had accumulated. (2)

Ignatius, who at this time was patriarch of Constantinople, was a son of the emperor Michael Rangabes (811-813). Made a eunuch by order of Leo the Armenian (813-820), and confined in a monastery, lest he should claim the throne, he voluntarily became a monk, and in time an abbot. Celebrated for his virtues, he attracted the attention of Theodora, and on the death of Methodius, in 847, was by her influence raised to the patriarchal chair. Under his administration everything prospered, and it was plain that the holy Methodius was worthily replaced. But his zeal soon made Ignatius obnoxious to Bardas. Enraged at the episcopal rebuke for his incest, and convinced, by the refusal to violate the canons in the case of Theodora's monastic investiture, that Ignatius would never be a mere courtier-prelate, the Curopolates compassed his downfall. About this time a certain crazy adventurer, named Gebo, advanced a claim to the throne, asserting that he was a son of Theodora, and quite a number were found to adhere to him. When he was captured and deprived of eyes, hands, and feet, his followers soon disbanded. Bardas now came forward, accusing Ignatius of having been an instigator of the conspiracy. The credulous Michael was easily influenced, and the patriarch was banished to the isle of Terebinthus. Here he was waited upon by several of Bardas' episcopal and patrician friends, and vainly urged to resign his see. (3). Several unworthy prelates, under the leadership of Gregory of Syracuse (1), now held a species of synod, pretended to depose Ignatius, and elected as patriarch a layman, named Photius, then first secretary of state to the emperor. Photius was of a patrician family, a grandson of St. Tharasius, and, besides his secretaryship, held the post of first Sword-bearer. He was wealthy, learned, ambitious, and unscrupulous; in fine, a ready-made instrument for the use of Bardas. In six days the new patriarch received the monk's tonsure, the Lectorate, the Subdiaconate, Diaconate, Priesthood, and Episcopate. These events occurred in the year 857. That most of the bishops who voted for Photius were influenced by fear, is evident from the words of his friend, Metrophanes of Smyrna, who, writing to the patrician Manuel, said: "All the bishops of the province of Constantinople met together and anathematized Photius, declaring him deposed in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, and conspiring together, they devoted themselves to eternal pains if they ever recognized Photius as patriarch." So long as Ignatius lived, Photius was uneasy. Hence he persuaded the emperor that the unfortunate patriarch was conspiring against the throne, and new persecutions were set afoot, not only against Ignatius, but against all who refused to communicate with the intruder. (2). A synod was also held in 859, in the imperial church of the Blachernal, and the deposition of Ignatius was confirmed. A few bishops, not lost to all sense of religion, met, in answer to this conclave, in the church of St. Irene, and declared Photius an intruder, asserting, furthermore, that he had promised, when nominated patriarch, to always regard Ignatius as the legitimate incumbent, and himself only as a vicar.

(1) The dignity of Curopolates corresponded to that of "Master of the Palace" in the West, although in the Byzantine court it never was associated with the real power which often accrued to the possessors of that title under the Merovingian kings. The title of Cæsar gave the bearer a rank second only to that of the sovereign, and was generally associated with so much of real power, that the Cæsar was regarded as a kind of lieutenant of the emperor.

(2) NICETAS, CEDRENIUS, and ANASTASIUS the Librarian.

(3) Idem.

Photius now came to the conclusion that he would never

(1) Gregory had been tried and convicted for sedition, schism, and other crimes, and deposed from his see of Syracuse, by Ignatius, who, as patriarch of Constantinople, was his superior, Sicily being at that time in the obedience of the Eastern empire. Ignatius, however, requested of Pope Leo IV. a ratification of the procedure, which the Pontiff postponed, to give time to Gregory to make a defense. Ignatius afterwards sent to Rome a copy of the papers in the case, and Pope Benedict III. confirmed the sentence. In spite of all this, Gregory retained the insignia of his office, thanks to the protection of Bardas.

(2) Among other torments to which Ignatius was subjected, was his confinement in the sepulchre of Copronymus, where he would have died from the stench and from starvation, had not a faithful adherent bribed the guards to open the doors. He was often beaten nearly to death, and his teeth were knocked from his jaws. Basil, who had been Prefect of the Archives under Ignatius, had his tongue cut out, because he used it in defence of his patron.

enjoy his new dignity in comfort, unless he could obtain the sanction of the Roman Pontiff. Accordingly, he sent to Rome a legation composed of two bishops, and Arzabir, the imperial Sword-bearer. Most cunningly did these gentlemen fulfil their commission. Having presented to Pope Nicholas some very costly gifts in token of homage from Michael and Photius, they put on the veil of piety, and begged the Pontiff to send legates to Constantinople, in order that, by the authority of the Holy See, ecclesiastical discipline might be strengthened, and a final blow be given to Iconoclasm, then threatening to again raise its head. In the letters of Photius, the Pope was told that Ignatius, worn out with age and disease, had resigned his see, and was now residing in a monastery, loved and venerated by all, from the emperor down; that he (Photius) had been chosen patriarch by the unanimous voice of the bishops, and that he had been compelled by the emperor to assume the dignity. (1). Pope Nicholas I. then sent as legates to Constantinople the bishops Rodoald of Porto and Zachary of Anagni, who were charged with the enforcement of the decrees of the Seventh Council on the image question, and instructed "to investigate the cause of the patriarch Ignatius, and to refer it to the true and thorough judgment of the Apostolic See." The legates were ordered to communicate with Photius, "as with a layman," as we learn from the intruder himself. (2). The Pontiff sent letters to the emperor and to Photius. Writing to Michael, he disapproved of the deposition of Ignatius, as done "without the advice of the Roman Pontiff;" he condemned the elevation of Photius, as a violation of the Canons of Sardica and of the decrees of Popes Celestine I., Leo I., Gelasius, and Adrian I.; he ordered that Ignatius should be brought before the Papal legates in full Synod, that an investigation might be held as to the causes of his deposition; he insisted upon due honor to images; he ordered the restoration of the patrimonies of the Roman Church in Sicily, which had been alienated by Leo the Isaurian. This epistle bears date of Sept. 25. 859. In his letter to Photius, Pope Nicholas refuses to recognize that prelate's uncanonical elevation.

(1) NICETAS, Life of Ignatius; PHOTIUS, Epistle to Nicholas I., in Baronio, y. 859; ANASTASIUS, Preface to 8th Council; STYLIANUS, Epistle to Stephen VI.; METROPHANES of Smyrna, Epistle to Manuel.

(2) Epistle I., to all Catholics.

Upon their arrival at Constantinople, the Papal legates were confined to their quarters for a hundred days, being allowed to communicate with no one unprovided with an imperial permission; threats of starvation, exile, etc., were also made, if they did not recognize the legitimacy of Photius' installation. History shows us that, as a general thing, Pontifical ambassadors have exhibited a courage and fidelity worthy of their high position, but Rodoald and Zachary were of the few who, at various times, have ignominiously betrayed their trust. Yielding to the combined influence of fear and bribery, they promised to favor the cause of Photius, and in 861 a numerous Synod was held, at which, although the legates were present, the emperor really presided. The intruding patriarch caused a mutilated version of the letters of Pope Nicholas to be read, and then, in the name of the legates, Ignatius was ordered to appear before the Synod. The holy patriarch was on his way, dressed in the robes appropriate to his dignity, when he was threatened with death if he appeared before the prelates in any other guise than that of a monk. Thus he accordingly presented himself, and was immediately assailed by the emperor with a torrent of invectives. Seated upon a wooden bench, he was allowed to speak with the legates. Asking them if they had no letters to him from the Pontiff, he was informed that "there were none; they had been sent, not to a patriarch, but to one who had been condemned by the Synod of his own province, and that they were prepared to settle all things according to the Canons." To this Ignatius retorted: "Then first remove the adulterous one; if you cannot do so, you are no judges." The legates pointed to Michael, and replied: "He orders us." The unfortunate patriarch was then besieged by the officers of the palace, who vainly urged him to yield up his claims. Cited before the Synod, he refused to acknowledge it as his judge, and appealed to the Pope, saying: "I do not acknowledge such judges ; I appeal to the Pope, and will willingly bow to his decision." He then desired the bishops to read the Decree of Pope Innocent I. in the case of St. Chrysostom, in which that holy doctor's restoration to his diocese was ordered as a preliminary to any judgment ; he also quoted the 4th Canon of Sardica, "If any bishop be deposed, and he declares that he has a defense, let no one be substituted in his place, until the Pontiff of the Roman Church shall have decided in the matter." Urged again and again to appear before the Synod, and being told that there were many witnesses who would swear that his election had been uncanonical, Ignatius answered : "If I am not archbishop, thou art not emperor, nor are these bishops ; for you were all consecrated by my unworthy hands and prayers." Seventy-two witnesses now came forward and swore that Ignatius had been thrust into the patriarchal chair by the secular power ; only one bishop, Theodulus of Ancyra, tried to defend the victim, but he was stopped by a blow which caused his blood to flow. Then was read the Apostolic Canon which declares that, "if any bishop obtains a church through use of the secular power, let him be deposed," and a decree of condemnation was passed against Ignatius. The ceremony of degradation was then performed, the pallium and many other patriarchal ornaments being placed upon, and then taken from, the unfortunate by one Procopius, a subdeacon whose vices had caused his suspension. As this minister of injustice pronounced the word "unworthy" at each removal of insignia, the treacherous legates and all the episcopal sycophants echoed the opprobrious term, and Photius had triumphed. But the hatred of Bardas was not yet appeased, and if Photius could not compass the death of the patriarch, he was bound to have, at least, his resignation. Ignatius was conveyed to the tomb of Copronymus and there subjected to torture. After two weeks of racking, whipping, and starvation, an attack of dysentery nearly ended his life. As he lay inanimate upon the stones, a certain Theodore, a creature of Photius, traced a cross with the patriarch's hand upon a clean sheet of parchment, and took the sheet to his master.

Photius then wrote above the mark: "I, the unworthy Ignatius of Constantinople, confess that I have usurped the throne of this church, not having been legally chosen, and that I have acted the tyrant." But this document gave no security for the future; accordingly, the two conspirators resolved to adopt that plan of mutilation so commonly used by the Byzantine rulers toward all from whom they anticipated danger. Orders were given to pluck out the eyes and cut off the hands of their victim, but when the executioners entered his mother's apartments, to which he had been taken, they found them empty. Ignatius now fled from place to place, pursued by the imperial emissaries, who had orders to kill him on sight as a disturber of the empire. But God protected him, and when a forty days' earthquake had thoroughly convinced the Byzantines of the divine displeasure, a pardon was proclaimed for Ignatius, and permission accorded him to live in his old monastery (1).

In the meantime there had arrived in Rome a faithful friend of Ignatius, the archimandrite Theognostus, who presented to Pope Nicholas, in the name of the patriarch, a full account of his own and his church's calamities. This document commences: "Ignatius, oppressed by tyranny, etc., to Our Most Holy Lord and Most Blessed Ruler, the Patriarch of all the Sees, the Successor of St. Peter, Prince of the Apostles, the Universal Pope Nicholas, and to all his Most Holy Bishops, and to the entire Most Wise Roman Church." And it finishes with this appeal: "Do thou, Most Holy Lord, show to me the bowels of thy mercy, and say with the great Apostle: 'Who is weak, and I am not weak?' Look upon thy predecessors, the patriarchs Fabian, Julius, Innocent, Leo, and, in fine, all who have manfully fought for the faith and for truth; imitate them, and arise in vindication of us who have suffered these things." The legates Rodoald and Zachary now returned to Rome, but merely reported that Ignatius had been deposed and Photius confirmed. There came also to the Pontiff an ambassador from the emperor Michael, in the person of his secretary Leo, charged with the task of delivering to his Holiness an account of the proceedings of the Photian Synod, and of obtaining its confirmation.

(1) These facts are recorded by Nicetas; by Theognostus, in the book inscribed to Pope Nicholas I. and all the bishops of the West; in the Epistles of Nicholas I., nos. 7, 8, and 9; and by Anastasius, in Preface to 8th Council.

The Pontiff soon discovered the prevarication of his legates, and having called a Synod, he declared, in the presence of the imperial secretary, that he had never, and never would, consent to the deposition of Ignatius; as for the legate Zachary, he was deposed from the priesthood, while Rodoald, then absent in France, would be tried at a future time. Leo was then dismissed with letters of the same tenor to Michael and Photius. In his letter to Photius, the Pontiff is careful to address him as though he were a layman, for, although his consecration was valid, it was illicit. He inscribes the document "To the most prudent man, Photius," and after descanting upon the authority and primacy of the Holy See, which Photius himself then acknowledged, he refutes the arguments adduced by the intruder in justification of his uncanonical election, and declares that Ignatius is the legitimate patriarch of Constantinople. This epistle is dated March 18. 862, and on the same day the Pontiff issued a letter to all the patriarchs and bishops of the East, prohibiting any recognition of Photius as patriarch. These letters of Pope Nicholas infuriated the emperor, and he dispatched to Rome his Sword-bearer, with a very disrespectful epistle to the Pontiff, urging more strongly than ever the recognition of the usurper. The result of this embassy was the appearance of a Papal letter, still more exhaustive in its arguments against Photius. Nevertheless, the intruder prospered under the protection of Michael, and when his great patron, Bardas, had been put to death for supposed conspiracy, he was sufficiently wily to make the emperor believe in his fidelity, and to render that protection more solid than ever. In the year 866 the madness of Photius culminated in an "excommunication" of the Roman Pontiff; and in an Encyclical to all the patriarchs of the East, he adduced, in justification of his rebellious attitude, the following accusations against the Latins. They fasted on Saturdays. They observed the first week of Lent in a gluttonous manner, namely, drinking milk, eating cheese, etc. They imposed the yoke of celibacy upon their priests. They denied to priests the right of administering Confirmation. They taught that the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Father and the Son. In the year 867, Photius held another Pseudo-Synod, composed of the bishops of his faction and of impostors who called themselves legates of the other patriarchs. He repeated his anathema against Pope Nicholas I. and sent the Acts to the emperor Louis II., promising him the Byzantine throne, if he would procure the deposition of the Pontiff. But Photius now experienced a great reverse of fortune.

In the year 867, the emperor Michael associated his quondam chamberlain, Basil, with himself in the government. This prince, however, soon excited his monarch's displeasure, and his tenure of life became uncertain. Therefore he seized the opportunity afforded by an imperial debauch, and assassinated Michael. (1). The day following, he ordered the removal of Photius from the patriarchal palace, and his seclusion in a monastery. (2). Ignatius was then, after nine years of persecution, restored to the patriarchate. Basil immediately informed Pope Nicholas of his exertions for the well-being and liberty of the Church, and that his impartiality might be evident, he sent to Rome not only the metropolitan John of Syleum, on the part of Ignatius, but also the metropolitan Peter of Sardia, to defend the cause of Photius. He also begged the Pontiff to send legates to Constantinople, that an end might be put to all ecclesiastical turmoils. Ignatius also wrote to the Pope, consulting him as to the course to be pursued with reference to those who had become schismatics under Photius. In this letter, Ignatius gives the following magnificent testimony to the reverence of the Greek Church of his time for the See of Peter: "For the cure of the wounds and ills of the human body, the medical art furnishes us with a great number of physicians; but for the members of the Holy Catholic and Apostolic Church of our God the Saviour, there is only one chosen and universal physician, namely, your Fraternal and Paternal Holiness, constituted by the Supreme and Most Powerful Word of God, when He said to Peter, the supreme and most holy Prince of the Apostles: 'Thou art Peter, etc.' And these blessed words were not addressed to the Prince of the Apostles, simply as conferring a private privilege, but through him they were directed to all the Pontiffs of the Roman See, his successors. Wherefore, in the past, whenever heresies and corruptions came into existence, the successors in your Apostolic See always extirpated such tares and noxious growth; and now, your Blessedness, worthily using the power received from Christ, crushes the enemies of truth, and him who, like a robber, enters the fold of Christ by the window . . . With the physician's hand of holy and Apostolic authority, you cut him off from the body of the Church; and pronouncing us innocent, who have been so oppressed by his wickedness, you have, like a most loving brother, restored us to our church." When the legates of Basil arrived in Rome, they found that Pope Adrian II. had mounted the throne. Having presented their letters, they witnessed, in a Roman Synod, the confirmation of the deposition of Photius and of Ignatius' restoration.

(1) According to Liutprand, b. i., c. 1, a celestial vision induced Basil to perform great penance for this crime.

(2) Among the effects of Photius, the imperial officers found two elegantly bound MSS. One contained the Acts of the Pseudo-Synod held against Ignatius, and seven pictures, illustrating the same, painted by Gregory of Syracuse. The first represented the holy confessor receiving a beating, and was inscribed "The Devil." In the second he was seen covered with spittle, and styled "The Beginning of Sin." The third showed him de-throned, with the epigraph "Son of Perdition." In the fourth he was depicted in chains and condemned to exile, with the motto "Avarice of Simon Magus." The fifth calumniated him as "He who extols himself above all that is called or worshipped as God." In the sixth he was condemned to death as "The Abomination of Desolation." The seventh pictured him being dragged to the scaffold under the name of 'Anti-Christ.' The second MS. was a copy of the documents sent to the emperor Louis II.

To remedy the evils produced in the East by the schism of Photius, Pope Adrian II. convoked the Eighth General Council, which met at Constantinople, Oct. 5, 869. Before, however, we treat of this subject, it is better to finish our historical sketch of the career of Photius. During ten years of exile, this wretched man was able to do little more, in the way of furthering his ambition, than meditate and plot. Ignatius was restored by a sentence of an Œcumenical Council, was protected by the Roman Pontiff, and enjoyed the favor of his sovereign. The cunning of the schemer, however, was great, and by means of friends at court he was constantly informed of everything which might be turned to his advantage. Having learned that Basil was exceedingly sensitive on the subject of his lowly origin, he excogitated a means of gratifying the imperial vanity, trusting to thereby mount in time to the point of his ambition. He invented a genealogical table, by which it was shown that Basil was descended from Tyridates, a famous king of Armenia. (1). The hospitality of the palace was now extended to Photius, and he was appointed governor of the imperial princes. But his influence over Basil was not strong enough to bring about the deposition of Ignatius. He therefore simulated repentance for the past, and earnestly besought the patriarch to restore him to the active priesthood. Ignatius, however, would not yield, and then the daring of Photius and the weakness of the emperor became manifest. Photius put on the patriarchal insignia, and he presumed to hold ordinations in the imperial chapel. The death of Ignatius now occurred (878), and the usurper again seized the patriarchal throne. Many of the suffragan bishops were already of his faction ; some others he won by promotion or by money, while the few who refused to recognize his jurisdiction were turned over to the mercies of Leo Catacalus, the prefect of the guards. He pretended that the ordinations of Ignatius were null and void, and as such, he repeated them ; he restored to their sees all the bishops whom Ignatius had suspended. (2). At this time, the Apostolic legation at Constantinople was held by the bishops Paul of Ancona and Eugene of Ostia. Faithful to their trust, they refused even to admit Photius to communion ; hence the infatuated Basil sent legates to Rome to try the constancy of Pope John VIII., then in the sixth year of his Pontificate. Photius also sent to Rome his creature, Theodore Santabarenus, whom he had made metropolitan of Patras, as bearer of a letter in which it was declared that Photius had been forced by the bishops and by the emperor to accept the patriarchal dignity. This letter bore the signatures and seals of all the metropolitans, those of the faithful prelates having been procured by Peter, the imperial secretary, under pretext that the document was connected with the purchase of some ground for the patriarchate. (1). The result of this mission to Pope John VIII. was the restoration of Photius, to be effected, however, under certain conditions. In speaking of this action of Pope John VIII., Alexandre does not hesitate to say that by it "was rescinded the resolution of the Eighth Council never to receive Photius, to which resolution John himself, then archdeacon, had subscribed, before the universal Church," and that by it "John now gave up his name to everlasting reproach." That this harsh judgment is also unjust, a calm consideration of the facts in the case will conclusively show. Basil asserted that Photius was repentant; that his confirmation would give peace to the church of Constantinople; that such confirmation was desired even by those who had been ordained by Ignatius and Methodius. These assertions were apparently corroborated by the forged signatures to Photius' letter. Again, the general conduct of Basil had caused Rome to regard him as meriting well of the Church; hence if he could be gratified in justice and with honor, prudence suggested a compliance with his wishes. Finally, Ignatius was now dead, and no one claimed the see in opposition to Photius. (2). In his answer to Basil, Epist. 199, the Pontiff says that he hearkens to the emperor's prayers, "without any prejudice to the Apostolic statutes, or any relaxation of the rules of the fathers; yea, rather resting "upon their authority;" and after quoting instances of prudent yielding to circumstances, on the part of his

(1) By the connivance of Theophanes, one of the imperial chaplains, this table, adorned with many prophetic descriptions, was placed in the Palatine Library. Theophanes then pretended to discover it, and telling Basil that it greatly interested the imperial family, he declared that only one man in the empire was sufficiently erudite to interpret it. That man was Photius and he was immediately summoned to the palace. Here his intrigues were greatly aided by Theodore Santabarenus, a monk addicted to necromancy, but reputed a saint by Basil.

(2) These facts are gathered from Nicetas' Life of St. Ignatius, and from the Epistle of Stylianus to Pope Stephen V.

(1) NICETAS, ibid.

(2) Nor should it be forgotten that Pope John relied upon the Greek fleets to protect the coasts of the Campagna and Tuscany from the Saracens. It is remarkable that while even Baronio blames Pope John VIII for his restoration of Photius, the furious Gallican De Marca (Priesthood and Empire, b. iii., c. 14.) thus excuses him: "Ignatius having died, the often condemned Photius recovered his see through the votes of the Eastern bishops and the good will of the emperor Basil; but that restoration could not have been complete without the approval of the Apostolic Chair. Wherefore John VIII., besought by the emperor to consult the peace of the Church, ceded to necessity, and, influenced by the example of Leo, Gelasius, Felix, and an African Council, who all thought that in some emergencies rules might be modified, he freed Photius from anathema. with the consent of the other patriarchs, and allowed him to retain the patriarchal throne, on condition that he would beg pardon before the coming Council. The agreement of the emperor, the other patriarchs, and a full Eastern Synod, frees John from blame."

predecessors and certain Synods, he grants the request of the patriarchs of Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem, of all the metropolitans, bishops, priests, and of all the clergy of Constantinople, who remain of the ordination of Methodius and Ignatius ; and receives as co-minister in the episcopal office the same Photius, if, according to custom, he begs mercy in a Synod. We, upon whom, according to the Apostle, rests the care of all the churches, not wishing that there should any longer remain cause of dispute in the Church of God, absolve this same patriarch from all ecclesiastical censure ; and with him, all the bishops, priests, clerics, and laymen against whom the censures of the divine judgment have been pronounced ; and we decree that he receive the Constantinopolitan see principally because, by this act, all will witness an instance of Apostolic mercy." When the imperial ambassadors departed from Rome, they were accompanied by the legate Peter, cardinal of the title of St. Chrysogonus, with instructions to arrange, in union with two other legates already at Constantinople, but in accordance with what had been decreed at Rome, the affairs of the distracted patriarchate. Peter arrived at his post in November, 879, and in an interview with Photius handed him the Papal letters of instruction. The schemer then requested permission to retain the documents for a short time, that he might have them translated into Greek, for the use of the coming Synod. The legates assented, and it was afterwards found that the imprudent concession had furnished an opportunity for an interested mutilation and interpolation of the Papal instructions. Among other alterations, Photius erased the clause in which he was ordered to throw himself on the mercy of the Synod. He also inserted a condemnation of the Eighth Council, held ten years before, against his schism, and an abrogation of all the decrees issued against himself by the Pontiffs Nicholas I. and Adrian II. Armed with this new weapon, Photius now held that famous Synod which the schismatics afterwards styled the Eighth Œcumenical. The conclave met in the church of St. Sophia, and was attended by 380 prelates, and by the whole imperial family. The Papal legates were also on hand, but, like their unfortunate predecessors in the time of Pope Nicholas, they had been corrupted. Photius, therefore, had things his own way. Although his own cause was in question, he was allowed to preside, the legates assenting to everything proposed by the usurper, and saying nothing of the Pontifical mandates. After a solemn restoration of Photius to the patriarchate, and an excommunication of all who would not communicate with him, the Pseudo-Synod issued a number of canons, to give the affair more of a conciliary appearance. Photius wished much to have the "Latin doctrine," as he called it, of the Filioque, condemned, but fearing lest the Papal legates would be incited to something like a resemblance of their duty, and thus render null all of his proceedings, he deferred his overt act of heresy to a more propitious time. (1)

The three Papal legates returned to Rome immediately after the Photian "Eighth Synod," and simply reported that peace was restored to the Constantinopolitan church, and that the emperor would send a powerful fleet to protect the Italian coasts from the Saracens. But the letter of Photius, admitting that he had not asked pardon of the Synod, caused Pope John VIII. to suspect that his commands had been evaded in more ways than one. Hence he commissioned the cardinal Marinus, who was destined to succeed him in the Papacy, and who had been one of the presidents of the Eighth Council, to return to Constantinople for the purpose of investigation, instructing him to rescind all which he might discover to have been unjustly or illegally done by the former legates. Marinus did his duty. The frauds of Photius were made manifest, and therefore his old condemnation by the Eighth Council was revived. The olden zeal of Basil for the good of the Church had been greatly modified by his intimacy with Photius, and he was made furious by the apostolic intrepidity of Marinus. He forgot the respect which all rulers owe to the law of nations, and even that which every Christian should show to the representative of Christ's vicar. The legate was thrown into prison, and for thirty days his constancy was tried, but the only result was an exhibition of firmness which was a glorious offset to the scandal caused among the vacillating Greeks by the weakness of his predecessors. When Pope John VIII was informed of the treachery of his legates, and of Photius' usurpation, he immediately confirmed the condemnatory sentences of Nicholas I. and Adrian II., and added his own anathema. Pope Marinus, who succeeded John VIII. in the year 882, confirmed the acts of his predecessor in reference to Constantinopolitan affairs, and the infuriated Basil dared to retort by asserting that Marinus was not a legitimate Pope, since he had been bishop of another see, and could not abandon it. It was during the reign of Marinus that Photius wrote to the schismatic patriarch of Aquileia his famous Epistle attacking the Catholic dogma on the Procession of the Holy Ghost.⁽¹⁾ During the Pontificate of Adrian III. (884—85), Basil again vainly sought from Rome the recognition of Photius. In the year 889, Leo, surnamed "the philosopher" on account of his erudition, succeeded his father Basil on the imperial throne of Byzantium, and with his advent came an end to the first stage of the Greek Schism. The Papal Chair was then occupied by Stephen VI. (885—91), one of whose first acts had been a brilliant and solid defence of the actions of his predecessors in the Photian matter, against the insolent attacks of Basil. The letters of Stephen produced a deep impression on the mind of Leo, and he immediately ejected Photius from the patriarchal palace, appointing instead his own brother Stephen. Having recalled from exile all the bishops and priests who had been the victims of Photius, Leo addressed them: "Having sought the truth, our authority, which is from God, has ejected that wicked man Photius from the patriarchal chair and has stopped your persecution. Nor shall we compel you, in any way, to unwillingly communicate with him; we rather request of your piety that you communicate with our brother, that there may be but one fold. If, however, you do not wish to communicate with my brother, without first consulting Rome, which has condemned Photius, and because my brother was ordained deacon by him, let us together write to the Pontiff that he may give absolution from the anathema pronounced against those ordained by Photius." Letters were accordingly sent to Pope Stephen VI. by Leo and by Stylianus of Neo-Cæsarea, in the name of the Greek bishops, begging the Pontiff to remove the censure from all who were worthy of pardon. After due consideration, the Holy See sent legates to Constantinople, in 891, with instructions to recognize the patriarch Stephen and to remove all censures from such as they would deem worthy of lenient treatment. From this time history is silent with regard to Photius. Manuel Calecas (1) contends that he died in the communion of Rome. Certain Greek schismatic writers (2) have asserted that he re-communicated with the Latins, when these "had recanted their errors." But these authors are sufficiently refuted by the Breviary or Synopsis of the Eighth Council, affixed in 891 to the doors of St. Sophias' Basilica, and quoted by us in the last chapter.

(1) Six weeks after the Pseudo-Synod, while at an assembly of bishops in the Triclinium of the Blachernal palace, the emperor asked Photius for a Profession of Faith, and received one made up of the definitions of the first seven Councils, with a declaration that nothing should be added to them.

(1) BARONIO, year 883.

The Eighth General Council now demands our attention. That this assembly possessed the first requisite of œcumenicity, namely, convocation by the Supreme Pontiff, is proved by the Epistle of Pope Adrian II. to the emperor Basil, read in the first Session: "We desire that a numerous Council be celebrated at Constantinople through the industry of your Piety; at which Council our legates will preside, and having examined into the causes of men and their crimes, they will give to the flames all the copies of the impious Pseudo-Synod (the Photian Eighth) which must be surrendered by all who have them." And in the Preface of the Eighth Synod, sent to Adrian II., we read: "Having sent, with your Apostolic authority, your vicar and epistolary decretals, you commanded a Synod to be held at Constantinople, etc." That the Papal legates, namely, Donatus, bishop of Ostia, Stephen, the bishop of

(1) Calecas was a Greek orthodox author of the fourteenth century. His principal work, directed against "The Errors of the Greeks," was translated into Latin by order of Martin V.

(2) MICHAEL ANCHIALIS, Dialogue with Emmanuel Comnenus; MAXIMUS MARGUIN, Dialogue of a Greek with a Latin. See the work of Leo Allatius on the Perpetual Agreement of the Eastern and Western Churches, b. ii., c. 6.

Nepi, and Marinus, the deacon, presided over the Council, is evident from the Acts. The first Session commences. "Being assembled, Donatus and Stephen, bishops, and Marinus, the deacon, holding the place of Adrian, archbishop of the senior Rome, and Ignatius, archbishop of Constantinople, the younger Rome; and the Vicar of the Orient, Thomas, metropolitan of Tyre, holding the place of the see of Antioch, etc. The most holy vicars of the senior Rome said: 'Therefore let us put all hesitation out of your hearts, and let us certify to you by word and by deed that we shall dispose all things as has been commanded unto us. We have, then, letters to the emperor and to the patriarch, and if you order, let them be read.'" Again, the Papal legates are first named, speak before all others, and are the first to subscribe to the decrees.

The Eighth General Council, also styled the Fourth of Constantinople, was opened on Wednesday, the 5th of October, 869, in the second year of Pope Adrian II., and third of the emperor Basil, and its sessions were held in the basilica of St. Sophia. In the First Session, the Papal legates were asked to manifest the nature of their commission, and as they deemed the question rather insolent, they hesitated to answer. Then the Patrician Bahanes informed the legates that no contempt of the Apostolic See was meant by this request, but rather a precaution, on account of the prevarication of Rodoald and Zachary, the legates of Nicholas I. The legates therefore replied: "We have in our hands a letter sent to the emperor by the most holy Pope Adrian, who has also given us power to so order all things according to what the blessed Pope Nicholas established for the holy church of Constantinople, that we may so arrange and strengthen them, that no one will be able to combat them, and that we may confirm what the most holy Adrian has commanded. For he has inherited the labors of him to whose honors he has succeeded; for this, God placed him in His Church. Behold the letter of the holy Pope Adrian. If you wish, let it be read." After the reading of the Pontifical letter, the legates ordered a reading of a Papal document, to which all who wished the communion of Rome were obliged to subscribe. It contained a condemnation of all heresies, and an anathema against Photius ; also a declaration that the subscriber accepted all that Pope Nicholas I. and Adrian II. had done in the cause of Ignatius and Photius. In this document, which was signed by the entire Council, the following passages are noteworthy : " For we must not forget the words of our Lord Jesus Christ : ' Thou art Peter, etc.' This saying has been proved by events, because in the Apostolic Chair the Catholic Religion has been preserved immaculate, and holy doctrine ever held. Therefore, not wishing to be separated from the faith and doctrine of this See, and following the Constitutions of the rulers of this holy Apostolic See, we anathematize the Iconoclasts and all heresies ; we anathematize also Photius, etc."

The Second Session was held on the 9th of October. It being announced to the fathers that certain bishops were waiting without, who, having been ordained by Methodius or by Ignatius, had joined the Photian ranks, they were told to enter the Synod. Having begged pardon for their transgressions, they were addressed by the legates : " We receive you, according to the command of our most holy Pope Adrian, on account of your avowal of repentance." They then replied : " And we reverence you, and acknowledge you as our judges, and we will accept your judgment as from the Person of the Son of God." Having then subscribed to the document issued by Rome, and read in the first Session, the penitents were admitted to seats in the Synod, but were ordered not to exercise their functions until the following Christmas, the intervening period to be spent in penance.

The Third Session was held on the 5th of the Ides of October. The fathers invited Theodolus of Ancyra and Nicephorus of Nice to subscribe to the Roman Definition, but they refused. It having been discovered that Theodore of Caria, one of those lately forgiven, had been one of Photius' accomplices in anathematizing Pope Nicholas I., his case was reserved to the Pontiff. The epistle of Pope Adrian to Ignatius was read, and declared " canonically written and full of justice."

The fourth Session was held on the 3d of the Ides of October. The bishops Zachary and Theophilus, of the Photian faction, were presented by certain patricians, but when urged to sign the Pontifical Definition, they declared that both they and Photius had been received by Pope Nicholas I. on the occasion of a mission which they had undertaken for the usurper to that Pontiff. The legates therefore caused several epistles of Nicholas to be read, and then it was demonstrated that these schismatics lied. Urged again to subscribe to the Definition, they replied: "We wish to hear nothing about it." By order of the legates, they were shut out of the Synod.

The Fifth Session was held on the 13th of the Calends of November. Photius was summoned by means of laics to the Council, but when he was introduced, and asked whether he would receive the decrees of Nicholas I. and of Adrian II., he remained silent. Urged to reply, he answered: "God hears me, even when I am silent." Pressed again, he replied: "Jesus also was condemned when silent." Elias, vicar for the patriarch of Jerusalem, then ascended the pulpit and energetically contended that his church had never recognized Photius, concluding by exhorting him to repentance. The legates also urged the unfortunate man to repentance, that he might merit lay-communion. Pressed also by the patrician Bahanes, he answered: "My justification is not in this world," and then sank again into an obstinate silence. He was therefore dismissed from the Council.

The Sixth Session was held on the 8th Calends of November. The emperor Basil asked the bishops who yet adhered to Photius if they would at last yield to the decision of the Church, but they impudently answered that the judgments against their leader were null and void. Zachary of Chalcedon now arose, and in a discourse which was a tissue of sophisms where it was not mere baseless assertion, endeavored to sustain the cause of the baffled intruder. Metrophanes of Smyrna then dissected the remarks of Zachary, and refuted them, point by point. After an exhortation to penitence addressed to the recalcitrants by Basil, seven days of delay were granted them.

The Seventh Session was held on the 4th Calends of November. Photius and Gregory of Syracuse were brought to the Synod and questioned as to their willingness to accept the Papal Definition. The only reply of Photius was: "May the Lord preserve our holy emperor many years!" Urged again by the legates, he answered that they had more need of repentance than he had. Finally, the Synod pronounced anathema on Photius, "the courtier and invader; the secular, neophyte, and tyrant; the condemned schismatic, adulterer, and parricide; the inventor of lies and perverse dogmas: the new Judas and new Dioscorus; anathema on all his followers and sympathizers, etc."

The Eighth Session was held on the Nones of November. All the writings of Photius against the Pontiffs, and the Acts of his Pseudo-Synods, were thrown to the flames. Basil of Jerusalem and Leontius of Alexandria, whose names Photius had inserted among the subscriptions to his Pseudo-Synod, as legates of their respective patriarchs, then anathematized the writings against Pope Nicholas. Many metropolitans were then asked if they had signed the decrees of the Photian Synod, and they answered that the signatures, which purported to be their own, were forgeries. Several Iconoclasts were then reconciled to the Church, the emperor kissing them after their abjuration.

The Ninth Session was held on the day before the Ides of February of the new year. Joseph, archdeacon of Alexandria and legate of Michael, the patriarch of that see, then explained that his bishop was prevented by the Saracenic domination from travelling; that he had obtained for Joseph an appointment as commissioner of exchange of captives, in order that he might attend the Council in his name. Michael was so isolated that he knew nothing of the merits or demerits of Photius, but he suggested that he and Ignatius might rule the diocese of Constantinople in common. The Alexandrian legate, having read the Acts of the previous sessions, solemnly accepted them in the name of his patriarch. There were then introduced certain perjurers, among them the consul Leo, who, compelled by Photius and the emperor Michael, had sworn falsely against Ignatius on the occasion of his mock trial. They confessed their crime, anathematized Photius, and received a canonical penance.

In the Tenth Session, held the day before the Calends of March, there were edited 27 canons, of which the following are the principal. The 1st decrees that all canons of the Church are to be observed as "Second utterances of God." The 2d orders the observance of the decrees of the Pontiffs in the Photian matter. The 3d accords to the images of Christ, of His Mother, and of the saints, the same honor as is given to the Book of the Gospels. The 5th puts a check on the growth of the pestilent crop of courtier-bishops, by ordering that no one shall be made a bishop unless he has been ten years a cleric, and allows no dispensation to be ever given in the case of a courtier candidate. The 6th segregates Photius even from lay-communion, on account of his forgeries of episcopal signatures. The 11th anathematizes the doctrine of a dual soul in man, taught by Photius. The 12th condemns all undue interference of the secular power with ecclesiastical preferments. The 13th prohibits the elevation to high ecclesiastical dignity in the church of Constantinople of any one not belonging to the clergy of that see, and excludes from that body the domestic clerics of princes and nobles, thus putting another check on the courtier-clergy and giving a safeguard to the integrity of the patriarchal chair. The 14th rebukes the want of respect for their office shown by those bishops who are ever ready to pay court to the rich and powerful, especially to princes; condemns their dismounting from horseback, etc., in order to salute the great ones; and their practice of standing among the gentlemen-in-waiting, while the grandees are eating. The bishop who thus forgets his dignity is suspended from communion for one year; the prince who permits such fulsome obsequiousness suffers for two years. The 15th prohibits any alienation or mortgaging of ecclesiastical property, and declares it null. A monastery erected by the funds of a diocese belongs to that diocese. The 16th anathematizes those who ridicule the sacred offices or officers. The occasion of this canon was the conduct of the emperor Michael, who permitted his Protospatarius, Theophilus, to mimic the patriarch for the amusement of the court, saying : " Theophilus is my patriarch, the Cæsar Bardas has Photius, and the Christians have Ignatius." The 19th condemns those metropolitans who go about among their suffragans, living at their expense, under pretext of visitation. The 25th condemns all the bishops, priests, etc., who pertinaciously adhere to Photius, and deprives them of all hope of restoration. After the promulgation of the canons, the Council issued a Definition of Faith, anathematizing all heresies, and condemning Photius and his followers. In subscribing to the conciliary decrees, the Papal legates came first, and wrote : " I . . . , holding the place of my Lord Adrian, Supreme Pontiff and Universal Pope, and presiding over this Holy and Universal Synod, have promulgated, subject to the will of the same illustrious Ruler, everything above recited, and have subscribed with my own hand." The vicars of the patriarchs write : " I . . . , receiving this Holy and Universal Synod, and agreeing with, and defining, all that has been decided and written, have subscribed." The emperor Basil and his sons do not define, but consent and venerate : " Basil, Constantine, and Leo, ever August, in the Christ of God faithful princes of the Romans and great Emperors, receiving this Holy and Universal Synod, and agreeing with all it has defined and written, have subscribed." When all the bishops had subscribed, the Council issued a Synodical Epistle to all the bishops and faithful of the Church, giving an account of the crimes of Photius and of all proceedings against him. An Epistle was then addressed to Pope Adrian II., begging a confirmation of the Council, which was immediately granted, as is shown by the Pontiff's letter to Basil, which was read at the end of the Acts.

We now again approach a question which we have frequently had occasion to encounter, that of the amenability of a Pontifical judgment to a conciliary juridical examination. The author of the Defence of the Declaration, etc., and with him, Alexandre (1), contends that the actions of the (1, Cent. xv., diss. 4, n. 26.

Eighth Council plainly prove that the prelates deemed the conciliary authority superior to that of the Pontiff. They cite the 21st canon, "If a General Council is in session, and there is any doubt or controversy, even about the holy Roman Church, an investigation and a solution of the question should be had with due reverence; audaciously, however, sentence should not be passed against the Supreme Pontiffs of the Senior Rome." Again, the bishops were asked whether they would receive the letters of Popes Nicholas and Adrian. But it can be easily shown that the fathers of the Eighth Council, far from critically examining the Papal definitions, willingly and at once obeyed the injunctions of the Holy See; that, in fine, all that was effected in that Council was done because Rome commanded it to be done. In the 3d Session was read the letter sent by Basil to Pope Nicholas I., in which the emperor prays the Pontiff to predefine what was to be done in the Synod soon to be held, and after saying that some of the schismatics had fallen through fear, and others through simplicity, he adds: "We have asked, and now beg, your Paternal Holiness, to send a judgment and decree in regard to these persons. Thus, O Spiritual Father, and divinely to be honored Supreme Pontiff, hasten to the correction of our church, and give us an abundance of strength against injustice and for the attainment of truth, that is, a clean unity, a spiritual structure free from all strife and schism, a church one in Christ, and a fold obedient to one shepherd." These sentiments certainly indicate a belief in the irreformability of Papal decisions, and if it be thought that Basil's judgment proves little, we turn to the letter sent to Nicholas by Ignatius, and already quoted by us, in which the patriarch asserts that the Roman Pontiff is the divinely appointed physician for the diseases of Christ's members. In answer to this letter, Pope Adrian II., the successor of Nicholas I., says: "Your Fraternity must take care that the signatures of all of your bishops, united in Synod, be put to those chapters which were synodically promulgated by us in that Church of God where rests the holy body of Peter, Prince of the Apostles: promulgated for the abolition of the profane Synods held in Constantinople by Photius. . . . and let them be carefully deposited in the archives of each diocese."

Could Pope Adrian have used this language, if he, at least, did not hold that the Pontiff was superior to a Council? But let us see what the conciliary Acts evince. When, in the 1st Session, the patrician Bahanes requested the Papal legates to show their mandatory letters, they at first resisted, saying that "until now they had never heard that the vicars of the elder Rome were questioned by anybody," which elevated language does not imply much of subjection toward the Synod. In the same Session was read the Papal Definition sent by Adrian, and which all were obliged to sign as a preliminary to any recognition. In that document was written: "For we must not forget the words of our Lord Jesus Christ: 'Thou art Peter.' etc. This saying has been proved by events, because in the Apostolic Chair the Catholic Religion has been preserved immaculate, and holy doctrine ever held. Therefore, not wishing to be separated from the faith and doctrine of this See, and following the constitutions of the rulers of this Apostolic See, we anathematize the Iconoclasts and all heresies; we also anathematize Photius, etc." In these words the infallibility of the Pope is clearly enunciated, for heresy is condemned principally because of the Constitutions of Rome. In this same Definition, signed by the entire Synod, the subscriber promises to observe "all which is herein established; we will observe it according to the ordinance of your decree, receiving that which it receives, and condemning what it condemns, especially the aforesaid Photius. . . . With regard to our most venerable patriarch Ignatius and his followers, we follow, with our whole heart, what the authority of your Apostolic See has decreed, and venerate it with religious devotion. . . . because, as we have said, following the Apostolic See in all things, and observing all its Constitutions, we hope to merit to be in the one communion which that Apostolic See offers, and which is the true and complete solidity of the Christian religion." When such are the sentiments of this Definition, it is plain that the fathers of the Eighth Council did not deem their body superior to the Pontiff, when they used the phrase cited by our adversaries, "The book presented by the holy Roman Church has been read, and pleases all." The examination, that is, like all of those of which we have treated in the cases of the Dogmatic Definitions read in other Councils, was not juridical, but informatory. In the 2d Session, when there arose a question as to the treatment of the schismatics, the Papal legates declared that Pope Adrian had ordered that they should not be received to penance until they subscribed to the Pontifical Definition, and they asked the delinquents: "Are you willing to obey the orders of the most holy Pope Adrian?" And when, in the 3d Session, the archbishops of Ancyra and Nice refused their signatures, pardon was denied them. The conduct of the legates would have been arrogant in the extreme, and the Eastern bishops would have resisted them, had the mind of the Synod been such as our adversaries would have us believe. In the 4th Session, two of Photius' faction, who had been his legates to Pope Nicholas, asked admission to the Council. The Papal representatives at first opposed their entrance, saying: "We cannot rescind the decision of the holy Roman Pontiffs; that is contrary to the canons." And when they were admitted, it was only that "the just judgment of the holy Roman Church might be more manifest." The fathers said: "Let the legates enter, but we do not call them to a dispute, but only that they may hear the epistle of the most blessed Pope Nicholas." In the 5th Session Photius was asked "whether he received the judgment of the holy Roman Pontiffs;" and in the 6th, the legates told the emperor that he should not speak to Zachary of Chalcedon, because he had been condemned by Rome. In the 7th Session, when Photius entered with the pastoral crozier, the legates took it from him, because he had no jurisdiction. In fine, throughout the Council, everything was done because of the previous decision of Rome.

The 21st canon does not favor the theory of conciliar superiority. At first sight, indeed, it would seem that only audacious examinations into Papal decisions are discouraged.

But how is it that the Papal legates made no opposition to this canon, if, as is asserted, it allowed a conciliar discussion of Pontifical judgments? They well knew that such procedure was foreign to the ideas of the Holy See; they knew that, a short time before the Council, Pope Nicholas I. had declared that the value of a Council depended upon its approbation by Rome; they knew that the first See claimed the right to judge all others, and the prerogative of being judged by none; they knew that this very Eighth Council had not objected to Pope Adrian's assertion, read in the 7th Session, that the Pontiff was subject to no judgment, unless for heresy, and then only with his own consent. And yet they did not oppose the canon. But let us hear the words of Popes Nicholas and Adrian. Rebuking the arrogance of the emperor Michael, Pope Nicholas says that "The Roman Church confirms the Councils by her authority, and guards them by her moderation. Hence, certain of these have lost their value, because they had not the approbation of the Roman Pontiff." And he adduces instances, such as the "Robber-Synod" of Ephesus, (431) where bishops and patriarchs could not constitute a legitimate Council because of the opposition of the great Leo, and then continues: "Since, according to the canons, the decisions of inferiors are to be referred to greater authority, to be confirmed or annulled, it is plain that the judgment of the Apostolic See, the authority of which is the highest, cannot be revised by any one, nor can any one pass judgment on its decision. For the canons have willed that from every part of the world appeals should be made to Rome, but from her no one can appeal." And Pope Adrian II., in his 2d Allocution to the Council, declares: "We read of the Roman Pontiff judging the bishops of all churches, but we read of no one ever judging him. For although the Orientals pronounced anathema upon Honorius after his death, it is to be observed that he had been accused of heresy, for which alone one may resist one's superior, or reject his depraved utterances; but even in this case, the patriarchs and bishops cannot pronounce sentence, unless the authority of the Pontiff of the first See has been obtained." Considering, then, these declarations of the Holy See, and the consent of the legates to the 21st canon, we must suppose that the meaning of the ordinance was that, in case of a question about the Roman See, a Council should reverently consult the Pontiff, but "not audaciously pronounce sentence."

CHAPTER V.

THE ADDITION OF THE CLAUSE "AND FROM THE SON" TO THE CREED.

In the General Council of Ephesus, one Charisius, a Philadelphian priest, having brought to the fathers a Profession of Faith which was redolent of Nestorianism, the following decree was issued: "No one is allowed to offer, write, or compose any other Faith than that which was defined by the holy fathers congregated at Nice in the Holy Ghost. And whoever shall dare to compose another Faith, or to present it to converts to the truth from paganism, Judaism, or any heresy, shall be deprived of their sees if they are bishops, of their standing if they are clerics, and if they are laymen, they shall be subject to anathema." The same decree was repeated by the Council of Chalcedon in its Definition of Faith. Among the excuses given by Photius for his schism, and repeated by Michael Cerularius when he re-inaugurated a separation of the Eastern and Western Churches, was the assertion that the Latins had violated this prohibition by adding the words "and from the Son" (Filioque) to the clause of the Constantinopolitan Creed which expresses the Procession of the Holy Ghost. Traces of this dispute between the Latins and Greeks are found as far back as the Synod of Gentilly, held in 767. It was agitated in the Synod held at Aix-la-Chapelle, under Charlemagne, in 809, and has been renewed at every effort made for a healing of the schism, notably in the Fourth Council of the Lateran (1215), in the Second of Lyons (1274), and in that of Florence (1439). In theological language, when we speak of the origin of the Divine Persons, we say that the Son comes from the Father by "generation," and that the Holy Ghost comes from both by "procession" (1). In the Symbol drawn up by the Second General Council, the First of Constantinople (381), it was simply stated that the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Father. But the faith of the Church being that the Son also is a source of origin to the Spirit, the clause "and from the Son" came to be added in the Definitions of Faith, and often in the Symbol or Creed. We know that the Sixteenth General Council (Florence) finally and definitively approved of the addition, as a necessary test of orthodoxy; but we cannot lay the finger on the date, place, or circumstances of the first use of the questioned clause. It occurs in the Creed recited by king Ricardo in the Third Council of Toledo, in 589; in the Exposition of Faith of the Fourth of Toledo, 633; in the Creed recited in the Eighth of Toledo, in 653, and that Synod tells us that this Creed was then read at Mass throughout Spain. In the Twelfth, Thirteenth, and Fifteenth Councils, held at Toledo, in the years 681, 683, and 688, the addition occurs in the Creed. It was also read in the Synod of Forli, held in 791, by Paulinus, patriarch of Aquileia. In the year 809 the ambassadors of Charlemagne conferred with Pope Leo III. about the clause.

The Greek schismatics have always fallen back for defence upon the prohibitory canon of Ephesus, and that their interpretation of it is correct, they try to prove by various ancient testimonies. Thus they adduce St. Cyril of Alexandria (2), saying: "We in no way permit any one to attack that Faith, or Symbol of Faith, which was issued by the holy Nicene fathers. For it is not allowable to us, or to any one else, to change even one word there placed, nor do we allow one syllable to be passed over, mindful of the saying: 'Do not cross the limits placed by the fathers.' For they did not speak of themselves, but of the very Spirit of God the Father, who proceeds indeed from Him;

(1) Both generation and procession are, in the Trinity, eternal, for the Son and the Holy Ghost are co-eternal with the Father. Both are necessary, not contingent, for necessity of being is an attribute of the Divinity. Both the Son and the Holy Ghost are inseparably united to the Father, though really distinct from Him; hence, in the Trinity, both generation and procession have nothing in common with the philosophic conception of "emanation" of spirits.

(2) Epistle of John of Antioch.

the Spirit, however is not foreign to the Son, for so commands the nature of the Essence." They also cite the commands of the Council of Chalcedon, as declaring that the Creeds of Nice and Constantinople are sufficient, and prohibiting any additions to these. And lest they should be told that here only such addition is meant as would involve an alteration of meaning, the schismatics quote the following words, pronounced when, in the Second Session, the fathers of Chalcedon had been asked for a Profession of Faith plainly agreeing with, but verbally differing from, the Symbols of Nice and Constantinople: "No one makes another Exposition. We do not try, nor do we dare, to present one. For the fathers have taught, and their teachings are preserved in writing, and we can say nothing further. . . . this we all say, that what has been explained is sufficient; it is permitted to make no other Exposition. . . . Let the sayings of the fathers be held.' And, further, contended the Greeks, even Pope Vigilius (1) anathematized those "who presume to teach or explain, or to give to the saints of the Church of God, any other Symbol" than the Constantinopolitan. And Pope Agatho, in an Epistle to the emperor, read in the Sixth General Council, declares: "We preserve those doctrines of the delivered Faith which have been regularly defined by our holy Apostolic predecessors, and by the five venerable Councils; desiring, and being studious of one principal good, namely, that in what has been regularly defined nothing be withdrawn, changed, or added, but that it be preserved the same in meaning and in word." Finally, the Seventh General Council, after its Definition of Faith, exclaimed: "We preserve the laws of the fathers; we anathematize those who add or withdraw anything." Such were the arguments adduced in the Council of Florence by the famous Mark of Ephesus, to whom, more than to any other one man, is due the perpetuation of the Greek schism.

In defending the propriety, nay, the necessity of the use of Filioque, better arguments cannot be used than those adopted by Andrew, archbishop of Rhodes (2), who, in the 6th Session of the Florentine Council, thus pressed his adversary. The insertion of the clause "and from the Son" in the Creed is not, properly speaking, an addition, but an explanation. The phrase "and from the Son" was already implicitly contained in the "from the Father." If every explanation constitutes an addition, then there have been many additions made to the Scriptures, for the Nicene fathers inserted the word "Consubstantial" in their exposition of the Scriptures, and nevertheless Gregory of Nazianzen, writing to Cledonius, denies that any addition was made (1). The fathers of Constantinople added to, or explained, what those of Nice had written; these latter had not said "of all things visible and invisible," nor had they used the phrase "true God of true God," nor that styling "the Holy Ghost the Lord and Life-giver." Notwithstanding these explanations, the fathers of Constantinople did not think they had made any "additions" to the Creed of Nice. Again, where the Nicene Council said, "Born of the Father," that of Chalcedon said, "Consubstantial to the Father, according to the Deity, and Consubstantial to us, according to the Humanity," for such explanation was made necessary by the Eutychian heresy. And even Mark of Ephesus, when he was asked why the Ephesine prelates made mention only of the Nicene Creed, ignoring apparently the Constantinopolitan, gave as a reason that "they are one and the same"; therefore, even according to this schismatic leader, an insertion made in the Creed for the sake of explanation is not, properly speaking, an addition. Now, that the clause "And from the Son" is simply an explanation of that "from the Father," Andrew of Rhodes proved by many testimonies of Greek fathers. Again, the authority of the Church is and will be always the same as it was in the beginning, and if it was ever permitted to the Church to add new words and phrases to the Creed, for the sake of more efficaciously contradicting new heresies as they arose, that is allowable now, and ever will be. In the

(1) Epistle to Eutychius of Constantinople.

(2) Sometimes styled "archbishop of Colossus," to distinguish him from the Greek metropolitan of the island.

(1) "We have not added, and we could not add, anything to the Faith which the holy fathers of Nice put forth in condemnation of the Arian heresy; but we hold and will hold that same, more clearly explaining what was less fully declared concerning the Holy Ghost. For as yet that question had not been moved."

7th Session, the archbishop observed that, as everything belonging to any science is implicitly contained in the principles of that science, so, though not explicitly, the Creed implicitly contains the entire doctrine of Christianity. No heresy has yet been born, or can be excogitated, which is not implicitly condemned in the Creed. As the Nicene Council issued its Creed as a basis of Faith, it was necessary that it should be affected by no change; in sciences, conclusions may be affected, principles never. But the Gospel contains the perfect doctrine, and yet both the Greek and Latin fathers have explained it. The Council of Chalcedon implied a future necessity of explanatory additions to the Creed when it said that "for a full knowledge and confirmation of religion, it might suffice, etc." It did not say "it suffices," for the advent of new heresies renders it incumbent upon the Church to make new explanations.

The great Bessarion, then archbishop of Nice, having forcibly opposed the use of the disputed clause, though he did not deny the doctrine, was refuted in the 10th Session by John, bishop of Forli. There are three kinds of addition to the Creed, said this prelate; the first adds what is contrary, the second what is different, the third what agrees with the subject treated. The first is the addition of error, e. g., if one were to say that the Holy Ghost proceeds from no one. The second is an addition made by the rash, who are fond of modes of expression unknown to the Church, e. g., if one were to style the Father a geometer, the Son an astronomer, the Holy Ghost an arithmetician. The third is the addition of Catholics, e. g., as when they say that the omnipotent Father is eternal, the consubstantial Son is co-eternal, the proceeding Holy Ghost is breathed forth. The clause "and from the Son" is not contrary to the one "from the Father," nor does it import any different idea; it agrees with it. Hence, as the Apostles' Creed was not violated at Nice by the insertion of the clause declaring the procession from the Father, so the Nicene Creed was not violated in after time when the Church indicated by express words her faith in the procession also from the Son. An ecclesiastical ordinance, concluded the bishop of Forli, must be understood according to the mind of its promulgators, and the 1st Session of the Ephesine Council shows us that the fathers designed merely to prohibit any addition to the Symbol which would be contrary to the Nicene doctrines. The bishops said : " Let the Exposition of the Nicene fathers be read, that we may compare the discourses on faith with it ; let those be received which agree with it, and let those be rejected which differ from it." Then the Nicene Creed was read, and afterwards the epistle of St. Cyril to Nestorius ; the fathers found them concordant. Then the epistle of Nestorius to St. Cyril was read, and the Council pronounced it contrary to the Symbol of Nice. It is evident, therefore, that the Synod of Ephesus did not intend to command the rejection of any and every other exposition of faith, but only such as were contrary to received doctrine.

In the Eleventh Session of the Council of Florence cardinal Julian Cesarini illustrated this subject by an account of the circumstances in which the objected decree of Ephesus was issued. Charisius, a priest of Philadelphia, had complained that one James, a Nestorian emissary, had attacked his doctrine ; and the Profession of Faith of Charisius and that of James, which had been written by Anastasius and Photius, two disciples of Nestorius, were both read to the Council. That of Charisius was found to be according to neither the Symbol of Nice nor that of Constantinople (1), and yet, after the passing of the decree of prohibition, when the Council condemned the Nestorian document, no mention whatever was made of the Profession of Charisius. The Council did not intend, therefore, to condemn a different Exposition, providing it agreed with the Symbol of Nice. The same Cesarini also drew the attention of the Greek synodals at Florence to the conduct of the Council of Chalcedon in reference to the decree of Ephesus. The reader will remember that after the condemnation of Eutyches, in 448, by a Constantinopolitan Synod held under Flavian, the heresiarch appealed to Pope St. Leo the Great ;

(1) In the Exposition of Charisius were wanting the words " those who say : ' there was a time when He was not,' " which are found in the Nicene Symbol. But it contained the clause " And in the Holy Ghost, consubstantial to the Father and to the Son," which is wanting in both the Nicene and Constantinopolitan Creeds.

but knowing that he could expect no support from the Holy See, he prevailed upon Theodosius to convoke the "Robber-Synod" of Ephesus, in 449, in which, in defiance of the remonstrances of the Papal legates, he was declared orthodox. In this assembly, Eutyches professed the Nicene Creed and, as we read in the Acts, he said: "This is the faith of the fathers, and in it I wish to live and die." But, as the Nicene Faith was confirmed by the Council of Ephesus, and this latter prohibited the profession of any other Faith than that of the former Council, decreeing that nothing should be added or withdrawn, he therefore said: "I hold the right faith; Flavian, however, does not hold it, since he asserts that Christ is in and from two natures, while the Nicene Symbol does not say this." After this declaration of Eutyches in the "Robber-Synod," Eusebius of Dorylæum cried out in reference to the allegation of the Ephesine decree, "He lies; there is no such canon." The usurping president, Dioscorus, replied: "Why do you say there is no such canon? We have two codices, in both of which is read that it is not permissible to add anything to the Nicene Symbol." Then Dioscorus passed sentence of deposition against Flavian and Eusebius for their "violation of the Ephesine decree." Now, said cardinal Julian, when these transactions were narrated in the Council of Chalcedon, the fathers exclaimed: "Anathema to Dioscorus, who wickedly judged; let him this hour be condemned." Then the Council rescinded all the acts of the "Robber-Synod," declaring that Flavian had not violated the Ephesine canon, because, although the clause "from two, and in two Natures" is not explicitly contained in the Nicene Creed, yet it is not contrary to that Symbol. Therefore, concluded Cesarini, the Latins are not to be condemned for inserting the clause "and from the Son" in the Symbol, as it implies nothing contrary to the Definitions of Nice or of any other Councils.

The schismatic portion of the Greek Church has always contended that no addition to the Creed should be undertaken without its consent. But, as the same schismatics avowed in the Council of Florence, the Roman Pontiff is the Pastor and Doctor of the whole Church; therefore he may define what is of faith. But even though the Pope could not define doctrines of faith without a Council, it does not follow, according to the Greeks' own principles, that they should be consulted before every addition to the Symbol. They admitted, in the olden days of unity, that a small number of bishops, if convoked in Council and confirmed by the Pontiff, was sufficient to pronounce in matters of faith. They used to hold that the value of a Council did not arise from the multitude or diverse nationality of its members, but rather from their connection with the Chair of Peter. The Council of Rimini was composed of 600 bishops, Greeks and Latins, or rather Easterns and Westerns, and simply because it was rejected by Rome, both East and West condemned it. The second Council, first of Constantinople, was composed of only 150 bishops, and all of them Easterns, and yet, because it was confirmed by Pope Damasus, it was received as Œcumenical. Again, even though the Pontiff were not the "bishop of the first see," but a mere patriarch, like him of Alexandria or him of Constantinople, the Greeks should not have complained of the addition of the Filioque. If the question is merely ritualistic, certainly the introduction of a simple rite ought not to cause a schism. If the question, however, is one of faith, we answer that it is not certain that they were not consulted; just as we do not know how or when the addition was first made, so we do not know whether or not the Greeks had anything to do with it. But even though they were not consulted, could they not remember the many instances of condemnation of heresy by particular Synods, which were nevertheless not followed by schism on the part of those who were not called? Paul of Samosata was condemned by the little Council of Antioch; Macedonius was condemned by the Second Council, in which there was not one Latin bishop; Pelagius was condemned by provincial Synods; Nestorius was condemned at Ephesus before the arrival of the Latins. And finally, the Greeks were called again and again in Council, and the question was proposed and discussed in their presence. If they were not called in the beginning, we may say with St. Augustine, who thus answered the Pelagians who demanded a General Council, that every heresy ought not necessarily to trouble all the countries of the earth. And if General Councils were afterwards called, it was to satisfy the Greeks, not because said assemblies were necessary. St. Bonaventure assigns as another reason the small number of learned men among the Greeks of those days.

Protestant authors quite naturally blame the Holy See for its course throughout this controversy, but it is easy to show that no blame can with justice be laid at the doors of Rome. Whenever the question of reunion between the East and West has been agitated, the principal stress of argument has been laid upon the doctrine of the Procession of the Holy Ghost. Pope Benedict XIV. (1) says the whole question may be reduced to three points: "Firstly, whether it is a dogma of faith that the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Father and the Son . . . Secondly, whether, granted that it is a dogma, it was allowable to add to the Creed the clause obnoxious to the Greeks . . . Thirdly, whether, granting these two points, it could be allowed to the Orientals to recite, during the Mass, the ancient Constantinopolitan Creed, that is, without any introduction of the disputed words." As for the first point, the Holy See has always taught that it is a dogma of Catholic faith that the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Father and the Son, and that hence no one can be regarded as a Catholic who does not accept that doctrine. The second point is equally sure. As for the third, Pope Benedict shows by many examples that the Holy See has varied its instructions according to circumstances: "At times the Apostolic See has permitted the Orientals and Greeks to recite the Creed without the Filioque, that is, when it was sure that they received the first two points, or articles, and when it knew for certain that a denial of this greatly-desired favor would prove an obstacle to union. Sometimes, however, the clause was made obligatory, because it was asserted that the Holy Ghost did not proceed also from the Son, or because it was denied that the Church had the right to introduce the Filioque." Permission to abstain from the use of the clause was accorded to the Greeks by Gregory X., in the Council of Lyons; by Eugene IV., in the Council of Florence; by Clement VIII. (1); and by Benedict XIV. (2). These two last Pontiffs decreed that the permission should not be used if there were danger of scandal, or if "in any particular place, the custom of reciting the Filioque had been already introduced, or if it were deemed necessary to recite it as a test of right faith." In the year 1278, Pope Nicholas III., having learned that the Greeks had forgotten their promises to Gregory X., ordered that the recitation of the clause should be exacted. Martin IV. and Nicholas IV., having doubted whether certain Oriental peoples held the orthodox doctrine on the Procession, also commanded as a test that they should recite the Filioque. Benedict XIV. tells us (3) that "when Pope Calixtus III. sent the Dominican friar, Simon, as inquisitor into Crete, into which island many Greek refugees had come, owing to the Turkish conquest of two years before, he ordered him to be careful that said Greeks recited the Symbol with the addition of Filioque, probably suspecting that they, being fresh from Constantinople, were careless as to that dogma of faith."

(1) Bullarium, vol. iv., Const. 47, n. 30.

CHAPTER VI.

THE FALSE DECRETALS OF ISIDORE MERCATOR.

Towards the close of the ninth century there appeared, under the name of Isidore Mercator (4), a Collection of Canons which for several centuries undeservedly enjoyed a reputation for authenticity, not only in the West, but also in the East. (5). After the Preface, this Collection gives the order for celebrating a Council, then the first 50 Apos-

(1) Bullarium, vol. iii., Const. 34, § 6.

(2) His Bullarium; Const. "Although Pastoral," vol. i., § 1.

(3) Ibid.

(4) De Marca (Concord, b. 3, c. 5) insists that the best codices present the name as Peccator. But Zaccaria (Anti-Feb., diss. 3, c. 3) relying upon the Vatican codex, No. 630; that of Paris, mentioned by Hardouin; the Modenese; and the authority of Ivo; reads Mercator.

(5) Nicephorus (Eccl. Hist., b. 4, c. 59) cites the letters of Antherus and Calixtus, although he mistakes Celestine for Calixtus.

tolie Canons, then the Epistles of the Pontiffs from St. Clement down to Sylvester, then the Decrees of Nice, then those of other Councils, and finally the Decretals of other Pontiffs, down to St. Gregory the Great. In this Collection, four classes of monuments are to be distinguished: First, the Genuine, namely, the Decretals taken from the Dionysian Codex. Second, the Supposititious, composed by the Mercator, whoever he was; that is, nearly all the Epistles of the Pontiffs down to Siricius, and many of those from Siricius down to St. Gregory the Great; the Acts of a Roman Synod under Julius; and the Acts of the 5th and 6th Roman Synods under Symmachus. Third, the Apocryphal, which, though forged long before his time, this enterprising canonist placed in his Collection; Fourth, the Interpolated, or those which are corrupted by Isidore's additions. Thus, among the Interpolated, are to be classed the two last chapters of the Epistle of Pope Vigilius to Profuturus (by error of the copyist, written "Enterius").

In the twelfth century Peter Comestor, a canon of Paris, seems to have doubted the value of the Isidorian Collection, but the first writer to render its position insecure was the Cardinal De Cusa, in the fifteenth century. (1). The great Erasmus also had his doubts of its authenticity. The Centuriators of Magdeburg having spent much labor in attacking the dogmatic value of the Collection, Francis Turriano, S. J., published at Florence, in 1572, a defence of the Apostolic Canons and of the Pontifical Decretals; but his work did not help the Collection to hold the esteem of Baronio, Bellarmine, Du Perron, Sirmond, and other learned men. Anthony Augustinus, archbishop of Tarascon, proved that many passages were taken from the Theodosian Codex, which was written two or three centuries after the time of the Pontiffs to whom said passages were ascribed. In the year 1627, the celebrated Calvinist, David Blondel, published a defence of the Centuriators of Magdeburg (2), in which he displayed as much critical acumen in his arguments, as he did temerity in claiming to be the first expositor of the forgery. The cudgels were then taken up for the Mercator by the Franciscan theologian, Malvasia, in a book published at Rome, in 1635, (1) and by the Cardinal Aguirre. (2). But soon there were few left to defend a cause opposed by such critics as De Marca, Lupus, Baluz, Noris, Schelestrate, Labbe, Papebroch, the two Pagi, Alexandre, Coustant, Bortoli, and the Ballerinis. In this agreement of great critics, however, justly observes Zaccaria, we should not despise the following gentle, but wise, remark of the Franciscan writer, Bianchi (3): "I know that Turriano, having well defended these ancient Epistles from a dogmatic point of view, from which they were attacked by the Centuriators, and accused of errors against faith and sound doctrine, has, on the other hand, left them exposed to the censure of sharper critics. These have noticed the puerile solecisms, the forbidden barbarisms, and the gross anachronisms, which are constantly met in these Epistles. . . . I know also that Severino Binio vainly tried to cleanse them of these stains, that they might appear to belong to the authors to whom they are ascribed. However, if we wish to judge correctly in this matter, we must observe several things. . . . Although these Epistles, as they have come to us through the Collection of Isidore, are not to be ascribed to the reputed authors by any judicious person, both because of the adduced reasons and for others, nevertheless, their indelible stains do not prove that they were all invented in later times, and that the subjects treated were not treated by those venerable Pontiffs. It is merely shown that some impostor has interpolated them." (4). To this day critics dispute as to the author of the false Decretals. Some say that under the name of Isidore Mercator or Peccator is hidden the identity of St. Isidore of Seville; others think that another Spanish Isidore was the author; some ascribe the Collection to Otgar, archbishop of Mentz; others again opine that it was compiled by

(1) Catholic Concordance, b. 3, c. 2.

(2) The False Isidore and Turriano Chastised.

(1) Messenger of Truth to Blondel.

(2) Collection of Spanish Councils.

(3) External Policy of the Church, b. ii., c. 3, § 5, no. 1.

(4) See the erudite work of the BALLERINIS on the Collections of Canons, p. 3, c. 6, § 3, in which all the documents of the Isidorian Codex, whether genuine, spurious, or interpolated, are accurately examined. Also, MARCHETTI'S Commentary on the History of Fleury, and WASSERSCHLEBEN'S False Decretals of Isidore.

Ebron, archbishop of Rheims, assisted by Rotharius of Soisson, and the canon Wulfad; others finally deem it the work of a certain Benedict the Levite, a clerk of Mentz, who wrote some false Capitulars in the ninth century. Certainly, the Collection did not issue from Rome, as Febronius malignantly contended. While Charlemagne was besieging Pavia, Pope Adrian I. gave him the famous Collection of Canons, commonly called the Adrian, and this was simply the Collection of Dionysius the Little, with a few additions at the end. Even during the reign of Leo IV., 847-858, the Isidorian Collection was unknown, for this Pontiff, in a letter to the Britons (1), describing the Collection used in Rome, speaks only of the Dionysian. Had Isidore consulted the Romans, says Coustant, (2), they would willingly have given him access to their archives, where he would have found genuine monuments with which to enrich his Collection. Febronius quotes Barthel, chancellor of the university of Wittenberg (1762), as saying that the Isidorian Codex was foisted upon the Church by Pope Nicholas I. and was brought into Germany by Reginulph, archbishop of Mentz. Now Reginulph died in 814, thirty-two years before the Isidorian Collection saw the light. As for Pope Nicholas I., when, in 858, he had occasion to cite certain Decretals in the cause of Photius, he did not quote those of Evarist, Alexander, Sixtus, etc., (in the Isidorian,) although he did quote other apocryphal documents, such as the Synod of Sylvester, the Sinuessan, etc., from other Collections. Had he known of these reputed Decretals, and deemed them of value, he would not have failed to use them. And in his letter to Hincmar, confirming the Synod of Soissons, he shows that as yet he knew nothing of the Isidorian Codex. For, assigning the sources from which the Roman Church drew its discipline, he mentions only the Councils and Epistles found in the Collection of Dionysius. (3). However, Pope Nicholas I. was made acquainted with the Collection of Isidore, and it was through the French bishops that he learned of its existence, they having cited it when it suited their convenience. "It is probable," says Zaccaria, (1), "that he (Nicholas) had a copy brought from France, and that he cited it against the bishops who alleged its authority. But he found that they rejected it when they found it favorable to the Apostolic See; and he reasonably complains of this inconsistency. (2). And as they, in rejecting it, fell back upon the Adrian Codex, in which were wanting the authorities, he undertakes, I say with Noel Alexandre, to refute this weak reasoning, and argues with them ad hominem, that nevertheless they received the letters of St. Gregory and others, which were not in the Codex of Adrian. Here we must observe that this letter of Nicholas was sent to France in 865, the same year that he sent the eighth letter to the emperor Michael. And although in that letter he proves at length the prerogatives of his See against the wicked Photius, he adduces none of the Isidorian Decretals, but principally relies upon the undoubted epistles of Pope Gelasius. Why this difference in two letters of the same year? He mistrusted the authority of the Isidorian Collection, but used it against the French prelates, because they had cited it. . . . This is all that Nicholas did for the Decretals of Isidore. . . . In the language of Barthel and Febronius, this is forcing the world to accept the Decretals." (3).

(1) In Gratian, dist. 20, c. 1.(2) Preface to Epist. Rom. Pont., n. 136.(3) Epist. 38, in Baronio, year 863.

With regard to the Collection of Isidore, the following things are to be remembered. First, there is nothing in it contrary to faith or morals; otherwise, it would not have been received by the whole Church for nearly seven centuries. Second, as we have already observed, it was issued without any consent or connivance of the Roman Pontiffs. Third, the privileges of the Holy See are not founded, as modern heretics have asserted, upon it. Fourth, there is no reason for the complaint made by De Marca, Basnage, Fleury, and others, that by the introduction of this Collection the ancient discipline of the Church was abrogated, and an entirely new one adopted; for many of Isidore's monuments are extracted from Conciliary Canons, genuine Pontifical Constitutions, and opinions of the Fathers, while the rest show the discipline obtaining before the time of Isidore. As the Ballerini brothers remark, the impostor would have been a fool if he expected his Collection to be received by men among whom he was introducing, as our adversaries assert, a new and abhorrent discipline. But no clamor was raised, no murmurs heard, because of these apocryphal Decretals, unless on account of those pertaining to the causes and judgments of bishops, of which we read something in Hinemar and in the Epistles of Nicholas I. And that which is given by Isidore with regard to these very causes and judgments is not entirely new. The canonist, therefore, did not intend to introduce a new discipline, but to establish one generally received. (1). Fifth, the discipline inculcated by this Collection did not obtain the force of law by virtue of itself, but by virtue of preceding and subsequent Constitutions, and by force of custom, which is quite powerful in disciplinary matters.

(1) Anti-Feb., diss. 3, c. 3, no. 5.

(2) Epist. 47, to the Bishops of France.

(3) The reader who is anxious for more information on this point will be abundantly gratified in Zaccaria's valuable work, loc. cit.

Protestant critics willingly admit that the Decretals of the Pontiffs contained in the Isidorian Collection, down to Siricius, are supposititious; they would gladly say the same of all the others. Centuries have passed since a Catholic author of note has defended their authenticity. Nevertheless, a brief rehearsal of the arguments by which the supposititiousness of these documents is evinced will not be out of place. The student will bear in mind that there is no question of the Epistles of St. Cornelius, which are found among the works of St. Cyprian. Nor is there any doubt about the Epistles of Julius I., which are given by St. Athanasius, in his Second Apology. Authenticity is vainly claimed for such Epistles as are found in the Fragments of St. Hilary (2); but the Epistles of Damasus to the Illyrian Bishops, which Theodore^t records, and also the other Epistles of Damasus given by St. Jerome, are authentic. The mark of spuriousness is affixed to the five Epistles ascribed to St. Clement, to three of Anacletus, two of Evarist, three of Alexander, two of Sixtus I., one of Telesphorus, two of Hyginus, four of Pius I., one of Anice-

(1) DÖLLINGER; Ecel. Hist., ep. iii., c. 4. (2) See our Chapter on Liberius, vol. 1., p. 224

tus, two of Soter, one of Eleutherius, four of Victor, two of Zephyrinus, two of Calixtus I., one of Urban I., two of Pontian, one of Anterus, three of Fabian, three of Cornelius, one of Lucius, two of Stephen I., two of Sixtus II., two of Dionysius, three of Felix I., two of Eutychian, one of Caius, two of Marcellinus, two of Marcellus I., three of Eusebius, one of Melchiades, one of Sylvester, one of Mark (supposed to be to Athanasius), two of Julius I., two of Liberius, two of Felix II., and several of Damasus. That all of these Isidorian documents are supposititious, the best critics have decided, impelled by the following reasons: First, the Pontiffs who preceded Siricius could have had no knowledge of St. Jerome's Vulgate, and these letters ascribed to those Popes frequently quote the Scriptures according to that version. (1). Second, during the first eight centuries, these documents are cited by no Council, by no Pontiff, by no ecclesiastical writer. Had they been genuine, they would not have been ignored by such writers as St. Jerome and Photius, or by such Pontiffs as SS. Innocent I. and Leo I. Third, these Epistles are silent as to the heresies of the first centuries, as to the persecutions, etc.; it is incredible that genuine works of those days would not even touch upon such topics. Very different is the tenor of the undoubted documents of that period. Fourth, these Isidorian documents are evidently compiled from epistles, decrees, and writings of Pontiffs, Councils, and Fathers of a later date than those assigned to them. Those who favored the False Decretals answered this argument with the assertion that these posterior Pontiffs, Councils, and writers were acquainted with the documents in question and cited them. But the reply is futile, for if these Pontiffs, etc., had used these documents, they would certainly have made good use of the authority of the great names they bear, and would not have kept silence, contrary to their custom, in regard to so powerful an argument in their own favor. Fifth, in the Isidorian monuments there is frequently a sublime contempt for dates, especially as to the Consular periods, which is a strong argument against their authenticity. Sixth, there is a wonderful similarity of style in these documents, which would not be observed in the works of so many different men of different countries and periods. Seventh, the Roman Pontiffs have always been men of more than ordinary education, to say the least, but the Epistles of this Collection are not only full of barbarisms, but are couched in a style, to use the words of Alexandre, "only fit for cooks and hostlers."

(1) Siricius mounted the Papal throne in 384. St. Jerome finished his version of the New Testament in 383. Of the Old Testament, Joh, Paralipomenon, Ecclesiastes, Proverbs, and the Canticle, were not translated by him until 380; the Psalter and Prophets appeared in 392; the work was completed in 404. See UBALDINI Introduction to Sacred Scripture, sect. II., chap. 3, § 3.

It has been objected that the Church of Rome gave her formal approbation to the False Decretals, by receiving the celebrated Decree of Gratian, which, to use the words of Zaccaria (1), "is altogether made up of Isidorian merchandise." But it is incorrect to say that the Church absolutely follows the Decree of Gratian. This Collection of Canons was formed, about 1150, by no public authority, but on the private responsibility and according to the individual judgment of the great Benedictine whose name it bears. But did it receive the approbation of the Church? Some authors hold the affirmative, because it has been generally used in the schools, and because, they say, Pope Eugene III. and Gregory XIII. approved of it. Others, however, hold the negative, saying that the Decree is full of errors, and denying the approbation of the aforesaid Pontiffs. Of the approbation by Eugene III., Trithemius is the sole witness, and gives no authentic proof of his assertion; if that approbation had been given, it would have been prefixed to some exemplar of Gratian. As for Gregory XIII., in his letters of July 2, 1582. he declares that he took care that the Decree should be revised and corrected, but he does not even imply any approbation. The Roman Rivota (Cor. Pegna, dec. 480), cited by Vecchiotti (2), says "Nor did Gregory XIII. approve as legal the book of Gratian, for he only ordered it to be corrected, and to be observed." And Pope Benedict XIV. says (3): "Although it has been often corrected by the care of the Roman Pontiffs, the

(1) Anti-Feb., diss. iii., c. 3, no. 7.

(2) Institutions of Canon Law, b. i., c. 4, § 64.

(3) Diocesan Synod, b. vii. c. 15, no. 6.

Decree of Gratian does not possess the strength and force of law; rather do all agree that whatever it contains has just so much of authority as it would have had if it had never been inserted in the Collection of Gratian." It is plain, then, that the Roman Church did not become responsible for the False Decretals by their admission into the Decree of Gratian. The Holy See often felt the necessity of revising the famous Decree, and the learned corrector employed by Pope Gregory XIII., Anthony Augustinus, archbishop of Tarascon, in his work entitled Gratian Corrected, gives many instances where his labor was sadly needed. (1).

Speaking of Isidore's interpolations, Bianchi says that they are indicated by "a constant and ever-same inequality and incoherenttness of style, met with in every case, and causing each document to appear different from itself: which certainly excites a belief that these letters were not entirely manufactured, but that, already existing, they received a new dress, according to the depraved taste of the artificer." Commenting upon this idea, Zaccaria makes the following judicious remarks: "To tell the truth, I am inclined to agree, at least in part, with this erudite writer I do not understand how, in the part of his Collection which is given to the Councils, the false Isidore is so religiously careful as to give us, saving only some interpolation, merely genuine Councils (of which we are sure, from other sources); only in regard to the Epistles of the Roman Pontiffs does he assume the most impudent liberty of lying There is no doubt that many monuments were in existence at the time of our Isidore, which are now lost. In his Collection is found the genuine letter of St. Damasus to Paulinus, divided into three, and mixed up with two other apocryphal ones. Why did he do this? We must suppose that he found it so divided in the Codex of the Spanish Collection, of which he availed himself. And who does not know how many Papal Bulls and imperial privileges were preserved in the particular churches to which they were given, but which now would be vainly sought in the Roman or imperial archives? To give an instance well suiting our argument, if

(1) Thus the very words of certain Imperial Laws in the Theodosian Code are represented as proceeding from Pontiffs who lived three centuries before the Code was issued.

Agnello had not preserved, in his History of the Ravenna Bishops, a certain epistle of Pope Felix IV., it would have been lost. What we have already said, is confirmed by another example. Labbe and others accuse Isidore of forging the letters of St. Damasus, St. Leo, and John III., about the vice-bishops. (1). Remember, however, that I do not deny their spuriousness. I only say that Isidore did not forge them, because not a few years before him, Pope Leo III. mentioned them, writing to the French bishops. Another example is the letter of St. Gregory the Great to Secundinus. In the MSS. it is very much altered, and is full of additions tacked on, by another hand, to the original text of the holy Pontiff. Isidore is accused of these interpolations, but wrongfully, because the same text is given by Paul the Deacon, who died in 801, long before the publication of the Isidorian Collection. From all this I think that we may plausibly assume that many of the monuments attributed to Isidore were forged or adulterated before his time . . . I would wish that Isidore should not be charged with all these impostures, and principally do I desire that the learned would more accurately consider the compilation of Isidore, and take courage to separate what is more ancient, and perhaps authentic, from that which is his own, or certainly false."

Who was the author of the False Decretals? No author of repute any longer ascribes them to St. Isidore of Seville. As Alexandre, after the Ballerinis, observes, that holy doctor could not have been the impostor, for the Collection gives Councils of Toledo (6th to the 13th), and one of Braga, which were held after his death. That St. Isidore died in 636, the 26th year of Heraclius, we learn from his Life, written by his deacon, Redemptus: from Braulio of Saragossa (2); from Luke of Tay (3), and from Mariana (4). The Collection also gives the Acts of the Sixth General Council, which was celebrated in 681, or forty-four years after St. Isidore's death. We also read in it epistles of Popes Gregory II. and III., and of Pope Zachary, who lived in the eighth century. Therefore Hincmar of Rheims was deceived when he asserted that "Isidore, bishop of Seville, collected the Epistles of the Roman Pontiffs from St. Clement down to St. Gregory." (1). Cardinals Bona and Cenni incline to the belief that St. Isidore was the author in question, but they base their opinion only on the testimony of Hincmar. Some critics have ascribed our Collection to some unknown Isidore, also a Spanish bishop. But it is incredible that an impostor, such as this writer must have been, would have missed the opportunity of glorifying the importance of his own church and country. Now in the Collection there are only one or two Epistles addressed to Spanish bishops. Again, down to the time of Innocent III (1198—1216) this Collection was unknown in Spain, and all of the 9th century MSS. which contain it were written in France or Germany, as is shown by the characters and other signs. The barbarisms of style also indicate that the author was a Franco-German, for impurity of diction was as common in the Rhine countries at that time as it was rare in Spain. Blondel accepts these two last reasons for believing the impostor to have been a Franco-German, a subject of Charlemagne, and adds another excellent argument. It is improbable that any resident of Spain, then groaning under the terrible oppression of the Saracens, would have been inclined, or have found the opportunity, to digest and arrange this mass of documents. Finally, there are many things in the Collection which were evidently extracted from the letters of St. Boniface, which is no slight indication that it was prepared in that part of Germany which was numbered among the Gauls. Many critics, and among them the acute Zaccaria, believe that the Collection must be ascribed to a churchman of Mentz, called Benedict the Levite, who, about the year 845, compiled three books of Capitularies of Charlemagne and Louis the Compliant (2).

(1) Chorepiscopi.(2) Cut-douge of the Works of Isidore.(3) Book III.(4) Book vi., c. 7.

With regard to the time when the False Decretals were given to the world, Febronius insisted that it was about

(1) Epist. 7, c. 12.

(2) See ZACCARIA, loc. cit. Also, DENZIGER'S Opinions of Recent Critics on the False Decretals of Isidore.

744 that Reginulph of Mentz published them, though they must have been written, he said, some time previous. But Isidore furnishes us with some Decretals of Popes Urban I. and John III., in which are found, word for word, certain sentences of the Council of Paris of 829. And Blondel observes that the impostor borrowed, here and there, many formulas and phrases from the letter of Jonas of Orleans to Charles the Bald. Since, then, this prince ascended the throne in 839, the Collection must be of a posterior date. In 841 Rabanus dedicated his Penitential to Otgar of Mentz, but he makes no allusion to the Isidorian Decretals. For these, and other excellent reasons, Zaccaria concludes that Benedict the Levite, under the auspices of Otgar of Mentz, (d. 847) published the Decretals about the year 846.

The innovators of modern times, whether of the Reformed, or courtier schools, have always laid great stress on the falsity of the Isidorian Decretals, and have contended that it was by their means that the power of the Holy See was greatly increased, to the detriment of, and in defiance of, the ancient discipline of the Church. To mention only a few of the leading minds by whom Protestants and other innovators are guided in their opinions on this matter, such was the theory of Wycliffe, Febronius, the Gallican Fleury, the Jansenist Egidius Witte, John Francis Budde, Mosheim, Tamburini, Villers, and Potter. Among the many authors who have triumphantly refuted this assertion, and successfully proved that all the present prerogatives of the Roman See belong to it of divine right, and were always recognized by the Universal Church, we may mention as especially worthy of consultation, besides the already cited works of the Ballerinis, Alexandre, Bianchi, Zaccaria, and Marchetti, the valuable book of Peter Ballerini entitled Defense of the Pontifical Authority against the Work of Justin Febronius; the Commentary of Blascus on this subject; the Disquisitions on the Collections of Canons, by Theiner; Schulte's Manual of Canon Law; Palma's Lectures; Vecchiotti's Institutions of Canon Law. Febronius (1) asserts that "with the help of Isidore and Gratian, the Roman court succeeded in changing its primatial and patriarchal rights into a kind of ecclesiastical monarchy," and that "the Roman Church gained great advantages from the supposed Decretals." Fleury (1) says: "Of all these false documents, the most pernicious were the Decretals attributed to the Popes of the first four centuries, which inflicted an irreparable wound on the discipline of the Church, by the new maxims which they introduced regarding the judgments of bishops and the authority of the Pope." The Jansenist Witte (2) informs us that "Nicholas I., an active man, and very confident in his combat for a bad cause, defended with his whole soul the fictitious and adulterated Epistles, in which it was asserted that all ecclesiastical affairs were subject to the Supreme Pontiff, and he himself to no one; hence a man of nice discernment can perceive that this adulterated merchandise was exposed in the public forum of the Church, not without the consent of the Roman court, even though we do not call it their parent and author. After the days of Nicholas, these deplorable Decretals obtained force by degrees, because of the ignorance of those times in matters of ecclesiastical history."

(1) Chap. 8, § 3 and 4.

The Protestant professor, John Francis Budde (d. 1729) asserts (3): "The Roman Pontiff Nicholas I., who, as the abbot Hegino says, 'commanded kings and tyrants, as though he were the lord of the earth,' as he never lost any occasion of augmenting his power, so he took these fictitious Epistles, so to say, in both hands, and approved of them, and tried to force them upon others, especially in France." Mosheim (4) says: "In order that this new code of the Church, very different from the old one, might be more favorably received, there was need of ancient documents and records to establish it, and to defend it against hostile attack. Hence the Roman Pontiffs took care to falsify compacts, Councils, epistles, and other documents, by means of faithful agents, so that it would be believed that in the early days of Christianity the Pontiffs enjoyed the same

(1) Discourse iii, on Ecclesiastical History.

(2) Augustine of Ypres Vindicated, p. 2, c. 5.

(3) Historico-Theological Introduction.

(4) History, cent. ix., p. 2, c. 2, § 7.

power and majesty that they then arrogated to themselves. Among these fraudulent supports of the Roman power, almost the first place is held by the Decretals, as they call the Epistles of the Pontiffs of the first centuries, which a certain obscure person—Isidore Mercator, or Peccator—invented.” To all these assertions we reply with Baronio (1) that “even though these Decretals be proved false, the Roman Church loses none of her rights and privileges, since, even if these documents were wanting, those rights would be abundantly sustained by other undoubtedly genuine Decretals.” The Calvinist Blondel admits that these Decretals are made up from words and passages which occur in Canons, laws, and other writings of the fourth and fifth centuries; he grants therefore that these documents illustrate a discipline which obtained at least at that time. This admission of Blondel is noticed by De Marca, who, although saturated with Gallicanism, remarks (2), “I cannot agree with him in so atrociously attacking these Epistles, which were certainly composed from words and passages of ancient laws and canons, and of the holy Fathers who flourished in the fourth and fifth centuries.

The Ballerini brothers (3) call our attention to the end which Isidore had in view when he issued these Decretals. It was to provide for the greater security of bishops, that is, to prevent their being frequently cited in judgment by the importunate, as he himself explains in the Preface. If, therefore, he exalts the Apostolic See, he does so out of consideration to the bishops, who would find there a refuge from the oppressor. But, retorts Febronius, Isidore does glorify the Chair of Peter for this end. We must therefore show that this glorification was not unfounded, that it was not invented by Isidore. It is not our province, but that of the dogmatic theologian, to show that all the prerogatives claimed for Rome by these Decretals belong to her by divine right, but it is within our sphere to prove that the Pontiffs exercised them long before the time of Isidore, and that they did so in the face of a willingly obedient Christendom. If these Epistles produced an innovation in discipline, why are there no traces of resistance, why no clamorings in defense of the ancient system? The following, a few only of the many proofs which can be adduced, will show that Isidore introduced no new discipline when he inculcated the supreme jurisdiction of the Roman Pontiff. From the first ages of Christianity the Holy See has been accustomed to consider the "greater causes," sent to it from all parts of the earth. An instance of this is found in the very first century, in the recourse of the Corinthians, because of their dissensions, to Pope St. Clement I. St. Cyprian (254) is judged by Pope St. Cornelius in the matter of reconciling the "fallen." The Council of Sardica (341) writes to Pope Julius: "It will be regarded as most proper, if the priests refer the affairs of each and every province to the Head, that is, to the See of Peter." Celebrated indeed is the case of the African Appeals, of which we have fully treated. In 378, Peter of Alexandria appealed to Pope Damasus, when expelled from his see by Euzoius and the emperor Valens. It was in allusion to this case that Eutherius and Elladius of Tarsus wrote to Pope Sixtus III. (432): "When of old the tares of heresy arose in Alexandria, your Apostolic See sufficed to give it the lie for all time, and to repress its impiety; to correct what needed correction, and to strengthen the world for the glory of Christ, in the time of the thrice-blessed Damasus, who is among the saints, and also in the time of other Pontiffs." In 381, Istanzius, Salvianus, and Priscillianus, condemned by a Synod of Saragossa, appeal to Rome. (1). Famous also is the appeal of St. John Chrysostom to Pope Innocent I., of which we have already treated. In 422, Perrevious, oppressed by the bishops of his province, appealed to Pope Boniface, and that Pontiff appointed his vicar, Rufus, to judge the case (2). In 430, Pope Cœlestine hears the cause of St. Cyril of Alexandria against Nestorius: "The ancient custom of the churches," writes the Alexandrian patriarch, "instructs us to refer such a cause to your Holiness." In 437, Iddua, bishop of Smyrna, condemned (according to

(1) Annals, year 865.(2) Concord. iiii., b. 3, c. 5, no. 1.(3) Works of St. Leo, vol. iiii.

(1) SULPICIOUS SEVERUS, History, b. II., c. 48.

(2) Epist. Rom. Pont., vol. I., ep. 13.

Holstein, who first edited his letter) by Proclus of Constantinople, or, (as Lupus (1) thinks), by his primate, Basil, appealed to Pope Sixtus. In 445 occurred the celebrated appeal of Chelidonius, a bishop of the province of Vienne, to Pope St. Leo the Great. Deprived of his see in a Synod presided over by St. Hilary of Arles, because he was said to have married a widow before he became bishop, and because, while yet a magistrate, he had condemned a criminal to death, he proved his innocence before the Pontiff and was restored to his diocese. We have already treated of the appeal of Flavian of Constantinople to this Pontiff. In 446, Lupicinus, a bishop of Mauritania, being deposed by a Synod, appealed to Rome, and was restored. (2). In 483, John Talaja, patriarch of Alexandria, persecuted by the ambitious Acacius of Constantinople, appealed to Pope Simplicius. In 488, the priest Solomon, unjustly degraded by Acacius, appealed to Pope Felix III. and received justice. In 531, Stephen of Larissa, metropolitan of Thessaly, degraded by Epiphanius of Constantinople, appealed to Pope Boniface II. In 535, the bishops Sagittarius and Salonius, deposed in a Synod of Lyons, went to Rome with permission of king Guntran, and appealed to Pope John III. In 590, the archbishop of Salona, Natalis, tried to disembarass himself of his archdeacon Honoratus, who would not connive at the prelate's convivial habits and his using the ecclesiastical revenues to support his relatives. He compelled the deacon to receive the priesthood, so that he might have a pretext for appointing another archdeacon, the discipline of that day not allowing a priest to fill that office. Honoratus appealed to Pope Pelagius II., and the disputants were summoned to Rome. Natalis delayed, and when St. Gregory ascended the throne, he restored Honoratus to his archdiaconate. In this same year we find a case of African clerics appealing in the "first instance," not to a Synod, but to the Roman Pontiff. The Donatists had bribed the bishop Argentius to promote certain ones of their sect over the heads of orthodox clerics; Vincent and

(1) Appeals, diss. 1., c. 34.

(2) Epistles of St. Leo the Great, edit. by Balberini, cv. 12.

Felicissimus, deacons, appealed to St. Gregory, and the Pontiff appointed the monk Hilarus as legate to settle the affair. (1). The Pontificate of St. Gregory the Great is filled with instances of appeals. (2). We abstain from adding to the list, for we have adduced enough of examples to show that, long before the appearance of the Isidorian Collection, the right of the Roman See to receive appeals, and therefore its supreme jurisdiction, was acknowledged by Christendom. Theodoret, bishop of Cyria, writing to St. Leo the Great (3), rightly speaks of the Holy See having received appeals in the days of St. Peter, for the Apostle Paul, he says, "betook himself to the great Peter for a resolution of the doubts which had arisen at Antioch about the legal conversation." St. Jerome (4) writes: "When I was assisting Damasus, bishop of the Roman city, in his ecclesiastical correspondence, and used to answer the synodical consultations of the East and the West, etc." (5).

The Jansenist abbé, Racine, (6) says that "To realize the extent of the evil produced by the False Decretals, one must reflect that they established new maxims, and caused them to be regarded as of the highest antiquity; that they enfeebled the greater portion of the Canons, and enervated all vigor of discipline. The forger, used by the demon to inflict so terrible a wound on the Church, knew that it would be too revolting if he brought forth Canons directly contrary to those universally received by the Church; he was contented, therefore, with forging those which only sweetened and enfeebled the ancient ones. But that he might succeed in his design of entirely changing the discipline, he made a flank movement, which was an infinite extension of the appeals to the Pope." In commenting upon this assertion, which is also made by Fleury and Febronius, Zaccaria (7) observes that Isidore could not have been such a simpleton as to fail to perceive that the

(1) Epistles of St. Gregory, b. 1, ep. 82.

(2) See ZACCARIA'S Anti-Feb., p. 2, b. 3, c. 6.

(3) Epistles of St. Leo, vol. i., ep. 52.

(4) Epist. 123, to Ageruchia.

(5) See BELLARMINE, Rom. Pont., b. 2, c. 24; CAPPELLO'S African Appeals to the Roman Church; BOLGENI'S Episcopacy, b. 4, c. 3.

(6) Reflections on the State of the Church.

(7) Anti-Feb., diss. iii., c. 5, no. 3.

introduction of a new discipline would injure his design of sustaining the episcopal dignity against its oppressors. Innovations generally give rise to tumult : and how great a disturbance was to be feared, if he undertook to substitute a new discipline for one established by well-known laws, and confirmed by the use of centuries and the consent of the whole Church ? But there was no disturbance, no resistance against this "new discipline ;" Hincmar and his partisans made some clamor, but they opposed only what pertained to the causes and judgments of bishops. And here we would notice the remark of Papebroch, (1), that the doctrine contained in the False Decretals was sound, and precisely therefore the forgery was undiscovered. "In those days," says Zaccaria, "there was a lack of that critical tact which could distinguish the styles of various authors, examine dates, and compare texts ; but there was (which only a heretic will deny) the discernment necessary to judge of doctrine. Therefore the easy reception of the Isidorian Collection is an invincible proof that its doctrine was not contrary to the ancient Canons." We need not sympathize therefore, with the tears of Fleury when he laments the halcyon days of the ancient Church. Erasmus was well satisfied with the discipline of the Church of his day, in spite of the False Decretals ; so much so, indeed, that he must have disappointed those who were hoping that he would join the "Reformers," when he said that "if St. Paul were living to-day, he would not disapprove of the present state of the Church." (2)

CHAPTER VII.

THE EUCHARISTIC DOCTRINE IN THE TENTH CENTURY.

Protestant authors have not hesitated to assert that it was only in the tenth century that the Eucharistic belief took the form in which it is now presented by the Catholic Church. The invention of Transubstantiation is attributed by Claude, La Roque, Mosheim, and a host of modern imitators, to Paschasius Radbertus, a Benedictine monk of Corbie, who died in the year 860. The innovating doctrines of Paschasius, contend these polemics, were energetically combated by Ratramn (Bertram), Rabanus Maurus, Amalarius, Scotus Erigena, Heriger, and other defenders of the primitive purity of Christian dogma; but, nevertheless, the new opinions spread during the fearful darkness of the ninth and tenth centuries, and finally were adopted by the magistracy of the Church.

(1) Preface in Conat. Catal. Pont., n. 14.

(2) Letter written in 1529 against the False Evangelists.

It is not our purpose to enter into any details in order to show that the Eucharistic doctrine underwent no change in the tenth century; that Ratramn, Rabanus, etc., did not combat the doctrine of Transubstantiation; that there was, between these writers and Paschasius, no difference of belief as to the Real Presence, but merely a difference as to the way of explaining that Presence. Catholic polemics have clearly proved that Ratramn and all the other cited authors, with the sole possible exception of Scotus Erigena, (1) were as firm in their recognition of the Real Presence as was Paschasius himself (2); and in our remarks on the faith of the early Irish and Saxon churches we have had occasion to cite many testimonies of dates greatly anterior to the period of Paschasius, which plainly show the falsity of the assumption that this writer was the inventor of the theory of Transubstantiation. Nor is it our province to further develop this point. Nevertheless, we venture upon a few reflections. Paschasius tells the king that his book on the Body and Blood of the Lord was written for the instruction of the newly converted Saxon youth, and throughout the work there is preserved that even and assured tone of possession which naturally pervades a treatise, the arguments of which are contradicted by none. There is nothing of that apodictical style, of that aggressiveness, which generally accompanies controversy, even when undertaken by the meekest of men. Would such have been his tone, if Paschasius had started with the idea of uprooting a settled belief of Christendom? And how is it that this presumed innovator, and so startling a one, was so universally respected by his contemporaries? A Council of Paris, in 846, was loud in his praises. Kings Louis, Lothaire, and Charles loaded him with favors. Engelmod, bishop of Soissons, wrote a poem in his honor, and styled him "the prop of the Church, the crest of Religion, and the buckler of Faith," saying also of him that he was "not disgraced by a lying simulation of faith, but adorned with a strength that was conscious of rectitude." Lupus, abbot of Ferrières, calls him "most beloved, and to be embraced by all good men." St. Odo, abbot of Cluny, says of his book on the Eucharist that he had collected "from the sayings of the Fathers many arguments to inculcate reverence for the Mystery, and to demonstrate its majesty; which, if read by even a learned man, will give him so much knowledge, that he will think that until now he has known little indeed of this Mystery." Would this esteem have been felt for an innovator? Are not Protestants fond of describing the miserable position at once secured for himself by any Catholic who presumes to leave the beaten track, and to follow the path of his own discovery? Again, if at the time that the young monk of Corbie commenced to write, the Christian world believed that the Eucharist was merely an image of the Body and Blood of the Lord, how can the silence of the Christian bishops and doctors of the time be explained? Paschasius himself tells us that no one openly contradicted him; only a few murmured, because, as they said, he attributed to the words of Christ more than truth warranted. In his old age Paschasius wrote to Frudegard on the Real Presence: "It is wicked to pray with all, and not to believe what is attested by truth itself, and universally received as truth. . . . And hence, although some have erred through ignorance, no one has as yet openly contradicted this, which the whole world believes and avows." Let us picture to ourselves a young ecclesiastic of our own day endeavoring to force upon the Catholic world a belief that the images of our holy Father, Pope Leo XIII., are not mere representations, but really and substantially the Pontiff himself. Is it likely that he would be esteemed for his learning and sanctity? But we would dwell a moment upon the absurdities of the theory advanced by our opponents.

(1) John, called Scotus Erigena, or the Irishman, seems to have been a layman; for no contemporary speaks of him as being in orders or in any religious community. He enjoyed the favor of Charles the Bald, but his wild and dangerous, and even heretical, opinions caused Pope Nicholas I. to request that monarch to remove him from the imperial court. His book on Predestination was condemned by the third Synod of Valence, that assembly styling it a collection of "silly little questions and old women's fables—an Irish strabout—Scotorum pultes." His work on The Natures was condemned by Pope Honorius III. The book on the Eucharist, which was proscribed at Vercelli, and is attributed to Erigena, was undoubtedly heretical, but it is not certain that he was its author. Hincmar tells us, in his Predestination, c. 31, that in this book it was asserted that "the Sacrament of the Altar is not the true Body and Blood of our Lord, but only a memorial.

(2) ALEXANDRE, cent. IX., X., diss. 13.

We are asked to believe that during the ninth and tenth centuries the faith of the Church underwent a tremendous change, and that the ecclesiastical and literary world was so supine that it took no notice of the matter. Such indeed is the assertion made by Protestant polemics; and from among the scores of noted writers of the lethargic period, they bring forth only five who, they say, were awake; and of these five not one speaks of the doctrine in question as a new one, and only one of them attacks it. At other times, when innovations were made in a doctrine, all earth was moved against the heretic; the science of theologians, the prayers of the faithful, and, when it could be obtained, the aid of the secular power, were brought to bear against him. And here, we are told, is a new doctrine, calling on men to discredit the evidence of their senses; to regard their philosophy as a mere cobweb of flimsiness; and it triumphs! Dark indeed would be those days in which such a thing could be possible, unless, perchance, they were sufficiently illuminated by the preternatural effulgence of the genius who could excogitate and actuate such a design. However, it is in this very darkness, intellectual and moral—which, our adversaries insist, was a characteristic of the tenth century,—that we are told to find the key of the problem. Well, to convince us of the possibility of so stupendous an event, it would be necessary to show that the tenth century was darker than any nineteenth-century worshipper has ventured to depict it. We do not regard the tenth as remarkably lustrous among the Christian centuries; and before us now is a passage even of Baronio, wherein the great annalist presents it as "iron in its harshness, and barren of good; leaden in the deformity of its evils; obscure by reason of its dearth of authors." (1). And Bellarmine admits that "no century has been more illiterate or unhappy; he who paid attention to mathematics or philosophy, was regarded as a magician by the common people." (2). But we can show that these remarks are to be taken in a comparative sense; that the tenth century was not so deficient in sanctity and learning as to render at all probable our opponents' way of accounting for the progress of the tremendous error which, according to them, was propagated at that period. Since the days of Bellarmine (ob. 1621), the labors of many erudite and patient investigators, especially of Muratori and Tiraboschi, have shed more light upon the condition of the Middle Ages than he enjoyed during his valuable studies. Speaking of the tenth century, Pagi says: "This century was not inferior to its successors in learning. If compared with the centuries immediately preceding and following it, it can be styled a period of ignorance only because of the relatively small number of authors it produced. But he who examines the catalogues of ecclesiastical writers will find that there flourished then many more authors than were known of in Bellarmine's time."

The tenth century produced Nilus, Romuald, Amimicus, Guido, Firmanus, and many others, "over whose venerable bodies," said St. Peter Damian, "ecclesiastical authority has caused the erection of holy altars." From the school of St. Romuald issued St. Boniface, martyr, apostle of the Russians. At this time the Germanic regions were enlightened by the labors of Udalric; Adalbert of Magdeburg; Bruno, Heribert, and Anno, of Cologne; Wolfgang of Ratisbon; Bernard and Gothard of Hildesheim; Harduit of Salzburg. Hungary can boast of St. Adalbert of Prague, apostle of her people and of the Lithuanians, and can also glory in her great king, St. Stephen. Norway points to her royal martyr, Olav. England had her Odo, Dunstan, Oswald, Ethelwald; her saintly monarchs Alfred, the two Edwards, Athelstane, Edmund, and Edgar. Spain, although groaning under the Saracenic yoke, produced SS. Gennadius of Zamora, Attilan of Asturia, Rudisind of Compostella,

(1) Annals, year 900.

(2) Rom. Pont., b. iv., c. 12.

and the pious kings. Alphonsus the Great, Ramir II., and Weremond. France was taught by Heriveus, Adalberon, Radbod, and Gerald; by Berno, Odo, Aimard, and Odilo, abbots of Cluny; by Abbo of Fleury; and she was edified by her devout king Robert.

Italy, which suffered more from the storms of the tenth century than any other country, produced a great many literary men and cultivators of the fine arts and of science. (1). Ratherius of Verona tells us that in his episcopal see the many schools of science were frequented by throngs, and that the schools of Rome were in a flourishing condition. Atto of Vercelli took care that instruction should be given gratuitously to all, in every town and hamlet of his diocese. A Bull of Benedict IV., promulgated in 903, shows that at Pisa the schools of theology and of law were in full force. At Ravenna, Vilgard presided over a flourishing academy. When the emperor Otho I. wished to improve the schools of Germany, he brought from Novara the famous Deacon Gonzo. And were the monks doing nothing for science and literature during this tenth century? The labors of the cowed students of Bobbio alone would have sufficed to remove the reproach of sloth and ignorance from a whole nation. (2).

Certainly there was in the tenth century sufficient intellectual vigor, as well as sufficient zeal for the things of God, to preserve and transmit to posterity the treasures of faith and of science, where other matters were concerned. We cannot suppose, therefore, that in this one matter of the Eucharistic belief—one of so tremendous a nature—the clerks of that period were delinquent. These students and scribes were most diligent in their details of events. The modern critic often smiles, and sometimes he fumes, because of the indiscriminate zeal they often manifest in their greed of materials for their chronicles,—a zeal which causes no little trouble to the modern investigator. Can we suppose that these chroniclers, who apparently claimed everything and anything as grist for their mill, would have overlooked the abundant harvest which Protestant polemics declare to have been at their disposal? Here are the "Lives" of SS. Radbod, Dunstan, Ethelwald, Bernard of Hildesheim, Remachus, Maurus of Cesena, Odilon, Romuald; other "Lives" of celebrated ecclesiastics of the tenth century; and throughout all of them you will search in vain for any hint at a late change in the Eucharistic doctrine. Here are the "Chronicle of Flodoard," found in his "History of the Church of Rheims," which gives an account of the events that happened from 919 to 966; the "Chronicle of Odoran," running from 675 to 1032; the "Annals" by Hepidan of St. Gallo, embracing the period from 709 to 1044, the "Chronicle of Hildesheim," reaching from 714 to 1138; the "History of the Tenth Century," by Glabrus Rudolphus, who died towards its end; the "Chronicle" of Hermann Contractus, extending to 1054; that of Marianus Scotus, terminating at 1083; and in all of them we find complete ignorance of any change in the Eucharistic belief of the Catholic Church, although they were all written, if not at the time, certainly shortly after, the momentous change is asserted to have been made.

(1) See MURATORI, Annals of Italy, y. 900; and TIRABOSCHI, Italian Literature, vol. iii., b. 3, c. 1.

(2) See the Catalogue of Bobbio, in MURATORI'S Antiquities.

If the ancient doctrine of the Church concerning the Sacrament of the Altar had been contrary to that taught by Paschasius; if he started that transformation of belief which is said to have been consummated during the tenth century; why did not Berengarius, the sacramentarian leader of the eleventh century, seize upon this fact as an invincible argument in favor of his own denial of the Real Presence? When, from the rising to the setting of the sun, all Christendom anathematized him as an opponent of the universally received belief of God's Church, why did he not reply that down to the tenth century the Church had ignored the doctrine of the Real Presence? Not once does he assert that he derived his theory from those who had taught him in his youth; not once does he even hint at the wonderful revolution discovered by Claude, La Roque, Albertin, Mosheim, and their modern imitators. All that he attempts to adduce by way of authority is comprised in some few misinterpreted passages of St. Augustine, and a book attributed to Scotus Erigena. This significant silence would have been broken, had such a thing been possible. When, in the year 1045, Berengarius broached his heresy, there were living many whose teachers had seen the commencement of the tenth century, and who could not have been ignorant of the faith professed by Catholics at that time. Fulbert, bishop of Chartres, whose instructions Berengarius had often heard during his youth; Adelman, a companion of the future heresiarch in the school of Fulbert; Hugo of Langres and Deoduin of Liege, his friends; Gozechin of Mentz, Durand of Troars, Lanfranc of Canterbury, Guitmund of Aversa—all upbraid Berengarius as an innovator on the primitive and universally received faith of Christendom; not once do he and his answer that the tenth century saw the birth of what the Catholic polemics present as the ancient doctrine of the Church.

CHAPTER. VIII.

THE PRETENDED DEPOSITION OF POPE JOHN XII.

In the year 931, Hugh of Provence, who, a few years previously, had been proclaimed king of Italy and had been recognized as such by nearly all the northern Italians, made matrimonial overtures to Marozia, widow of Guido of Tuscany, who had usurped the sovereignty of Rome. Marozia bestowed her hand and usurped territories upon the new king, but his arrogance soon disgusted the Romans, and led by Alberic, a son of Marozia by her first marriage with Alberic of Spoleto, they attacked the mausoleum of Adrian (1) and the Provençal barely escaped with his life. Marozia was thrust into prison, and Alberic was hailed as patrician and consul by the Romans. With this dignity he assumed the sovereign rule of the city and duchy of Rome, the Exarchate and the Pentapolis having fallen into the hands of the king of Italy, Berengarius II. During the Pontificates of John XI. (a brother of Alberic), of Leo VII.,

(1) Castle of St. Angelo.

Stephen IX., Marinus II., and Agapetus II., the usurper was master of Rome. On the death of Alberic, in 956, his son Octavian, a boy of eighteen years, succeeded to his possessions, and the Papacy becoming vacant by the death of Agapetus II., he procured his own election to the chair. Fear of schism caused the Roman clergy to acquiesce, and the new Pontiff, John XII. (1), was therefore certainly legitimate. In the year 962, he conferred the crown of the Holy Roman Empire on Otho of Germany, thus reviving, after a vacancy of many years, the imperial dignity, which was destined to abide with the Germans until its final disappearance. One of the first acts of the new emperor was the restoration of the Pontifical authority in the Duchy of Rome, and the restitution of the Pentapolis and the Exarchate of Ravenna. In the midst of the festivities attending the elevation of Otho, no one seems to have spoken to the emperor of the scandals of the Roman court; but when he had begun to prosecute the siege of the fortress of St. Leo, in which Berengarius II. had shut himself, deputies came from Rome to inform Otho that the young Pontiff's life was a scandal to Christendom, and to beseech his interference. Believing the accusation to be a calumny, the emperor sent some confidential servants to the Eternal City to investigate the matter. The report proved true, and Otho remarked: "Pope John is a mere boy, and the example of good men will easily change him. I trust that a discreet admonition and some good advice will draw him from his evil ways, and then we may say with the Prophet, 'This change is from the right hand of the Most High.' We must first defeat Berengarius; then we shall paternally admonish our lord the Pope." (2). When the Pontiff found that Otho was disposed to become his rigid patron rather than an obsequious friend, he repented of having conferred upon him the imperial crown, and resolved to break his power, at least in Italy. He called to Rome the fugitive Adalbert, son of Berengarius, and openly espoused the cause of that de-throned monarch. Learning, in 963, that the Pope was influencing the princes of Benevento, Capua, and Salerno,

(1) This is the first instance of a change of name on the part of a newly elected Pope.

(2) Continuation of Liutprand, b. vi., c. 6.

to draw the sword for Berengarius, Otho left sufficient troops before St. Leo to maintain the siege, and marched on Rome with a large army. The Pontiff and Adalbert were not prepared for this sudden move, and fled from the city. The Romans opened the gates to Otho, and three days afterwards he assembled a Synod in St. Peter's, composed of many of the Roman clergy and several Italian bishops, to consider the cause of Pope John. Peter, a cardinal priest, testified that he had seen the Pontiff celebrate mass without communicating. John, a cardinal deacon, and John, bishop of Marni, swore they had seen him ordain a deacon in a stable. Many of the clergy declared that he had consecrated as bishop a boy of ten years, and that he frequently conferred the episcopacy for money. Fornication and incest were also proved against him. He was addicted to hunting. He had deprived of eyesight and put to death Benedict, his "spiritual father;" he had caused the mutilation of a cardinal deacon. He went abroad in full armor, and girt with a sword. When playing at dice, he invoked the aid of Jupiter, Venus, etc. He never said the Office. Otho quite naturally suspected that many of these accusations were false, and he conjured the prelates and clergy, by the Virgin Mother of God and the body of St. Peter, to not calumniate their Pontiff. The whole assembly arose, and unanimously protested that of all that had been alleged, "and of more wicked things," Pope John was guilty. The Pontiff was then summoned to answer the charges, but he refused to appear, and threatened the members of the court with excommunication. Two cardinals were then sent to summon him for the second time, but they returned without having been able to serve the citation. The court then declared John XII. deposed from the Pontifical throne, and in his place was chosen Leo, archivist of the Roman Church, and at that time a layman. Ordained and consecrated, he exercised the Papal functions as Leo VIII. After the installation of Leo VIII., the emperor remained a short time in Rome, and as everything seemed tranquil, he sent a large part of his army to join the besiegers of St. Leo. When Pope John heard of this dimination of the imperial forces, he dispatched agents to Rome, who soon fomented an insurrection in his favor. At the head of his troops, Otho fought for his life, and succeeded in quelling the outbreak. He then departed for St. Leo. (1). Pope John now returned to Rome and took terrible vengeance for his expulsion. But in May, 964, he died, probably assassinated, and was succeeded by Benedict V., hitherto a deacon of the Roman Church. Otho was furious at this action of the Roman clergy, whereby his intruding Leo was rejected, and the oath taken by them in 963 ignored. He immediately besieged the city, and soon reducing it, he recalled Leo. A pseudo-Synod was then held, in which Pope Benedict was declared relegated to the rank of deacon (2); after which Otho exiled him to Germany, where he soon died. Leo, however, reigned only until 965, when his death enabled the Roman clergy to elect John, bishop of Narni, who ascended the Pontifical throne as John XIII.

That the life of Pope John XII. was abominable, seems certain from the concordant testimony of the olden writers, such as the Continuator of Liutprand, Sigebert, and the Acts of the Roman Synod held in his regard. Baronio admits that he was "most impure, and rightly detested by all good men," and speaking of his death, which the Continuator ascribes to a direct intervention of Satan, the learned Oratorian says, "although he was warned by God with so many and so great vexations, he would not abstain from his wonted sins, and justly merited to be at length punished by God." (3). We must remember, however, that the Continuator, upon whom we principally rely for information, was thoroughly devoted to the emperor Otho and

(1) This fortress soon yielded, and Berengarius was sent a prisoner into Germany. The suzerain authority of Otho was soon recognized by the Lombard princes of Benevento, Capua, and Salerno, and by the year 969 he was master of Italy, save in such territories of the Duchy of Naples, the Puglia, Calabria, and Sicily, as were disputed by the Greeks and Saracens. In 963, he had exacted from the Romans an oath of fidelity and a promise to elect no Pontiff without his or his successors' consent.

(2) Gratian, in Dist. 63, chap. Synod, gives a Constitution of this pseudo-synod in which is conceded to Otho and his successors the privilege of choosing the Roman Pontiff, and that of granting the "investiture" to bishops. Baronio proves that this Constitution is supposititious, 1st, from the falsity of a singular concession here asserted as made by Adrian I. to Charlemagne (see Alexandre's Synopsis of Cent. VIII., chap. Rom. Pont.); 2d, because it is not to be supposed that Otho, already emperor, would have been created patrician and king, as this document states; 3d, because the violators of the Constitution are not only excommunicated, but consigned to eternal flames, which style of language Leo, an archivist of the Holy See, knew well to be foreign to the usage of Rome.

(3) Annals, year 963, no. 25.

to the intruder Leo. His testimony, therefore, is not above suspicion. Sigebert wrote more than a century after the death of John XII., and probably derived much of his knowledge from the Chronicle of Liutprand and its Appendix. But we do not intend to write an apology for Pope John XII.; we grant that he was one of the very few wicked men who have sat in the Chair of St. Peter. Our Lord reminded us that the leaders in Israel are not personally impeccable: "The Scribes and the Pharisees have sitten on the chair of Moses. All things therefore, whatsoever they shall say to you, observe and do; but according to their works, do ye not." Having succinctly narrated the events of his Pontificate, we merely propose to show that the deposition of Pope John XII. was null and void, and that therefore the intruder, known as Leo VIII., must be relegated to the list of Anti-Popes.

Many of the olden authors, especially the Germans, who were most favorable to Otho I., seem to regard Leo VIII. as legitimate. Among these are the Continuator of Liutprand, Sigebert, Platina, Trithemius, and Papyrius Masson. Among the eccentricities of the famous Launoy was an endeavor to uphold the legitimacy of Leo, and it is against his arguments that Alexandre principally contends in his apposite dissertation on this subject. (1). Speaking of the pseudo-Synod which pretended to depose Pope John XII., Baronio says that he "had never read of any Synod in which ecclesiastical law was more disregarded, the Canons more violated, tradition more despised, and justice more outraged." Very different from this was the impression produced by the imperial Synod on the mind of the German professor Neller (1766), whose courtier sensitiveness could perceive only the promptings and effects of religious zeal in its proceedings. However, his fellow professor in the university of Treves, Martin Bender, S. J., well refuted his arguments, as the reader may perceive by consulting Marchetti's Critical Commentary on the Ecclesiastical History of Fleury. (2). Baronio proves the nullity of the deposition of Pope John XII., 1st, from the fact that there was not a sufficient number of witnesses brought against him (1): 2d, the decree was issued after only two citations of the accused, while the Canons require three, nor were there granted any delays; 3d, the Synodals demanded of the emperor what a layman could not effect, that is, the deposition of a Pontiff and the election of another; 4th, sentence, properly speaking, was not pronounced; a short speech of the emperor pretended to settle so important a matter; 5th, an assembly of bishops convoked by an emperor, without the consent of the Roman Pontiff, is not a Synod, but a mere convention possessed of no authority. As we have seen, when treating of the cause of Pope Symmachus, the Roman Synod declared that, even in the Pope's own cause, no Synod could be held unless by his consent and convocation. "The aforesaid bishops," say the Acts, "suggested that he who is said to be accused should himself convoke the Synod, for they knew that a peculiar power over the churches had been given to his See, firstly, by the merit and principality of the Apostle Peter, and afterwards, according to the Lord's command, by the authority of the venerable Councils." But the chief argument against the legitimacy of the Othonian decree is found in the principle that a superior cannot be judged by an inferior. The bishops of the Roman Synod just quoted declared that "the bishop of the Apostolic See has never been subject to the judgment of his inferiors." And in the Apology which Eunodius wrote for this Palmaris Synod, and which the fathers stamped as possessing Synodical authority, we read: "God has wished men to decide the causes of other men, but He has reserved the rulers of that See to his own tribunal, without question. He has wished the successors of the Blessed Apostle Peter to answer for their innocence to Heaven alone."

(1) Cent. X., diss. 16.(2) Art. 2, chap. iii., no. 99.

In the letter which Avitus of Vienne, in the name of the bishops of France, sent to the Roman Senators, complaining of the Synodal action in the case of Pope Symmachus, they not knowing that the Pontiff had consented to the

(1) Alexandre thinks that Baronio is wrong in his argument (deduced from the supposititious Synod of Sinnessa, in the cause of Pope Marcellinus) that 72 witnesses were necessary. There were really, says Alexandre, no legitimate witnesses; accusers and witnesses were the same, and no single crime was attested by more than one.

holding of the Synod, we read: "While we were anxious and fearful for the cause of the Roman Church, feeling that our State tottered when its head was attacked, . . . there was brought to us a copy of a sacerdotal decree, which the bishops of Italy, assembled in the City, had issued concerning Pope Symmachus. Although the assent of a large and reverend Synod rendered this Constitution worthy of observation, we nevertheless knew that Pope Symmachus, if he had been accused in the world, ought to have received consolation from his fellow-priests, rather than judgment we cannot easily understand with what reason or law a superior is judged by his inferiors the same venerable Synod reserved for Divine examination the cause which, saving the reverence due to it, it had rashly undertaken Which being shown, as myself a Roman senator and a Christian bishop, I solemnly call upon you that you do not less respect the See of Peter in your Church, than you do the height of power in the City. . . . If anything weakens in other priests, it may be strengthened, but if the Pope of Rome is called into question, not merely a bishop, but the episcopate, seems to totter. . . . He who governs the fold of the Lord will give an account of his care of the lambs entrusted to him; again, it is the province of the Judge, not of the flock, to correct the shepherd."

It was in accordance with the principle that a superior should not be judged by an inferior, that St. Cyril, patriarch of Alexandria, complained, in the Fourth Action of the Ephesine Council, of the decree of deposition issued against him by John, the inferior patriarch of Antioch; and the fathers did him justice. And because of the same principle, not on account of faith, said Anatolius of Constantinople, Dioscorus, who had pretended to excommunicate Pope St. Leo, was condemned by the fathers of Chalcedon. Since, therefore, this principle was ever held holy by the Church, a sentence of deposition pronounced against a Roman Pontiff by a handful of prelates at the bidding of a lay autocrat must be regarded as null and void. When Pope Leo III. willingly appeared before a Roman Synod, in the presence of Charlemagne, to answer certain accusations, the bishops exclaimed: "We dare not judge the See of the Apostles, which is the head of all the Churches of God. By her and by her Vicar we are all judged; she is judged by no one—such is the ancient custom. As the Roman Pontiff discerns, we canonically obey." (1). Launey contends that the Roman Synod held by Pope John XII. after his restoration, and in which the Anti-Pope Leo was condemned, is supposititious; but he adduces only the negative argument, that the Continuator of Lintprand, Flodoard, Sigebert (in the Gemblours codex), Martin the Pole, Trithemius, Platina, and a few others, do not speak of it. But the ancient Vatican codex used by Baronio in editing the Acts of this Synod is beyond suspicion, as is evinced by the fact that the Centuriators of Magdeburg do not question its antiquity. Launoy also argues for the legitimacy of Leo from the fact that the St. Leo who reigned from 1049 to 1054 is styled in the Roman Martyrology Pope Leo IX., whereas, if the Leo substituted for John XII. was an Anti-Pope, the saint of the eleventh century should be called Pope Leo VIII. Launoy has reason on his side, inasmuch as the St. Leo in question was, strictly speaking, Leo VIII. But although this error has crept into the Martyrology, and the usage of centuries has sanctioned the enumeration of the Pontiffs now in vogue, the consequence which Launoy would fain derive from the custom is not a necessary one. Pope Felix (526-530), the ancestor of St. Gregory the Great, is generally styled Felix IV., as the Felix who mounted the throne in 483 is called Felix III., although it is certain that the Felix denominated Second, who was illegally substituted for Liberius (355), should be expunged from the catalogue of Pontiffs. Again, if the archivist Leo was not an Anti-Pope, then Benedict V., whom the Roman clergy elected on the death of John XII., certainly was one, for Leo was yet living and claiming the Chair of Peter when Benedict was chosen. It would follow then that the nomenclature of all the Popes named Benedict, since that time, is incorrect. Since then, both in the hypothesis of Launoy and in our own, an error in the Martyrology is manifest, it cannot be adduced as a proof that its compilers regarded as legitimate the chosen of the Othonian Synod.

(1) ANASTASIUS, Life of Leo III.

Matthew Flaccius, when endeavoring to prove that the Holy Roman empire was transferred from the Franks to the Germans, without the authority of the Holy See, asserts that Otho deposed Pope John XII., and that he did so in the exercise of his imperial prerogative, which was the chastigation of unworthy Pontiffs. The following are his words: "As for the letter of the cardinals to Otho, it was nothing else than an accusation against John XII., a most impure man, and a petition that, having deposed him, the emperor would substitute another and better bishop or Pope in his place; which, indeed, Otho I. energetically effected, for then, as in all antiquity, the Cæsars possessed the authority to chastise impure Popes. The history of this fact is fully given by Liutprand, a writer most worthy of confidence." It is absolutely false that Otho deposed Pope John XII., and that of old it was regarded as part of the imperial duty to punish wicked Pontiffs. The Pagan emperors, indeed, put many of the Pontiffs to death; heretical and schismatic emperors, Christian only by baptism, often imprisoned, exiled, and tortured the successors of St. Peter, on account of their apostolic firmness, but the truly Catholic sovereigns always treated the Popes with veneration and submission. While innumerable testimonies can be produced to show that the first duty of the emperor was to defend the Holy See, that, indeed, such was the prime reason of his dignity, and its only reason of being, neither Flaccius nor any one of his modern imitators have produced one proof that, in the constitution of the Holy Roman empire, the emperor possessed the right to judge the Roman Pontiff, either as Pope, as king, or as man. Flaccius praises Liutprand as a reliable historian, and refers us to his chronicle in proof of many insolent assertions. But this author (1), and what is more, Flaccius himself (2), testify

(1) B. vi., c. 6 and 7.

(2) Centuriators of Magdeburg; cent. 10, c. 9.

that, guilty as Pope John seemed to be, Otho did not himself enter upon a judgment or even a trial, but called an episcopal convention at Rome, and to it submitted the cause of the Pontiff. Otho declared, says Lintprand, "let the Synod declare its judgment in this matter," and in the epistle of Otho to the Pope, given by the same historian, the emperor does not command, but respectfully entreats him to come to the Synod: "To the lord John, supreme Pontiff and universal Pope, Otho, by the divine clemency, August Emperor, together with the archbishops of Liguria, Tuscany, Saxony, and France, send greeting in the Lord. Coming to Rome for the service of God, when we questioned your sons, the Roman cardinals, bishops, priests, and deacons, and the whole people, as to your absence, and why you wished not to see us, the Defender of your Church and of yourself, they alleged against you such obscenities, as would be shameful, even if charged to play actors. And lest these accusations should be unknown to your Greatness, we will briefly describe some of them Therefore we earnestly entreat your Paternity to come, and not to hesitate in proving your innocence of these charges."

CHAPTER IX.

THE GREEK SCHISM : ITS REVIVAL BY MICHAEL CERULARIUS, AND ITS PRESENT CONDITION.

From the second deposition of Photius by the emperor Leo the Philosopher (y. 889), down to the reign of Constantine Monomachus—that is, for nearly a century and a half—the union of the Greeks with the centre of unity remained unbroken. Once, indeed, (y. 998), it had been endangered, when the patriarch Sergius, of the same family as Photius, assembled a Synod, and, having renewed all the calumnies of that schismatic against the Holy See, endeavored in vain to induce the other patriarchs to revolt (1); and the successor of Sergius, though he persistently tried to obtain from Pope John XIX. the title of Œcumenical (1), did not revenge his disappointment by rebellion. Under seventeen successive patriarchs, after the extinction of the Photian schism (2), the Greeks continued to recognize the supremacy of the Roman See, until the patriarchate of Michael Cerularius, in the year 1053. At this period, the Byzantine throne was occupied by Constantine Monomachus, whom the empress Zoe, a worthy compeer of the many murderous and adulterous sovereigns who, for centuries, defiled the throne of the great Constantine, had married in 1043. During the reign of Michael of Paphlagonia, Zoe's second husband, the relations of Monomachus with the imperial adulteress had caused his exile to Lesbos, but after Michael's death the sexagenarian princess recalled her paramour, and placed him on the throne. The reign of Monomachus was rendered infamous by his shameless debauchery, and under his supine administration the empire lost Illyria to the Servians, the Puglia and Calabria to the Normans, while nearly all its Asiatic possessions were ravaged by the Turkish conquerors of Persia. Among the favorites of the imperial debauchee was Michael Cerularius, an ambitious nobleman, who, having conspired against the Paphlagonian, had been confined in a monastery, where, although he took the monastic habit, in order to avoid further punishment, he remained a layman, that he might be in position to profit by future contingencies. The similarity of their fortunes drew Cerularius and Monomachus together, and when, eight months after the coronation of the latter, the Constantinopolitan patriarchate became vacant, it was given to the former.

(1) Maimbourg asserts that Sergius erased the name of the Roman Pontiff from the diploms (Schism of the Greeks, b. III.), but Peter of Antioch writes to Michael Cerularius (in ALLATIUS, Consent, b. 2, c. 1.) that the accusation is false, and that he does not know who effected the erasure. The patriarch Veccus, Orat. II., confirms the declaration of the Antiochian patriarch.

For ten years Cerularius gave no sign of hostility to the Holy See; but in 1053, having gained great influence over Leo, metropolitan of Acridia, and Nicetas (Pectoratus), a monk of the great monastery of Studius, and one of the most learned men in the empire, he made his first movement toward a revival of the schism of Photius. He caused

(1) Eustathius begged that, as the Roman Pontiff was Œcumenical for the whole world, so the Constantinopolitan patriarch might be styled the same for the East.

(2) Manual Calceas: Against the Greeks, b. iv.

Nicetas to write a pamphlet against many of the customs of the Latins, and especially against the use of unleavened bread in the Holy Sacrifice—a usage, we may remark, which even the virulent Photius had not thought of condemning. This document was circulated throughout the Greek empire, and as some of the dioceses of the Puglia were still in the Byzantine obedience, a copy was sent to John, bishop of Trani, with an order from Cerularius to publish it throughout the West. The bishop of Trani handed the diatribe to cardinal Humbert, who was then visiting Trani, and his Eminence translated it into Latin and laid it before Pope Leo IX., then a prisoner to the Normans in Benevento. The following are the terrible accusations against the Roman, and therefore against all the Latin churches, which the profundity and sincerity of Cerularius put forth as a justification of revolt against the See of Peter.

- I. By the use of unleavened bread for the Sacrifice of the Mass, the Latins communicate with the Jews, and, furthermore, adopt an invalid matter for said Sacrifice.
- II. The Latins eat the flesh of suffocated animals.
- III. They shave their faces.
- IV. They fast on Saturday.
- V. They eat the flesh of unclean animals.
- VI. They allow their monks to eat meat.
- VII. They violate the Lenten fast, by permitting the use of flesh on Quinquagesima and in the first week of Lent.
- VIII. They have added the clause “And from the Son” to the Creed, and they err in the doctrine as to the Holy Ghost.
- IX. They loudly proclaim, in their liturgy: “Our Holy Lord Jesus Christ, in the glory of God the Father, through the Holy Ghost.”
- X. They allow two brothers to marry two sisters.
- XI. At the time of Communion, the officiating and other clergy give each other the kiss of peace.
- XII. Their bishops wear rings, as though espoused to their churches.
- XIII. Their bishops go to war, and soil their hands with human blood.
- XIV. They immerse the subject, in Baptism, one only time.
- XV. They put salt into the mouth of the candidate for Baptism.
- XVI. They do not venerate the relics or the images of the saints.
- XVII. They do not sing the Alleluia during Lent.

Pope St. Leo IX. read this curious mixture of puerilities, absurdities, and lies, a few days after he had received from Peter, the newly-elected patriarch of Antioch, a most submissive letter, begging for the confirmation of that prelate's new dignity. The holy Pontiff immediately wrote to the Constantinopolitan patriarch a lengthy and admirable reply, in which he strenuously insisted upon the God-given prerogatives of the See of Rome, and pointed out to the arrogant Cerularius the unreasonableness of some, and the absurdity of others, of his allegations against that See: he also showed how a diversity of customs may subsist, and yet the unity and essence of faith and of doctrine be not affected; drawing his attention also to the fact that, even in Rome, the Greeks were allowed—nay, even commanded—to observe their own peculiar rites and usages, since only a difference in faith, or a disobedience to the head of the Church, can rupture communion. When Cerularius had read this letter, he did not act as might have been expected, from the tone of his celebrated diatribe; perhaps he had been ordered to temporize by Monomachus, who was begging the aid of the Pontiff against the Normans; perhaps he had found too much opposition among the Greeks to his schismatic designs. Whatever may have been his reason, he addressed a conciliatory letter to the Pontiff, and St. Leo IX., anxious for the unity of the Church, sent as legates to Constantinople the cardinal Humbert, the cardinal-chancellor, Frederick, and the archbishop of Amalfi. These prelates were magnificently received by the Greek emperor, and during the following conferences, which lasted several days, the cardinal Humbert refuted the charges made by Cerularius. The monk Nicetas was convinced by the arguments of the cardinal, and having made a solemn retraction of the sentiments contained in his diatribe, was received into communion by the legates. The patriarch, however, now refused to submit, and after many efforts to overcome his obstinacy, the legates proceeded to the great basilica of St. Sophia, (Aug. 16, 1054), and there, before an immense congregation, they declared Cerularius and his followers excommunicated, and having laid the sentence upon the high altar. they shook the dust from their shoes, and left the church, crying, "Be God our Judge!" Charged with valuable presents from Monomachus for the churches of St. Peter and of St. Benedict at Montecassino, they then departed from Constantinople. Cerularius now spread a report that the excommunication applied to the entire Greek nation, and when the mob had become sufficiently excited to warrant his supposing that the legates would be killed if an opportunity were afforded, he signified to the emperor that he was now willing to confer with them, if they would return to the city. Monomachus, however, suspected the design of the patriarch, and hurried the legates on their journey; indeed, fond of Cerularius as he had shown himself, and though he was too apt to yield to him on all occasions, this emperor did not directly abet the schism. But in a few months after the departure of the legates. Monomachus died, leaving the crown to Theodora, sister of the empress Zoe (who had died a short time before), and Cerularius became all-powerful; the efforts of the schismatics were also aided by a year's vacancy of the Holy See. The patriarchs of Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem did not at once join the party of Cerularius; indeed, Peter of Antioch ridiculed most of the charges made against the Westerns by the Constantinopolitan; but he could not endure the one immersion at Baptism, and the addition of "And from the Son" to the Creed; hence, in time, he joined the other patriarchs in anathematizing the Latins, and in erasing the name of the Pontiff from the diptychs. The schism thus inaugurated has endured, saving short periods of nominal and interested union, until our own day. (1).

In many minds the Russian, or, as it styles itself, the "orthodox" Church, is synonymous with the schismatic Greek Church; but it is not schismatic Greek in origin, nor is it Greek in language, polity, or government. The schismatic Greek Church is composed of those Christians who recognize the spiritual jurisdiction of the Greek patriarch of Constantinople, and is confined to the territories once embraced in the Byzantine (now known as the Ottoman) empire (1) with its vassal (now only quasi vassal) states—Egypt, Nubia, etc. The Russian Church communicates with the schismatic Greek, and, in spite of its own liturgy, which stoutly asserts the primacy of the Roman See, (2) agrees with the schismatic Greeks in rejecting the authority of the Roman Pontiff; but it is, in every respect, a national church. (3)

(1) The remainder of this chapter appeared as an article in the Ave Maria, vol. xxiv., nos. 23 and 24.

The language of the Russian Church is not the Greek, but the Slavonic; and not the vernacular, but the Old Slavonic, with which the people are not familiar. Protestants are much mistaken when, reading that the Greeks, Syrians, Copts, etc., celebrate their services in Greek, Syrian, Coptic, etc., they imagine they discover an example for their own use of the vernacular. The languages used in the rituals of these peoples are very different from those in daily use. (4). Nor do the Russians owe their conversion to the Greek schismatic church. This conversion was effected by the Roman Catholic Apostolic Church; for whether, as we learn from Constantine Porphyrogenitus, the first missionaries to Russia were sent by the Catholic Patriarch Ignatius (867), or, as Nestor asserts, they were sent by the schismatic Photius (866), it is certain that no real impression was made upon the Russian masses until toward the end of the tenth century, (5) when the Grand Duke Vladimir, called "the Apostolic," embraced Christianity; and at the

(1) In 1833 the hierarchy of the new kingdom of Greece declared its independence of the patriarch, and in 1858 that prelate recognized its autonomy.

(2) The Russian liturgical books, written in Old Slavonic, are full of such testimonies. Thus, Pope St. Sylvester is called "the divine head of the holy bishops." Pope St. Leo I. is styled "the successor of St. Peter on the highest throne, the heir of the impregnable rock." To Pope St. Martin is said: "Thou didst adorn the divine throne of Peter, and, holding the church upright on this rock, which cannot be shaken, thou didst honor thy name." Pope St. Leo III. is thus addressed: "Chief Pastor of the Church, all the place of Jesus Christ." St. Peter is called the sovereign pastor of all the Apostles—"pastyr vshchynny tsich Apostolov."

(3) It recognizes no earthly authority over itself but that of the "Holy Synod," a body entirely dependent on the Czar. Originally, the metropolitan of Russia was nominated by the sovereign, and consecrated by the Constantinopolitan patriarch; but after the schism the czars began to act more and more, as heads of the church. In 1589 the patriarch Jeremiah II. recognized Job, metropolitan of Moscow, as patriarch of Russia, and as next in rank to him of Alexandria. In the reign of Alexis Michaelovitch, father of Peter the Great, Nikon of Moscow rejected the authority of Constantinople; and in 1667, Nikon having offended Alexis, he was deposed, and the power of his successors became nominal. Peter the Great finally, in 1721, placed the government of the Russian church in a "Holy Synod," every member of which swears obedience to the Czar as "supreme judge in this spiritual assembly."

(4) ASSEMANI: "Oriental Library," vol. iv., c. 7, § 22.

(5) About the year 945 Olga, Olga, or Elga, widow of a grand duke (or king) of Russia, made a journey to Constantinople, and was there baptized. Returning to Russia, she vainly endeavored to convert her countrymen. But her grandson, Vladimir, having married Anna, sister of the Greek Emperor Basil II., was baptized in 988, and in a few years nearly all the Russians received the Faith. Those authors who assign the conversion of Russia to the ninth century, remarks Bergier, confuse the reign of Basil II. with that of Basil the Macedonian.

time the Greeks were in communion with Rome. The revival of the schism, by Michael Cerularius, did not much affect the Russians. Not until the twelfth century were they entirely seduced from the Roman obedience. Then, with the exception of the Church of Galicia, (1) most of the Russians ceased to be Catholics. However, at the time of the Council of Florence (1439) there were as many Catholics as schismatics in Russia. (Bollandists: "September," v. 41.) About the middle of the fifteenth century, a second Photius, archbishop of Kiev, extended the schism throughout the land. (2)

The following remarks of the Russian Jesuit, Ivan Gagarin, than whom the reader will find no better authority on matters concerning the Russian Church, are worthy of attention: "It was only in a very indirect manner that the Russian Church was drawn into schism. The metropolitans of Kiev depended, in the hierarchical order, upon Constantinople. When the rupture between Rome and Byzantium took place, Kiev found itself separated from the centre of unity; but for a long time the Russians did not share the passions of the Greeks, and it may be said that, for a long period, merely a material schism subsisted between Rome and the Russian Church. But the clergy of Constantinople endeavored to imbue the Russians with their own prejudices and with their hatred of the Latins. They succeeded, and when the princes of Moscow manifested a design of attacking the independence of the Russian church, this body could rely on itself alone.

"As yet no one has written the sad and touching history of the struggle which this church, isolated from the West

1) Galicia, or Red Russia, returned to the fold of unity under Pope Honorius III. (1216-27.) The two millions of Ruthenians, as they are called, use the Slavonic liturgy, and their secular clergy may marry before receiving Holy Orders.

(2) Some authors opine that the schism of Cerularius did not affect the entire Greek empire in the 11th century. Certainly, Pope Alexander II. sent Peter, bishop of Anagni, as Apoctisarius (agent, not legate) to the emperor Michael Ducas in 1071, and he continued as such for a whole year. When, in 1078, St. Gregory VII. excommunicated Nicephorus Botaniates, it was only because that prince dethroned Ducas, who was in communion with the Holy See. Pope Paschal II. sent Chrysolanus (or, as some write the name, Grosolanus, or Proculanus) as legate to Alexis Comnenus. Alexandre and Mansi hold that there was communion between the West and East for some time after the excommunication of Cerularius and his pretended retaliation of the same. It is noteworthy that Euthymus Zygabenus, who, by order of Alexis Comnenus, collected the sayings of the Fathers against each and every heresy, makes no mention of the Latins as heretics. Even in the twelfth century there were many Greeks in communion with Rome, as we learn from the many narratives of the crusades, from the Alexias of Anna Comnena, from the Life of Manuel by Nicetas Choniates, and from the letters (b. iv., nos. 39, 4) of the Venerable Peter of Cluny to the emperor John Comnenus and to the patriarch of Constantinople.

and betrayed by the East, sustained against the growing ambition of the granddukes and czars of Moscow. And, nevertheless, that history has some beautiful pages. If the Russian Church succumbed, it was not without combat or without glory. Ivan III., if not from conviction, at least ostensibly, belonged to a sect which designed to substitute Judaism for Christianity. The metropolitan of Moscow had been seduced, but the Russian Church preserved sufficient strength and independence to condemn the impure doctrines. When Ivan IV., who much resembled Henry VIII. of England, shed the blood of his subjects in torrents, and trampled on ecclesiastical authority to gratify his passions, Philip, metropolitan of Moscow, spoke to him with apostolic liberty, and sealed his remonstrances with his blood. But the church continued to lose ground, and when Boris Godounov transformed the metropolitan of Moscow into a patriarch (1588), that elevation was, in his mind, for the purpose of furnishing the czar with a willing tool." (1)

Although the "orthodox" Russians and schismatic Greeks, like the Nestorians and Jacobites, are witnesses to the antiquity of many dogmas which Protestants regard as modern human innovations, Protestant polemics ever show much sympathy for the aversion cherished by these schismatics toward the Holy See. The children of the Reformation have often endeavored to enter into communion with these separatists, but their efforts resulted, each time, only in a formal condemnation of Protestant tenets by the progeny of Photius and Cerularius. Two of these attempts at union between the Eastern and Western opponents of Rome merit attention.

In 1574 Stephen Gerlach, a Lutheran, and preacher to the imperial embassy at Constantinople, was urged by many of his co-religionists to obtain from Jeremiah II., patriarch of Constantinople, an endorsement of the "Confession of Augsburg" as consonant with the faith of the schismatics. But Jeremiah combated the "Confession" as heretical, with tongue and pen. In 1672 Dositheus, schismatic patriarch of Jerusalem, convoked a Synod to consider the doctrines of Calvin, and the Synodals said of the Lutheran overtures to Jeremiah : “ Martin Crugius, and others well versed in the new doctrines of Luther, sent the articles of their ‘ Confession ’ to him who then sat on the throne of the Catholic Constantinopolitan Church, that they might learn whether they agreed in doctrine with the Oriental churches. But that great patriarch wrote to them—yea, against them—three learned discourses, or replies, wherein he theologically and Catholicly refuted their entire heresy, and taught them the orthodox doctrines which the Oriental Church received from the beginning. However, they paid no attention ; for they had bidden farewell to all piety. The patriarch’s book was issued, in Greek and Latin, at Wittemberg in Germany, in the year of salvation 1584 ; but before the time of Jeremiah, the entire doctrine of the Oriental Church had been more fully set forth by the priest John Nathaniel, procurator of Constantinople, in his ‘ Treatise on the Sacred Liturgy ’ ; and after the said Jeremiah, this was also done by Gabriel Severus Moreanus, archbishop of our brethren of Crete, in his book on ‘ The Seven Sacraments of the Catholic Church. ’ ” (1)

(1) Will Russia become Catholic? Paris, 1856.

Another and more celebrated attempt to unite the Western innovators and the Eastern schismatics was made in the seventeenth century. Cyril Lucar, a Candiot, was sent to the University of Padua when a youth, where he studied under the famous Margunius, bishop of Cythera. After his graduation he traveled in Germany, and became infected with the new doctrines. Nevertheless, on his return to the Greeks he received the priesthood, and in time became patriarch of Alexandria. In 1621, having bribed the Grand Vizier with money furnished by the Calvinists of Holland, he was appointed patriarch of Constantinople. He began immediately to teach Calvinism ; the clergy revolted ; Cyril was exiled to Rhodes, and Anthimius of Alexandria was placed on the patriarchal throne. However, the intrigues of the English ambassador caused the Porte to recall Cyril, and he soon published a Confession of Faith of the most

(1) We have followed the Latin version of this Synod of Jerusalem (or of Bethlehem) made by an anonymous Benedictine of St. Maur, and first published at Paris, in 1676.

Calvinistic type. In 1636 the indignation of the Greeks compelled the Porte to again banish the innovator, but after three months he was once more recalled—only to be bow-stringed, by order of the Porte, in 1638. Lucar's Confession appeared in Holland in 1645, and was gladly welcomed by Protestants as a harbinger of their recognition by the historically venerable churches of the East; but the consequent publication of the justly celebrated Perpetuity of the Faith of the Catholic Church concerning the Eucharist demonstrated the fallaciousness of their hopes (1). They soon found that the Greeks admitted their agreement with Rome concerning most of the Catholic dogmas. Indeed, as soon as Lucar's Confession appeared in Constantinople, the author was synodically deposed, and Cyril of Berea was made patriarch. This prelate convoked a Synod in 1638, and a condemnation of Lucar was signed by the three schismatic patriarchs of Constantinople, Alexandria, and Jerusalem, and by twenty-three bishops. Soon after, bribery and intrigue procured the patriarchal chair for Parthenius of Adrianople, who in 1642 held another Synod, which again reprobated Lucar's teachings. In 1672 Dositheus of Jerusalem celebrated the Synod already mentioned, which confirmed the decisions of the other assemblies.

In the Acts of this assembly we read that the Greek schismatics accused the Calvinists (whom they styled "liars, innovators, heretics, mendacious architects, apostates, who, like all heretics, are artificial explainers of Scripture and of the Fathers,") of calumniating the Orientals by the assertion that the said Orientals held Calvinistic doctrine. And this assertion was made, say the bishops, in spite of so many declarations of Greek patriarchs; in spite of the publication of the "orthodox" belief; in spite of the lucid

(1) In the five quarto volumes of which this work consists, are collected testimonies of all the Greek ecclesiastical authors who wrote after the schism of Photius; the professions of faith of many patriarchs and bishops; declarations of many Synods; the liturgies, etc., of the East. It is proved that in all ages, just as to-day, the Orientals admitted seven sacraments, and held that these produce grace; that, as now, they believed in transubstantiation; that, as now, they prayed to the saints, prayed for the dead. It is also shown that Lucar manifested, not the sentiments of his co-religionists, but his own opinions—a fact proved by himself when he proposed his doctrine as one he would like to introduce among the Greeks. In the last two volumes of the Perpetuity, the doctrine of the Catholic and schismatic Greek Churches is compared with that of the Nestorians, who were separated from Rome in the fifth century, and with that of the Eutychians, or Jacobites, who became schismatics in the sixth. Then follows an exposition of the belief and of the discipline of the Ethiopians, Egyptian Copts, Maronites, and of the Nestorians scattered throughout Persia and India.

treatises of many Greek doctors. Then follow eighteen chapters, in which the synodals declare that man's free-will was not destroyed by the fall of Adam; that faith alone will not justify; that there are seven Sacraments; that Baptism cleanses from original sin; that in the Eucharist the substance of the bread and wine is really changed into the substance of the Body and Blood of Christ; that the saints are to be invoked as friends of God; that their images are to be venerated; that we must receive all traditions given us by the Church, which, being taught by the Holy Ghost, cannot err.

Disappointed in their hopes of union with some ecclesiastical body of comparative antiquity, the Calvinists accounted for the adverse action of the schismatic Synods by the supposition of Latin bribery. Thus, in 1722, appeared the book of Cowell, an Englishman, who tried to prove that fraud was behind the apparent agreement of the Roman and schismatic doctrines. Mosheim affects to discover, in the history of the Lucar affair, that Catholic polemics do not scruple at dishonesty when disputing with heretics. Now it is false that the Greek bishops who condemn the Western "reformers" were partial to the Latins. Cyril of Berea, like many other schismatic prelates and priests of his time, may have died, as Mosheim asserts, in the Roman communion, but the dominant spirits of the Synods in question would have rivalled a Scotch covenanter in hatred of Rome. Nectarius, an ex-patriarch of Jerusalem, composed an energetic diatribe Against the Primacy of the Pope; Dositheus, the president of the Synod of Jerusalem, published, in 1683, many works of Simeon of Thessalonica, in which this writer severely upbraids the Latins. Again, if these Greek adversaries of the "Reformation" were actuated by a desire of pleasing Rome, why did they, in these very Synods, so strenuously assert their peculiar dogma concerning the Procession of the Holy Ghost? Finally, how is it that the Greeks, so bitter against the Holy See, so tenacious of their own distinctive doctrines, did not depose Dositheus, Nectarius, Parthenius, etc.?

From the day of her separation from Rome, the Greek

Church, once so active, has been in a state of lethargy, displaying none of that fecundity which Christ promised to His own spouse. "The prodigious ignorance and stupid superstition," says Feller, "in which the priests and people of this isolated church are involved, necessarily entail the great abuses and enormous disorders with which they are reproached. For centuries the Greeks can show no celebrated doctor, no council worthy of attention. Their latest sages—Bessarion, Allatius, Arcudius, etc.,—all belonged to the Church of Rome."

Again we call the reader's attention to some reflections by Gagarin:—

"Byzantism pretended to have for its object the exaltation and triumph of the Greek Church, empire, and nationality. It sacrificed the unity and independence of the Church to that object, and what has been the result of the conflict which it provoked? The ruin of the Greek Church, and consequently of the Greek empire and nationality. But God did not wish that this ancient and glorious church should perish. He raised up a new people, who seem to have the mission of re-establishing her in her pristine splendor. That people is the Slavic, and three-fourths of them belong to the Oriental rite, with this difference, that their liturgical language is the (Old) Slavonic. One can not avoid being struck by the contrast between the Slavonic and Greek branches of the Oriental rite. The former possesses numbers, force, vigor, while the latter exhibits only feebleness and decrepitude. Laying aside every other argument, the figures will make this difference palpable. It is estimated that all the Oriental Christians—Slavs, Greeks, Moldo-Wallachians or Roumanians, Georgians, etc.,—number about seventy million souls, of whom nearly sixty millions are Slavs. If from the ten or twelve remaining millions we deduct those who are not Greeks, we see to how small a number the Greeks are reduced. (1). Now the Slavs of the Oriental rite are nearly all subjects of the Russian Empire."

(1) By the term "Greek," Gagarin does not here indicate merely the subjects of the modern kingdom, but all of the old Byzantine nationality.

And now a few words as to the probability of a submission of the Russian "orthodox" church to the Roman jurisdiction. The czar may devoutly wish for union with Rome. If he is a statesman, he must realize that the activity and zeal of a Papal clergy would be a great check to the growth of Nihilism. The more learned and more pious of the "orthodox" clergy—too few, alas! in number—may yearn for unity. But there is one obstacle, which, apparently, neither the once powerful inclinations of a czar nor the fast-decreasing influence of a corrupt clergy can overcome. When England shall have learned the wisdom of doing justice to Ireland, there may be hope that Russia will commence to doubt the wisdom of her policy toward her Ireland—unfortunate, noble, and exhausted Poland. But as yet, to the average Russian mind, Poland is a subject only for the iron heel; and Catholicism, to this mind, means Latinism,—i. e., Polonism. The Russian "patriot," therefore, regards any progress of Catholicism in "Holy Russia" as a progress of Polish nationality.

Again, the Russian clergy have always systematically inculcated the idea that a reunion with Rome means the abolition of several institutions dear to the Russian heart—viz., Communion under both species, the use of fermented bread in the Sacrifice of the Mass, the Old Slavonic liturgy, and the marriage of the secular clergy. And here we must note that nothing can be more false than the idea entertained by most of the Eastern schismatics, that, whenever there has been a question of reunion with Rome, the Holy See has designed to force them to adopt the Latin rite and discipline. In refutation of this idea, Pope Benedict XIV., in his Bull Allate sunt, quotes the words of Pope Innocent IV., who cited two Constitutions of Popes Leo X. and Clement VII., in which these Pontiffs vehemently reprov'd those Latins who blamed the Greeks for their observance of certain customs approved by the Council of Florence.

The same Benedict XIV., speaking of those who were laboring for reunion, resumes their obligations as follows: They should disabuse the schismatics of those errors which their ancestors introduced. in order that they might have a pretext for withdrawing from the obedience of the Sovereign Pontiff. In every endeavor to convert said schismatics, the greatest stress should be laid upon the writings of the early Fathers of the Greek Church, who are in perfect accord with the Latin Fathers. The Apostolic See has always insisted that the Eastern Schismatics must not be urged to follow the Latin rite. And in our own day Pope Pius IX., in an Encyclical addressed to the Orientals, under date of Jan. 6, 1848, uttered the same sentiments. Nevertheless, the idea is firmly fixed in Russian heterodox minds that union with Rome means the loss of their loved rite. This fact, added to the present sentiments of these minds regarding the burning question of Poland, would seem to indicate that there is little probability of a speedy submission of the Russian Church to the Holy See. (1)

CHAPTER IX.

ST. LEO IX. AND PIUS IX.—CIVITELLA AND CASTELFIDARDO.

In the year 1048, while the emperor, Henry III., was residing at Frisingen, deputies came to him from Rome, informing him of the death of Pope Damasus II., and asking

(1) In reply to the assertion that, in spite of the declarations of many Roman Pontiffs, the Catholic missionaries have always tried to bring their converts of the Oriental rite into the Latin rite, Gagarin, loc. cit., says: "It is true that in the Ottoman Empire all the Catholic Greeks, excepting the Melchites of Syria, have passed over to the Latin rite. It is also true that in Poland the Latin rite has been adopted by many Catholic families who once belonged to the Greek rite. But we insist that these facts prove nothing against us, and that they are sufficiently explained by causes completely foreign to the actions of the Holy See and of its missionaries. In Turkey, until the hatti-houmayoun of Feb. 18, 1856, all the Christians of the Greek rite were placed under the (civil) authority of the patriarch of Constantinople; and when one of them renounced that prelate's communion to enter that of the Pope, it is evident that he was exposed to vexation by that personage, who, though no longer his spiritual, was still his temporal ruler. He had only one way of escaping persecution, and that was a withdrawal from the patriarch's civil jurisdiction when he left the schismatic communion. To effect this withdrawal, he had to join the Latin rite. These few words ought to explain how, in Greece and the Archipelago, all the Catholic Greeks have been led to abandon the Greek rite. The concession made by the Sultan Abdull Mijid, on Feb. 18, 1856, deprived the patriarch of his civil authority over the co-nationals; but it has not yet been shown that the Greeks who were desirous of joining the Roman communion, and who still preferred to cling to their old rite, could do so with impunity. Let us judge, then, whether they could have done so a century or two ago. In Poland the circumstances were different, but the United Russians passed to the Latin rite because of similar influences. In the Republic of Poland there were two rites, two languages, and two nationalities. The superiority was with the Poles; and when the convert adopted the Latin rite, he assumed Polish nationality and entered the ranks of the dominant people. Does not this state of things explain the facts opposed to us?"

N. B.—As a sequel to this disquisition, we would direct the attention of the student to our essay entitled, "Heterodoxies of Modern Russian Orthodoxy," in the Supplement at end of our Vol. VI.

him to give the Church a new Pontiff (1). Henry did not hesitate to arrogate this office to himself, but nevertheless he convoked the bishops and other grandees of the empire to consult concerning an election. The assembly was held at Worms, and its unanimous choice was Bruno, bishop of Toul, a cousin of the emperor Conrad, and an Alsatian. Undoubtedly Henry would have named a German, had he not feared to irritate the Romans.

The writers of the time differ as to the conduct of Bruno when he was notified of his nomination. According to Otho of Frisingen (2), Bruno proceeded to Cluny, clothed in the Pontifical purple, and the prior Hildebrand —afterwards Gregory VII.—“immediately rebuked him, saying that it was illicit for any one to receive the Pontificate from lay hands.” And Platina says that Bruno afterwards reproached himself “because he had obeyed the emperor rather than God.” But Wibert, who was Bruno’s arch-deacon at Toul, tells us that his lord declared to the assembly at Worms: “I shall proceed to Rome, and if the Roman clergy and people freely choose me as Pontiff, I will comply with your wish;” and the same is attested by St. Bruno, bishop of Segni, author of another Life of St. Leo IX. (3). At any rate, Bruno, accompanied by Hildebrand, whom the future Pontiff had providentially withdrawn from the solitude of Cluny, presented himself to the Romans in plain attire and barefooted, saying, “The choice of the clergy and people, as well as the authority of the Canons, is superior to any other nomination; if you do not elect me, I am ready to return to my own country.” Then, observes Otho of Frisingen, “by the advice of Hildebrand, all ancient usages were followed; Bruno was elected Pope, and was enthroned Feb. 12, 1049. In his first Synod the new Pontiff made Hildebrand cardinal deacon.

The attention of the new Pope was soon drawn to the miserable state of affairs in Southern Italy, where an enemy, scarcely less barbarous and ferocious than the Moham-medan hordes who were infesting the Greek Empire, had introduced a reign of rapine, sacrilege, and murder. The first establishments of the Normans in Italy had been very feeble, but by degrees they had extended their domination over Italian barons, Greek lieutenants, and Saracen intruders. At the time of which we write, Robert Guiscard had proclaimed himself duke of the Puglia and of Calabria; and, having turned his terrible arms against the Campagna—attracted more by lust of wealth than by desire of conquest,—he had spread devastation over a hitherto fertile and opulent province, and had usurped the Papal duchy of Benevento.

(1) LAMBERT OF ASCHAFFENBURG; year 1019.

(2) B. vi., c. 33.

(3) See also LEO OF OSTIA, B. II., no. 81.

Moved with pity for the oppressed populations, who, to avoid the flames which destroyed their less fortified towns, had sought refuge in the mountain fastnesses, and fearful also lest Rome itself should fall a prey to a modern Alaric, Pope Leo remembered that he was a king as well as a Pontiff, and that his sceptre was meant to protect as well as to rule his people. He called upon his own subjects and the other Italians for volunteers. The inhabitants of Ancona, of the Puglia, and of the Campagna sent their quotas to his standard; but Leo well understood that their devotion would avail little against the disciplined forces of the Norman. Therefore he requested the Byzantine emperor, whose own interests were involved, to send him some veteran troops. In his letter to the sovereign, his Holiness says: "As we are told in Wisdom, no one can change him whom God rejects, and the fool is not corrected by words. So it is with the malice of this people: every day they grow worse. Therefore, not only wishing to use my temporal resources for the liberation of the flock of Christ, but also desiring to devote myself to that work, I have thought that nothing will more manifest the wickedness of these men, or more quickly repress their obstinacy, than the use of human weapons. For I learn from the Apostle that princes do not hold the sword without reason, and that they are the ministers of the anger of God, punishers of those who work evil." (1)

The Greek emperor answered with fair words, but no aid arrived. Then Leo journeyed into the wilds of Pan-nonia, where Henry III. was at the head of an army, and he besought that emperor's assistance. He obtained only five hundred veterans, but with this small reinforcement he led his army—otherwise composed of Pontifical infantry and Lombard pikemen—into the Capitanata, in June, 1053. On the approach of Leo, the Normans sent him an embassy, offering to become tributary to the Holy See; but the Pontiff would accept of no conditions short of their entire evacuation of Italy. (1) Then occurred the battle of Civitella, called by some Dragonara. The Pontifical army was nearly destroyed, and the Pope, who had watched the combat at a little distance, was captured by the victors.

(1) MIGNÉ'S Patrology, vol. 143., p. 449.

Then was witnessed an extraordinary event—conquerors kneeling at the feet of the conquered. As the Pontiff, preceded by the cross, came forward to meet his captors, they prostrated themselves before him, imploring his mercy. (2). Then they conducted their prisoner to Benevento, where for the space of nine months he was honorably entertained by count Hunfrid. Profoundly afflicted at the loss of his faithful soldiers, many of whom were his own relatives and friends, Leo did not retire to his couch during the whole time of his captivity, but took his necessary sleep on the stone pavement of his chamber; he fasted beyond measure, and completely despoiled himself for the sake of the poor.

The Normans were soon glad to withdraw from their anomalous position, especially as they were surrounded by enemies—Italians, Greeks, Germans, and Saracens. Reflecting on the great advantages they would derive from the favor of the Roman Pontiffs, they not only offered peace and liberty to their venerable prisoner, but implored him to receive them as vassals to the Holy See, swearing to defend it against all enemies, in return for the Papal investiture of their conquest in the two Sicilies. St. Leo IX. readily accepted the offer, and on March 12, 1054, he departed from Benevento and arrived in due time at Rome, where he died April 19 of the same year.

The conduct of St. Leo IX. in the matter of the Norman

(1) According to Gaufridus Malaterra (History, B. i., 10), and Hermann Contractus (Chronicle) the Pontiff would have accepted the offer of the Normans; but the German auxiliaries arrogantly relied on their superior size, and thought it would terrify the enemy.

(2) SISMONDI, vol. i., p. 359; WIBERT, "Life of St. Leo IX." usurpation of his territories has been severely criticised; even St. Peter Damian reprov'd him for appealing to the temporal sword. However, history tells us of no Pope who voluntarily surrendered any portion of the patrimony of St. Peter because of a scruple to adopt material force in its defence. If Julius II. was the only Pontiff who himself led his troops to battle, many others have, from time to time, called renowned warriors to the service of the Holy See; and these Gonfalonieri, or captains of the Church, as they were styled, held their commissions as the most honorable that their profession could afford them. In 1084, Robert Guiscard, once the foe of St. Leo IX., was called by St. Gregory VII. to defend Rome against Henry IV. of Germany. In 1370, Louis I., of Hungary, aided Urban V. against the Florentines. Martin V. created the great Sforza Gonfaloniere of the Church. Frederick Malatesta fought for Pius II., Paul II., and Sixtus IV.; Robert Malatesta served the last named Pope, and when mortally wounded received the Sacraments from the Pontifical hands. Under St. Pius V. fought Marcantonio Colonna, the hero of Lepanto, and in our own days the Catholic world glorifies the memory of Léon Juchault de Lamoricière.

None of these leaders, and not one of the Popes who employed them, felt any of the scruples affected by the enemies of the Holy See. No such scruples were entertained by those Pontiffs who, during four centuries, were the soul of the resistance made by the civilized world to the inroads of barbarous Islamism; and precisely because those Pontiffs did use the temporal sword in defense of religion and of the right, the crescent does not shine to-day over every capital in Europe. From St. Leo IX. to Pius IX., each Pope who has drawn the sword in defence of his temporal dominion has done only what the world admires in all other kings. It is curious, therefore, that we should so often hear men counselling the Popes to answer the invaders of their territories with a benediction.

The idea of the Supreme Pontificate is as contrary to that of aggressive warfare, as is the idea of the priesthood to that of violence. Meekness is not only appropriate to the successor of St. Peter; it is the duty of his office, and he should ever remember the saying that "the Church abhors blood." And meekness has ever been, as a rule, the characteristic of the Pope-Kings. But when his States, the patrimony of the Church, are attacked, meekness and inactivity on his part would be culpable. It is not our province to prove the necessity of temporal sovereignty, as an aid and guarantee for the liberty of the Church; that has been done so effectually by writers of every kind, and in every quarter of the globe, that he who now denies that necessity must be either woefully ignorant or wilfully blind to the truth. But this much we will say: in this matter there is not a mere question of maintaining a reigning dynasty, although even that may sometimes be a holy cause. In the cause of the Pope-King, is involved the question whether or not society is to fall under the domination of mere brutal force, for to such barbarism must society come, if the profession of Christianity is denied it. That the profession is only possible with a free, that is, sovereign Pontiff, is admitted by the more frank of the enemies of the Church, and is asserted by the entire Catholic episcopate (1). Why then should not the Pope defend his temporal rights, if necessary, even with the armed hand? He was not blamed when his police arrested, or his courts punished the ordinary criminals of society; why should he be reproved for resisting the enemies of society at large?

(1) On the 18th June 1859, Pope Pius IX., in an Apostolic Letter addressed to all the bishops, notified the world of the robbery just consummated in the four Legations; on the 20th, in a Consistorial Allocution, he declared the robbers excommunicated; on the 26th Sept., in another Allocution, he protested against the pretended annexation of the Emilia to the Sardinian Kingdom; and on Jan. 19, 1860, in an Encyclical, he informed Christendom why, in his letter to Napoleon III., under date of the 31st December, he had rejected all offers of compromise. His revered and authoritative words were immediately echoed by the bishops of the World. In all ecclesiastical history, there is no such record of unanimity on the part of the episcopal body, in a matter not directly entering into the domain of faith, as the reader will find in the immense collection entitled The Temporal Sovereignty of the Roman Pontiffs Defended in its Integrity by the Suffrage of the Catholic World, in the Fourteenth Year of the Reign of Pius IX.: Rome, 1860. The proposition asserted by the bishops may be epitomised as follows: I. It is necessary for the liberty of the Church, at least in the present condition of society, that the Pontiff possess, in a temporal sovereignty, a perfect independence, and a mastership of his own acts; so much so, that, without such sovereignty, reversion and servitude would be the lot of the Church. Hence, although the matter of this question of the temporal power may be political, nevertheless, since that power is sacred in its object, the said question assumes a religious aspect. II. To this fitnessness or necessity, Providence has supplied, by means of a principality the most ancient, most legitimate, and least disputed, of all those of modern Europe—a principality constituted with the consent of peoples and of princes, as a patrimony of the Church, and a monarchy hereditary in the successors of Peter; nor, for any reason whatever, can any portion of it be violently usurped, without grave injury to the whole and a no less danger to the rest. III. The Supreme Pontificate, far from preventing the Popes from ruling their states properly, greatly assists them in so doing; and the pretended discontent of the Papal subjects, where not studiously excited by the spoliators, is a calumnious invention, unless, indeed, we are to regard as the people those few who abhor the Pontifical government, merely because it is Christian. In defending these propositions, the bishops, of course, did not mean to present a matter of faith; but, inasmuch as they have reference to the practical principles according to which the faithful should govern their thoughts and actions, we cannot see how the propositions can be questioned by any one unwilling to incur the note of rashness.

There is much similarity between the campaign of St. Leo IX. against the Normans, and the unfortunate yet glorious one which the Papal troops undertook in 1860. In both cases the enemy was composed of baptized persons, professing no heresy, but apparently glorying in the creed of Rome. However, in the case of St. Leo IX., the Pontiff himself marched against the invader; whereas in the campaign of Castel Fidardo the little Papal army, organized to deal only with the hordes of Garibaldi concentrated on the Neapolitan frontier, and expecting no attack from the regular troops of Sardinia, (1) were suddenly and treacherously assailed on their own territory. "Impious men!" said Pope Pius IX., "of whom the Almighty now makes use in order to punish the sins of all, but to disperse them and punish them in the day of his fury,—trampling on the law of God, cursing the voice of the Holy One of Israel, and ceasing not to wage most cruel war on the Church and this Apostolic See. Possessed by the spirit of Satan, they have excited the peoples of Italy to rebellion; they have unjustly expelled legitimate princes, and have disturbed all things human and divine; during the past year they have invaded our States, sacrilegiously occupying some of our provinces, and now they try to invade and usurp the rest." (2).

These aggressors, said the same Pontiff, "for a long time have waged war against the Catholic Church, her ministers, and her property; and, caring nothing for ecclesiastical

(1) The battle of Castelfidardo was fought September 18. It was only on the 10th that Lamoricière was informed by Capt. Farini, aid-de-camp of Gen. Fanti, the Sardinian war-minister and commander-in-chief, that, in certain described cases, the troops of King Victor Emmanuel would cross the frontier. In answer, the hero of Constantina replied: "What you propose to me is a shame and a dishonor—viz., to evacuate without combat the provinces which it is my duty to defend. It would have been more candid on the part of the king of Piedmont and his generals had they at once declared war on us. But, despite the numerical preponderance of the Sardinian army, we shall not forget that, on certain occasions, officers and soldiers must not count the enemy's numbers, nor spare their own lives in preserving the outraged honor of the government they serve." And, as late as September 13, the Duke de Gramont, French ambassador at the Vatican, telegraphed the following to the French Vice-Consul at Ancona: "The emperor has written from Marseilles to the king of Sardinia, that, if the Piedmontese troops enter the pontifical territory, he will be forced to oppose them. Orders have already been given to embark troops at Toulon, and these reinforcement will soon arrive. The Imperial Government will not tolerate the culpable aggression of the Sardinian Government; as Vice-Consul of France, you will regulate your course by this information." (See Lamoricière's "Report" to the Papal Minister of War.)

(2) Letter to the chaplain-in-chief of the Papal army, Sep. 10, 1860.

laws or censures, they have dared to imprison illustrious cardinals and bishops and most worthy members of both the secular and regular clergy, to expel religious communities from their cloisters, to appropriate the goods of the Church, and to subvert the civil principality of this Holy See. . . . They open public schools for the teaching of every false doctrine ; with abominable writings and theatrical representations, they offend and banish all modesty, chastity, honesty, and virtue ; they despise the holy mysteries and the Sacraments, the precepts, institutions, ministers, rites, and ceremonies of our holy religion, and try to banish all justice from the earth, and to destroy the very foundations of religion and of civil society." (1)

The use of military force, therefore, was a duty incumbent upon Pius IX., just as it had been on his predecessor, the Ninth Leo. But we must here remark that in the days of St. Leo IX. no one thought of reproving, still less of insulting, the soldiers of the Pope. No Norman knight threw the stigma of "mercenary" in the faces of the defenders of the patrimony of St. Peter ; such mendacious discourtesy was reserved for a Cialdini and a Fanti to display to a Lamoricière, a Pimodan, a Charette, and the hundreds of scions of the noblest blood of Brittany and Belgium, who abandoned wealth and comfort for the defense of the freedom of the Chair of Peter. (2)

They who were killed at Civitella, fighting under the standard of the Keys, were hailed as martyrs, alike by Pontificals and penitent Normans ; and when the holy Leo IX. was seized with his last illness, he said to his weeping attendants : "The time of my departure approaches. Last night I saw in a vision the heavenly land ; and among other things, I saw crowned as martyrs those who fell in the Puglia fighting for the Church. With one voice they all said to me : ' Come and dwell with us : for it was through thee that we attained this glory.' " (1)

(1) Allocution, Sep. 28, 1860.

(2) Read the following proclamation of the Sardinian minister of war : "Foreign bands from every part of Europe have carried into Umbria and the Marches the belted standard of a religion at which they scoff. Without country or roof, they provoke and insult the populations to have a pretext to master them. Such martyrdom must cease, and such insolence is to be suppressed by our succoring, with our arms, those unfortunate sons of Italy who have vainly hoped for justice and mercy from their government. We shall fulfil the mission confided to us by king Victor Emmanuel ; let Europe know that Italy is no longer the rendezvous and the prize of the most audacious or fortunate adventurer. From Headquarters in Arezzo, Sept. 11, 1861. The Minister of War, commander-in-chief of the Corps of Occupation in the Marches and Umbria : M. FANTI." The following morsel from Cialdini is exquisite : "Soldiers of the 4th Corps d'Armée ! I lead you against a herd of foreign drunkards, whom thirst of gold and lust of plunder have attracted to our country. Fight, destroy inexorably these hired assassins ; and let them feel, by your hand, the ire of a people desirous of their nationality and independence. Soldiers ! Unrevenged Perugia demands satisfaction, and though tardily, will have it. The General Commanding the 4th Corps d'Armée : ENRICO CIALDINI." Civiltà Cattolica, in its News of the Day, s. iv, vol. 8.

It was not given to Lamoricière to crown with his death for Holy Church one of the most glorious military records which even the history of France can furnish. But he became the generous envy of every Christian soldier, and as a prisoner of war for the Roman Pontiff he was greater than when amid his triumphs at Medeah, Mascara, and Constantina. " I found myself," he wrote in his " Report " to Mgr. de Mérode, " before a question of duty and honor ; and if, in my resolutions, I had at all considered the gravity of the danger probably awaiting us, my old companions in arms of the French army would have disowned me."

CHAPTER XI.

THE PONTIFICATE OF ST. GREGORY VII.

Above all the historical personages of the eleventh century, there towers the figure of one person of such pre-eminent calibre, that certain historians have felt themselves compelled to designate that century by his name. As devout children of the Catholic Church, ready to accept any true glorification of her earthly head, we too would be willing to call that age the Hildebrandine ; but when Protestant authors and court-theologians use this term in regard to the century which was honored and fructified by Pope St. Gregory VII., they adopt it rather as a slur upon that period ; they imply, says Palma, that the name of Hildebrand should be assigned to that age which he " greatly afflicted," just as the names of Novatian, Arius, Nestorius. Photius, etc., are rightly used to designate the centuries accursed by their influence. If we may credit the opinion of Mosheim (2). Gregory VII. simply tried to subjugate the universe to his temporal behests ; if we may believe the Anglican Potter (d. 1747), Gregory would have better consulted his reputation for sanctity, if he had only tried to be a learned and virtuous monk. (1). Of the justice of these views the reader will judge when he has read the short sketch of this Pontificate which we propose to give, and the following chapters on the questions in which Gregory took so prominent a part.

(1) Bollandists, April 11.

(2) Cent. XI., p. 2, c. 2.

Alexander II. having died in May, 1073, the cardinals immediately elected to the Pontificate the cardinal Hildebrand, who, born in 1018 at Soana in Tuscany, had been taken from among the monks of Cluny by Leo IX. and attached to the immediate service of the Roman Church. His diplomatic and other labors during the reigns of Leo IX., Victor II., Stephen IX., Nicholas II., and Alexander II., had already shown him to be worthy of the encomium of St. Peter Damian, writing to Pope Nicholas II., that he was "a man of most holy and most pure counsel." A man of great intellect, of mortified habits, and inflexible in regard to the rights of the Roman See, and concerning everything pertaining to clerical discipline, he was scarcely settled in the Chair of Peter before he launched the lightnings of the Vatican on all simoniacs, and all married and concubinary priests. So widespread were the disorders of simony and concubinage among the clergy, thanks to the iniquitous system of princely investiture, which filled the ecclesiastical benefices with incumbents who possessed no other qualification than the good will of the great, that everywhere, more especially in Lombardy and in Germany, the decrees of the Pontiff were productive of tumults and even bloody outbreaks. Gregory's zeal for the temporal rights of his See, together with regard for the well being of the vassals of Roman Church, caused him to threaten with excommunication the Norman Guiscard, who had conquered a great portion of the Two Sicilies, a fief of the Holy See, and who delayed his due homage and oath of fidelity to the Pontiff. Guiscard finally obeyed, as did Philip I. of France, who consented, under the same threat of excommunication, to repair many injuries done to his own subjects and to certain Italian merchants in his dominions..

(1) Spirit of the Church, etc., vol. v., pt. 2, b. 2.

Eleven different Councils were held at Rome during the twelve years of Gregory's Pontificate. In the First, held in 1074, the Pontiff decreed (1): "That all who have been promoted to the grade and office of Holy Orders by the heresy of simony, that is, by the use of money, hereafter hold no place of ministry in Holy Church. Those who obtain churches by gifts of money, let them lose their positions altogether." In this Synod, married and incontinent priests were interdicted from the celebration of mass; deacons and subdeacons in the same condition were excluded from the sanctuary. Lambert of Aschaffenburg tells us that when these decrees reached Germany, the married clergy called Gregory "a heretic, who, forgetful of the words of the Lord, that 'all do not understand this word,' would compel men to lead the life of angels . . . that they would sooner abandon the priesthood than the married state." The Second Council was held in 1075, and in it Gregory prohibited all Christians from hearing the masses of married priests." The imperialist Sigebert, in his overwrought zeal for Henry IV., insinuates that the Pontiff forgot that the mass of even a married priest was valid; but Gregory's words show that he did not deny the validity of any ordained priest's mass; that he only wished "that those who would not be corrected by the love of God, and for the dignity of their office, would be influenced by the judgment of the world and by the reproof of the people." In this Synod, Gregory excommunicated several friends and counsellors of Henry IV., who were in the habit of selling bishoprics, etc., namely, the bishops Otho of Ratisbon, Otho of Constance, Burchard of Lausanne; the counts Eberhard and Udalric. Here also was issued the celebrated decree against royal investiture. The Third Council was celebrated in 1076, and herein were excommunicated king Henry IV., the archbishop Sigefrid of Mentz, the bishops William of Utrecht and Robert of Bamberg. Of this Synod we shall have occasion to speak hereafter. The Fourth Council was held in 1078, and was composed of a hundred bishops and a large number of abbots and clerics. Herein the archbishops of Milan and Ravenna, who, as we shall see, incited Henry IV. to another outbreak after his simulated penance at Canossa, were deposed from every sacerdotal ministry. In this Synod a decree was issued for the protection of the shipwrecked, and for the condemnation of piratical wreckers. The Fifth Council was celebrated in the same year, 1078, and in it the legates of Henry and of his rival, Rudolph, swore that they would not interfere with the Papal legates sent into Germany to settle their respective claims. The Sixth Council was convened in 1079, and in it Berengarius, for the second time, retracted his heresy, and made a third Profession of Faith. Then the legates of Henry and Rudolph promised that a convention for the final settling of their masters' dispute should be held in Germany, in the presence of the Pontiff or of his legates. The Seventh Council met in 1080, and it condemned princely investitures, prohibiting any one to sit among bishops or abbots who had received his episcopal or abbatial investiture from a layman, and interdicting him from entrance into a church until he had resigned his benefice. The Eighth Council was held in 1081, and it confirmed the excommunication of Henry IV. and of all his abettors. The archbishops of Arles and Narbonne were deposed, and Ildimund and Lando, tyrants of Champagne, were anathematized. The Ninth Council met in 1083, and in it, as two of Gregory's epistles show (1), the Pontiff showed himself not unwilling to come to an accommodation with Henry; but, as we shall see, the wickedness of the king rendered hope of peace impossible. The Tenth and Eleventh Councils met in 1084, and both repeated the anathemas against the anti-Pope Guibert and Henry.

(1) Epistle of Gregory to the Bishop of Constance. MARIANUS SCOTUS, Chronicle, year 1074.

We shall devote a chapter to the treatment of the question of investitures. Here we merely observe that Gregory VII. was too far-seeing a man not to know that an endeavor to wrench so great a power from the hands of the usurping princes would be attended by apparently insurmountable difficulties. He knew that Henry IV., the young king of Germany and expectant emperor, had triumphed over all his enemies at home, and was free to send his victorious troops into Italy. But, under God, he relied upon the greater part of the clergy, who were desirous of throwing off the yoke of this terrible usurpation, and upon the aid of the powerful Matilda, countess of Tuscany, as well as upon that of Robert Guiscard, who was bound by gratitude and vassallage to the Holy See.

(1) B. 9, epist. 3, to Altmann of Passau; and epist. 28, To All the Faithful.

Before the storm in Germany burst forth in its utmost fury, the Pontiff was greatly afflicted by disorders in Lombardy and by an outrage against his own person in Rome, both of which events were produced by his inflexible severity in the matter of ecclesiastical celibacy. Erlembald, archbishop of Milan, having adopted rigorous measures against the violators of the Canons, was attacked in the open street by these gentry and their friends, and after a bloody and obstinate resistance on the part of his cortege, was stretched dead on the pavement. In Rome, on Christmas eve, while the Pontiff was assisting at the divine office in St. Mary Major's, one Cencio, prefect of the city, burst into the sanctuary at the head of an armed band, dragged the Pope from the altar, and carried him prisoner to a fortified tower which the noble brigand possessed in the city. When the sacrilege was made known to the people, they rushed to arms, forced an entrance to the tower, and found the wretched Cencio kneeling before Gregory, begging him to save his life. The Pontiff forgave him and assisted him and his family to depart from Rome, imposing upon him, however, the penance of a pilgrimage to Jerusalem. (1). In the year 1076 the question of investitures resolved itself into open war between the Pope and the German king. The Pontiff had tried every peaceful measure to induce the young Henry to renounce the usurpation of his predecessors, but the haughty monarch was inflated by his recent victories over the Saxons, and was, besides, not very scrupulous in religious matters. Hence he loudly proclaimed that the conceding of investiture to bishops, abbots, etc., was an inalienable right of his crown, and he was eagerly supported by the many whose interest it was to perpetuate what was a source of immense revenue to both king and courtiers. At length, tired of advising, praying, and threatening, Gregory published the decree against investitures which had been issued in his Second Synod in 1075. Henry grew furious, and, in his turn, called a Diet at Worms, composed of his partisan bishops and many of the higher German nobles. By this convention the Pontiff himself was declared excommunicated; his election was pronounced null and void, as having been made without the consent of the king, and his deposition from the Pontificate was proclaimed. To this presumptuous and sacrilegious proceeding Gregory answered with a solemn excommunication of Henry and all his abettors, declaring him deposed from his throne, and pronouncing his subjects free from their obligation of allegiance. Henry now sent emissaries through Germany and Italy to excite the princes, bishops, and people against the Pontiff. He even sent an audacious ecclesiastic into the Pope's presence, who, in the name of the king, ordered Gregory, "the intruder," to make room for a legitimate Pontiff. The people would have torn this miserable man to pieces, had Gregory himself not protected him. But the censures of the Vatican soon told upon the princes, clergy, and people of Germany. Although many of the clergy were incontinent and simoniacal, the idea of being governed by an excommunicated monarch was horrible to them; and although Henry, rightly dreading the effect of their influence upon the people, now showered favors upon them, he experienced the mortification of beholding a Diet, convoked successively at Utrecht, Oppenheim, and Tribur, proclaiming his deposition from the throne. Immediately the great princes and the nobles, with few exceptions, abandoned the disgraced Henry; some even prepared to attack him and force him to an abdication. Then it was that the cowering monarch resolved to submit to necessity, and throw himself at the feet of the Pontiff. Disbanding his troops, and dismissing the few princes and nobles who still clung to his standard, he crossed the Alps with a small retinue, in the midst of a most rigorous winter, and prepared to submit to his priestly adversary.

(1) LAMBERT of Aschaffenburg and PAUL Briedensis.

At this time Pope Gregory had left Rome with the intention of proceeding to Germany, at the request of the princes, to there pronounce sentence upon all points in dispute between the Papacy and the empire. He was resting in the strong fortress of Canossa, one of the strongholds of the "great Countess," Matilda, when an embassy from Henry appeared at the gates and besought an audience. The ambassadors were Amadeo, count of Savoy, Albertazzo, count of Este, and the abbot of Cluny. They informed Gregory that Henry had come, almost alone and without arms, to beg pardon of his spiritual father and to be reconciled with the Church of God. Henry then presented himself outside the fortress, dressed in sackcloth, bare-headed and bare-footed, in spite of the cold, and begged admission. After some delay he was introduced, entirely alone, but only into the outworks, and there he passed three days and three nights, no one approaching him even with a word of comfort. On the fourth day he was admitted into the presence of the Pontiff, and was absolved, on condition that he would conduct himself as an excommunicated person until the assembling of the Diet at Augsburg, when a definite judgment would be pronounced in his case. (1). When the tidings of this humiliation of Henry reached the ears of his partisans in Lombardy, who were far more bitter than the Germans against the Pontiff, they became so indignant at what they styled Henry's lack of firmness, that, on his passing through their country while on his return to Germany, he not unfrequently found the gates of the cities and castles shut in his face. Then it was that the monarch

(1) The historian Leo, a German and a Protestant, in his History of Italy, b. iv., c. 4, § 5, writes: "Some German writers describe the episode at Canossa as an insult of an arrogant prelate to the German nation. This blindness is unworthy of an enlightened people. Let us, for an instant, lay aside the prejudices born of Protestantism and national pride, and let us entertain a truly Protestant freedom of thought. We behold in Gregory a man issued from a class enjoying no political privileges, a man relying only on the force of his own genius and of his own will, raising a vilified institution, the Church, out of abjection, and giving to it a splendor hitherto unknown. In Henry, on the contrary, we see a man—if he merits that name—whose father bequeathed him an almost absolute power over a brave and rich people, and who, in spite of such plentitude of external means, has been drawn by his base character into the mud of the worst vices; we see this person become an abject suppliant, and, after trampling on all that men hold as most sacred, trembling at the voice of an intellectual hero. Of limited spirit, indeed, is the one whom national vanity can so blind, that he will not exult at the triumph, effected at Canossa, of a most profound genius over a vile and characterless man."

showed how insincere had been his submission at Canossa. In order to prevent his partisans from entirely abandoning him, he listened to the suggestions of the excommunicated archbishop of Ravenna, and openly and publicly violated the conditions of his absolution. He appeared before the army clothed in his royal robes, and declared himself ready to vindicate the royal dignity outraged by Gregory. When Gregory was informed of Henry's proceedings, he renewed the excommunication, and sending legates to Germany, convoked a Diet. Henry was there deposed, and the crown was offered to Rudolph, duke of Suabia. The Pontifical forces were then joined to those of the countess Matilda, and Gregory was fairly embarked in secular as well as spiritual war. In this struggle no part was taken by Venice, Genoa, or Pisa, which republics were too intent upon the development of their commerce and industries, to interfere, unless they found their monetary interest in jeopardy. Robert Guiscard also, for a time, remained neutral, as he found it enough to consolidate and extend his Sicilian dominions. The Norman, however, took advantage of Gregory's being fully occupied with Henry in the North, and invading the territories of the Church which lay in the southern Campagna, he besieged Benevento. It was then that Desiderio, the holy abbot of Montecassino and destined successor of Gregory, entered the camp of Guiscard and prevailed upon him to relinquish his ungrateful and sacrilegious enterprise. The war in Germany between the rivals Henry and Rudolph was waged with alternate success for three years, and in it there perished many bishops and ecclesiastics, who, according to the terms of their tenures as civil barons, owed military allegiance to the king, either personal or by substitute, for their domains, and who themselves were too frequently willing to don the cuirass. In his Seventh Synod, held in 1080, our Pontiff again declared Henry deposed from the German throne, confirmed the election of Rudolph, and sent the latter a golden crown, inscribed "The rock (Petra) gave the diadem to Peter, and Peter gave one to Rudolph." When Henry learned of this decisive step in favor of his adversary, he convoked at Brixen a pretended Synod, which was composed of both his Italian and German partisans; and he caused a proclamation to be made to the effect that Gregory was deposed, and that in his place was located Guibert, the excommunicated archbishop of Ravenna, under the name of Clement III. While Guibert was enrolling soldiers for a march upon Rome, Henry and Rudolph met, for the fourth time, in pitched battle, and Rudolph was slain. About the same time the heroic countess Matilda, ever true to the cause of the Church, saw her troops defeated by those of Guibert. Henry now descended into Italy, at the head of a large army, with the avowed intention of installing Guibert in the chair of Peter, and of receiving from him the imperial crown. Many of Gregory's counselors, seeing the present inability of Matilda, the Pontiff's great reliance, to assist the Holy See, advised him to come to terms with Henry. But the wise and determined Pope replied that, even if he could bring himself to so humiliate the Holy See, which he never would do, it would not be prudent to confide in the promises of the perjured Henry. He therefore sent legates into Germany, who convoked a Diet of bishops and princes, and Hermann of Lorraine was chosen king of the Germans. The news of this election showed Henry that the Pontiff was inflexible and implacable in his regard. He therefore detached part of his army to occupy the attention of Matilda, and ordered the rest to march on the Eternal City. When he arrived in the meadows of Nero, he found that the walls and towers of Rome were well-manned by an ardent citizen-soldiery, whom the harangues of Gregory had induced to aid his few regular troops in the defence. For a short time the monarch presided over the siege, but growing tired of inactivity, he turned over the guidance of this operation to his anti-Pope, and withdrew with a portion of his men, to join the army operating against Matilda. But he was able to do no more than devastate the outlying districts of Tuscany, for the countess, perceiving that her troops were too few to successfully cope with Henry in the open field, kept them within her castles and fortified cities. The enraged monarch now returned to the siege of Rome. In vain he ordered many assaults. Always repulsed, he had made up his mind to await the slow effect of hunger upon the Romans, when treachery came to his aid during the Lent of 1084.

The emperor Alexius Comnenus, hardly pressed, not only in his Sicilian dominions, but nearer to home, by his enemy Guiscard, had offered Henry a large sum of money if he would direct his arms against the Norman. This money Henry had in his camp, and he resolved to use it to immediate advantage. He succeeded in corrupting some of the citizens, upon whom the horrors of a strict blockade had begun to tell, and on the Thursday before Palm Sunday the Lateran gate, now called St. John's, was opened. With his anti-Pope and army Henry entered the city, occupied the Lateran palace, the bridges over the Tiber, and most of the strategic points. Pope Gregory had shut himself in the strong castle of San Angelo: and Henry, having received the imperial crown from Guibert, awaited the reduction of the fortress. But the monarch now learned that Guiscard had suddenly left the theatre of his victories in Greece, and that, having entrusted the prosecution of his designs against Alexius to his son Bohemond, he was coming to the aid of his suzerain at the head of a powerful force. Henry felt that the previous campaign had left him too weak to meet Guiscard in the field, and he knew that Rome was not yet sufficiently provisioned to warrant its undergoing a new siege. Therefore, taking with him his precious anti-Pope, he evacuated the city, and directed his march to the north. Guiscard entered Rome the following day, and wickedly and unwisely allowed his soldiery to punish the treachery of a few of the Romans, by a wholesale sacking of the city. Gregory in vain tried to prevent the devastation, and as the Romans were naturally in a most irritated state of mind, he deemed it wise to accompany Guiscard into that prince's Sicilian dominions. Proceeding first to Montecassino, he finally made his residence in Salerno. In May of the following year, feeling that death was coming upon him, he summoned all the cardinals to his presence, and earnestly exhorted them to recognize as his successor only a canonically elected person. Being asked whom he would prefer for that office, he suggested as his first choice the cardinal Desiderio, abbot of Montecassino; as his second, the cardinal Otho of Ostia, or Hugh, archbishop of Lyons. Fortified by the last sacraments, he passed from a stormy life, his final words being: "I have loved justice and hated iniquity; therefore I die in exile."

Sigebert asserts that he "found it written," that, when Pope Gregory became aware of the approach of death, he rescinded his condemnation of Henry IV.: "The Apostolic lord Hildebrand, or Gregory, being at the point of death, called to himself one of the twelve cardinals whom he loved more than the rest, and avowed to God, and St. Peter, and the entire Church, that he had greatly sinned in the pastoral office committed to him, and that, by the persuasion of the devil, he had excited hatred and anger in the human race. He then sent the aforesaid confessor to the emperor and to the whole Church, that he might obtain pardon, for he saw the end of life approaching. . . . and he abrogated all his decrees against the emperor, etc." But this interested discovery of the imperialist Sigebert is shown to be valueless by the testimony of grave contemporary authors, such as Paul Briedensis and Hugh of Flavigny. The first writes: "The Blessed Pope Gregory, being asked whether he wished to absolve those whom he had excommunicated, replied: 'I absolve and bless all who, without doubt, believe that I have this special power in the place of the Apostles Peter and Paul; all excepting the said king and Guibert, the invader of the Apostolic See, and the principal persons who have aided their iniquity by counsel or assistance.'" Hugh, abbot of Flavigny, in the Chronicle of Verdun, says: "knowing that the day of his summons was at hand, long before it he called together the cardinals, bishops, and his other fellow-captives, and predicted the day of his death. Having arranged all the affairs of the ecclesiastical government, on the 15th of the Calends of June he urged the aforesaid brethren, in the name of holy obedience, to presume not to keep silence if they knew of anything that he ought to correct. And when they commended his course of life and his holy teachings, his morals and the fervor of his holy zeal, he forced them, by his Apostolic authority, to give him, one by one, their hands, and to promise that they would never receive that heretical invader of the Holy and Apostolic Church, unless perchance he canonically repented, and, deprived of all dignities of the ecclesiastical order, should offer a pure confession to the cardinals and bishops ; affirming and attesting that all should be forever condemned who would presume to communicate with the arch-pirate Henry, the usurper of the empire, unless, having laid aside the dignity of king, he should, according to command, do penance."

Various indeed must necessarily be the judgments of critics upon such a Pontificate as that of Gregory VII. A modern author, much esteemed by the unitarians now at the helm in Italy, writes : "The Seventh Gregory was a Pontiff of pure life, austere virtue, and indomitable will. If human prudence can reproach him for an inflexibility which savors of excess, and for pretensions to a supremacy which may appear unlimited, we must not forget the enormity of the abuses that he was obliged to correct, and the unbridled tyranny that he strove to repress. From his attack on the imperial power in Italy came the completion of the establishment of the Italian communes, which, because the schism had enervated the authority of the imperial counts and of the prince-bishops of the cities, now commenced to elect their own magistrates." (1). Imperialist and Gallican writers generally hold that Gregory was so elated by his elevated views of his Apostolate that he wished everything, sacred and profane, to be prostrate at his feet. Alexandre is more moderate, when speaking of this Pontiff, than most authors of his school. For while he contends that "Gregory was the first Pope who claimed the power to depose kings, and this, also, against the teachings of the Fathers and of Scripture," he admits his sanctity and single-mindedness, and believes him to have been influenced, in his course toward Henry IV., by the opinion, "held by Gregory, by certain other Pontiffs, and by some authors, that a change had come over the empire and the imperial dignity, when the empire was transferred to the Germans, and the confirmation of the imperial election devolved upon the Pontiff;" that, in fine, the empire was a fief of the Holy See. (1). That this opinion was as old as the Holy Roman empire itself, we have already seen when treating of that empire's foundation. Alexandre is unwilling to concede this, but though he did concede it, he would deny the application of the principle to the case of any other sovereign than the emperor; most especially, to the case of his Most Christian Majesty of France. We shall treat of this point when we come to our special chapter on the deposing power of the Pope.

Henke says of Gregory VII. that he was "a shameless and wicked man, full of tricks, and a rash innovator, although he had the prudence of a statesman and the courage, energy, and firmness of a hero. He was low and vile, although externally he presented a noble independence. He was a pretended saint, adored by his partisans and a man without religion, faith, or belief; one of his intimate friends called him St. Satan" (2). Schroek admires his perspicacity and his knowledge of the human heart, but reproaches him with dissimulation, an indomitable pride, unmeasured ambition, and obstinacy. (3). Bower says that our Pontiff tried to establish an absolute and universal despotism, and implies that he was a heretic, hypocrite, and impostor. (4). Sismondi says that he was dominated by an insupportable arrogance and an unlimited ambition, and that he sacrificed everything to these two passions. (5). After such judgments it is refreshing to hear the Protestant Voigt saying: "Gregory was profoundly convinced that religion alone can procure to the world safety, happiness, and universal peace; he was persuaded that the sole organ of religion is the Church, which, in his eyes, is the interpreter of the will of the Most High. But to attain this object the Church should have some means of subsistence; the more, she separated

(1) Cent. ii., diss. 2, art. 9.

(2) History of the Christian Church, p. 2.

(3) History of the Church, p. 2.

(4) History of the Roman Popes, B. vi.

(5) Italian Republics, vol. i.

herself from the state, or severed the ties hitherto binding them, the more urgent it became to provide for her existence in some other manner. Restored to her liberty, the Church could rely only upon herself, upon her own rights, and not upon the favors of the state. . . . Gregory was a Pope, and acted as one; in this aspect, he was grand and admirable. To form a right judgment upon his actions, one should consider his object and his intentions, and should see what was necessary for his time. A generous indignation may seize a German, when he beholds the humiliation of his emperor at Canossa. or a Frenchman, when he hears the severe lessons given to his king. But the historian, who regards the life of peoples from a general point of view, rises above the narrow horizon of German or Frenchman, and finds these things just, although others condemn them. . . . Gregory's has been the lot of all the great men of history; there have been ascribed to him motives of which it would be difficult, if not impossible, to prove the existence. . . . Nevertheless, even the enemies of Gregory are obliged to admit that his dominating idea, the independence of the Church, was indispensable for the propagation of religion, for the reform of society, and that, to obtain this effect, it was necessary to sever all the ties which had bound the Church to the state, to the detriment of religion; the Church had to be an entirety, one in herself, and by herself a divine institution, whose salutary influence over all men was not to be checked by any prince of the earth. . . . The genius of Gregory embraced, and had to embrace, the whole Christian world, because the independence of the Church was a general idea; his action was necessarily energetic, for he acted in his century: his faith and his conviction were what they were, because the course of events had given them birth. It is difficult to give him exaggerated praise, because he everywhere laid the foundations of a solid glory." (1)

(1) Gregory VII., B. xii. We take pleasure in subjoining the following reflections of the Abbé Jager, taken from his Introduction to the work of Voigt. "The great men who appear in critical times, as instruments of Providence, do not always labor for their own epoch, but for the future. . . . So it was with Gregory. In spite of all obstacles, in spite of every effort of the imperial power, he died a conqueror; but he did not enjoy his victory. The Anti-Pope Guibert did not ascend the Pontifical throne; Henry did not die an emperor; investitures were abolished; the Church obtained worthy ministers; a new era was inaugurated—the twelfth century, so remarkable in history. This was entirely the work of Gregory, for when we compare the tenth century with the twelfth, we see the traces of a

There are several subjects of importance, connected with the Pontificate of St. Gregory VII., to each of which a special chapter must be devoted. These are the freedom of Papal elections, to restore which our Pontiff spared no labor; the question of investitures, the settlement of which may be regarded as the one object of his life; clerical celibacy, the enforcement of which excited in Gregory more zeal than had been shown by any of his predecessors. and the right exercised by the Roman Pontiffs, during the Middle Ages, to depose sovereigns. But before we treat of these questions, we would submit to the reader some passages from the Epistles of Gregory, which illustrate the spirit which animated his whole career. "The Church ought to be independent of every secular power. The altar is reserved to him who, through an uninterrupted series of Pontiffs, succeeds to St. Peter. The sword of princes is subject to the Pontiff, and is obtained from him, for it is a human thing; the altar, the Chair of Peter, came from God, and depend from Him alone (iii., 18; viii., 21). The Church is now buried in sin, because she is not free, because she is attached to the world and to worldly things (i., 42, 55); her ministers are not legitimate when instituted by men of the world; among the anointed ones of God abound cupidities and criminal passions, and hence we behold dissensions, haughtiness, and envy, where ought to reign the peace of God (ii., 11; i., 42; ii., 45; vii., 2; viii., 17). The Church ought to be free, and to become so, by means of her head, the first person of Christendom, the sun of faith. The Pope holds the place of God, and governs His kingdom on earth; without him, there is no kingdom; without him, government disappears, like a leaking ship. Things of the world pertain to the emperor; those of God to the Pope. Therefore the latter must relieve the ministers of the altar from the chains imposed on them by the lay power. The state is one thing, the Church another. As faith is one, so great man. This great man was Gregory, the Hercules of the Middle Ages. He chained up their monsters; he destroyed the feudal hydra; he saved Europe from barbarism; and, what is still more praiseworthy, he illuminated Christendom by his virtues. The grateful Church has canonized him, and never was that homage more merited: for Gregory is covered with immortal glory, a glory without stain, which, in spite of prejudice, has always found some to appreciate it, and which, it is said, caused the most illustrious soldier of modern times to exclaim, 'If I were not Napoleon, I would wish to be Gregory VII.'"

the Church is one ; the Pope is one, the faithful members one. If the Church exists by herself, she ought not to operate by herself. Just as a spiritual thing is visible only by an earthly form, and as the soul operates by the body, so religion does not exist without the Church, and the Church does not exist without the possessions which assure her existence (i., 7). As the spirit is nourished by earthly things in the body, so the Church is maintained by temporal possessions. It is the duty of the emperor, who holds the supreme power, to see that the Church procures and preserves these possessions ; therefore, emperors and rulers are necessary for the Church (i., 75 ; v., 10 ; vi., 20) ; but she exists only through the Pope, and the Pope exists only through God (i., 39). If the Church and the empire are to prosper, the priesthood and the lay power must be strongly connected, and must unite their forces for the peace of the world (i., 19). The world is lighted by two luminaries ; a greater one, the sun, and a lesser one, the moon. The Apostolic authority can be compared to the sun ; the royal power to the moon. Just as the moon illuminates only because of the sun, so emperors, kings, and princes subsist only by the grace of the Pontiff, who comes from God. The power of the Roman See is immeasurably greater than that of princes ; a king owes obedience to the Pope (ii., 13, 31 ; viii., 21 ; i., 75 ; viii., 20, 23). As the Pope comes from God, every thing is subject to him ; spiritual and temporal affairs should be brought to his tribunal ; he it is who should teach, exhort, punish, correct, judge, decide. The Church is the tribunal of God (i., 62, 35, 15 ; ii., 51 ; vii., 21 ; ix., 9 ; i., 60 ; vii., 25) ; she is the finger of God. Great and tremendous is the dignity of the Pope, the representative of Christ (i., 53), for of him it is written, 'Thou art Peter, etc.' (vii., 6 ; viii., 20). The Church is composed of all those who profess the name of Christ and are called Christians ; hence all particular churches are members of the Church of Peter, that is, of the Roman Church. This Roman Church is the mother of all the churches of Christendom, all of whom are subject to her, as daughters to a mother (ii., 1 ; iv., 28). As a mother, the Roman Church commands all churches, and all their members, archbishops, bishops, priests, emperors, kings, princes, and the rest of the faithful. By virtue of her authority, the Roman Church institutes and can depose all these; she confers their power, and not for their glory, but for the good of the many. Whenever they enter into the ways of sin, their holy mother is obliged to check them; otherwise, she would share their guilt (i., 60; viii., 21; ii., 18, 32; vii., 4; v., 5; ii., 5; iii., 4; iv., 1; Appendix, i., 3, 4). He who holds the place of Jesus Christ on this earth, may find much opposition; but he must stand firm in his position, and suffer, as did his Master (iv., 24). From the head of the Church must proceed all reforms; he, therefore, must declare war on vice, and he must aid all who are persecuted for the sake of justice and truth. He who threatens, or does violence to the Church, or who causes grief in her heart, is a son of the demon, and she must banish him from human society (Append., ii., 15; iv., 37; vi., 1)."

Convinced of the truth of these conceptions, Pope St. Gregory VII. devoted his life to their actuation; and while his frankness and vigor may astound men of to-day, they were adapted to the needs of his time, just as his sentiments were conformable to the persuasions of that time. Therefore, says Cantù, "he claimed the right of high domain over Sicily, Spain, Sardinia, Hungary, and Dalmatia, the princes of which countries, recognizing the wisdom, justice, learning, and protecting authority of Rome, had made their crowns feudatory to her, thus assuring to themselves and their heirs a protection against foreign attack and domestic rebellion Our age, which styles itself liberal, bases its constitutions on the inviolability, or rather the infallibility, of kings, and it rages at the thought of their responsibility for their acts. Our ignorant ancestors saw infallibility only in that Church with whom Christ promised to ever abide; they thought that the Church possessed the right of watching the conduct of rulers, of correcting their sins, and of punishing their contumacy. The wisdom of to-day, in order to balance power, introduces a royal veto, and a refusal, on the part of parliament, to vote the budget; and the Chambers not only call the ministers to account for their administration, but sometimes pretend to change dynasties and to send kings to the scaffold or into exile. Terms have changed; the substance of things remains. In the days of Gregory, no one had heard the maxim that ordinary morality and equity should not regulate government affairs. Then—and let it be noted by those who believe that liberty was born only yesterday—no man was born a king. He was elected a king, and merit was a condition of his election. Kings were not despots, but were limited by the Assemblies of the nation, and the supreme authority of the Pope was acknowledged, not only by the Canon, but by the civil law.” (1)

CHAPTER XII.

THE ELECTION OF THE ROMAN PONTIFF, AND HILDEBRAND'S DEFENCE OF ITS FREEDOM.

When Pope St. Gregory VII. ascended the Pontifical throne, many abuses claimed his immediate attention, but there was one the thought of which stirred his inmost soul, for often its exercise nearly annihilated the Apostolic liberty of Christ's vicar, and nearly neutralized his influence over the hearts of men. For a long time princes had more or less controlled the Papal elections, and the emperors “of the Romans” now claimed a right to exercise such control. Of the few “bad Popes” who have reigned, nearly all owed their elevation to the schemes of princes. When Hildebrand was elected, the Christian world yet blushed at the memory of John X., thrust upon the Papal throne by Theodora, his mistress (2); of Sergius III., who also owed

(1) Illustrious Italians, vol. i., art. Gregory VII. (Milan, 1873).

(2) In early life, John frequently came to Rome on business for the archbishop of Ravenna, his ordinary. Being possessed of great beauty, he touched the imagination of Theodora, a noble Roman dame, and she succeeded in seducing him. She soon procured for him the see of Ravenna, and finally, that she might keep him in Rome, intrigued with Landolph, prince of Benevento and Capua, to raise him to the Papacy, in 915. After his elevation, John emancipated himself from Theodora's influence and rendered great service to the Church and to Italy. In 928, Marozia, a daughter of Theodora and duchess of Tuscany, who had inherited her mother's power in Rome, fearing to lose her influence if Hugh of Provence, whom John favored, were made emperor, seized the Pope, threw him into a dungeon, and there had him assassinated. See LUTPRAND, B. III., c. 12. FLODOARD, Chronicle, year 929.

his elevation to the schemes of a mistress, Marozia ; of John XI., son of this Marozia, perhaps by Sergius III. (1). Four successive Pontiffs owed their election to Alberic, the son of Marozia and half-brother to John XI., whom he imprisoned ; and the influence of this family procured the tiara for Octavian, (John XII.), son of Alberic, when he was only eighteen years old. To obviate these evils, St. Gregory VII. used all his energy to restore to the Holy See its freedom of election. We now proceed to give a brief description of the various phases through which the system of elections passed, from the days of St. Peter to those of Hildebrand.

Down to the time of Constantine, the only relations between the Pontiffs and the emperors were those of persecuted and persecutors ; but for this very reason, while there was no external liberty for the Church, her internal liberty was inviolate. Receiving no favors from the state, the Holy See was forced to grant none, and the clergy and people of Rome were free to choose their pastor. Nor is it strange that, at that time, unworthy arts were seldom employed to secure the prize of the Papacy. Torture and death were the almost certain earthly rewards of the office. Nor was liberty of election infringed by the early successors of Constantine. In the schism of Ursicinus against Pope St. Damasus (367), and of Eulalius against St. Boniface I. (418), the emperors followed and defended the decision of the better and greater part of the clergy. Odoacer, king of the Heruli (476), was the first ruler who forgot his duty in this matter. His edict was recited in the fourth Synod of Pope Symmachus by the deacon Hormisdas, and from it we learn that Pope Simplicius (467—483) had requested that the prince would repress any tumults that might occur at the election of his successor, and that Odoacer thereupon decreed that no Papal election should be held without his advice and sanction. This decree was never put into execution, and the fourth Synod of Symmachus protested that "for a layman to interfere in an ecclesiastical election was plainly against the Canons."

(1) So says Luitprand, but other authors ascribe John's paternity to Marozia's second husband, Guy of Tuscany.

When, in 526, Theodoric the Ostrogoth had thrown Pope John I. into prison, there to perish, he compelled the Romans to receive Felix IV. As Felix was a reputable and fit man, the clergy deemed it best to acquiesce, and after a short time they consented to his elevation. Atalaric (526) decreed that the Pontifical election should be made, indeed, by the Roman clergy, but that a notification, accompanied by a donation of 3000 ducats, should be sent to the king of Italy. Here we may observe that neither the Western emperors nor the Gothic kings of Italy ever claimed an originary and inborn power of controlling a Papal election; they merely pretended to obviate discord. This originary and inborn right of princes is generally conceded by the olden Protestant jurists (1) and by Catholics of the stamp of Hontheim (Febronius) and Giannone. Their principle, "his is the religion, whose is the region," necessarily involves such a claim. But, says Muratori, "the kings of Italy never claimed (in a Papal election) the right of eminent dominion . . . the Western emperors never exercised that power." We may also note that, during the domination of the Western emperors and of the Gothic kings, there is no vestige of any recognition, on the part of the Church, of any princely right to interfere in a Papal election; when the clergy yielded, as in the case of Silverius, imposed upon them by Theodatus (536), it was under protest, and to avoid greater evils. When the valor of Belisarius had subverted the Gothic rule in Italy (536), and restored the peninsula and adjacent islands to the empire of Constantinople, the emperors insisted that the certificate of a Papal election should be sent to them; but they did this without any pretense of interference, and only for the sake of the donation which was to accompany the document. Cardinal Deusdedit speaks of this custom as follows: "While we read that the decree of election was frequently sent to the emperors, we never read that they contradicted the choice of the Romans. . . . After a time this custom came to an end, or at the most, it was only kept up by the exarchs of Ravenna. For we read that at this period the interpontificia (1) were very short. The interpontificia are counted from the burial of the deceased Pope until the day of consecration of the new one. Three acts were performed in regard to a new Pontiff: the election, which was restricted to no definite locality; the enthronization, in the Lateran; the consecration, in the Vatican basilica. Sometimes the enthronization or legitimate 'possession' (2) preceded the consecration; hence the duration of the interpontificium is calculated up to the day of consecration. When, then, we see that there was a very brief interpontificium, we may conclude that the consecration was performed without the assent of the emperor, since there was not sufficient time to obtain it." (3). The emperor Constantine Pogonatus (668) remitted the odious tax on a confirmatory decree, although he at first insisted upon the imperial assent being obtained for the consecration; but finally, as we learn from Anastasius (4), he issued a decree, permitting that "the one elected to the Apostolic See should be consecrated without delay." Here again, then, just as in the case of the Western emperors and the Gothic kings of Italy, we find that the Eastern emperors claimed no right of eminent dominion in confirming a Papal election.

(1) See PUFFENDORF and GROTIUS, passim.

The emperor Charlemagne carefully abstained from any interference in Pontifical elections. Florus the Deacon, writing in the middle of the ninth century, says: "We observe that in the Roman Church, down to the present day, the Pontiff is consecrated after the manifestation of the divine judgment, and without any interposition of princely consent." (5). Equally just was Louis the Compliant, as is proved by Leo of Ostia, Anselm, and Ivo, who give his decree, ordering that Papal elections shall proceed, "according to the Canons, without contradiction; and when the Pontiff shall have been consecrated, he shall send unto us legates, who will confirm peace, charity, and friendship between him and ourselves, as was the custom in the times of our great-grandfather, Charles (Martel), of our grandfather, Pepin, and of our father, the emperor Charles, all of blessed

(1) This term corresponds to the "interregnum" of civil governments.

(2) In Italian, il possesso.

(3) Against Schismatics, B. i.

(4) Lives of St. Benedict II. and John V.

(5) Election of Bishops.

memory." But the emperor Lothaire (840-855), as we read in the Bertinian Annals, did interfere in Papal elections. He sent Hulderic to Rome, in 844, with orders that "hereafter, on the death of the Apostolic, no one shall be consecrated Pontiff without our consent, or in the absence of our ambassadors." Some critics deny the authenticity of this decree, but we know that at this time the interpontificia were unusually long; thus sixty-five days elapsed between the death of Valentine and the election of Gregory IV. Again, the interference of Lothaire is plainly shown by the Bertinian Annals, when they tell us that, on the death of Valentine, "the priest Gregory was elected, but not consecrated, until the imperial legate had come to Rome and inquired into the election." This move of Lothaire, however, was of little consequence. Sergius II. succeeded Gregory IV. fifteen days after the latter's death, and Anastasius says of St. Leo IV. (847) that "they consecrated him Pontiff without the permission of the prince." Again, down to 884. the interpontificia were very short; from Leo IV. to Benedict III., forty-four days; from the latter to Nicholas I., fourteen days; from John VIII. to Martin II., seven days; from Martin II. to Adrian II., six days. Here we must make mention of a decree of Pope Stephen IV. (1), which we find in Anastasius and in Anselm of Lucca: "Under pain of anathema we decree that no layman, whether of the civil or military order, presume to be found at an election of a Pontiff; let the election be made by certain priests and officers of the Church, and by the entire clergy."

We now approach the period when the liberty of the Church was to be attacked by those whose first duty, inculcated especially by their coronation oath, was its defense. It was reserved for the emperors of the German line to attempt to destroy that which the Byzantine sovereigns, the Gothic kings of Italy, and the French emperors, had scrupulously respected. In Dist. 63, chap. Synod, Gratian gives a decree of the anti-Pope Leo VIII., in which that intruder pretended, in return for his elevation, to concede to

(1) Some chronologists call him Stephen III., since they wish not to count Stephen II. (752), who died before his consecration, on the third day after his election.

Otho I. and his successors the right of choosing the Roman Pontiff. In our chapter on the Pretended Deposition of John XII. we have given the reasons for which Baronio regards this decree as supposititious (1), but here we will remark that, even though it be authentic, it can have no value, being the work, not of a legitimate, but of an anti-Pope. However, all the early German sovereigns interfered, more or less, in the Papal elections, and, on the Christmas of 1049, the deacon Hildebrand, the future Gregory VII., first displayed his invincible opposition to their usurpation. It was then that he persuaded Bruno, bishop of Toul, who had just been named Pontiff by a Synod at Worms, and who stopped at Cluny on his way to Rome, to doff the Pontifical robes, and to proceed to the Eternal City, dressed as a pilgrim, and to await his election by the Roman clergy. Hildebrand's second opportunity of combatting the imperial pretensions arrived in 1054. As we have seen, he had been for five years a cardinal-deacon, and was regarded as the right-arm of the Holy See. He was sent to Germany, on the death of Leo IX., to select, in the name of the Roman clergy and people, a new Pontiff. His choice fell on Gebhard, bishop of Eichstadt, a man of much prudence, and much loved by Henry III. (2); but when Hildebrand met Henry at Mayence, and mentioned his preference, the emperor again and again suggested another person for the Papacy. But Hildebrand persisted, and finally Gebhard departed for Rome, where he was formally elected by the clergy and people, and took the name of Victor II. And here we may observe that, while Hildebrand was determined that only the clergy and people of Rome should elect their Pontiff, he was too much of a statesman to unnecessarily excite the ill-will of the emperors. In his time, men had not excogitated the principle, nowadays so often badly applied, of a "free Church in a free state;" his idea was rather to preserve a harmony between Church and state, each being independent in its own sphere, but each helping the other. Thus, in the election of Leo IX. at Worms, he did not resist the emperor, but merely insisted that the Romans

(1) Bianchi and Catalani also reject it.

(2) LEO OF OSTIA, Cassinese Chronicle, b. ii., c. 80.

themselves should first signify their will ; in the election of Victor II., he preferred a person beloved by the emperor.

During the reign of Nicholas II., Hildebrand procured, in a Roman Synod, held in 1059, the publication of a decree which would define the limits of the two powers in the matter of an election. It reads as follows : " The cardinal-bishops will carefully consult together, and will immediately convene with the cardinal-priests and deacons ; then the remaining clergy and the people will approach to give their consent to the election. . . . they will select one from the bosom of the Roman Church, if one can be found fit ; but if such is not found, let him be taken from another church, saving the honor and reverence due to our dear son Henry, at present king, and, as is hoped, God granting, future emperor, as we have conceded this to him and his successors, who will personally ask the Apostolic See for this right." (1) This decree was signed by eighty persons, archbishops, bishops, priests, and deacons. " It is certain," says the Protestant Voigt, " that this Canon was a masterpiece of Pontifical wisdom, or rather of that of Hildebrand. It took from the emperor the right of approving of the election of Popes, a right until then uncontested. The Canon does not expressly state this, but it says sufficient when it exacts that the emperor shall ask the Pope himself for the right." The death of Nicholas II., in 1061, was to test the value of the above decree. On the invitation of Hildebrand, then archdeacon of the Roman Church, the cardinals assembled and chose Anselm, bishop of Lucca, a man of great learning and austere morals, who took the name of Alexander II. When the news of this election reached Germany, a number of imperialist prelates assembled at Basel ; most of them came from Lombardy, led by Gilbert of Parma, the royal chancellor, whom Nicholas of Aragon calls " a most wicked man." These bishops

(1) Muratori edited this decree from the Farfensan Chronicle, and it agrees with the testimony of St. Peter Damian, B. I., 20. But the cardinals Deusdedit and Baronio refuse to give it implicit credit, asserting that it was mutilated and corrupted by schismatics. Certainly no credence is to be accorded it, merely because Gratian gives it (dist. 23, c. in nomine), for he lived a century after, and records many apocryphal Canons and Pontifical elections. But it seems to be genuine, if we read St. Damian's Dialogue between himself and the royal advocate. The saint never denies the existence of the privilege which the king claimed as his by Apostolic concession, but he constantly insists that Henry IV. had rendered himself unworthy to exercise it.

resolved to recognize only a Pontiff taken from "the Paradise of Italy," as they styled Lombardy, and they inveighed most bitterly against the decree of Nicholas II. Shortly afterwards the bishops of Piacenza and Vercelli formed themselves into a Synod, and elected as Pontiff Cadalao, bishop of Parma, who assumed the name of Honorius II. Our limits will not permit of our entering into the details of this schism. While it was at its height, a Council of Italian and German bishops was held at Osbor (1) in 1062, as a means of reunion. Here was read a remarkable letter of St. Peter Damian, and as it throws much light upon the events of the day, and explains the plans of Hildebrand, we give a few extracts from it. It purports to be a dialogue between a defender of the Roman Church and a royal advocate. "Defender. This is a question which, if well settled, will settle the rest (2); but which, left uncertain, will cause all else to be dubious, since it is the basis of all other disputes. The king, or the emperor, or perhaps an irreproachable representative of each, used to arrange, according to their will and power, the sees of the patriarchs, the limits of the metropolitans, the jurisdiction of the bishops, the dignities of the churches, and of each order. They regulated, in a uniform manner, the extent of ecclesiastical prerogatives. But the Roman Church is founded and built upon the rock of faith, by no will or intention of man, but by that Word which made heaven and earth. On this power she relies. It is certain that he is unjust who deprives a church of any one of her rights, and that he is a heretic who takes from the Roman Church that supremacy which she received from the Head of all the churches. Advocate. I contend that, in naming a Pope without the consent of the king, the Roman Church has violated the rights, and dishonored the majesty, of the sovereign. Def. Before speaking of violated rights, let us see whether the Pope can be named without the king's consent. Adv. Clearly, the Pope ought to be elected by those who, according to the holy Canons, are to obey him;

(1) So the locality is designated by Damian; where it was, is now unknown.

(2) That is, whether the Pope should be chosen by the Church, or by the monarch, or by both in concert. In the above Dialogue, we give the synopsis of Voigt.

now, the Roman people, and the emperor, who is their head, are bound to obey him as their Sovereign Pontiff. The question then is, whether the people, without their head, can perform an election; whether the people should obey a Pope whom the emperor has not chosen. It is shown, then, that a Pontifical election is not complete unless it is confirmed by the king of the Romans." The Papal defender then shows, by many examples, that temporal princes have not exercised great influence in ecclesiastical elections, and he concludes that, since the head of Christianity was established by the King of Heaven, the king of the earth should not interfere with him. The emperor has no power in the Church; why then ought not the Pope be elected without his approbation? The advocate admits this proposition, but he advances another: "It cannot be denied that Henry III., father of our present monarch, was made 'Patrician of the Romans,' and received from them the first place in the election of a Pope. And what is more, Pope Nicholas confirmed, by a Synodal decree, this privilege which the king already had from his father." The defender does not contest the reality of the privilege, but falls back on the minority of the king. The Church, he says, is the young king's mother; he is merely a child, needing a tutor. How can he choose a Pope? Adv. "Defend what you please, but you cannot change what a Pope has established and confirmed. Def. Cannot a weak man change his arrangements, when even the Almighty does so? The defender then proves this assertion by Scripture, and concludes the Dialogue as follows: "We, counsellors of the crown, and servants of the Holy See, make common efforts for the union of the Priesthood and the Empire, in order that the human race, governed by these two powers, may never be divided, that they may sustain each other like the two poles of the earth, and that the peoples may not become indocile because of their differences; so that, as the Mediator between God and man has mysteriously united royalty and the priesthood, their two heads may be united by a mutual affection, and the king be found in the Roman Pontiff, and the Pontiff in the king; saving the right of the Pontiff, which he alone can exercise. Let the Pope repress criminals by the law of the prince; and let the prince order, through the bishops, according to the holy Canons, what concerns the salvation of souls. Let the Pope, as the father, have the pre-eminence; let the king, as an only son, repose in the arms of the Pontiff's affection."

In this Synod of Osbor the infamous Cadalao was solemnly and effectively deposed. When Hildebrand became Pontiff, he continued, with greater zeal, his struggle for the independence of the Church, and his last act was a protest against princely interference in Papal elections. His victory was a lasting one, for, as Pagi says: "We have carefully examined, and we have found that Gregory VII. was the last Pontiff whose election was signified to the emperor before his consecration."

CHAPTER XIII.

THE QUESTION OF INVESTITURES.

According to ancient custom, the election of bishops had depended on the votes of the clergy, the testimony of the people, and the consent of the provincial prelates. But in course of time sovereigns arrogated to themselves, and with some show of reason, a right of interference in these elections. The piety of the great and wealthy had endowed the churches and monasteries with lands; the interest of sovereigns had caused them to give the rank of temporal lords to men upon whose fidelity they could depend. Nearly every bishop and abbot was a feudal dignitary, and subject therefore, as such, to the same obligations, either personally or by substitute, as the secular noble. Every possessor of a fief held it by virtue of an investiture from his lord or suzerain, and this investiture was conferred with certain ceremonies, more or less solemn and symbolical, according to the nature of the fief. Hence it came to pass that, when an ecclesiastic had been chosen as bishop for a vacant see, or a monk had been elected by his brethren to an abbacy, the elect applied to the sovereign for his induction into the fiefs or regalia pertaining to his particular diocese or monastery. Before he received his investiture the elect gave hominium, or homage, for his fief, and swore fidelity to his suzerain. So long as the sovereigns were content with an exercise of the right of investiture within these limits, the Church did not complain. There were, doubtless, many inconveniences in the system, but it was considered that they were more than counterbalanced by the accession of dignity and influence which accrued from the elevation of the bishops and abbots to a position among the temporal rulers of the earth. But in time Cæsar became dissatisfied with the possession of only those things which belonged to him; he laid his hand upon the things of God. Under the pretext that he had a right to see that the regalia of his spiritual fiefs did not fall into the hands of his enemies, he did not always confer them upon the canonically elected person. Then he commenced to ignore the election altogether, and to nominate whom he would to the vacancy. Hence an opening to favoritism, to simony, and to every species of irregularity. In some countries, immediately upon the death of a prelate, his crosier and ring, the emblems of his spiritual jurisdiction, were taken to the sovereign, to be retained by him until he saw fit to confer them upon an acceptable candidate; too frequently this candidate had no merit beyond the love of the sovereign or a plethoric purse. In all countries where the feudal system had obtained, the granting of the regalia was effected by the suzerain's presenting the staff and ring to the beneficiary. Until that ceremony had been performed, whether he was canonically elected or not, whether he was consecrated or not, no bishop or abbot could enter upon the duties of his office. In taking a determined stand, therefore, against this method of investiture, the Roman Pontiffs derogated from no legitimate right of a sovereign; they simply insisted upon the inherent and divinely accorded right of the Church to elect her own pastors. They did not wish a prelate to obtain the fiefs annexed to his charge by any evasion of the temporal duties thereto attached:

they merely contended that those fiefs should not be accorded by the suzerain in a manner which would imply that the said suzerain was the source of the prelate's spiritual jurisdiction. For nearly half a century Rome fought this battle with the great ones of the earth, but principally with the German sovereigns. Finally, as we shall see, she was victorious.

In France the exercise of the right of investiture was as ancient as the monarchy itself. It is recognized in the tenth Canon of the fifth Council of Orleans, held in 549, during the reign of the great Clovis; and is claimed in an edict of Clothaire II., in 615. The ancient writer of the Life of St. Romanus of Rouen speaks of the Saint as receiving the crosier from Clovis II., and being "therefore" enthroned as bishop, in 623. Gregory of Tours and Fortunatus assign to the order or consent of Clovis II. the election of Quintian and of Gallus of Auvergne; to that of Childebert the episcopacy of Germain of Paris; to that of Clothaire II. the choice of Euphronius of Tours, and of other bishops. In the Appendix to the second volume of the Councils of France, edited by Sirmond, there are several ancient formulas used by the Merovingian kings in the granting of investitures. In one of them, the king says to the elected: "By the advice and will of our bishops and nobles, according to the will and consent of the clergy and people of the said city, we commit to you the episcopal dignity, in the name of God. Therefore, by the present precept we decree and command that the aforesaid city or things of its church, and its clergy, remain under your will and government." Under the Merovingians and Carolingians, the French church experienced but little trouble from the system of royal investiture; but under the Capetians, simony was quite frequent, especially during the reign of Philip I. St. Gregory VII., writing to the bishop of Chalons (1), says: "Among other princes of our time who have desolated the Church of God by simony, and have crushed their mother into the condition of a handmaid, Philip, king of France, has so oppressed the church of

(1) Epistles, B. I, n. 35.

France, as we have learned from reliable sources, that he seems to have arrived at the very depth of this detestable iniquity. We have been the more grieved because of this state of things in that kingdom, on account of its well-known prudence, religion, power, and devotion to the Roman Church. The desolation of the churches, and our general pastoral solicitude, have urged us to reprove most severely such audacious excesses; but since he has, through his private chamberlain Alberic, just now earnestly promised to change his life, and to arrange ecclesiastical affairs according to our judgment, we have delayed to exercise the rigor of the Canons. We wish, however, first to test the value of his promise in the affair of the church of Matiscon, long bereft of a pastor and reduced to extremity; that is, we desire that the archdeacon of Autun, already elected by the unanimous voice of the clergy and people, and as we have heard, with the consent of the king himself, be installed at the head of that church, having received gratis, as is proper, the episcopal position." According to the system permitted by the Holy See, therefore, a widowed diocese was to be provided for in this manner. The election by the clergy should first take place; then the approval of the king was to be requested; then the investiture was to be granted, but always gratis; finally, the consecration was to take place. It was only owing to the royal violation of these wise regulations that trouble arose in any country.

The system of investiture was very old in England. William of Malmesbury (1), speaking of the privileges of the monastery of Glastonbury, says that "King Edgar decreed that the monks should always elect their abbot; but he reserved, for himself and his heirs, the power of giving the pastoral staff to the brother elected." St. Wulstan, bishop of Worcester, received his investiture from king St. Edward, and when he was accused of "illiteracy and simplicity, and of being almost an idiot, and ignorant of the French language, and unable to assist at the royal council." (2) he refused to resign his crosier to William the

(1) Deeds of the English Kings, B. II., c. 8.

(2) MATTHEW OF PARIS, year 1095.

Conqueror, who had not given it to him, but, approaching the tomb of St. Edward, there laid down the emblem of his dignity (1). Ordericus Vitalis (2) gives a favorable picture of the conduct of the Conqueror in the matter of investiture, and says that he always deferred to the judgment of the wise "during the fifty-six years in which he held the reins of government either in Normandy or in England, thus leaving a good example to his posterity. He detested every kind of simony; and hence, in choosing abbots and bishops, he regarded the sanctity and wisdom of the person, rather than his wealth or power." But Ingulf, abbot of Croyland, talks in a very different manner of William's proceedings, saying that "for many years, there has been no really free and canonical election of prelates; all the episcopal and abbatial dignities have been given by the royal court, through ring and staff, just as it pleased." And Gervase, a monk of Canterbury, says of Lanfranc: "He asked the king to give him the abbey (Canterbury), as all his predecessors had possessed it. The king replied that he would like to have all the pastoral staffs in England in his own hand. At this, Lanfranc wondered; but, for the greater good of the Church, which he could not effect without the king, he held his peace for the time." The successors of the Conqueror exercised the right of investiture in a shameless manner; William Rufus (1087-1100) especially distinguished himself as a public auctioneer in conferring every ecclesiastical office that fell vacant. Under Henry I. (1100-1135) things came to a crisis, thanks to the zeal and determination of St. Anselm of Canterbury. This prelate had attended a Roman Synod, in which excommunication had been pronounced against all lay patrons of ring and crosier,

(1) Matthew records that Wulstan replied to Lanfranc: "I well know that I am not worthy of this honor, nor am I equal to the labor; but you should not demand my pastoral staff, since you did not give it to me. Obeying your sentence, however, I shall resign the crosier; but I will do what is more fitting, if I yield it to St. Edward, by whose authority I received it." Then going to the tomb, he thus apostrophized the saint: "Most holy king Edward, thou knowest how unwillingly I assumed this burden; how often I absented myself, when they sought me. Nor do I deny that I was unwise, but thou didst compel me. For although they were not wanting an election, the petition of the people, the will of the bishops, and the grace of the nobility, yet it was thy authority and will that turned the scale. But now there came a new king, a new law, and new prelates, and they issue new decrees. They charge thee with error, because thou madest me a bishop; they accuse me of arrogance, because I yielded. Not to those who demand what they did not give, but to thee, I resign the staff thou gavest; to thee I resign the care of those thou didst entrust to me."

(2) History, B. iv., year 1070.

and when he returned to England, in 1106, he firmly but respectfully informed the king that he would enforce the Synodical decrees. Henry was at that time at war with his brother Robert (1) and knowing how difficult it would be to carry out his projects without the aid of the prelates, he dissimulated, and suggested that a special appeal should be made to the Holy See. The result was that after a long interchange of letters between Rome and England, and a continued series of artifices on the part of Henry, Anselm was persuaded to journey to Rome and personally consult the Pope. He was then ordered by Henry to remain in exile until he had decided to obey the royal behests. For three years the aged and infirm prelate was the guest of the archbishop of Lyons, and during this time Henry was continually annoyed by the murmurs of his barons and people, and by the importunities of queen Matilda and of his sister Adela, countess of Blois, urging him to yield. Finally, having been warned by Pope Paschal that his excommunication was imminent, he met the primate at the abbey of Bec, and abandoned the claim to investiture by staff and ring; reserving, however, the claim of fealty and homage, as civil duties, on the part of bishops and abbots. (2)

St. Gregory VII. was not the first Pontiff to raise his voice against the abuse of investitures, although he was the first to ply the axe to the root of the evil, by decreeing the utter abolition of the system. Pope St. Leo IX. (el. 1049), in the first year of his reign, had decreed, in the Council of Rheims, that "no one should be promoted to the government of a church, unless elected by the clergy and the people." Alexander II., in 1063, had issued a Canon, in a Roman Synod of 110 bishops, declaring that, unless by canonical election, "no one should obtain a church through favor of laics, either for money, or gratis." Nicholas II. (el. 1058), had written to Gervase of Rheims "correct your glorious king; beseech him; admonish him;" because

(1) This prince was the inventor of a profitable improvement in the matter of investiture. He sold the reversion of bishoprics in favor of children, and frequently sold more than one see to the same buyer. So says Ivo of CHARTRES, Epistles 178, 179, 181.

(2) "On the whole," says Lingard, "the Church gained little by the compromise. It might check, but did not abolish, the principal abuse. If Henry surrendered an unnecessary ceremony, he still retained the substance. The right which he assumed of nominating bishops and abbots was left unimpaired, and though he promised not to appropriate to himself the revenues of the vacant benefices, he never hesitated to violate his engagement."

Henry III. had appointed a bishop without a canonical election. Nor did St. Gregory VII. at first wish to abolish the investitures. In an epistle to the Germans (1), he simply besought that no interference should be made with the freedom of elections: "Let him use counsellors who love God, and not merely their own gain; men who will prefer God to all worldly profit. Let him no longer think that the Church is, like a handmaid, subject to him; let him regard her as placed above him, as a mistress." Before he proceeded to the extremity of abolition, Gregory, says William of Tyre, (2) "seeing that the rights of the Church were down-trodden, again and again admonished the same emperor to desist from such detestable presumption." Only when he found that no other course was left, did the Pontiff, says William of Malmesbury, (3) "openly effect what others had threatened to do, excommunicating all who received investiture of their churches from the hands of a layman by means of staff and ring." Hugh of Flacigny, in the Chronicle of Verdun, gives us the decree which was issued in Gregory's Second Roman Synod, held in 1075: "If any one hereafter receives a bishopric or an abbacy from the hands of any lay person, let him not be received among bishops or abbots, or receive any hearing as a bishop or abbot. We also deprive him of the grace of Blessed Peter, and debar him from entrance into a church, until he shall have relinquished the position which he has occupied in ambition and in disobedience, which is the wickedness of idolatry. We decree the same in reference to the inferior ecclesiastical dignities. Also, if any emperor, duke, marquis, count, or any other secular power or person, presumes to give the investiture of a bishopric or of any ecclesiastical dignity, let him know that he falls under the same sentence." This decree was confirmed in the Roman Synods of 1078 and 1080.

The immediate successors of St. Gregory VII. imitated his firmness in the matter of investitures. Victor III. renewed the prohibitory decree in the Synod of Benevento, held in 1087; and Urban II. did the same in the Synod of

(1) B. iv., Epist. 3.

(2) Sacred War, B. i., c. 13.

(3) Deeds of the English Kings, B. iii.

Amalfi, in 1089, in a Synod at Claremont, in 1095, and in a Roman Synod, in 1099. While the German and English sovereigns persisted in the obnoxious system, king Philip I. of France readily obeyed, relinquishing the solemn delivery of the staff and ring, but receiving, as was perfectly reasonable, the oath of fidelity for the fiefs, into possession of which the newly elected was inducted. In fact, Ivo of Chartres (1) attests that the concord between the Holy See and the French monarchs was never disturbed by the question of investitures.

In the year 1106, Paschal II. held a Synod at Guastalla, at which were present the ambassadors of Henry V. of Germany. Another decree against investitures was issued in these words : " For a long time the Catholic Church has been oppressed by wicked men, both lay and clerical ; hence, in our days, many schisms and heresies have been born. However, by the grace of God, she now regains her proper liberty, the authors of this wickedness having departed. We must therefore take care that the causes of these schisms be entirely removed. Agreeing, therefore, with the Constitutions of our fathers, we absolutely prohibit the giving by laymen of ecclesiastical investitures ; and if any one braves this decree, let him, as guilty of injury toward his mother, be removed from his dignity, if he is a cleric ; be debarred from entrance to a church, if he is a layman." Pope Paschal had intended, after holding the Synod of Guastalla, to proceed to Germany, hoping that his presence would contribute to a settlement of all troubles ; but his counsellors persuaded him that it would be injudicious to trust himself to the courtesy of the young Henry. He accordingly journeyed into France, in 1107, to seek the aid, or at least the influence, of king Philip, in his struggle with the German monarch. Suger, then a monk, and afterwards abbot of St. Denis, gives us an interesting account of this visit (2). After the Pontiff had paid his respects to the shrine of St. Denis, " king Philip and the lord Louis, his son, gratefully came here to meet him, prostrating, for the love of God, the royal majesty at his feet ; just as kings

(1) Epistle to Paschal II., 253.

(2) Life of Louis the Fat, c. 9.

are accustomed, having offered their diadems, to bow before the tomb of the fisherman Peter. The lord Pope raised them with his hand, and caused them, as most devout children of the Apostles, to come before him. He then conferred with them upon the state of the Church in a wise manner, and familiarly; blandly influencing them to give aid to Blessed Peter and his vicar, to take the Church by the hand, and to strenuously oppose all tyrants and foes of the Church, especially the emperor Henry. They gave the Pontiff their right hands, in token of friendship, advice, and assistance." The Pontiff having promised to receive the ambassadors of Henry V. at Chalons-sur-Marne, they came to the audience, "not humble, but rigid and obstinate; leaving behind (at St. Menge's) the chancellor Albert, through whose tongue and heart the emperor acted; the others coming to the court with an immense retinue, much pomp, and excessively bedecked. These were the archbishop of Treves, the bishops of Halberstadt and Munster, a great number of counts, and the duke Guelph, with a sword carried before him—a corpulent man, wonderful and boisterous through his whole extent of length and breadth—and all this noisy crowd seemed to have been sent to terrify, rather than to reason. The archbishop of Treves, an elegant and jovial man, well practised in the speech of France, then held forth, tendering greeting and service, saving the rights of his kingdom, to the lord Pope and the court, on the part of the lord emperor. Carrying out his instructions, he said: 'Such is the cause of our lord the emperor, in behalf of whom we are sent. In the days of our predecessors, the holy and apostolic Gregory the Great and others, it was acknowledged as a right of the empire, that, before an election could be held, the ear of the emperor should be sought, and if the person in view proved acceptable, the imperial consent should be given; then, according to the Canons, the petition of the people, the election by the clergy, and the assent of the great (honoratorum), should take place; finally, the consecrated person should go to the emperor for the regalia, that is, to be invested with staff and ring, and to swear fidelity and do homage. And no wonder, for cities, castles, marches, etc., can be obtained in no other way. If the lord Pope agrees to these things, there shall be prosperity and peace in Church and kingdom, to the honor of God.' To these things the lord Pope considerably replied, through the bishop of Piacenza: 'The Church being redeemed by the Precious Blood of Jesus Christ, and established in freedom, cannot again be reduced to the condition of a handmaid. If the Church cannot elect a pastor without consulting the sovereign, the death of Christ is rendered null, and she is servilely subjected to that sovereign: if the ring and staff are used for investiture, the things of God are usurped by the prince, for the ring and staff are religious symbols; if the hands consecrated to the Lord's Body and Blood are subjected, in obligation, to the hands of a layman reeking with human blood, there is an insult to Holy Orders and the Holy Unction.' When the stiff-necked ambassadors had heard this answer, their rage became frenzy, and if they could have done so with impunity, they would have insulted the Pontiff. But, continues Suger, they replied: "'not here, but at Rome, the quarrel shall be settled by the sword' When they had departed, the lord Pope proceeded to Troyes, and celebrated the long-proposed Council; then he safely returned to the See of Peter, with the love of the French, who had served him well, and with the fear and hatred of the Germans." In the year 1108, Pope Paschal reiterated the condemnation of investitures in the Synod of Benevento, and in 1110 he did the same in a Roman Synod.

The question of investitures now assumed another and a bloody aspect. (1) Henry V. moved from Germany at the head of an immense army, passed through Savoy, and penetrated into Italy. The Lombard cities prepared to defend themselves, but, terrified by the fate of Novara, which Henry gave to the flames, they soon made overtures of peace. The great countess, Matilda, shut herself in her stronghold of Canossa, but promised Henry that she would not attack him in the rear, and as he had enough on his hands, the monarch feigned to be satisfied, reviewed his army in the plains of Roncaglia, and marched on Rome. Pope Paschal looked vainly around for succor. Many of the Lombard cities had formally submitted to Henry, others thought only of their own affairs. Venice, Genoa, and Pisa were too busy making money out of the Crusades, furnishing provisions of all kinds to the heroes in the Holy Land. The strength of the Normans was enrolled under the cross; the duke of the Puglia, Calabria, and Sicily, was a child (Roger II.), under the regency of a timid woman. Abandoned by all, the venerable Pontiff, weakened by age, had recourse to negotiations. But Henry was firm in retaining his hold on the investitures, and Paschal just as firm in his design to abolish them. At length, after many proposals and rejections, the Pontiff, to the astonishment of the world, made the following proposition. All ecclesiastics, without exception, were to yield up to Henry all their fiefs and regalia, whatever they had received from the empire and the kingdom; and on his side, Henry was to renounce the right of investiture with staff and ring. It is easy to imagine the joy with which Henry acceded to this proposal. Here were the means of attaching more and more to his person a large number of creatures, who would be dependent upon him alone, and not hold an allegiance to Pope as well as to emperor. Hostages were immediately exchanged, and Henry prepared to enter the Eternal City. Toward Monte Mario proceeded the officers of the Papal court to meet him, and they were accompanied by crowds of the people, carrying garlands, palms, and olive-branches. Outside the Leonine city were stationed bands of Jewish youth, and in the arch of the gate were placed Greek boys and girls; and as the king approached, Hebrew and Greek hymns of praise saluted his ears. All the Roman clergy were within the gate, arrayed in their most gorgeous vestments, and flanked by bands of monks with lighted torches. In spite of all this peaceful appearance, the suspicious Henry would not enter within the walls, until all the gates and strategic points were handed over to his soldiers. On the steps of St.

(1) The events we are about to narrate are described by PETER THE DEACON, in the Chronicle of Cassino, B. iv., c. 37; SUGER, loc. cit.; JOHN OF TUSCULUM, Epist. to Richard of Albano; OTHO OF FRISIGNEN, B. vii.

Peter's, Pope Paschal, surrounded by the cardinals and a number of bishops, awaited the king. When Henry arrived, he fell at the Pope's feet, and when lifted, kissed the Pontiff "on the lips, forehead, and eyes: " hand in hand, the two then entered the basilica. But no sooner did it become noised about that all this festive and peaceful scene meant the loss, on the part of the ecclesiastics, of nearly all their temporal possessions, than there ensued a Babel of discord. Nor was Henry disposed to fulfil his part of the agreement, for when "the Pontiff requested him to restore the rights of the Church, as had been agreed in the treaty," the answer was returned that "the treaty could not justly and legitimately be fulfilled." Pope Paschal therefore refused to proceed to the coronation of Henry as emperor; whereupon the monarch caused the Pontiff and many of the cardinals to be confined under military custody. Immediately the Roman people flew to arms, and pouring into the great square of St. Peter's, attacked the German soldiery. The vestibule and steps of the basilica were drenched with the blood of the combatants; Henry himself was wounded in the face, and his horse was killed. The fight lasted several hours, and finally the German king drew off his troops, and, taking with him the captive Pontiff, retired into the Sabine province, where the main body of his army was encamped. During his imprisonment, the determination of Paschal was not shaken by any regard for himself, but after two months of resistance, regard for the Romans, who were suffering greatly from the hardships of war, and pity for his fellow-captives, prompted him to sign the following Privilege (1): "That privilege of dignity which our predecessors conceded to the Catholic emperors, your predecessors, we also concede to your Belovedness, and confirm it by the present page; that you may confer the investiture of staff and ring upon the bishops and abbots of your kingdom, who will have been freely elected, without violence or simony." The Pontiff and king Henry now came together to Rome for the latter's coronation as emperor, but it was probably the most melancholy coronation which

(1) Chronicle of Cassino, B. 17., c. 42.

Rome ever witnessed. During the entire ceremony, so much did the Germans fear another outbreak on the part of the Romans, that the gates of the city were kept closed, and the Leonine city, that is, the Vatican district, was shut up within itself. Immediately after the coronation, the emperor departed for Germany.

So hostile was the majority of the Sacred College to the concession made by Pope Paschal, that there wanted but little to cause an open schism. The Pontiff retired to Terracina, and wished to resign the tiara, but the Roman people and clergy sent him a deputation, begging him to return. He did so, but the reproaches he constantly endured became so painful, that he resolved to submit the question to a Synod. Accordingly, in April, 1112, three hundred bishops met in the Lateran Basilica, and the Pontiff humbly laid the affair before them. According to Godfrey of Viterbo (1), Pope Paschal laid aside the Pontifical insignia and offered to abdicate, if the Synod deemed it best. The result was that, on the last day of the Synod, the Pope issued his Profession of Faith, concluding: "And I receive the decrees of the Roman Pontiffs, especially those of my lord, Pope Gregory VII., and of Pope Urban of blessed memory; whatever they praised, I praise; what they held, I hold; what they confirmed, I confirm; what they condemned, I condemn; what they rejected, I reject; what they interdicted, I interdict; what they prohibited, I prohibit, in all things; and in that state, I shall always persevere." The following sentence was then promulgated: "That Privilege which is not and ought not to be called a Privilege, which was violently extorted by King Henry from the lord Pope Paschal, for the freedom of the Church and of certain captives, we all, met together with the lord Pope in this holy Council, condemn, by the judgment of the Holy Ghost; and we judge it to be null, and we cancel it entirely, and anathematize it as of no authority or power. And it is condemned, because in it is asserted that he who is canonically elected by the clergy and the people can be consecrated by no one until he has been invested by the king; which is contrary to the Holy Ghost and the institutions of the Canons." In the year 1117, Henry V. determined to strike another blow in defense of investitures, and he entered Italy with a large army. The countess Matilda had just died, and the Pontiff knew that the emperor had many partisans in Rome. He therefore betook himself to Benevento, to implore the aid of the Normans. When Henry arrived in Rome, the Ghibelines received him with joy, but as there was no one with whom he could treat on the matter in question, and as he feared the effects of the climate on his army, he soon retired into Lombardy. Pope Paschal now returned, but he soon died. (1118).

(1) Chronicle, part 17.

Three days after the death of Pope Paschal II., the cardinals elected the Cassinese monk, the cardinal John Gaetano, who took the name of Gelasius II. Immediately after the election, the partisans of Henry, headed by Cencio Frangipane, rushed into the Lateran, dragged the new Pontiff from the sanctuary, covered him with blows and outrages, and carrying him half-dead to Frangipane's palace, thrust him into a dungeon. But the horrified people, although many of their leaders were in the emperor's pay, rescued the Pope by force of arms. Gelasius then prepared for his consecration, but before it could be effected, news arrived that Henry was making forced marches on Rome. The Pontiff and his court then embarked on galleys, and although a furious tempest was then raging, set sail for Gaeta. Here he was reverently received by William, duke of the Puglia and of Calabria, and by the principal Southern barons, and was solemnly consecrated. Henry, being now arrived in Rome, again and again sent embassies to Gelasius, inviting him to return to the capital of Christianity, but the Pope feared the fate of his predecessor, and remained within the walls of Gaeta. The furious emperor then called a convention of his ecclesiastical partisans, declared the election of Gelasius null, and caused the pretended election to the Papacy of Maurice Bordino, archbishop of Braga, in Portugal, who is known among the anti-Popes as Gregory VIII. Having obtained from his creature a pseudo-confirmation of the right of investiture, Henry returned to Germany. Gelasius now re-entered Rome, but fear of the Ghibelines very soon caused another flight. At first he sought refuge at Pisa, then at Genoa, and finally made a pilgrimage to Cluny. Here he was taken with his death-sickness, and having caused himself to be laid upon the ground, and his suffering frame to be sprinkled with ashes, he yielded his soul to God, in February, 1119.

Three days after the death of Pope Gelasius II., the cardinals and Roman clergy who had accompanied him to Cluny met in that monastery, and chose for his successor Guido of Burgundy, archbishop of Vienne, in Dauphiny, son of the great William of Burgundy, and uncle of Adelaide, queen of Louis the Fat. The cardinals remaining in Rome having signified their assent, Guido ascended the Papal throne as Calixtus II. Having called a Synod of 213 bishops, and a large number of abbots, at Rheims, in November, 1119, he confirmed the anathemas pronounced against Henry and the anti-Pope Bordone, and re-asserted the abolition of investitures. Being recognized as head of the Church by all but a few of Henry's creatures, he left France in 1121, and entered Rome in triumph. Bordone had retreated and thrown himself into the strongly fortified city of Sutri, relying upon the fidelity of its Ghibeline citizens and confidently expecting aid from Henry. But in a few days the Sutrini, wearied of the state of siege maintained by the troops of Pope Calixtus, and being, besides, terrified by the anathemas which hung over them, seized the wretched Bordone and handed him over to the Papal commander. Conducted to Rome, he finished his days in a monastery. While in France, Pope Calixtus had, for a short time, flattered himself that the question of investitures was at length terminated. The legates of the Pontiff and the imperial representatives had met near Metz, and had signed a compact, whereby the emperor resigned all claim to investitures, and the Pontiff admitted Henry to communion. This convention having been reported to Calixtus, then at Rheims, he sent to the camp of Henry the cardinal John of Ostia and three other legates, to urge the emperor to immediately fulfil his part of the compact. To their indignation, Henry hesitated and demanded delay, that he might consult the princes of the empire. Day after day the final settlement was postponed until, at length, nothing seemed to stand in the way of peace, but the comparatively unimportant question as to whether the emperor should publicly, and bare-footed, beg the Pontiff's pardon. The Pope had already advanced considerably on the way to the interview, when the legates began to suspect a trap on the part of the unscrupulous Henry. They found that he had collected a force of thirty thousand men and that the number was hourly increasing. Hurriedly returning to Calixtus, they prevailed upon him to turn aside and take refuge in the camp of the powerful count of Troyes. Henry then wrote to the count, asking him to detain the Pontiff for one day, that the peace might be concluded. The faithful noble refused to interfere, and before daylight Calixtus started for Rheims, making the journey of twenty leagues in time to celebrate mass the same day, and consecrate the bishop of Liege. Calling together the members of the Synod then sitting in Rheims, Calixtus re-excommunicated Henry. In 1121, as we have said, the Pontiff returned to his capital. He soon learned that Henry was, at length, sincerely desirous of peace. Profoundly discouraged by the fall of Bordone and by the reconciliation of the clergy and people of Lombardy with the Holy See, and finding that his own Germans were heartily sick of the long struggle with the Papacy, the monarch finally yielded to the prayers of the barons, and made overtures to Calixtus. The bishop of Spire and the abbot of Fulda were sent to Rome, with instructions to request the convocation of a general Council, "in order that whatever could not be settled by human judgment, might be arranged by the Holy Ghost." The Pope then commissioned the cardinal Lambert of Ostia and two other cardinals to receive Henry into the Church, after he had abandoned all claim to investiture, and to accord to him the right of superintending elections, and of giving the regalia, by means of the sceptre. The following agreement was presented to the Diet at Worms: "I, Henry, by the grace of God, august emperor of the Romans, for the love of God and of the lord Pope Calixtus, and for the good of my soul, do yield to God and to his holy apostles Peter and Paul, and to the Holy Catholic Church, every investiture by staff and ring, and do grant that in all churches free election and consecration be held. I restore to the same Holy Roman Church all the possessions and regalia of Blessed Peter which have been appropriated from the beginning of this discord until to-day, and which I hold ; and as for those which I do not hold, I shall faithfully see that they are restored. I shall also faithfully help in the restitution of the possessions of all the other churches, of the princes, and of others, both clerics and laymen ; and I accord true peace to the lord Pope Calixtus, to the Holy Roman Church, and to all who are or have been on their side ; and I shall faithfully aid the Holy Roman Church in all she asks of me.—I, Calixtus, servant of the servants of God, do grant unto thee, beloved son Henry, by the grace of God, august emperor of the Romans, that in thy presence be held, without simony or any violence, those elections of bishops and abbots of the German kingdom, which belong to the kingdom ; so that, if any discord shall arise between the parties, thou mayest, by the advice and judgment of the metropolitan and provincials, give countenance and aid to the deserving side. The person elected shall receive the regalia from thee, by means of the sceptre, and shall effect what he owes to thee of right ; excepting all those things which are known to belong to the Roman Church. Any one, however, who is consecrated in other parts of the empire, shall receive from thee the regalia, by means of the sceptre, within six months. I shall grant my aid, according to the duties of my office, in all things of which thou mayest complain to me. I accord true peace to thee, and to all who are or have been on thy side during this discord. Given on the ninth of the Calends of October, of the year 1122.” With the signing of this compact the war of investitures came, for all practical purposes to an end. A finishing stroke was given to the dispute, in the Ninth General Council, the first of the Lateran, but of that assembly we shall speak in a special chapter.

Some authors, hostile to the Holy See, have deemed themselves especially brilliant when they asserted that the struggle about investitures was merely a dispute as to whether the regalia should be conferred "with a crooked stick, or a straight one." (1). In this connection, the "crooked stick" or crosier was the emblem of spiritual power, and the Church would have stultified herself had she sanctioned its use by a secular ruler; "the straight stick" or sceptre, the emblem of temporal jurisdiction, was the proper insignia with which to invest a prelate with his temporal estate. This is admitted even by Mosheim (2): "Nor is this reason a foolish one, if we regard, not the opinions of our own day, but of an age when the staff and ring were signs of sacred things, and when he who delivered these signs was thought to give sacred power with them." No Catholic will deny that the Church has the right to defend her liberty against any potentate or society interfering with it. In the time of St. Gregory VII. bishoprics and abbacies were as much the subject of barter and sale as any goods in the public markets, and they were handed over to the highest bidder by means of the staff and ring, the emblems of spiritual power. Listen to St. Anselm of Lucca, the right hand of St. Gregory in this war: "Your king constantly sells bishoprics, publishing edicts to the effect that no one shall be regarded as a bishop, even though elected by the clergy and sought by the people, unless according to the royal pleasure; as though he were the keeper of this gate . . . you dismember the Catholic Church, attacking her throughout the entire kingdom, and having reduced her to vile slavery, hold her under your dominion, subjecting her liberty, divinely accorded, to your will, saying that to the emperor belong all things, bishoprics, abbacies, and all the churches of God: although the Lord says 'My Church, My dove, My sheep,' and St. Paul says 'Let no one take unto himself the honor, unless called by God, like Aaron' . . . Who is elected because of morals or honesty, or integrity? The wolves are to be attacked, etc." But the granting of investitures by staff and ring was an ancient custom, replied the German sovereigns. To this assertion, the holy bishop of Lucca replies: "We need not dispute about the length of time that this condemnable practice of the secular power, appointing bishops at its pleasure, has been in vogue. That custom is rather to be followed which was originated by our Catholic ancestors, treading in the footsteps of their fathers; namely, that sanctioned by the prelates of the Seventh and Eighth Councils, according to the statutes of the holy Roman Pontiffs, which were founded on the practice of all the churches from the times of the Apostles. The wickedness of secular princes is of no prejudice to that holy custom, no matter how long it has been manifested. Otherwise, the Lord our God is to be blamed because He freed the Jews, who had been a long time in bondage, and because, by His own death, He liberated man from the slavery of the devil, which had lasted for five thousand years. Again, while adultery is forbidden by the Old and New Testament, are kings allowed to commit it, because former kings did so? God forbid! . . . Any ecclesiastic whose zeal is not excited for the cleansing of God's house from this stain is not consumed with zeal for that house, and God will regard him as a mute dog who cannot bark. Who does not see that this plague is the cause of the heresy of simony, and the lamentable destruction of the whole Christian religion? When the episcopal dignity can be obtained from a prince, in spite of the bishops and priests, the Church of God is contemned; one man pours a large amount of money into the purses of the courtiers, that their influence may work his infamous promotion; another, at great expense, serves ten years at court, patiently suffering the rigors of the seasons and everything else; another constantly yearns for the death of the prelate to whose post he aspires. And alas! Often dignities are conferred upon slaves and fornicators. When such persons have obtained their posts by such means, they dare not reprove the powerful when they sin."

(1) Thus, for instance, the authors of the famous Art of Verifying Dates.

(2) Cent. XI., p. 2, c. 2, in note.

CHAPTER XIV.

CLERICAL CELIBACY.

One of the most difficult of the tasks imposed upon himself by Pope St. Gregory VII. was the enforcement of the law of clerical celibacy. According to Leo of Ostia (d. 1110), when Gregory ascended the Pontifical throne "one seldom found a priest without a wife or a concubine"; (1) and Lambert of Aschaffenburg (d. 1077), tells us that many of the clergy resisted the Pontiff's "insane teaching," as they styled the decrees on celibacy, and declared that if "he proceeded to enforce them, they would sooner abandon the priesthood than the conjugal state, and then let Gregory seek for angels to minister to the people of the Church of God." In such a state of affairs, says Baronio, speaking of the reformatory efforts undertaken, with the aid of Hildebrand, by Leo IX., the Pontiff must have felt as does a farmer about to free an immense field of a growth of thorns and weeds. But Hildebrand was not dismayed. Whether as a deacon of the Roman Church, and confidential adviser of several Pontiffs, or as himself the incumbent of the Papal Chair, he pursued his favorite object with unvarying fortitude. His zeal in this matter, as we learn from Otho of Frisingen, caused many bishops to urge Henry IV. to oppose his election. In 1074 Gregory held a Plenary Council of all the bishops of Italy, and decreed that "all ecclesiastical ministrations are forbidden to incontinent clergymen; under pain of deposition, no clergyman shall marry; no one shall receive Holy Orders unless he solemnly promises continency, according to the decrees of the ancient and holy Councils."

Mosheim (2), Potter (3), Ranke (4), and most Protestant authors, condemn the action of Pope Gregory VII. as an innovation upon ancient discipline. Among the writers who have defended the Pontiff from this charge, proving the antiquity and propriety of clerical celibacy, the palm of success must be accorded to Zaccaria, in his Polemical History of Holy Celibacy. The reader may also consult with profit Gaume's Ecclesiastical Celibacy in its Religious and Political Relations; the Celibacy of Rosmini; the Protestantism and Catholicism Compared of Balmes; and the Dictionary of Bergier. We now proceed to show that neither St. Gregory VII., nor any of the Benedictine Pontiffs, to whom Ranke ascribes the design of making monks of the secular clergy, instituted the system of clerical celibacy; that, in fine, this system is quite as old as the Church herself. Such was the opinion of St. Jerome (b. 340); for he says that "Christ, a virgin, and Mary, a virgin, consecrated the love of virginity (dedicavere principia) in both sexes. The Apostles were either virgins, or, after their nuptials, were continent." (4).

(2) Inst. Hist. Eccl., cent. xi., p. 2.

(3) Spirit of the Church, vol. v., p. 2, b. 2.

(4) Papacy, vol. i., b. 1, § 3.

In the Third Synod of Carthage (397) the primate Aurelius, speaking of celibacy, says: "Let us also follow what the Apostles taught, and what antiquity observed." Such is the testimony of the African church, which derived her discipline directly from Rome. In the year 385, Pope St. Siricius addressed to Himerius, bishop of Tarragona, a letter in reply to one sent by that prelate to the previous Pontiff, St. Damasus, in which the Pope had been consulted as to the course to be pursued toward certain clergymen who had married. Himerius had informed St. Damasus that some of the delinquents alleged ignorance as an excuse, while others justified their course by the example of the priests of the Old Law. In his answers to Himerius, St. Siricius declares the absolute obligation of ecclesiastical celibacy, and speaks of it in such terms as to leave no doubt as to the antiquity of the custom. After adducing arguments from the Gospel and from St. Paul, to show the propriety of the discipline in question, the Pontiff subjoins: "We all, priests and levites, are bound, by an irrefragable law, to devote our hearts and bodies, from the day of our ordination, to sobriety and purity . . . And since some of those of whom we speak, according to your Holiness, lament their fall through ignorance, we do not deny them mercy, but on this condition, that, if they hereafter prove to be continent, they may officiate in their present dignities, but are to receive no further promotion. As for those who try to excuse themselves by the concessions of the Old Law, they are deprived, by the authority of the Apostolic See, of every ecclesiastical honor which they have so unworthily used, nor can they ever again handle those venerable Mysteries, of which, by clinging to obscene cupidities, they have deprived themselves. And whereas the present cases warn us to look to the future, every bishop, priest, and deacon, who shall hereafter be found like unto them,—and we trust none will—must know that every avenue to our mercy will be closed to them, for those wounds must be treated with the knife, which do not heal under the influence of milder remedies." The Pontiff then orders Himerius to communicate this Apostolic Letter to the Carthaginians, Boetians, Lusitanians, Gauls, and as many as he can reach. Here, then, is a Pontifical decree, enjoining that celibacy which Ranke and others would have us regard as an invention of Hildebrand, written seven hundred years before his time, and the language of the Pontiff plainly indicates the previous existence of the law he enforces.

(4) Epistle 48, to Pammachius.

In the year 405 Pope St. Innocent I. also was consulted on this matter by Exuperius, bishop of Toulouse, and the Pontiff replied as follows: "In such cases the discipline of the divine law is clear, and the commands of bishop Siricius, of blessed memory, went forth; that is, that persons enjoying such offices (the higher Orders), who proved incontinent, should be deprived of all ecclesiastical honor, and ought not to be permitted to exercise a ministry that ought to be conducted only by the continent." In view of these decrees of his early predecessors, St. Gregory VII. properly declared that he made no innovation in the matter of celibacy, and most reasonable was his decree, directed to Otho of Constance, that "if they condemn our behests, yea, those of the holy Fathers, the people must in no way receive their ministrations."

The custom of the Greek Church, united and schismatic, is adduced by the foes of ecclesiastical celibacy to show the futility of the reasons put forth by the Westerns in justification of their discipline ; to prove that married clergymen may fulfil their duties with zeal, etc. But there are several points to be noticed in the discipline of the Greeks, which our adversaries generally keep in the background. Firstly, the Greek Canons do not allow a priest or deacon to contract matrimony after his ordination. (1) Secondly, they have nearly always prohibited the use of matrimony to bishops. As a rule, the bishops are taken from the monasteries ; and when, perchance, a secular priest is chosen, his wife, if he have one, must enter a nunnery. The only recorded exception to this latter point of discipline is that of the learned Neo-Platonician Synesius (410), who, being forced into the see of Ptolemais, endeavored to escape by protesting that he could not forego the society of his wife, and therefore received permission to retain her. But this very fact proves the existence of the contrary discipline. Thirdly, SS. Jerome and Epiphanius, and Eusebius, show us that among the olden Orientals, at least in Egypt and Syria, there were instances of enforced sacerdotal celibacy. Fourthly, the 26th Apostolic Canon, though not authentic, was greatly respected by the early Greek Christians, and it allowed only lectors and chanters to be married. And the Council of Neo-Cæsarea (315) deposes a priest who marries after his ordination. When Pope St. Gregory VII. enforced the already existing law of ecclesiastical celibacy, he had no intention of interfering with the ancient custom of the Eastern churches. He simply fulfilled his duty, in insisting upon obedience to the Canons which he found, upon his accession to the Papacy, in force in the West. And here we may remark that no theologian pretends that clerical celibacy is a matter of divine law. The Holy See, if it sees fit, may abrogate the discipline at once. In fact, dispensations have frequently been granted in particular cases, as we shall soon show.

(1) These Canons are observed by the United Greeks, but, as is shown by Joseph Assemani (Library of Oriental Law, B. i., c. 13, no. 361), the practice of the schismatic clergy is to take as many successive wives as they wish, provided these be virgins; they call a widow, when again married, only "half a wife," but sometimes they marry such. The Russian "orthodox" church has, in modern times, forgotten the ancient Greek Canons, prohibiting priests and deacons from marrying after their ordination. Before the time of Peter the Great, a priestly widower was obliged to retire to a monastery, but in 1724 this head of the "orthodox" church allowed a second marriage to a priest, and permitted him to be employed in a seminary or episcopal chancery. The following is the celibitic discipline of the United Greeks, Ruthenians, Maronites, and such other followers of the Oriental rites as are in communion with Rome. I. Bishops cannot, after their consecration, either marry again or cohabit with the wives married before their ordination. If the newly consecrated has a wife living, she must retire to a distant nunnery, and there be supported by her late husband. II. Priests and deacons may, in accordance with the Trullan Canon XIII. (y. 692), keep the wives taken before their ordination, but they must abstain from marital intercourse for some time before officiating at the altar. Pope Clement VIII. (1592-1605), in his Constit. 31, ordered this abstinence to be, if possible, for seven, and at any rate, for three days. III. Priests and deacons cannot marry after ordination; such was the decree of Benedict XIV. (Bullarium, vol. 1., Constit. 57), issued May 6, 1742, and such attempt at marriage was pronounced null. But in the case of priestly converts from schism, the same Pontiff decreed (Constit. 129) that the Holy See might permit the retention of a wife taken after ordination.

Mosheim finds an argument against the antiquity of the celibitic discipline in the fact that so many of the clergy resisted St. Gregory's enactments. So did the Arians resist the definition of the Church upon the Divinity of Christ, but Mosheim would not contend that their repugnance furnishes a proof that the early Church did not believe in that Divinity. It is not our province to enter upon a polemical discussion as to the advantages of clerical celibacy, but there is one assertion of certain of its adversaries that we ought not to disregard. They affect to discover in St. Gregory VII. a design to found a sacerdotal caste, by means of which his theocratic ideas might be disseminated and actuated. Celibacy, they say, segregates the clergy from the world to a great extent, and forms them into a body more amenable to central authority, more deeply penetrated by an esprit de corps, than a married priesthood shows itself to be. But, we ask, would not matrimony have been for the Pontiff a more powerful means whereby to perpetuate a priestly caste? Can a caste easily endure, without the principle of heredity? As Balmes rightly observes (1), had the Church been solely intent upon aggrandizing herself, by any and every means, she would rather have imitated those who instituted an hereditary class, and would have allowed her priests to marry.

We are frequently told that several of the Apostles were married men, and sometimes St. Clement of Alexandria (d. 215) is cited against us. This father says: "Will they condemn the Apostles? Peter and Philip had children, and the latter gave his daughters in marriage. Paul, in one of his epistles, finds no difficulty in speaking of his wife ; he did not take her along on his journeys, because he had no need of much service, but he says in his letter : ‘ have we not power to lead about a woman, a sister, as well as the rest of the Apostles ? ’ ” In citing this passage of St. Clement, our adversaries cunningly omit the following words of the saint : “ But since they (the Apostles) gave all their attention to preaching, a task which does not admit of distraction, they were accompanied by these women, not as spouses, but as sisters, in order that they themselves might enter, without suspicion, into the apartments of women, and there communicate the doctrine of the Lord.”

(1) Loc. cit., c. 60.

(1). But is it true that several of the Apostles were married men ? And if they were, did they continue the marriage relation during their Apostolate ? Now, as to the remark concerning SS. Paul and Philip, made by St. Clement of Alexandria, it is certain that he erred, and his mistake has been noticed by ancients and moderns. (2). The Philip with two daughters was not an Apostle, but was one of the seven deacons. As for St. Paul, does the following language sound like that of a married man, or at least like that of one who kept up the marriage relation ? “ Defraud not one another, except, perhaps by consent, for a time, that you may give yourselves to prayer ; and return together again, lest Satan tempt you for your incontinency. But I speak this by indulgence, not by commandment. For I would that all men were even as myself ; but every one hath his proper gift from God : one after this manner, and one after that. But I say to the unmarried, and to the widows : it is good for them if they so continue, even as I.” (3). Nor can it be replied that St. Paul would not have this rule applicable to all time, for the reasons which he assigns for

(1) Stromata, B. iii., c. 6. St. Chrysostom, Theodoret, Isidore Pelusiot. Ecumenius, and Theophylactus—all Greeks—interpret the passage of St. Paul as alluding, not to wives, but to women who accompanied the Apostles as assistants, especially in household matters. All the Latin fathers understand the mulierem sororem (adelphîn gunaika) of St. Paul’s, I. Cor. ix., as indicating either a wife with whom there was no longer any cohabitation, or some worthy woman who aided the Apostles in their works of charity, and took charge of their domestic concerns : the first class of writers are represented by St. Avitus of Vienne in a letter to King Gundobald of the Burgundians (BALUZE, Miscellany, B. i.), and the second by St. Jerome (B. i., against Jovinian), St. Augustine (Work of Monks, c. 4), St. Leo IX. (Can. Omnino, dist. 31), and even Tertullian (Monogamy, c. 8) whose authority is adduced against our thesis.

(2) See the Critical Notes on the Stromata.

(3) I. Cor. vii. 5—8.

celibacy, in the same chapter, are valid at every period. As for St. Peter, he was undoubtedly, before his vocation, possessed of a wife, but he said to his Master: "We have left all things and have followed Thee." (1). Finally, in citing St. Clement of Alexandria, the opponents of clerical celibacy omit to mention that the saint is combating those heretics of his day who condemned marriage as an evil thing; he by no means wished all to enter into that state.

The opponents of clerical celibacy are fond of adducing the instance of Gregory, father of St. Gregory Nazianzen, as a proof that, in early times, bishops were not obliged to observe continency; St. Nonna, wife of Gregory, gave birth, they say, to the saintly prelate, some time after his father became a bishop. Even among Catholic writers are found some who hold this opinion—namely, Tillemont, Baillet, the Benedictine editors of St. Basil, and Ceillier. Baronio, Alexandre, and Tournely combated this idea, but its full and triumphant refutation is due to the Bollandist Stilling (2), and after him, to Zaccaria, in his New Justification of Holy Celibacy (3). In the first place, we may observe, with Baronio, that St. Jerome tells us that even Jovinian acknowledged that "he could not be a bishop, who begat children during his episcopacy; if this were found to be the case, he would be condemned as an adulterer" (4). How is it, then, that the Arians, who did everything possible to detract from St. Gregory Nazianzen's reputation, never thought of calling him illegitimate? And how do our adversaries show that St. Gregory Nazianzen was born during the episcopacy of his father? Their only argument is drawn from a distich, in which the saint introduces his father as saying to him: "Thou hast not yet lived as many years as I have spent in sacrifices" (5). Baronio thinks that the verses are hyperbolic; Papebroch conjectures that there is some error in them; Alexandre accepts both of

(1) Matth. xix. 27.

(2) Dissertation on the Date of Birth of St. Gregory Nazianzen, published in 1750, in vol. iii. for September.

(3) Foligno, 1785, p. 121.

(4) Against Jovinian. St. Jerome wrote this passage only thirty years after the death of Nazianzen, and a little further on he speaks of this discipline as obtaining throughout the East.

(5) The Greek text has: Ουπο τοσούτον εκμεμετρικας βιον, οσος αλλιη θυσιον ενον χρονος. (On His Life. i., c. 35).

these opinions; Tournely supposes that the father of the saint compares the years of his son with the time which has passed since he himself was baptized, and became, therefore, a participant in the sacred Mysteries. At any rate, the verses are sufficiently ambiguous to prevent any serious argument to be drawn from them. The word thusion does not necessarily mean the Christian Sacrifice of the Mass; nay, it is much more appropriate to signify the Pagan mysteries, to which, before his conversion, the father of Nazianzen was addicted. The word ekmemetrikas is also ambiguous, and if, as Stilling translates it, "thou hast not considered" is the true meaning, the whole passage would read: "Thou hast not considered my age; I am not able any longer to sacrifice." But there are good reasons for believing that St. Gregory Nazianzen was born before the conversion of his father from Paganism. I. It is certain that the father was converted in 325. Now, in one of his poems, the saint says that he and his bosom friend, St. Basil, had resolved to leave Athens, where they had been studying many years: "For much time had been spent in study; it was now my thirtieth year." That the words "my thirtieth year" do not mean his thirtieth year of age, but his thirtieth year of study at Athens, is the opinion of the Greek priest Gregory, who compiled his life. All critics admit that the saint left Athens in 355; he therefore commenced his Athenian studies in 326. Precocious though he was, he could not have begun the study "of eloquence," which was his object in going to Athens, before his tenth year; therefore, concludes Stilling, he was born about 316, while his father was yet a Pagan. II. In certain of their writings, both St. Gregory and St. Basil speak of their extreme old age. The former says that he is "oppressed by hoary age; his members are withered by long life and sickness;" (1) he appeals to the prefect Olympius to have mercy on the citizens, for the sake of his gray hairs. (2). Now it is certain that St. Gregory died in 389. Can we suppose that he would use such language as the above, when he was not sixty years old? Yet, according to our adversaries, he would have so spoken, for they place his birth in 329, and the expressions noted were penned some years before his death. III. We know that, when the father of St. Gregory was ordained priest, he was fifty-five years old, and that his wife, St. Nonna, was of about the same age. (1) Are we to believe that St. Nonna gave birth to our saint at that period of her life? IV. St. Gregory himself is, at least implicitly, an authority for the assertion that his birth preceded his father's conversion. Narrating the life of his father, he is very particular in observing the order of events, and whenever he, for a moment, deviates from chronological sequence, he reminds us of it. But he speaks of his own birth before he mentions his father's conversion, and makes no sign of realizing that he has interrupted the order of time. (2) For the above reasons, and especially because of the testimony of St. Jerome concerning the discipline obtaining in his day, we must hold that St. Gregory Nazianzen was born before his father's elevation to the episcopal dignity.

(1) Oration 27.(2) Epist. 172.

Although we avoid discussing the economic, romantic, and sanitary reasons alleged against the celibitic life of the clergy, we deem it proper to direct the reader's attention to the following remarks of Lingard: "To calculate the probable influence of this institution on the population of nations has frequently amused the ingenuity and leisure of arithmetical politicians; of whom many have not hesitated to arraign the wisdom of those by whom it was originally devised, and of those by whom it is still observed. Yet, in defiance of their speculations, several Catholic countries continue to be crowded with inhabitants; and to account for the scanty population of others we need only to advert to the defects of their constitution, the insalubrity of the climate, the establishment of foreign colonies, and the barrenness of a parched and effete soil. Neither is it certain that to increase the number of inhabitants is, in all circumstances, to increase the resources of the state; but it is evident that the man who spends his life in promoting the interests of morality and correcting the vicious propensities of his fellow-creatures, adds more to the sum of public virtue and of public happiness than he whose principal merit is the number of his children. If it be granted that the clerical functions are of high importance to the welfare of the state, it must also be acknowledged that, in the discharge of these functions, the unmarried possesses great and numerous advantages over the married clergyman. Unencumbered with the cares of a family, he may dedicate his whole attention to the spiritual improvement of his parishioners; free from all anxiety respecting the future establishment of his children, he may expend without scruple the superfluity of his revenue in relieving the distresses of the sick, the aged, and the unfortunate. Had Augustine and his associates been involved in the embarrassments of marriage, they would never have torn themselves from their homes and country, and have devoted the best portion of their lives to the conversion of distant and unknown barbarians. Had their successors seen themselves surrounded with numerous families, they would never have founded those charitable establishments, nor have erected those religious edifices, that testify the use to which they devoted their riches, and still exist to reproach the parsimony of succeeding generations. (1). But it was not from the impolicy of the institution, that the reformers attempted to justify the eagerness with which they emancipated themselves from its yoke. They contended that the law of clerical celibacy was unjust, because it deprived man of his natural rights, and exacted privations incompatible with his natural propensities. To this objection a rational answer was returned: that to accept the priestly character was a matter of election, not of necessity; and that he who freely made it the object of his choice, chose at the same time the obligations annexed to it. The insinuation that

(1) Oration 19 and 10.

(2) Oration 19. Stilling develops this argument at some length.

(1) "He that hath wife and children," says Lord Bacon, "hath given hostages to fortune: for they are impediments to great enterprises, either of virtue or mischief. Certainly the best works, and of the greatest merit for the public, have proceeded from the unmarried or the childless men, which, both in affection and means, have married and endowed the public. . . . Unmarried men are best friends, best masters, and best servants. . . . A single life doth well with churchmen, for charity will hardly water the ground, unless it must first fill a pool." Essays, p. 17, London, 1696. Seneca says: "Conjugal life breaks high and generous spirits, and draws them from great to the most debasing thoughts."

a life of continency was above the power of man was treated with the contempt that it deserved. To those, indeed, whom habit had rendered the obsequious slaves of their passions, it might appear, with reason, too arduous an attempt; but the thinking part of mankind would hesitate before they sanctioned an opinion which was a libel on the character of thousands, who, in every department of society, are confined by their circumstances to a state of temporary or perpetual celibacy." (1).

Many dispensations from the obligation of celibacy have been accorded to ecclesiastics, and Zaccaria gives a long list in his New Justification, already cited. He doubts as to the dispensation given, according to Volterrano, Claude Espenceus, and others, to a bishop of Vardin (year 1096), in order that he might marry and raise heirs to the Hungarian throne, offered to him after the death of St. Ladislaus. But Mariana (B. xiii., c. 9) gives as certain a dispensation accorded to Peter, archbishop of Seville, and son of Ferdinand III., king of Leon, to marry the princess Christiana of Denmark. In the Metropolis Salisburgensis and in the Germania Sacra, is recorded a dispensation given in 1322, to the archduke Albert of Austria, parochus of Vienna, and bishop-elect of Passau, to marry Jane, daughter of Ulric, last count of Pfird. Claude Espenceus (Redemption of Vows, B. v., c. 7) and the Christian Gaul (vol. v.), narrate that, in 1391, Burchard of Lutzelstein, bishop of Strasburg, was allowed to resign his see, and to marry. Caesar Campana speaks of two dispensations, one in the line of the counts of Flanders (p. iv., no. 40), and one in that of the counts of Holland (no. 50). The first was in favor of Peter, lord of Alsace and bishop of Cambray, allowed to marry Sybil, daughter of the count of Nevers. The second was given to John, son of Alberic, (or Albert), count of Holland, who, in 1418, was permitted by Pope Martin V. to resign the bishopric of Liège, and to marry Elizabeth of Luxemburg. The Metropolis Salisburgensis (vol. i., p. 180, no. 48) and the Ecclesiastical History of Germany, Brussels, 1724, (vol. ii., p. 24), narrate that Robert, count palatine and bishop of

(1) Antiquities of the Anglo-Saxon Church, c. 2.

Frisingen, resigned his diocese to his brother Philip, and by a dispensation from Pope Alexander VI., married Margaret, duchess of Landshut. In a memorial presented to Clement XI., for the prince de Vendôme, it is said that Gregory XIII. similarly dispensed a certain archbishop, but his name is not given. Alexander VI. allowed Cæsar Borgia, a cardinal-deacon and archbishop of Valencia, to lay aside the purple and marry Charlotte d'Albret. Gregory XIII. wished to dispense the cardinal Charles of Portugal, uncle of king Sebastian, that he might give heirs to the crown, but the cardinal, alleging that he was too old—seventy-seven—declined to marry. In 1648, Innocent X. granted two dispensations to the Jesuit father, John Casimir of Poland—then a cardinal. Having been elected king of Poland, he was allowed to resign the purple, and was permitted to marry Mary Louisa di Gonzaga, the widow of his brother Ladislaus. In 1709, Clement XI., allowed the cardinal Francis dei Medici to marry Leonora di Gonzaga, daughter of the duke of Guastalla. The above instances of dispensation in the matter of celibacy, the reader will observe, are all in cases of cardinals and bishops. Although Zaccaria secured the good offices of Gaetano Marini, the Vatican archivist at the time, to search for evidence, he procured no “particular documents” referring to similar dispensations in cases of simple priests. He tells us, however, that Latino Latini wrote to Pope Pius IV: “Your Holiness has the example of your predecessor, Paul III., of happy memory, who, by letters which now exist (but which Zaccaria could not find), gave to three bishops the faculty of dispensing, in the cases of such priests as had married, provided they were men of great learning.” In modern days, the only instance of a validation of priestly marriages is that by Pius VII., in the case of the French Constitutionnels, who had married during the Revolution. Many deacons have been allowed to marry. In 1040, Benedict IX. dispensed in the case of Casimir, a monk of Cluny, for the sake of the Polish succession; see Longinus (Hist. Polon., B. iii.) and Cromer (Origin and Affairs of the Poles, B. iv.). In 1354, Clement VI. allowed Henry, brother of king Rudolph of Bohemia, to marry Elizabeth of Wittemberg : see Espenceus, (loc. cit., B. v., c. 7). In 1534, Paul III. dispensed in the case of James Jacovacci ; see Register of Paul III. In 1572, Gregory XIII. did the same with Francis, baron of Ghimes, chancellor of Transylvania. In 1620, a Brief of Paul V., addressed to the archbishop of Treves, allowed the deacon William von Ussbœck to marry. Several more dispensations for deacons are cited in the memorial of the prince de Vendôme to Clement XI. As to subdeacons, we find the following dispensations from celibacy. On Jan. 16, 1434, Eugenius IV. granted one to Christopher d'Héricourt of Amiens, a relative of the king ; see Register of Eugenius IV. Claude Espenceus speaks of one given to a canon of Passau, in the sixteenth century. On March 24, 1608, Paul V. writes to his nuncio at Cologne, dispensing in the case of Herman, of the counts of Salm, "that the many and great fiefs of this house may not revert to a heretical branch." On Sept. 13, 1612, the same Pontiff grants a dispensation to marry to John of Braccamonte, a subdeacon of Toledo, "because of the gravity and justice of the cause." In 1614, he also allowed marriage to Lupo de Mendoza, archdeacon (but as yet only subdeacon) of Compostella. Gregory XV. dispensed in the case of Francis Ciacco, subdeacon, and archdeacon of Toledo ; see Barbosa (B. i., on Subdicconate, c. 37, no. 28). On Dec. 18, 1625, Pope Urban VIII. allowed the subdeacon Leopold, archduke of Austria, to resign his many benefices and marry. On July 12, 1644, the same Pontiff dispensed in the case of John, count of Ritberg. and a subdeacon of Cologne, so that the estates of that family might not pass to a Calvinist heir. On Nov 9, 1655. Alexander VII. dispensed in favor of Everard of Schendelagen, of the diocese of Osnabruck ; on Oct. 31, 1656, he did the same for Henry of Savoy, duke of Nemours, a subdeacon of Paris ; in both these cases, the perpetuation of extensive estates in Catholic hands was the object of the concession. On June 30, 1685, Innocent XI. allowed the subdeacon Ferdinand Maximilian, of the counts of Ritberg, a canon of Cologne, to marry, to prevent his estates from passing to the Landgrave of Hesse, a Calvinist, and "to preserve the bishopric of Paderborn from probable danger." Dispensations to monks, friars, and nuns are numerous. Among the most celebrated are the following: In 1134, the death of Alphonsus the Warlike having left the kingdom of Aragon without an heir, the prince Ramiro, a brother of the late king, and a priest and monk, was placed on the throne, and was allowed, by Pope Innocent II., to marry. So say all old Spanish writers, the Art of Verifying Dates, and Arnold Wion, in his Wood of Life, B. iv. In 1177, Alexander III. allowed the Benedictine, Nicholas Giustiniani, to marry Anna, daughter of the doge Vitale Micheli, in order that the great family of the Giustiniani might not die out; but on condition that, when heirs had been born, Nicholas should return to his monastery. So it was done; the wife imitating the husband, and founding the nunnery of St. Adrian, at Venice. Constance, daughter of king Roger of Sicily, and a nun, was dispensed from her vows in 1191, by Celestine III., to marry the emperor Henry VI., who was crowned as king of Sicily in 1194. Dispensations in cases of persons belonging to the Military Religious Orders are quite numerous.

CHAPTER XV.

THE RIGHT OF THE POPE TO DEPOSE SOVEREIGNS.

Comparatively speaking, there are very few modern authors who do not declaim against the power exercised by the Roman Pontiff, during the Middle Ages, in the matter of deposing sovereigns. We are told that the Popes had no right to judge sovereigns, in temporal matters; furthermore, that such a usurpation was pernicious to society. Nor is the declared enemy of the Holy See the only one to inveigh against the deposing power, claimed and exercised by so many holy Pontiffs; many writers, whose devotion to the Church is beyond suspicion, have been so influenced by national prejudice and by an exaggerated respect for monarchy, as to join in the outcry against the "pretensions" of Rome. (1). The prodigious power over sovereigns exercised by the Pontiffs of the Middle Ages has given rise to many and various theories as to its origin, some of which are theological, that is, viewing the matter according to the principle of revelation and of divine right, while others are historical, that is, examining the question with an eye to the public law of the olden time. It was only in the beginning of the eighteenth century (2) that the theological theories commenced to be laid aside. It is not our province to here defend any one of them, but a brief exposition of their meaning is necessary. According to the system of the "direct divine right," the Pope has received, immediately from God, full power to govern the world, both in spirituals and temporals: the temporal ruler is only an official of the Pontiff, and as he receives the temporal sword to be used in conformity with the order of God, he may be deprived of it by the Pope, when he uses it against that order. Gosselin, whose excellent treatise is certainly the most exhaustive, clear, and impartial, of all modern works on the subject (3), thinks that the first to advocate this theory was John of Salisbury (1159). St Thomas à Becket certainly held it (4); so did the compiler of the Laws of Suabia (5). Henry de Suza (d. 1365) even asserts that "since the coming of Jesus Christ all the dominion of infidel princes was transferred to the Church, and is vested in the Pope as the vicar of Jesus Christ, the King of kings." (6). Besides these famous men, the principal defenders of the "direct divine right" theory were Augustine Triumphus (d. 1328), and Alvarez Pelayo (d. 1340). Another theory of the divine right is that said right is only indirect. According to this opinion, the Pope has received from God, immediately and directly, no power over temporals; nevertheless, his power over spirituals in-

(1) Among the eminent authors who have censured the Popes of the Middle Ages, and most especially Gregory VII. and his successors, for this reason, may be particularly mentioned FLEURY, passim, and BOSSUET (if, indeed, he wrote the work), in the famous Defence, B. i., sect. 1, c. 7; B. iii., c. 2, 9, 10. As to Fleury, see MARCHETTI'S Criticism, MUZZARELLI'S Remarks, and ZACCARIA, in Anti-Febronio, Introduction, c. 6., no. 11.

(2) FENELON was the first Catholic writer to defend the deposing power by the public law of the Middle Ages, in his Authority of the Supreme Pontiff; LEIBNITZ, though with less clearness, had done the same passim, but especially in his Right of Supremacy.

(3) Power of the Pope, during the Middle Age, over Sovereigns; Paris, 1839.

(4) Epistles, B. i., no. 64, to king Henry II.

(5) SENCKENBERG, Body of German Law, Preface to the Suabian Law.

(6) Commentaries on Decretals, B. iii., tit. 34, Vou, etc., c. 8, nos. 26, 27.

cludes, indirectly, a right to manage temporals when the good of religion demands such management; the Pope cannot, ordinarily, depose princes, but he can do so in extraordinary cases, when, that is, the salvation of souls is impeded by princes. Bellarmine, the principal advocate of this opinion (1), cites in its favor Hugh of St. Victor, Alexander of Hales, St. Bonaventura, Durandus, Peter d'Ailly, John Parisiensis, John Torquemada, Gaetano (Cajetan), and many others of note. But Gosselin holds that many of these authors defend rather the "directive" power, in the sense explained by Fénelon. Gosselin also remarks that many others of the authors cited by Bellarmine as advocates of the indirect divine right are really defenders of the direct. They try, he says, "to soften down what appears extreme in that opinion, and sometimes seem to reduce it to an indirect power; but all of them hold, as a fundamental principle, that the Pope receives temporal as well as spiritual power, immediately from God, which is the very essence of the opinion of the direct power." Although Bellarmine's theory was soon adopted by nearly all "ultramontane" theologians (2), many of them so modified it as to reduce it to the solution of a case of conscience, concerning the binding force of an oath of allegiance. As explained by the celebrated cardinal du Perron, this modified system of the indirect divine right inculcates that the Pope cannot depose a sovereign, but that he can decide whether the prince has forfeited his throne, because of some offence against religion (3). When so presented, Bellarmine's theory differs but little from that of the "directive" power, defended by Fénelon. The theological opinion of the divine right is only an opinion; it has never been defined as an article of faith, nor has any Pontifical or

(1) When Bellarmine's theory (Supreme Pontiff, B. v., c. 6) appeared, it was so bitterly censured by the partisans of the direct divine right, that Pope Sixtus V. placed the work on the Index. The new edition of the Index, containing the prohibition, was about to be published, when Sixtus V. died; the new Pope, Urban VII., erased the book from the list. SACCHINI, History of the Society of Jesus, p. v., vol. 1.; FULIGATI, Life of Bellarmine, B. ii., c. 7; D'AVRIGNY, Chronological and Dogmatic Memoirs, cent. xvii., Nov. 1610.

(2) PERCEIRA DE CASTRO, Royal Hand, Lisbon, 1625; RONCAGLIA, Notes on Alexander's Diss. ii., cent. xi.; BIANCHI, Power and Policy of the Church, vol. 1., B. i., § 8; PEREZ VALIENTE, Public Law of Spain, Madrid, 1751, vol. 1., c. 14; MAMACHI, Origins and Antiquities, Rome, 1749, vol. iv., c. 2.

(3) During the session of the States General of France, in 1614, du Perron thus explained his mind. See D'AVRIGNY, loc. cit., vol. 1., Oct. 27, 1614; LITTA, Letters on the four articles of 1682, no. 9.

Conciliary decree sanctioned it. Indeed, at present at least, the Holy See is very far from maintaining either the theory of the direct, or that of the indirect divine right. (1).

Fénelon thus presents his explanation of the conduct of the Popes in deposing princes: "An impression began gradually to take deep hold of the mind of Catholic nations, that the supreme power could be vested in none but a Catholic; and that a condition was implied in the tacit contract between princes and people, that the people should faithfully obey the prince so long as he remained faithful to the Catholic religion. This condition once supposed, it was the general belief that the oath which bound the nation to its prince ceased to be obligatory whenever he violated that condition and openly revolted against the Catholic religion. In these times it was usual that excommunicated persons should be deprived of all communication with the faithful, and should have no intercourse with them, unless for the necessities of life. It is not wonderful, therefore, that nations so devoted to the Catholic religion should shake off the yoke of an excommunicated prince. They had become subject to him only on condition that he also should be a subject of the Catholic religion (2). But a prince whom the Church had excommunicated, either because of heresy, or because of an evil and impious administration of his power, was no longer looked upon as that devout prince to whom the whole

(1) GOSSELIN, loc. cit., Confirmatory Evidence, no. 8. In our day, says this author, the Holy See, "far from favoring the theological opinion of the direct or indirect power, embraces readily such opportunities as present themselves of showing the slight importance it attaches to that opinion, and of openly professing principles which subvert, or at least are not easily reconciled with, it."

(2) This contract will not surprise us, if we bear in mind that in most of the monarchies established on the ruins of the old Roman empire the crown was not purely hereditary. It was also elective, inasmuch as the sovereign could be chosen among all the princes of the reigning family; quite naturally, therefore, conditions were attached to the coronation of the elect. As De Maistre remarks, after Voltaire (Essay on Customs, vol. iii., c. 121), election necessarily implies a contract between the king and the nation, "so that an elective monarch can at all times be called to account and judged . . . in the Middle Age, elective sovereignty had no other firm stay but that derived from the personal qualities of the sovereign; let no one, therefore, wonder at its having been so frequently attacked, transferred, or subverted." (The Pope, B. ii., c. 9). John de la Chapelle, secretary of the prince de Conti, in his Letters concerning the War of the Spanish Succession (Basel, 1703, vol. iii., p. 146) says that "the emperor swears to observe all the articles of a contract. By a violation of them, he frees his subjects from their allegiance; he forfeits every right to the empire, because he received the empire only on condition that he observed said articles." In the old Capitularies (BALFZE, Cap., vol. I); in the Law of the Visigoths, b. 12, tit. 2, no. 2, (CANCIANI, Laws of the Barbarians, vol. IV.); in the Laws of England (ibid.); and in the Preface to the Saxon or German Law, no. 21-24 (SENCKENBERG, Body of German Law, vol. ii.), we find it expressly determined that the sovereign shall be elected only on condition that he professes the Catholic faith, and swears to defend it, with all his power, against every kind of heresy and impiety.

nation had been willing to commit itself. The people therefore regarded their oath of allegiance as no longer binding. Again, the Canon law had decreed that an excommunicated person who did not submit to the Church within a certain period, and thus obtain absolution, was to be considered, if not a heretic, at least one suspected of heresy. Hence princes who contumaciously persisted in a state of excommunication were regarded as impious contempters of the Catholic Church, and, consequently, as heretics; and such were deposed by the nation, for having failed to keep their compact with it. The usage, however, was so far modified, that the deposition was not effected until the Church had been consulted . . . The Church neither deposed nor instituted lay rulers; she merely told the people, when they consulted her, what they could conscientiously do, in the matter of a contract and an oath. This is not a juridical and civil power, but only that directive and ordinative power which Gerson admits." (2). In another place, Fénelon says that the deposing power "consists only in this, that the Pope, as prince of pastors, and chief doctor and governor of the Church in all great questions of morality, is bound to instruct the people who consult him as to the binding force of their oath of allegiance. But the Popes do not wish to command princes, unless they have acquired the right by a special title, or by some peculiar prescription over such princes as are feudal vassals of the Apostolic See." (1). The deposing power, according to the bishop of Cambray, was not one of temporal jurisdiction, founded on the divine law; it was, however, both a directive power, of divine institution, and one of temporal jurisdiction, of human institution. The Supreme Pontiff, by divine institution, directs the consciences of men; and during the Middle Ages he received, by human institution, by the public law of the time, a power of temporal jurisdiction. When the Popes pronounced a sentence of deposition, contends Fénelon, they did not claim a divine right to do so; they merely declared that, by not having complied with the conditions implied in his election or coronation, a certain prince had forfeited his crown.

(2) Loc. cit., c. 30.(1) Ibid., c. 27.

While authors may differ as to the origin and grounds of the belief, universally held during the Middle Ages, that the Pope possessed a right, in certain cases, to depose princes, the existence of that belief is indisputable. It is admitted by Gallicans like Bossuet, Fleury, and Michaud; by such Protestants as Leibnitz, Pfeffel, Hurter, and Voigt; and by that enemy of all religion, Voltaire. Bossuet observes that "the obligation of avoiding heretics had made such an impression on pious and enlightened men in the time of Gregory VII., that they renounced allegiance to Henry IV., when he was excommunicated by that Pope. It was the custom in those days to insist on an avoidance of intercourse with the excommunicated." (1). Fleury, who yields to none in opposition to "ultramontanism," admits that during the eighth and ninth centuries kings themselves acknowledged that the Church could depose them, as appears from the petition presented by Charles the Bald to the Council of Savonières, in 859 (2). The same author says that, "more than two hundred years before Gregory VII., Popes had commenced to decide authoritatively on the rights of crowns." (3). Michaud says that "the pretensions of the Popes, in this matter, were unquestionably favored by the common belief of the age. Occasional complaints there were of unjust decisions issuing from the tribunal of the heads of the Church; but their right of judging the Christian powers was never questioned, and their judgments were almost always received by the people without murmur." (4). Leibnitz holds that "it is certain that many princes were feudatories or vassals of the Roman empire, or at least of the Roman Church; that some kings and dukes were created by the emperor or the Pope; and that others were not anointed kings without, at the same, time doing homage to Jesus Christ, to whose Church they promised fealty, when they were receiving the unction from the hands of the bishop; and this it was that verified the formula

(1) Defence of Declaration, B. I., sect. 2, c. 21; B. III., c. 4.

(2) Ecc. Hist., vol. XIII., discourse III., no. 10.

(3) Ibid.

(4) History of the Crusades, 4th edit., vol. IV., p. 166.

'Christ reigns, conquers, commands' (1), for all history attests that most of the Western nations submitted to the Church with equal promptitude and piety. I am not now examining whether these things were by divine right. The facts are that they were done with unanimous consent; that they could most properly be done; and that they are not opposed to the good of Christendom; for not unfrequently the salvation of souls and the public good are promoted by the same measure From the strict connection that exists between sacred and profane things, it resulted that people believed the Pope to have received some authority over kings themselves." (2). It is interesting to notice this great Protestant thinker sighing for the restoration of the Papal supremacy: "My opinion would be, to establish, yes, even in Rome, a tribunal (to decide controversies between sovereigns) and to make the Pope its president, as he really did, in former ages, figure as judge between Christian princes And since there is no prohibition against the planning of romances, what harm can there be in suggesting one which would revive the golden age?" (3). Voltaire observes: "It appears that the princes who had the right of electing the emperor, had also the right of deposing him; but to admit the Pope to preside in such decisions was to acknowledge him as the natural judge of the emperor and the empire." (4). The same malignant carper asserts that "every prince who desired to recover or to usurp a territory addressed himself to the Pope, as to his master. No new prince dared to call himself sovereign, nor would other princes recognize him as such without the consent of the Pope; and the fundamental principle of the entire history of the Middle Ages is that the Popes regarded themselves as lords paramount of all kingdoms, without one exception." (5). In the valuable work of Gosselin the reader will find many special

(1) This legend "Christus regnat, vincit, imperat" was on all the gold coins of France, from Louis VI. (year 1100) to Louis XVI.

(2) Right of Supremacy, p. iii.

(3) Letter ii. to M. Grimaire (Works, vol. v.). Pfeffel, in his New Compendium of German History, vol. i., year 1106, thinks that Pope Gregory VII. could not have acted toward Henry IV. otherwise than he did, for all his measures, he says, were the logical realization of principles then universally admitted.

(4) Loc. cit., vol. ii., c. 46.

(5) Ibid., vol. iii., c. 44.

proofs that it was universally admitted, during the Middle Ages, that the Roman Pontiff could depose, for certain reasons, any monarch in Christendom. We would here, however, only draw attention to a few proofs of the existence of that belief, with regard to the Holy Roman empire. By an examination of these proofs, the reader will be convinced that the said belief was not introduced by St. Gregory VII., and that the Popes of the Middle Ages have been falsely accused of usurpation in their conduct toward the empire.

Some of the olden authors speak of the empire as a fief of the Holy See, but that expression must not be understood as implying that the Pontiff held the same rights over the empire that he held over those countries, the rulers of which were, properly speaking, vassals of the Holy See. This is evident from the difference between the oath of fidelity taken to the Pontiff by the emperors, and that taken by the vassal princes, the kings of Sicily, Hungary, Aragon, and in at least one case, of England. The vassals, in their oath, plainly declare that they hold their domains by favor of the Pontiff; the emperor, in his, recognizes an obligation of protecting and defending the Roman See, from which alone he derives his title. But that the empire really depended on the Holy See, in the sense that the Pontiff could elect an emperor (or confirm an election by the prince-electors), and that he gave the title, and could take it away, is easily proved. During their conflict with Henry IV., the Saxon princes, and many other German lords, appealed to the Pontiff, and urged that "it is not right to tolerate so wicked a prince on the throne, especially as Rome has not yet conferred on him the royal dignity; it is proper to restore to Rome her right of appointing kings; it belongs to the Pope and to the city of Rome, in accord with the German princes, to select a man whose life and wisdom merit such an honor." (1). Godfrey of Viterbo, writing about the year 1184, represents the Pope as saying to the emperors: "We have given you the empire; you have given us little; you are Roman emperors by our gift." (1). Arnold, bishop of Lisieux, speaking in a Council of Tours in 1163, says that the emperors, "according to all old histories, have no other claim to the crown, than the will of the Holy Roman Church." (2). Gervase of Tilbury, writing to Otho IV., about the year 1211, tells that emperor to consider that "Pope Innocent II. gave to Otho's great-grandfather that empire which he now holds from Innocent III.," and then he proceeds: "The empire is not yours, but Christ's; not yours, but Peter's; you have received it, not from yourself, but from the vicar of Christ, the successor of Peter. . . . When you give his own to Peter, you lose nothing of your own. . . . By favor of the Pope, and not of itself, did Rome revive the empire, in the time of Charlemagne; the favor of the Pope gave the empire to a king of the Franks; the favor of the Pope transferred it from the Frankish to a German king; nor does the empire fall to him whom Germany chooses, but to him whom the Pope appoints." (3). Ludolph, bishop of Bamberg, an eminent juriconsult of the thirteenth century, regards as unquestionable "that after Charlemagne's elevation all the emperors received the unction and the crown from the Roman Church; that from the time of Otho every emperor, at his coronation, swore fidelity to that Church. . . . that the German princes, who had the right to elect a king of the Romans, had acknowledged to Pope Innocent III. that the Roman Church possessed the right of examining the person chosen as king of the Romans, who was afterwards to be promoted to the empire." (4). John of Paris, a devoted adherent of Philip the Fair, and hence very averse to anything like pretension on the part of Rome, says: "To the objection that the Pope can depose the emperor, I reply that it is true: the Pope deposes him whom he has made—the emperor receives his fief from the Pope." (5). But let us

(1) Apology of Henry IV., in CRISTITUS, Illustrations of Germany, edited by VOIGT, Gregory VII., B. viii.; and by BOSSUET, Defence, B. I., c. 12.

(1) Univ. Chron., Paschal II., in PISTORIUS, German Writers, vol. ii.

(2) LABBE, Councils, vol. x.

(3) Imperial Recreations. This work was probably suggested to Gervase, remarks Gosselin, by John of Salisbury's Polygeratien, also written for the instruction of princes. It is worthy of note, continues Gosselin, that these writers, though differing in their explanation of the subjection of the power of princes to that of the Pope, both assert the general belief in that subjection. See LEIBNITZ, Writers on Brunswick Affairs, vol. i.

(4) Zeal of the German Princes, Strasburg, 1508.

(5) Royal and Papal Power, c. 16.

hear the emperors themselves. Louis II., writing, in 871, to his rival, Basil, says of his own predecessors that "not one of them assumed the imperial title, until, for that end, he had been anointed by the Roman Pontiff." (1). Lothaire I. writes to his father, Louis the Compliant, "I have received from the Supreme Pontiff, before the altar, and before the body of St. Peter, the prince of the Apostles, as you desired, the blessing, honor, and title of the imperial office; also the crown, and the sword, for the defence of the Church." (2). Muratori declares that, in the immense multitude of charters and diplomas which he had examined, he could not discover one instance of the title of emperor having been given to a king of Germany before his coronation by the Pope. (3).

Let us now read the oath of fidelity to the Popes taken by the emperors. In two copies of the Sacramentary of St. Gregory, preserved in the Vatican and Orbonian libraries at Rome, and proved by Muratori (4) to be of a date prior to the death of Pope Leo III. (816), the oath is given as follows: "I, N., king of the Romans, by the grace of God, to be emperor, promise and swear, before God and the blessed Peter, that hereafter I shall be the protector and defender of the Supreme Pontiff and of the Holy Roman Church, in all their necessities and interests, guarding and preserving their possessions, honors, and rights, as far as the divine assistance will enable me, with all my knowledge and power, in pure and sincere fidelity. So help me God, and these holy gospels of God." (5). Before Otho I. even entered Italy, Pope John XII. required the legates to administer to him, before a portion of the true cross, the following oath, which was afterwards inserted (6) in the Body of Canon Law: "I, king Otho, do promise and swear to the lord John, Supreme Pontiff, by the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, and by this wood of the life-giving cross, and by these relics of the saints, that if, God per-

(1) BARONIO, year 871, no. 59. CENNI, Monuments, diss. 6, no. 19.

(2) CENNI, loc. cit., no. 21. MABILLON, Acts of the Benedictines, cent. 17.

(3) Annals of Italy, years 1433, 1493, 1519.

(4) Ancient Roman Liturgy, vol. 1., dissert. on Liturgical Matters, c. 6.

(5) MURATORI, ibid., vol. II.

(6) Decree, p. 1., dist. 53, c. 33, Tibi Domino.

mitting, I arrive at Rome, I shall with all my power exalt the Holy Roman Church, and thee its ruler; and I shall never injure, by my will, consent, advice, or persuasion, thy life, or members, or position; and I shall not make in Rome, in anything regarding thee or the Romans, any decree or law without thy counsel; and I shall restore to thee whatever part of the territory of St. Peter comes into our power: and whomever I shall place over the kingdom of Italy, I shall cause to swear that he will be thy ally in defending the territory of St. Peter, with all his might. So help me, etc." (1). The terms of this oath, says Gosselin, may have varied with time, but it was certainly taken by the emperors at their coronation, during the whole course of the Middle Ages. Having now shown that, contrary to the assertions of Sismondi, Michaud, Voigt, Guizot, and certain other modern authors, Gregory VII. was not the first Pontiff to regard the empire as a dependency of the Holy See, we proceed to defend the legitimacy of the deposing power, as exercised by the Popes of the Middle Ages.

We shall not consider the question of the Pontiff's divine right in the premises, whether that right be regarded as direct or indirect. It is not within our province, as historians, to do more than indicate that such a right has been defended by certain grave theologians, if not by the whole power of the schools. But we do contend that, when the Popes of the Middle Ages deposed sovereigns, they acted in accordance with the constitutional law of the day. (2) If

(1) BARONIO, year 960, no. 5.

(2) With regard to the meaning of what is called constitutional or public law, see SUAREZ, On Laws. In the Preface to his Public Law, John Dornat, whom Cauth styles, "by excellence, a philosophical juriconsult," says: "With regard to that part of the order of society which refers solely to persons united in one state under the same government, the matters arising from this order are of two kinds, which it is necessary to distinguish. The first consists of those which relate to the general order of the state: such as those that relate to government, the power of the authorities, the obedience due to them, etc. The second consists of those which regard the relations between private individuals, their various obligations to each other, whether with or without a contract. The first kind of matters, having reference to the general order of a state, is the object of constitutional law; and the second, which regards only what passes between private persons, is the object of that other class of laws, which, for that reason, is called private law. Of these two kinds of law there are two sorts, admitted in practice by all the nations of the earth. One consists of those which belong to the natural law; the other, of laws peculiar to each country; such, for instance, as customs sanctioned by long usage, and laws such as the reigning power may enact." In his Civil Law, prelim., tit. 1, sect. 1, nos. 2, 3, 4, 10, 11, the same author explains how these laws may be known: "Laws or rules are of two kinds: one belongs to the natural, and the other to positive, otherwise called human or conventional law, because enacted by men. Human laws are of two sorts; the first, such as from their very institution were written and promulgated by competent authority, as, for instance, the ordinances of the kings of France; and the other, those whose origin cannot be traced, but which are found sanctioned by the universal approbation and immemorial usage of the people. These latter rules, or laws, are called customs. Customs derive their obligatory

the public law of the time authorized the deposing power of the Popes, that power was legitimate. Now it is certain that, during the Middle Ages, it was stipulated in the election of all sovereigns, by the constitution of their states, that an heretical prince, or one who rebelled against the Church, incurred deposition. In proving that such was the public law of the time, we will not insist, with de Maistre, that the existence of this law is sufficiently shown by the fact of the universal belief of the day (1); we shall furnish direct proofs, founded on the constitutional law of Spain, of England, of Sicily, of France, and above all, of the Holy Roman empire. Firstly, then, in regard to Spain, the reader of Mariana, Ferreras, and Valiente will find that, as far back as the seventh century, the general assemblies of the nation insisted upon the Catholicism of the monarch. In the Sixth Council of Toledo (638), it was decreed that "hereafter, no king shall mount the throne until he has sworn, among other conditions, not to tolerate heretics in his states." The Jesuit Charenton, in his notes on Mariana, says that "it is not surprising that the Councils imposed new laws and conditions on the Gothic kings. All the grandees of the kingdom assisted at these Councils, for they were a kind of States-General. The bishop, it is true, had the exclusive management of ecclesiastical matters, but in civil affairs the barons, as well as the prelates, had a voice." Valiente tells us that the obligation of maintaining religious unity in Spain remained in force for all Spanish monarchs, and they were obliged to accept it at their coronation until the fifteenth century; and then it was no longer expressly mentioned, because it was no longer necessary for thoroughly Catholic Spain (1).

force from the people who have received them, whereas, in republics, the authority is vested in the people. But in monarchical states customs are not established, and cannot acquire the force of law, unless with the assent of the sovereign. Thus, in France, the kings have fixed and drawn up in writing, and confirmed as laws, all the customs, preserving for each province the laws which it had already possessed, either from the ancient consent of the people who instituted them, or of the princes who governed them." In sect. 2, no. 19, ibid., Domat concludes from the above principles, that "if the difficulties arising in the interpretation of a law or custom are found explained by an ancient usage, which fixes its sense, and which is confirmed by an uninterrupted succession of uniform decisions, we must adhere to the sense as decided by custom, which is the best interpreter of laws."

(1) Generally speaking, says Gosselin, the sole fact of the universal belief will establish the existence of the law (GROTIUS, Law of War, B. II., c. 4. PUFFENDORF, Law of Nature and Nations, B. IV., c. 12, § 8; B. VII., c. 7, § 4; c. 8, § 9.), "but when there is question of proving a point of constitutional law in favor of the Holy See, it is not enough, in the opinion of the enemies of the Church, to appeal to prescription . . . we must prove, besides, that the Church had from the beginning, possessed this power legitimately."

(1) Public Law of Spain, vol. II., c. 7, no. 18.

Secondly, as regards England, the Laws of St. Edward, which were solemnly confirmed by the Conqueror in 1069, declare, in art. XIV., that "the king, as he holds here below the place of the Supreme King, is appointed to rule an earthly kingdom and the Lord's people, and above all, to venerate His Church, to defend her from those who would injure her, to expel from her all evil-doers, and to utterly destroy them. Unless he does these things, the name of king shall not cling to him; yea, as Pope John declares, he shall lose the name of king." (1). And then, after mentioning the duties of a king, the same article says: "The king, in his own person, placing his hand on the holy Gospels, and on the sacred relics, shall, in the presence of the priests and of his kingdom, swear to observe all those things before he is crowned by the archbishops and bishops." In the sixteenth century, the English Catholics confidently cited, against Elizabeth's claim to the throne, the ancient laws of England, which expressly excluded a heretic from the throne. (2). Elizabeth herself, though she affected to ridicule the Pope's sentence against her pretensions, tried every means to procure its revocation, and even sought the emperor Maximilian's intercession. Pope Pius V. asked the emperor, in return, "whether Elizabeth deemed the sentence valid or invalid. If valid, why did she not seek a reconciliation with the Holy See? If invalid, why did she wish it to be revoked?" (3). Thirdly, in regard to the Two Sicilies, there can be no question, for from the time of Charlemagne, the Holy See was suzerain of nearly all the peninsular part of this kingdom (4); Adrian I. having received, in 773, from Charlemagne, the sovereignty of the duchy of Benevento, which then included all of the peninsular domain, excepting the duchy of Naples and Gaeta. During the Pontificate of John VIII. (872-882), whether;

(1) WILKINS, Anglo-Saxon Laws, London, 1721. It is well here to observe that, according to the best critics, these laws were, properly speaking, not St. Edward's own, but a compilation, with amendments, of old Saxon laws, reaching back to the year 602, in the reign of Ethelbert of Kent.

(2) See ALLEN, A True, Sincere, and Modest Answer of Catholics to the English Persecutors, 1584, c. 4, 5, and the same cardinal's Admonition to the Nobility and People of England and Ireland, Antwerp, 1588. Also, DOLEMAN, Conference on the Next Succession to the Crown of England, 1593, p. 2, c. 7.

(3) LINGARD, History of England, vol. vi., c. 1.
(4) BORGIA, History of the Temporal Dominion of the Apostolic See in the Two Sicilies, Second Edit., Rome, 1789, Dissert. Prelim., no. 18.

as the anti-Papal historian, Giannone, admits (1), by effect of another donation of Charlemagne, or by the voluntary submission of the people, Gaeta also became a fief of the Holy See. Under St. Leo IX. (1049-1054), the Holy See received from the emperor Henry III. a cession of the high dominion which the successors of Charlemagne had retained, subject to the Pontiff's rights, over these and the other Neapolitan territories; and we find the same Pope investing count Humfred with the sovereignty of the island of Sicily. From this period, down to our own day, the kings of Naples and of Sicily (or of the Two Sicilies) whether they were Normans, Suabians, Angevines, Aragonese, Austrians, Bourbons, have always solemnly recognized the suzerainty of the Holy See. (2). The following oath of fealty, taken by Robert Guiscard to Pope Nicholas II., in 1059, will sufficiently show the relations subsisting between the Roman Pontiffs and this kingdom. "I, Robert, by the grace of God and of St. Peter, duke of the Puglia and of Calabria, and by the same protection, duke-elect of Sicily, will henceforth be faithful to the Holy Roman Church, and to thee, my liege Lord, Nicholas. I shall take no part in any act or scheme against thy life, limbs, or liberty; nor shall I knowingly disclose, to thine injury, the plans which thou mayest entrust to me, and which thou forbiddest me to reveal. In all places, and with all my power, I shall aid the Holy Roman Church against all men, to hold and to preserve the property and domain of St. Peter; I shall assist thee to preserve in security and honor the Roman Popedom, the land, and the principality of St. Peter; I shall not try to invade, to acquire, or to seize, without certain license from thee or from thy successors in the dignity of St. Peter, any possessions other than those which thou or thy successors may grant to me. I shall try, in good faith, to pay annually to the Roman Church the tribute fixed for the lands of St. Peter which I hold or may hold. I shall place in thy power all the churches in my dominions, together with their possessions; and I shall defend them in their fidelity to the Holy Roman Church. Shouldst thou die, or any of thy successors die, before me, I shall help toward the election and installation of a successor worthy of St. Peter, according as I shall be advised by the best cardinals, and by the Roman clergy and people. All the above things I shall observe to thee and to the Holy Roman Church, and I shall observe this fidelity to thy successors in the dignity of St. Peter, who may confirm to me the investitures thou hast granted to me. So help me, etc." (1).

(1) Civil History of the kingdom of Naples, Naples, 1724, B. vi., c. 1.

(2) For dates of this solemn recognition, and payment of tribute, see the cited work of Borgia, p. xvi. When Borgia wrote (1789), this mark of vassalage had been exhibited to the Roman Pontiffs fifty-one times.

Fourthly, in regard to France, as far back as the sixth century, we find French kings subjecting themselves to be deposed, in certain cases, by the authority of the Pope. At the request of queen Brunehilda, St. Gregory the Great, when granting certain privileges to the monasteries and hospital of Autun, decreed that "if any person, king, bishop, judge, or any secular whosoever, knowing this our constitution, shall try to violate it, he forfeits the dignity of his power and honor." (2). But whatever may have been the custom of France under her first race of kings, it is certain that under the Carolingians the king was amenable to a national Council, an assembly which was at once ecclesiastical and political—a kind of States-General. (3). When Lothaire had been deposed, in 842, by the Council of Aix-la-Chapelle, the bishops declared that his brothers could not take possession of his states unless they promised to rule according to the law of God; and when the princes so promised, the president said: "Then, by the divine authority, we advise, exhort, and command, that you receive the kingdom, and rule it according to the will of God." (4). Charles the Bald, having been deposed by the Council of Attigny, in 857, presented a petition to the Council of Savonnières, in 859, in which he thus admitted the competency of the ecclesiastical tribunal: "By no one could I be cast down from the height of royal power, without at least the consideration and judgment of the bishops, by

(1) BARONIO, years 1059, no. 70.

(2) Epistles, B. xiii., ep. 8, 9, 10.

(3) THOMASSIN, Old and New Discipline of the Church, vol. ii., B. iii., c. 44–57.

BERNARD, Origin and Progress of French Legislation, B. V., c. 3.

(4) NITHARD, Dissensions of the Sons of Louis the Compliant, B. iv., in Labbe, vol. 7. DANIEL, History of France, vol. 2. FLEURY, vol. x., B. xlviii., no. 11; B. xlix., no. 46.

whose ministry I was consecrated king, and who are called thrones of God, in whom God sits, and through whom He pronounces His judgments." (1).

And now, fifthly, for the public law of the empire. We have already seen, when treating of the revival of the empire under Charlemagne, that this prince owed his title to the Roman Pontiff, the representative and guardian of the Roman people. (2). Again, by the nomination and coronation of Charlemagne, the Pope did not renounce his right in future elections, as is proved by the exercise of that right during the Carlovingian period, and by the transfer of the empire, at the will of the Pontiff (John XII.), from the Franks to the Germans. These facts would, of themselves, demonstrate the special dependence of the empire on the Pontiff, but that dependence, and the emperor's liability, in certain cases, to deposition by the Pope, are clearly asserted in the ancient monuments of German law. In the Swabian Code, compiled in the thirteenth century, from the ancient laws and customs of the empire (3), we read: "The Church sword is given to the Pope, that he may pronounce judgment at the proper times, seated on a white horse (then a sign of pre-eminence). The emperor must hold the stirrup, lest the saddle should shift. (4). Thus it is indicated that whoever resists the Pope, and who is not induced to obey by an ecclesiastical judgment, is to be compelled by the emperor and other lay princes and judges, by proscription." (5). Concerning the election of an emperor we read: "The election of the king belongs by right to the Germans. . . . when he is consecrated, and crowned, and placed on the throne at Aix-la-Chapelle, with the consent of the electors, then he receives the power and

(1) DANIEL, ibid. BOSSUET, Defence, B. II., c. 43.

(2) It is worthy of remark that, in modern times, when the emperors were no longer crowned at Rome, the Popes did not style them emperors, but emperors-elect. See two Briefs of Pius VI. to Leopold II. and Francis II. in Briefs of Pius VI., Paris, 1798, p. 557, 561. GOSSELIN, p. 2, c. 3, § 2.

(3) So says the title: "Here begins the Book of Imperial Provincial Law, established and ordained by the Roman emperors and electors, containing all the common articles of law—whatever is to be done or omitted. . . . for the sake of general peace, established by the Holy Empire, and seriously confirmed in ancient times." Preamble to the German or Swabian Law, in Senckenberg's Body of German Law, vol. II. For the opinion of eminent jurists as to the high authority of this Code, see Senckenberg, in Preamble, § 20, and Eichorn, in his History of the German Empire and Laws, vol. II.

(4) This custom was certainly older than the ninth century, for it is mentioned in copies of the Sacramentary of St. Gregory in use at that time. See Muratori's Ancient Rom. Lit., vol. II.

(5) Preamble, 21-24.

name of king; but when the Pope has consecrated and crowned him, then he has the full power of the empire, and the name of emperor Deformed, leprous, excommunicated, proscribed, or heretical persons cannot be chosen by the princes; but if they should choose such a person, the other princes have a right to reject him, in the place where the imperial court assembles." (1). As to the excommunication of an emperor, it is decreed that "Only the Pope can put the emperor under the ban; but he should do this only for three causes: firstly, if the emperor doubts as to orthodoxy of faith; secondly, if he leaves his wife; thirdly, if he injures churches." (2). Concerning heretical princes, it is established that "any lay prince who does not punish heretics, and who defends and protects them, shall be excommunicated by ecclesiastical judgment; and if, within a year, he does not amend, the bishop who excommunicated him shall denounce his crime to the Pope, and shall state, at the same time, for how long a period he has, because of that crime, persevered in the state of excommunication. This having been done, the Pope should deprive him of his princely office, and of all his honors. Such shall be the judgment, in the cases of magnates, as well as in those of the lowly; for we read that Pope Innocent deposed the emperor Otho (IV.) from his throne, for other crimes. This the Popes do, of right, for God said to Jeremiah: 'I have appointed thee judge over every man and every kingdom.'" (3).

It is evident, therefore, that, whether or not the deposing power be of divine right, the Pontiffs of the Middle Ages were guilty of no usurpation, and of no presumption, when they exercised it. As to the practical results of this exercise, if the reader will refer to the valuable work of Gosselin (4), he will be convinced, firstly, that the Popes were always

(1) C. 18, nos. 1, 2, 3; c. 22, nos. 8, 9.

(2) C. 29.

(3) C. 351. Gosselin properly infers from those provisions of the ancient German law that "it clearly follows that the Papal sentence of deposition deprived an emperor, not only of the imperial title, but of his rank and of his honors, and consequently, of the title and rights of king of Germany. . . . these provisions will, doubtless, surprise many readers, and it is to be regretted that the majority of modern writers who have treated of the history of this period were ignorant of this ancient jurisprudence, which throws so much light on the history of the lamentable conflicts which so long divided the priesthood and the empire." Loc. cit., p. ii., c. 3, § 3

(4) P. ii., c. 4.

moderate in the use of their power; secondly, that monarchical sycophants have falsely accused the Holy See of degrading, by their treatment of sovereigns, the royal authority in the eyes of the people; thirdly, that the blame for the wars caused by the collision of the spiritual and temporal power is to be assigned, not to the Pontiffs, but to rebellious and tyrannical, and sometimes heretical, kings. As to the real advantages accruing to society from the exercise of the deposing power, namely, the preservation of religion, morality, and public tranquillity, they are admitted by many Protestant, and even infidel, authors of eminence, who have been curious enough, and brave enough, to study the matter. Coquerel, (Athanasie) than whom modern French Protestantism has produced no more brilliant light, admits that "the Papal power, by disposing of crowns, prevented the atrocities of despotism; hence, in those dark ages, we see no instance of a tyrant like Domitian: a Tiberius could not exist; Rome would have crushed him. Great despotisms develop when kings believe that there is no power above them; then it is that the intoxication of unlimited power engenders the most atrocious enormities." (1). Ancillon (John), one of the best of Protestant historians, confesses that "during the Middle Ages, when there was no social order, the Papacy alone perhaps saved Europe from utter barbarism. It created bonds of connection between the most distant nations; it was a common centre, a rallying point for isolated states. It was a supreme tribunal, established in the midst of universal anarchy, and its decrees were sometimes as respectable as they were respected. It prevented and arrested the despotism of the emperors, and diminished the inconveniences of the feudal system." (2). Even Voltaire is compelled to acknowledge that "The interests of the human race required some check on sovereigns, and some protection for the life of the subject: this religious check could, by universal consent, be placed in the hands of the Pope. This chief Pontiff, by never meddling in temporal quarrels except to appease them,

(1) Essay on the History of Christianity, p. 75.

(2) Tableau of the Revolutions of the Political System of Europe after the 15th Century, Berlin, 1803, vol. 1., Introd., p. 133, 137.

by admonishing kings and nations of their duties, by re-proving crimes, by inflicting excommunications on great offences only, would have been regarded as the image of God on earth." (1).

CHAPTER XVI.

THE HERESY OF BERENGARIUS.

Berengarius was born at Tours, toward the close of the tenth century. His education was received in the schools of Chartres, and his principal master was the holy and learned Fulbert. (2). Adelman, who was one of his companions, informs us that, while yet a youth, Berengarius manifested a petulant spirit and a craving for novelties, which frequently impelled Fulbert to warn him not to desert the beaten path, namely, the Apostolic faith and the teachings of the Fathers. (3). According to William of Malmesbury (4) and Henry Knighton (5), St. Fulbert, when on his death-bed, prophesied that Berengarius would destroy many souls, and ordered him to be expelled from the schools of Chartres. On the death of Fulbert, the future heresiarch returned to Tours, became rector of the academy of St. Martin, and soon acquired a great reputation as a professor. Certain manuscripts of the abbey of Lorris, Polydore Virgil, and other writers, accuse Berengarius of having been addicted to necromancy, but Alexandre observes that none of his contemporaries make such a charge. Before the year 1047 he was received into the diocese of Angers, and was soon made archdeacon and treasurer. In 1047 he began to propagate his errors on the Holy Eucharist, and many others. He condemned infant baptism, and asserted that promiscuous intercourse between the sexes was licit. Guitmund of Aversa, a contemporary, thus describes his

(1) Essay on General History, vol. ii., c. 60.

(2) Gerson asserts that Berengarius was a disciple of Abélard, but he evidently confounds the Sacramentarian with the Berengarius of Poitiers, who wrote an Apology for that great unfortunate. Abélard survived the heresiarch many years.

(3) Epistle to Berengarius.

(4) English Kings, B. iii.

(5) English Affairs down to 1395, B. I., c. 13.

error regarding the Real Presence: "He denied that the Eucharist is truly and substantially the Body and Blood of the Lord; and asserted that it is such only in name, inasmuch as it is a sign and significative figure of the Lord's Body and Blood." From the Formula of Faith which Berengarius subscribed in the Roman Synod of 1079, we find that he had denied "that the bread and wine are substantially converted, by the mystery of holy prayer and the words of our Redeemer, into the true and very Flesh and Blood of Christ." Hugh, bishop of Langres, writing to Berengarius, says: "You assert that the Body of Christ is in this Sacrament in such manner that the nature and essence of the bread and wine are not changed." Some have attributed to Berengarius the theory that in the Eucharist there are both the substance of the Sacred Body and Blood, and the substance of bread and wine; that Christ's Body and Blood are hidden in the bread and wine. Certain of his followers taught this doctrine; not so Berengarius. Guitmund writes: "All those who err in this matter do not follow the same path of error. All the Berengarians agree that the bread and wine are not essentially changed; but some assert that there is nothing whatever of Christ's Body and Blood, that the Sacrament is only a type and a figure; others, yielding somewhat to the teaching of the Church, without abandoning their error, say that the Body and Blood of Christ are, in effect, contained in the Sacrament, but hidden in a kind of impanation, for our reception. These latter pretend that their theory is the more subtle opinion of Berengarius himself. Others, again, hold that the bread and wine are partly changed. Some believe that they are entirely changed, but that, if an unworthy communicant presents himself, the Body and Blood of Christ resume the nature of bread and wine." (1).

Berengarius soon abandoned his errors on infant-baptism and the advisability of fornication (2), and bent all his energies to disseminate that on the Eucharist. Some have thought (3) that Berengarius imbibed his heresy from the work of the Jew, Joseph Albo, entitled Foundations of the Mosaic Law, but Alexandre observes that Albo wrote in 1425, nearly four hundred years after Berengarius, and that it is more likely that Scotus Erigena, to whose works the heresiarch was much addicted, is responsible for Sacramentarianism. Berengarius tried hard to gain the adherence of Lanfranc, then a simple monk, but of great reputation for learning; but he labored in vain, and the great Lanfranc was probably the most energetic of all the defenders of the ancient doctrine. Among the writers whom God raised up to combat Sacramentarianism during the life-time of its author, we may mention, besides Lanfranc, the heresiarch's fellow-student, Adelmann, bishop of Brescia; Hugh, bishop of Langres; Guitmund, bishop of Aversa; Durand, abbot of Troars; while after his death the cause of truth was admirably defended by Alger, a monk of Cluny. (1). It is an immortal glory of the Benedictine order, observes Alexandre, that it gave to the Church these four defenders of the Eucharistic doctrine. Although there are some minor errors (2) in the work of Alger, Erasmus thought it worth all the polemical treatises which appeared on the same subject in the sixteenth century. Berengarius admitted that he could not answer its arguments.

(1) Against Berengarius B. 1.

(3) PAPIRIUS, Bishops of the City, B. IV.

(2) Ibid.

Mosheim (3), with his usual proclivity to adulation of all heretics, asserts that Berengarius was renowned for his learning and for personal sanctity. His holiness could not have been great, as he thrice perjured himself. As for his learning, it is not manifested by any of his writings, and Guitmund tells us that "he could not attain the secrets of the deeper philosophy; he was not sufficiently acute." He acquired a reputation in France, because at that period "the liberal arts had become, in France, nearly obsolete." (4). Mosheim also contends that, before the time of Beren-

(1) Body and Blood of the Lord.

(2) Alger agrees with Guitmund that the Sacramental species cannot be corrupted; that such corruption is only apparent, God so permitting, in order to punish the neglect of the priest or to try our faith; that the Body of the Lord is taken up to heaven when corruption seems to attack the species. He also attributes the error of the Stercoranists to the Greeks, while they were innocent of it. He asserts that Christ prescribed that the Eucharist should be consecrated in unleavened bread, which is not true.

(3) Cent. 11, p. 2, c. 3, § 13.

(4) Body and Blood of the Lord, B. i.

garius, the Church had not decided anything as to the manner in which Our Lord is present in the Eucharist ; that each person believed as he thought proper. We have already shown, in our chapter on the Eucharistic doctrine in the tenth century, the absurdity of this assertion. Mosheim insinuates that Pope St. Gregory VII. sympathized with the heresy of the Sacramentarians. The reader will judge of the truth of this charge when he observes the conduct of Gregory in the Synods held to condemn that heresy. The first Council called in this matter was held at Rome, in 1050, under the presidency of Pope Leo IX. It was occasioned by the letter written to Lanfranc by the heresiarch, reproving him for condemning Scotus Erigena, and giving a summary of his own views. Some had accused Lanfranc of sympathy with these views, and the holy Benedictine wished to clear himself of the aspersion. In this Synod the epistle of Berengarius was read and condemned ; he was excommunicated, and Lanfranc was vindicated. The Pontiff then ordered another, and fuller Synod, to meet at Vercelli. This body was convened in September of the same year, 1050, and the same Pontiff, Leo IX., presided over it. There appeared two clerics as representatives of Berengarius. His heresy was again condemned, as well as the book (supposed to be) by Scotus Erigena, on the Eucharist, which the heresiarch had alleged in justification of his own error. As Berengarius proved contumacious, a Synod of French bishops met at Paris, in the month of November, 1050, and, in the presence of king Henry I., the decree of Vercelli was solemnly received. After this Synod of Paris the heresiarch wrote to the abbot Richard, asking that prelate to obtain for him from the king some compensation for the injury done to him by the bishops, and saying that he was ready, at any time, to prove to the satisfaction of his majesty that Scotus and himself had been unjustly condemned. "The king should remember," he said, "that Scotus had written his book by command of, and at the expense of, the great Charles (the Bald). . . . that hence the king ought to vindicate him against the calumnies of men now living, unless he (Henry) wished to show himself an unworthy successor of that magnificent monarch." In the year 1055, Pope Victor II. again condemned Berengarius in a Synod held at Florence; and in the same year, a Council was held at Tours for the same purpose, presided over by the subdeacon Hildebrand, then Pontifical legate in France. In this latter assembly Berengarius made and signed an abjuration of his heresy, and solemnly swore never to teach it again. This having been done, he was benignly received by Hildebrand. The conversion of the heresiarch was short-lived, and in 1059 Pope Nicholas II. held a Synod at Rome, composed of 113 bishops; and here Lanfranc so pressed Berengarius with argument, that he again abjured his doctrine, and threw his own and the book of Scotus into the flames. He also read and signed the following Profession of Faith · "I, Berengarius, an unworthy deacon of the church of St. Maurice, at Angers, knowing the True, Catholic, and Apostolic Faith. do anathematize every heresy, especially the one by which hitherto I have been disgraced, and which seeks to show that the bread and wine placed upon the altar are, after the consecration, only a sign, and not the true Body and Blood of our Lord Jesus Christ; and that they cannot, in the Sacrament, be sensibly handled by the hands of the priest, or be broken or crushed by the teeth of the faithful. And I agree with the Holy Roman and Apostolic See, and with tongue and heart I declare that I hold, in regard to the Sacrament of the Lord's table, that faith which the venerable lord Pope Nicholas and this holy Synod, by Evangelical and Apostolic authority, has given me to hold; that is, that the bread and wine placed upon the altar are, after the consecration, not only a sign, but also the true Body and Blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, and that not only in the sign, but in truth, they are handled by the hands of the priest, and broken, and crushed by the teeth of the faithful; this I swear by the Holy and Consubstantial Trinity and by these Holy Gospels of Christ. And I pronounce worthy of eternal anathema those who contradict this faith; them, and their teachings, and their followers. If ever again I presume to think or preach anything against the above, I shall be subject to the severity of the Canons. Having read and re-read the above, I willingly subscribe to it." (1).

After this Synod, Berengarius returned to France, and upon the death of king Henry I. he took advantage of the minority of Philip I. and reasserted his heresy, issuing a book against the last Roman Council and violently attacking cardinal Humbert, the author of the Profession he had signed. Against this book Lanfranc wrote his famous treatise on the Body and Blood of the Lord. About this time Berengarius began to use a terminology very much in vogue with modern heretics. He styled Pope St. Leo IX., by whom he was first condemned, not a Pontiff, but a Pompifex and a Pulpifex; he called the Roman Church "the Church of the malignant," and said that she held, not the Apostolic Chair, but the "Chair of Satan." In 1063, a Synod held at St. Ouen, in the presence of William of Normandy, and in 1075, another, at Poitiers, condemned Berengarius; but he persisted in his obstinacy. In 1078 Pope Gregory VII. summoned the heresiarch to appear again before a Roman Synod. He begged a year's delay, and in the meantime sent a Profession of Faith, which did not satisfy the Pontiff. In 1079 he appeared before another Synod, over which Pope Gregory presided in person. The Acts of this assembly tell us that "Berengarius, the teacher of this error, frequently avowed his crime to the Council, and having begged pardon, merited it of the Apostolic clemency." He then made the following Profession: "I, Berengarius, believe in my heart, and avow with my tongue, that the bread and wine placed upon the altar are converted substantially, by the mystery of the holy prayer and by the

(1) In regard to the meaning of the words "not only in the sign, but in truth, it is handled by the hands of the priest, and broken, etc.," Catholic doctors differ. Some hold that these acts are exercised only on the sacramental species; others contend that they affect the Body of Christ. The former hold that the species or accidents remain, after the consecration, and that these are broken, etc. Among the assertors of this theory was Abélard, and because of it, he was styled by some "another Berengarius." Abélard says: "This breakage may well be said to take place, not in the substance of the Body, but in the form of the sacramental bread; then the breakage or partition would be true, though not in the substance, but in the sacrament, that is, in the species. . . . Truly indeed, but only in the sacrament." Walter, abbot of St. Victor's at Paris, accused Abélard of hereby "subtracting from the truth; saying that all these are done, not in the substance but in the visible species, and in the form of the bread." But this is unjust to Abélard, remarks Alexandre. Abélard contended against Berengarius that the Eucharist is the true Body of Christ, that the bread is changed into the substance of the Lord's Body; but that breaking, etc., is exercised, not in the Body, but in the "sacrament," (sign) or species. And certainly, for more than seven hundred years the Church has sung the words of St. Thomas Aquinas, "there is no partition of the substance: the fracture is only of the sign."

words of our Redeemer, into the true, real, and vivifying Flesh and Blood of our Lord Jesus Christ; and that, after the consecration, they are the true Body of Christ which was born of the Virgin, which hung from the cross for the salvation of the world, and which sits at the right hand of the Father, and the true Blood of Christ which flowed from His side; not only in sign and virtue of a Sacrament, but in property of nature and in truth of substance, as it is stated in this Brief, which I have read and you understand. Thus I believe, and never again will I contradict this Faith. So help me God, and these Holy Gospels of God!" Berthold of Constance, a contemporary, informs us that Pope Gregory then commanded Berengarius, by the authority of God Almighty, and of the holy Apostles Peter and Paul, never again to dispute with any person, or to teach any person anything regarding the Real Presence, unless indeed it were to convert to the truth those whom he had perverted. In spite of this third recantation, it would seem that Berengarius again relapsed. But there is good reason for believing that he died in the orthodox faith. The ancient MSS. of Lorris record that, "Leaving Rome, Berengarius came to Tours, and in the Island of St. Cosmas renounced the pomps of the world, combating for the Lord nearly twenty-eight years. (1). And Clare of Fleury says: "The master Berengarius of Tours, an admirable philosopher, was a lover of the poor. He composed the prayer 'Jesus Christ, Just Judge,' and finished his life a faithful and true Catholic." (2). Finally, William of Malmesbury writes: "Although Berengarius stained his hot early youth with the defence of certain heresies, in his more austere age he so repented as to be regarded by some as a saint." (3). Mosheim quite naturally dislikes the idea of any return, on the part of a heretic, to the bosom of mother Church; hence he ridicules the above and other testimonies, which show that, after all his vacillations, the most distinguished of Sacramentarians died in the communion of Rome. But when this author himself admits, nay insists, that Berenga-

(1) The number 28 is evidently an error, for Berengarius died in 1088.

(2) Clare wrote his Chronicle in the beginning of the twelfth century.

(3) Book iii.

rius was regarded, after death, as a saint, how does he account for this opinion, if he believes this "saint" to have died in his old Sacramentarian belief? Mosheim says that in his day the canons of Tours performed an annual service at the tomb of Berengarius; and how could that be, if these canons were not persuaded that he died in friendship with the Holy See? The German historian points to the fact that Berengarius begged pardon of God for the "perjury" he had committed at Rome in renouncing his theories. But this pardon was asked in the work written shortly after the death of king Henry I. (1060), and during the twenty-eight years of life yet remaining to him Berengarius may have repented of that expression. (1)

CHAPTER XVII.

ABELARD.

In reference to the amatory phase of Abélard's life we shall say very little. It has been so frequently the theme of poets, that a general and crude notion of it is widely spread. Only the student, however, is aware that the "woes of Abélard and Héloïse" are by no means the chief things for him to consider in the career of this extraordinary man. In fact, if Abélard were celebrated only for the events of which Pope and others have sung, his career would find no place among the topics noticed by the ecclesiastical historian. But the errors which he taught from his professorial chair, and his peculiar relations with the great St. Bernard which thence ensued, are worthy of the student's attention. Bayle (2), Mosheim (3), and other Protestant authors, have shown great sympathy with Abélard; not because this philosopher was a contumacious heretic, for we shall show that he was not such, but because they would detract from the reputation of "the last of the fathers,"

(1) Bergier remarks that Mosheim seems to have taken all he says about Berengarius from Basnage (History of the Church, B. xxiv. c. 2.). We find in both "the same reflections, and the whole is founded only on the assertions of this heresiarch, convicted a hundred times of imposture and perfidy."

(2) Dictionary, art. Abélard, Héloïse, Bernard.

(3) Cent. xii., p. 2, c. 3., § 10.

St. Bernard, who was the ambitious professor's chief opponent. Before entering upon a narration of Abélard's aberrations and of the course of St. Bernard, we shall give a short sketch of our subject's life, for the popular version is in many respects inaccurate.

Peter Abélard was born in 1079, at Palais, a village about eight miles east of Nantes, in Brittany. His father was a soldier, but fond of letters, and hence the young Abélard was made, not a knight, but a scholar. When a mere lad, he became a real peripatetic, going from place to place, and disputing, wherever he found an opportunity, on dialectics. Arriving, at length, in Paris, he attended the lectures of the celebrated William of Champeaux, archdeacon of Paris, and one of the first philosophers of his time. William was at first greatly pleased with his new auditor, but he was soon vexed on finding that most of his scholars deemed the young Abélard more worthy than himself to occupy the chair. Already, in fact, the young man gave unmistakable signs of those qualities which were to prove the bane of his life. Not only his conduct, as we gather from his contemporaries, but his own writings, show him to have been vain, presumptuous, and jealous. He disputed, not so much for the sake of truth, as to enjoy the pleasure of conquering. Nothing pleased him so much as to weaken the reputation of other professors; to entice away their scholars. He was a handsome man, possessed a charming voice, and was a poet as well as a philosopher. But his own works show that he owed his success much more to his seductive externals, than to superior solidity of doctrine. He complains much, in his letters, of his many enemies and of their persecutions. Many cruel and unjust persecutors he certainly possessed, but it is too evident that many of these enemies were deliberately made such by himself, that he might defy and conquer them. Abélard was only twenty-two years of age when he opened a scholastic hall at Melun. His reputation became immense, and as he succeeded in combating the views of his old master, William of Champeaux, on certain scholastic questions, the lecture-hall of that unfortunate professor was soon deserted for the one at Melun. After a while, Abélard removed to Corben, but hearing that William had resigned his chair in Paris, and had become a regular canon, he went to Mt. St. Genviève, and there began to lecture. After a few years, he intermitted his lectures, and attended the theological course of Anselm of Laon (1), a famous professor of divinity. Here he undertook to lecture in opposition to his professor, but, his proceedings being interdicted, he returned to Paris, where he soon acquired great fame and much money. And here we must succinctly but accurately narrate the events which have excited so much sympathy for Abélard. Up to his thirty-fifth year he seems to have led an exemplary life. His affections, like his ambitions, had been purely intellectual. But his inordinate pride needed a check, and it received a severe one. About the year 1114, Abélard made the acquaintance of the canon Fulbert, a beneficiary of the cathedral of Paris. Through the canon, he came to know the canon's niece, a beautiful young woman, and renowned throughout France for her learning. He soon fell a captive to the attractions of Héloïse, and deliberately designed her seduction. Knowing that Fulbert was proud of his niece's mental acquirements, Abélard offered to reside in their house, and, besides paying his board, to act as tutor to Héloïse. The offer was accepted, and Abélard himself tells us, in delicate and eloquent terms, of the result of his plot, namely, that Héloïse became a too willing victim to his and her own passions. (2). In time, her condition compelled her to secretly leave her uncle's house, and to betake herself into Brittany, to the care of a sister of Abélard. There she gave birth to a son, who was named Astrolabius. When Fulbert discovered the state of affairs, he naturally insisted that marriage should take place between the parties.

Abélard, the reader must know, was free to marry, for, though a cleric, he was not in Holy Orders. He would have married Héloïse from the beginning, but he was am-

(1) This Anselm must not be confounded with the Anselm, namely, the saintly archbishop of Canterbury and one of the most learned men of the Middle Ages. This confusion is sometimes made. Thus, in Appleton's Condensed Cyclopædia, we are told that Abélard "studied divinity at Laon, under Anselm, whom he also eclipsed." As there were only two Anselms of very great name at that period, viz., the saints of Canterbury and of Lucca, this non-qualification of the name and the glorifying of Abélard with the term "eclipsed" would mislead the ordinary reader.

(2) ABELARD, Letter to a friend, on the History of my Misfortunes.

bitious of ecclesiastical preferment, and his overweening vanity led him to aspire to any height. If the alleged Letters of Héloïse are genuine, she herself encouraged him in this conduct, preferring "to be his mistress, rather than his wife," (1) if she could only see him idolized by the multitude. Be this as it may, Abélard now asked Héloïse to marry him. Her answer shows that, learned though she was, passion had completely warped her mind, and that much of the sympathy extended to her has been misplaced. She told Abélard that even by marriage she would not pacify her uncle; that it would be inglorious for Abélard to unite himself to one woman, when nature had made him for all; that matrimony was full of vexations, and that Theophrastes and Cicero had both declared that no man could wed both a wife and philosophy; "there was nothing in common between scholars and servant-women, between writing-materials and cradles, between books and distaffs, between pens and spindles;" that, finally, Abélard was a cleric, and it was unfitting that he should marry. In spite of these strange reasons, Abélard persisted, and at length Héloïse yielded. Returning to Paris, she was married to Abélard, her uncle consenting that the union should be kept secret, for the sake of the professor's ambition. But the foolish Fulbert, proud of having the great philosopher for a nephew, soon began to boast of the marriage; the servants of the house also began to talk. Then Héloïse denied that she was married, great scandal ensued, and finally Abélard persuaded his wife to quiet things by retiring for a time to the convent of Argenteuil, where she had been educated. She might put on the nun's habit, he said, but she was by no means to take the veil. When this came to the ears of Fulbert and his kindred, they imagined that Abélard had tired of Héloïse, and had ridden himself of an encumbrance. Maddened at the fancied insult, and burning for revenge, they attacked the unfortunate professor, and barbarously mutilated him. (2). Shortly after his recovery, the humiliated Abélard, moved, as he himself testifies, more by shame than by devotion, took the monastic habit in the famous Benedictine abbey of St. Denis. Héleise took the veil at Argenteuil, and although, in the letters which she is said to have afterwards sent to Abélard, there are some expressions that savor of levity and even of a criminal hankering after the past, she seems to have finally settled into a contented and holy religious. In the course of time she became prioress of the convent at Argenteuil, and when the community was forced by the monks of St. Denis, who wished its house for themselves, to abandon Argenteuil, she took her nuns to the oratory of the Paraclete, which Abélard and his pupils, as we shall see, had constructed with their own hands, and afterwards ceded to Héloise. While abbess of the Paraclete, Héloise was visited by St. Bernard. The blessed Peter Mauricius, abbot of Cluny, greatly esteemed her, and in one of his letters he congratulates her as "a woman truly and entirely philosophical, who had chosen the Gospel instead of logic, the Apostle instead of physics, and the cloister instead of the Academy."

(1) HELOÏSE, Epistle to Abélard, n. 2.

(2) For this outrage Fulbert was deprived of his benefices, and the actual perpetrators are said to have been punished by the same mutilation they had inflicted.

Had Abélard become a monk simply for love of quiet, although that would have been a merely human motive, and therefore unworthy, he might not have been totally disappointed. But having done so in pure disgust and in shame, without any supernatural impulse whatever, it is not surprising that for many years his life knew but little of peace. Again, he seems to have brought into the monastery all the worldly spirit which had ever actuated him. His terrible experience had not lessened his pride of intellect, and when contradictions came, he knew not how to bear them. When Abélard first entered the monastery of St. Denis, his shame caused him to keep withdrawn from the gaze of the world, but his reputation was so great that many demands were made upon the abbot Adam, his superior to order him to resume his lectures. This order was soon given, and once more the multitudes of students hearkened to their idol's oracles. But in the year 1121, the great master was accused of heresy before the Synod of Soissons; a book he had written on The Trinity was condemned, because of errors on the omnipotence of God, and he was ordered to himself cast it to the flames. He was consigned to the custody of the abbot of St. Médard at Soissons; but the Papal legate, Conon of Palestrina, released him and sent him back to St. Denis. In a short time he became involved in trouble with the abbot Adam, owing to his agreement with Ven. Bede that the holy Areopagite was not bishop of Athens, but of Corinth. This touched the monks of St. Denis upon a tender spot; so furiously did they resent Abélard's theory, that they excited against him the ire of king Louis VI., telling the monarch that the honor of their St. Denis was the honor of France, and it would have gone hard with the unfortunate master, had not Stephen, the royal steward, obtained for him the privilege of leaving his monastery. He sought the protection of Théobald, count of Troyes, and having obtained permission from his abbot, he constructed, in a beautiful solitude given him by some admirers, a little oratory of reeds, where he proposed to reside. His former pupils learning of this, they came from all quarters to dwell around him and listen to his lectures. They built huts for habitations, and lived as they best could. During the intervals between the master's discourses, they all labored at a larger oratory, which would contain the hundreds of scholars drawn thither by the magic of his eloquence. When finished, it was dedicated to the Holy Trinity, and as Abélard had here found much consolation amid his vexations, he called it the Paraclete. After a residence here of a few years, he was chosen abbot by the monks of St. Gildas de Ruys, in the diocese of Vannes, in Brittany. By this time Abélard had advanced much in piety, and was therefore very zealous in the enforcement of discipline. The consequence was that he soon became an object of hatred to some of his monks, and several times they attempted his life. After his condemnation, in 1140, by the Synod of Sens, of which we shall soon speak, Abélard appealed to the Pontiff, Innocent II., and in the meantime claimed the hospitality of the venerable Peter, abbot of Cluny. He was cheerfully received, and for two years edified that strict community by the manifestation of every monastic virtue. We shall have occasion hereafter to cite the letter which the venerable Peter of Cluny wrote to Pope Innocent II. in favor of Abélard, but we here give a portion of the letter in which the holy abbot informed the abbess Héloïse of "the master's" truly holy death: "I do not recollect of ever having seen his equal in humility; Germanus would not appear to the accurate observer more abject, or Martin poorer. When I compelled him to hold a superior position among our large number of brethren, he appeared to be the last of all. I was frequently thunder-struck when watching him in the processions, while he walked with the others, as is customary, before me, reflecting how so famous a man could so contemn himself. And while there are some religious who greatly desire that their dress should be sumptuous, he was very careless in such matters, and was quite content with simple garments, of any kind. He preserved the same system in his food, in his drink, and in every care of his body. And he condemned, in himself and in others, both by word and in practice, not only superfluities, but everything that was not really necessary. His study was constant, his prayer frequent; his silence never-failing, unless a conference of the brethren, or a sermon to them, compelled him to speak. He used to frequent the heavenly Sacraments, and as often as he was able, to offer to God the sacrifice of the Immaculate Lamb His mind, tongue, and actions were always occupied in divine things, or on philosophy, or on matters of erudition For recuperation, as he was troubled with an itch and other bodily evils, I sent him to Chalons, on account of its mildness of climate there, so far as his complaints would permit, he renewed his olden studies, and was ever at his books. As we read of the great Gregory, he allowed not a moment to pass unoccupied by prayer, or by reading, or by writing, or by dictation. The coming of the gospel visitor found him among these holy exercises, nor, like many, was he found asleep, but on the watch How devoutly, how holily, how like a Catholic, he made a confession of faith, and then of his sins ; with what eager desire he received the Viaticum for his journey and the pledge of eternal life, the Body of our Lord the Redeemer ; how confidently he committed his body and soul to Him, for the present and forever, can be attested by all the religious of that monastery in which rest the body of the holy martyr Marcellus." With this truly consoling and edifying letter, the venerable abbot of Cluny sent to the abbess Héloïse the mortal remains of Abélard, and she interred them in her convent of the Paraclete. The letter of Peter of Cluny to Héloïse is sufficient testimony to the repentance and holy end of Abélard, but the reader will not be uninterested with the following, the first of two epitaphs which the holy abbot sent to be engraved on the tomb : " Abélard was the Socrates of France, the Plato of the West, our Aristotle ; equal, if not superior, to all the logicians who have ever lived ; known as the prince of learning throughout the world ; of varied genius, subtle, and acute ; mastering all by strength of reason and by artistic diction. But he triumphed the most, when he became a professed monk of Cluny, and cultivated the true philosophy of Christ. Here he happily completed the days of a long life, leaving us the hope that he is now numbered among true philosophers."

There is much sickening sentimentality abroad in connection with the names of Abélard and Héloïse ; thousands, who know nothing of the theologian and philosopher, sympathize with the unfortunate lover. Even certain serious historians play the school-girl, and manifest symptoms of hysteria when they touch on the " woes of Abélard and Héloïse." Listen to the grave Henri Martin ; declaiming how Héloïse offers to the world an example of real love, " of an entire surrender of one's self ;" insisting that the importance of Héloïse " in the moral history of humanity " is not due to her extraordinary learning ; telling us how, when buried in a nunnery, respected by the entire Church, she does not change " interiorly," does not undergo the mystic death of the cloister, never repents of her love, accepts not monastic asceticism, but, " eternally " protests in her heart, " which is so well formed for divine love ;"

declaring that this Héloïse, "inconsolable and unsubmitting," appears like "a great veiled figure" at the entrance of the "moral world;" and finally flattering himself that "the just instinct of the French" has made of her "one of the national glories," because she is "the great saint of love." (1). Such ravings may suit the "Druidic school," of which Henri Martin was the head, but they are not to be encouraged by a Christian. And whence this deluge of tears? Whether shed by Colardeau, Mercier, Saurin, Pope, or Martin, they are caused by the "immortal" Letters of Héloïse—letters which the last named author regards as "bearing the characteristics of no epoch," but as "above all time;" as revealing "no accidental form of the soul," but its very "eternal depth." And yet, remarks a modern critic (2), it would seem that these Letters are no more genuine than those of Penelope to Ulysses, of Phædra to Hippolytus, of Briseis to Achilles, of Sappho to Phaon, of Helen to Paris, which Ovid has furnished to us. This prosaic truth has been well evinced by M. Lalanne (3), from whose essay we extract the following arguments: "These letters of Héloïse, so full of passion, contain many contradictions and impossibilities. Their tone is inexplicable. I can conceive how Héloïse could have said such things to Abélard during the first years following their separation; but fourteen years of religious life have passed before the first letter is written. And she speaks to a man now fifty-four years old; incapable, for fourteen years, of responding to her passion; exhausted by his theological combats, by his wandering life, by his persecutions, and who now aspires only to eternal repose. Nothing checks her; her passion is unspeakably vehement, and yet she is the woman of whom, shortly before the penning of the first letter, Abélard has said, in the History of his Misfortunes, that 'the entire world admired her piety, her wisdom, and her inconceivable sweetness of patience in all circumstances; she seldom left her cell, but there devoted herself to holy meditation and prayer.' But this is not all. Even if we admit—which is very difficult—that Héloïse, from the day of the catastrophe to the moment when, expelled from Argenteuil, she was welcomed by him to the Paraclete (1129), never met Abélard, it is certain that then she did converse with him, and not merely on one occasion, and that the consequent scandalous rumors caused Abélard to cease his visits. (1). How then can Héloïse complain that, from the date of their monastic profession, that is, from 1119 (or 1120), she has not enjoyed Abélard's presence or one letter from him? Nevertheless, she is said to have so expressed herself in 1133. Therefore I do not believe that she wrote these Letters. . . . Again, granting that Héloïse, and after her time, the nuns of the Paraclete, preserved the letters of Abélard to her; can we unhesitatingly admit that, during a wandering life and until his death, Abélard preserved her letters, which breathed a passion and an ardent sensuality which must have necessarily compromised that reputation for wisdom and holiness which she had acquired? Finally, these letters of Héloïse are very labored; everything is arranged in order; the vehemence of their sentiments never, for a moment, interrupts their method. Their extreme length, their erudite and very exact quotations from the Bible, from the Fathers, and from Pagan authors, all convince me that they were not penned by a correspondent, but were leisurely elaborated, and with infinite art." (2).

(1) History of France, vol. iiii., p. 315, edit. 1855.

(2) LARROQUE, Errors of M. Martin, in his History of France, in the Annals of Christian Philosophy, Paris, Feb., 1856.

(3) In the Literary Correspondence, Paris, Dec. 5, 1856.

(1) In the History of his Misfortunes, p. 36, edit. Duchesne, 1616, Abélard defends himself from these charges.

(2) In regard to the famous tomb of Abélard and Héloïse at Père-Lachaise, an eminent archæologist, Guilhaume (in the Archæological Annals, Paris, 1846), says: "We must demand satisfaction from those who show, every day, so little consideration for historical iconography, in propagating errors which prescription will eventually raise to the rank of truths. Take, for instance, one of our most popular monuments in the cemetery of Père-Lachaise, the tomb of Abélard and Héloïse. How many illusions would vanish, if the pilgrims who here perform their devotions only knew that, in the construction of this elegant sepulchral chapel, there entered not one stone from that severe and learned abbey of the Paraclete which romancing troubadours have treated as a kind of temple of Venus. The columns, the capitals, and the decorations of the four facades, came from the cloister and some internal oratories of the monastery of St. Denis. The eyes of an expert are not required for the discovery that these sculptures were not originally destined for the same neighborhood. It was M. Lenoir, director of the Museum of French Monuments, who conceived the idea of uniting some of the fragments placed at his disposal, so as to form a tomb fit to receive the ashes of the two illustrious lovers of the twelfth century. For the men who had thrown to the winds the venerable and glorious ashes of St. Geneviève, of St. Marcellus, of St. Bernard, of Suger, were clownishly sensitive when they opened the tomb of Abélard and Héloïse; they were of the opinion that honors rendered to these 'victims of the cloister' would give a rude blow to a fanaticism which the axe was not extirpating quickly enough; therefore, a casket, sealed by the republican municipality of Nogent-sur-Seine, brought to Paris the ashes taken from the tomb of the Paraclete. But before the remains were placed in their last resting-place, the amateurs of a new kind of relics were to be satisfied. It is said that one of the soldiers at Valmy wore a talisman made from the moustache of Henry IV. Well, atheists and philosophers, probably older

It is certain that Abélard fell into several errors of doctrine, but there were many points in which his manner of expressing himself, rather than his teaching, was to be condemned. (1). The first condemnation of any error on the part of Abélard took place at the Synod of Soissons, in 1121 : he retracted what he was ordered to retract, and was sent back to his monastery by the Papal legate. But in after years, when he was endeavoring to discipline the unruly monks of St. Gildas, his adversaries accused him not only of teaching the already condemned doctrines, but of having put forth new errors. Abélard now saw in the ranks of his accusers the great St. Bernard, an adversary whose fame for sanctity and learning forbade his indifference. He therefore besought of Henry, archbishop of Sens, to afford him an opportunity of defending his doctrines in Bernard's presence. The prelate acquiesced, and a Synod was convoked at Sens, in 1140. Besides Henry of Sens and many other bishops, king Louis VII. and a large number of abbots attended. At first, the holy abbot of Clairvaux did not wish to be present, because it was improper, he said, to take up the consideration of opinions already condemned ; but finally he yielded, lest the partisans of Abélard should boast that their leader's position was impregnable. When the Synod had met, certain extracts from Abélard's books were being read, when, to the surprise of all, the author arose, appealed to the judgment of the Roman Pontiff, and left the hall. Out of respect for the Holy See, the prelates then took no action in regard to the person of Abélard ; nevertheless, they condemned his errors, and sent a report of their proceedings to Pope Innocent II., beseeching him to repress the innovator's audacity.

levelers of heads, seized upon the few teeth remaining in one of poor Héloïse's jaws, as safeguards in their lusts. A tooth of Héloïse cost a thousand francs ; Abélard's were not valued so highly. . . . The tomb was completed in the following manner : They took a bas-relief representing the funeral cortege of Louis, son of St. Louis, and they decided that hereafter it should represent Abélard's funeral procession. The soul of the young prince, being carried to heaven by an angel, became that of the great doctor. Two medallions represented Abélard as a love, with curled moustaches, and Héloïse as a half-naked woman, about as decent as a Messalina. In the sarcophagus, you see two recumbent statues ; one in clerical costume, and this is the Abélard so seductive above with his flowing hair and moustaches ; the other is of a woman of the fourteenth century, and was originally on a tomb in the chapel of St. John of Beauvais, in Paris. How much this unknown lady has gained by her assumption of the name of Héloïse ! The grisettes bathe her with their tears, and bury her in crowns of immortelles, for which they have paid ten cents at the gate of the cemetery ; then the pitying creatures sit down, and read, as though they were prayers, two or three of the parodied letters of 'Loïse and Bêlard.'"

(1) ALEXANDRE, Cent. xiii., diss. 7, art 6.

Samson of Rheims, Joscelyn of Soissons, and other prelates, now sent a letter to the Pontiff, the style of which, Alexandre well observes, indicates that St. Bernard was its author. We give a part of it, because it plainly shows the impression which Abélard had made upon men of undoubted zeal and learning: "Peter Abélard tries to nullify the merit of Christian faith, for he thinks that he can comprehend, with his human intelligence, all that God is. He ascends even unto heaven, and descends into the abysses; nothing is hidden from him, whether it is in heaven above, or in the depths of hell. In his own eyes he is a great man, disputing de fide against the faith, dealing with great and wonderful things above himself, an inquirer into majesty, a fabricator of heresies. Some time ago he composed a book on the Holy Trinity, but as errors were found in it, it was given to the flames by order of the legate of the Roman Church. Accursed is he who rebuilds the ruins of Jericho. That book has arisen from the dead, and with it, many heresies which had died have arisen and appeared to many. At last it extends its shoots even to the sea, and pushes them even to Rome. This man boasts that his book is received in the Roman court, and hence his error is strengthened and confirmed, and he confidently preaches the word of iniquity on all sides. And when, in the presence of the bishops, the abbot of Clairvaux, armed with the zeal of justice and of faith, would press him concerning these things, he neither avowed nor denied them; but, without any provocation, and merely that he might lengthen his iniquity, he appealed from the day, place, and judge, he himself had chosen, unto the Apostolic See. . . . We have gone on in this affair, so far as we may dare. It is now for you, most blessed Father, to provide that the beauty of the Church be not stained by any mark of heretical foulness."

In his own name, St. Bernard addressed two epistles (nos. 189 and 190) to the Pontiff. In the first we read: "Foolishly did I lately promise myself rest, as though the fury of the lion had been appeased, and peace would return to the Church. It indeed rested, but I did not. We have escaped a lion, but we have encountered a dragon, who is not less dangerous in ambush than the other roaring aloud. But he is not altogether in ambush ; would that his virulent pages were hidder in his desk, and were not read at the cross-roads ! A new gospel, and a new faith, are proposed to the peoples. . . . Goliath advances his tall frame, equipped in all the panoply of war, and preceded by his squire, Arnold of Brescia. . . . While attacking the doctors of the Church, he gives great praise to the philosophers ; he prefers their inventions and his own novelties to the doctrine of the Catholic Fathers and the faith ; and while all fly from before him, he selects me, the least of all, for single combat At his request, the archbishop of Sens wrote to me, appointing a day for a meeting, in which he (Abélard), in the presence of the bishops, would establish, if possible, those wicked teachings against which I had dared to murmur. I declined, both because I am a boy, and he is a warrior from his youth, and because I judged it unworthy to submit to the agitation of petty human reason that faith which is surely founded upon certain and stable truth. I said that his writings were enough for an accusation against him ; that it was not my business, but that of the bishops, to judge of dogmas. Nevertheless, he, for this very reason, cried out the louder, called many together, summoned his partisans. . . . He reported everywhere that, on a certain day, he would reply to me at Sens ; every one heard it, and it could not escape me." The Saint then narrates the proceedings at Sens, and concludes : "You will judge, O Successor of Peter, whether he ought to find refuge in the See of Peter, who denies the faith of Peter. You, I say, friend of the Bridegroom, will know how to free the Spouse from wicked lips and from a deceitful tongue." St. Bernard also wrote on the cause of Abélard to all the Roman cardinals collectively, and especially to the cardinal Guido di Castello, who had been a disciple of that master. In his letter to this cardinal he says : "In his book master Peter introduces profane novelties of speech and of meaning. . . . he sees nothing as in a mirror and by enigma, but regards everything face to face. . . . When he speaks of the Trinity, he sounds like Arius ;

when of grace, like Pelagius ; when of the Person of Christ, like Nestorius." Writing to cardinal Ivo, the Saint thus depicts his adversary : " Master Peter Abélard, a monk without rule, a prelate without charge, neither holds any order, nor is held by order. He is a man dissimilar to himself ; within a Herod, without a John ; altogether ambiguous, having nothing of the monk but the name and the dress. . . . He passes the limits placed by our Fathers, writing and disputing on faith, the Sacraments, and the Trinity ; he changes, augments, or diminishes, just as he pleases. . . . He is ignorant of nothing in heaven or on earth, excepting himself. " If some of St. Bernard's expressions seem harsh, we must remember that he was defending the cause of the truth, the interests of Catholic dogma, and therefore the interests of imperilled souls. In the mind and words of the true Catholic, there can be no compromise with heresy, and in dealing with Abélard, St. Bernard would have been foolish had he regarded him as an ignorant layman or a delicate schoolgirl under instruction. He was a " Goliath, equipped in all the panoply of war," and it was only the sharp pebble, sent straight at his brow, that was to bring him down. It is ridiculous for Mosheim to affect to believe that St. Bernard was jealous of Abélard. The Saint was one of the last to enter the lists against the innovator, and it was principally because of the pressure brought to bear upon him by William, abbot of St. Thierry, that he moved in the matter. Before the Council of Sens he wrote amicably and urgently to Abélard, begging him to correct his books. Abélard was condemned at Rome, as well as at Sens and are we to suppose that the Pope and the cardinals were actuated by jealousy ? Bernard was simply actuated by zeal for the truth, and the moment he found that his antagonist had retracted, he gave him a brother's hand, as we shall now see.

When Pope Innocent II. had received a report of the proceedings at Sens, he confirmed the condemnation of Abélard's errors, and enjoined upon the master, " as upon a heretic," perpetual silence. After leaving Sens, Abélard, as we have seen, started for Rome, but hearkening to the fatherly voice of the venerable Peter of Cluny, he stopped in that monastery. Here he was reconciled to St. Bernard, as we are informed in the following letter, written by Peter to the Pontiff: "The master Peter, well known, as I believe, to your Wisdom, coming lately from France (1), passed through Cluny. We asked him whither he was journeying. He replied that he was greatly vexed by certain parties, who styled him a heretic, a name which he greatly abhorred, and that he had appealed to the Apostolic Majesty. We applauded the design, and we advised him to fly to the known and general refuge; and we told him that the Apostolic justice, which never failed a stranger or a pilgrim, would not be refused to him. We promised that he should receive mercy, if reason there were for it. In the meantime there arrived the lord Cistercian abbot, and he talked both with Abélard and with ourselves, concerning peace between him (Abélard) and my lord of Clairvaux, because of whom he had appealed. We, too, did what we could toward this reconciliation, and we exhorted Abélard to go with him (the Cistercian) to Bernard. And we also admonished him to remove from his books and words anything he might have said or written offensive to Catholic ears; and this, in accordance with his (Bernard's) exhortation, and that of other good and wise men. And so it was done. He went and returned, having, by the mediation of the Cistercian, accommodated his olden differences with my lord of Clairvaux, and had a peaceful interview. Meanwhile, being advised by us, or rather, as we believe, being inspired by God, he abandoned the tumults of school and study, and chose a permanent abode in your Cluny. Believing this to be fitting to his age, his weakness, and his religion, and deeming his knowledge, not altogether unknown to you, to be of great advantage to our large community of brethren, we assented to his request; and so, if it be pleasing to your Benignity, we have graciously and joyfully allowed him to remain with us, your children. Therefore I, whatever I may be, yet ever yours, do ask; and this convent of Cluny, most devoted to you, also asks: and he himself asks, by these letters which he has requested me to write, and by us and the bearers of these letters, that you will order him to spend his remaining days, which perchance are few, in your Cluny; and that, by means of no one, he be expelled or removed from the house which, like a sparrow, he has found, or from the nest in which he, like a dove, rejoices; but that, as you ever cherish the good, and have loved even him, you will protect him with the Apostolic shield."

(1) Cluny was in Burgundy, which was not joined to France until 1477.

With regard to the errors of Abélard, the reader is referred to Alexandre's apposite dissertation, if he is desirous of examining them in detail. We merely give a brief summary of them, as described by St. Bernard (1), by the abbot of St. Thierry (2), and by Otho of Frisingen (3). First, he placed degrees in the Trinity, "modes" in the majesty, and numbers in the eternity of God. The Father is full power, the Son a certain power, the Holy Ghost no power. The Son is to the Father as a certain power is to power, as a species is to a genus, as man is to animal. Second, he asserted that the Holy Ghost proceeds indeed from the Father and the Son, but not from the esse of the Father, or from the substance of the Son. Third, he denied that the devil ever had any right in man, and that the Son became man to redeem man from the dominion of Satan. The Son died merely to show His love for us. Fourth, the Holy Ghost is, according to Abélard, the soul of the world. Fifth, he asserted that Christ, God and Man, is not the second Person of the Blessed Trinity. Sixth, he contended that we can wish and do good, without the aid of grace. Seventh, he taught that in the Eucharist the form of the prior substance remains in the air. Eighth, he held that only the punishment, not the guilt, of original sin descends to us from Adam. Ninth, he asserted there was no sin, unless in contempt of God. Tenth, he contended that ignorance always excuses from sin. Eleventh, he taught that diabolical suggestions often come from physical impressions, contact, etc. Twelfth, he defined faith as the acceptance of things which are not seen. Thirteenth, he assigned limits to the

(1) Epist. 190 to Innocent II.

(2) Dispute against Abélard.

(3) Deeds of Frederick I., B. i., c. 47.

Divine Omnipotence, asserting that God could do no more than He has done or will do. Fourteenth, he denied the descent of Christ into Limbo. Fifteenth, he said that the final judgment of men can be attributed also to the Father. Sixteenth, he doubted the power of binding and loosing. Seventeenth, he asserted that God never impeded evil, changing the will of man. Eighteenth, he contended that the executioners at the crucifixion did not sin. Nineteenth, he taught that the Spirit of the fear of the Lord was not in Christ, and that in the next world there would be no chaste fear of the Lord. Such were the propositions in reference to which St. Bernard wrote to the bishops and cardinals of the Roman court (1): "Read, if you please, the book of Peter Abélard, which he says to be on Theology. You have it at hand, for he glories that it is read by many in the court. See what he says therein about the Trinity, about the generation of the Son, about the procession of the Holy Ghost, and the many innumerable things he has foreign to Catholic ears and minds. Read also the other book, entitled his Sentences, and the one with the title Know Thyself, and observe how rank they are with the seeds of sacrilege and of error; see what he thinks of the soul of Christ, of His Person, of His descent into Limbo, of the Sacrament of the Altar, of the power of binding and loosing, of original sin, of concupiscence, of the sin of delectation, of that of infirmity and of ignorance, of the work of sin, and of the will of sinning. And if, indeed, you judge that I am justly moved, do you be moved, and lest you be moved in vain, act for the place you hold, for the dignity you possess, for the power you have received." In his Apology, or Confession of Faith, Abélard declared that these errors were all ascribed to him through ignorance or malice, and he denied that he ever wrote a book of Sentences; but if the reader will follow Alexandre, as he examines these nineteen propositions, one by one, he will find that many of them were distinctly taught by Abélard, although in some cases St. Bernard and the abbot of St. Thierry did not correctly apprehend the meaning of the master. As for Abélard's denial that he wrote a book of Sentences, he thereby descended to an unworthy and puerile equivocation, for though the book may not have borne that title, he did not disclaim the authorship of the passages to which St. Bernard objected, and which are found in that book. One great fault of Abélard was his proneness to the use of incongruous illustrations in explaining matters of faith. Otho of Frisingen (1) gives one instance, which will serve for many: "As the proposition, assumption, and conclusion are the same oration, so the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost are the same essence."

(1) Epist. 187.

Subjoined to the works of Abélard is to be found an Apology for the great master, written by Berengarius of Poitiers, who had been one of his disciples. The work of a young and ardent man, carried away by enthusiastic admiration for his teacher, it is extremely contumelious toward St. Bernard. Berengarius asserts that the Saint tried rather to discover occasion to rebuke Abélard, than to effect his conversion. But we are told by Godfrey (2) that Bernard, "with his usual goodness and benignity, desiring to correct the error, not to confound the man, privately admonished him: and so modestly and reasonably did he act, that Abélard was touched, and promised to correct all according to his wish. But he abandoned the good design." We are also told that Abélard, "whose mouth was the storehouse of reason, the trumpet of faith, and the lodging of the Trinity," was condemned at Sens, while absent and unheard. But he was contumacious, and had withdrawn himself from a judgment invoked by himself. Berengarius also attacks many points of doctrine which he alleges to have been put forth by St. Bernard, but in each case he misinterprets the Saint's meaning. In his more mature age, this enthusiastic defender of Abélard modified his opinions, condemned his master's errors, and acknowledged St. Bernard as "the Martin of our times, a shining light."

Abélard has often been stigmatized as a heretic, but unjustly. He did not pertinaciously adhere to his opinions, but ever professed himself willing to correct them, if erroneous; and he did, in fact, correct them. In the Prologue to his Introduction, he plainly avows his willingness to accept correction, "by force of reason, or by Scriptural authority," and declares that he will imitate St. Augustine in his Retractions, "that if he cannot be free from the vice of ignorance, he may at least not incur the guilt of heresy; for ignorance does not make a heretic, but obstinate pride does make one." In his Profession of Faith, sent to Héloïse, he says: "I wish not to so be a philosopher, as to resist Paul; to so be an Aristotle, as to be separated from Christ. There is no other name under heaven, by which I can be saved And in order that trembling anxiety and all doubt may be removed from your heart, you may be sure of this in my regard, that I have founded my conscience upon that rock upon which Christ founded His Church. . . . I believe the Son to be co-equal to the Father in all things, in eternity, power, will, and deed; nor do I hearken to Arius, who, moved by his perverse genius, yea, seduced by a demon, placed degrees in the Trinity, teaching that the Father is greater, and the Son less. . . . I declare that the Holy Ghost is consubstantial and co-equal to the Father and the Son in all things. . . . I assert also that in Baptism all sin is remitted; that we need grace, both to commence good, and to perfect it. . . . As for the resurrection of the body, why should I speak of it, when I would in vain glory in being a Christian, if I did not believe I would arise again?" And in the last of his works, the Apology, dedicated To All the Children of Holy Church, he wrote: "Well known is the saying that nothing is so well expressed that it cannot be distorted; and, as St. Jerome has remarked, he who writes many books creates many judges. And I, who have written only a few little ones, and in comparison with others, books of no moment, have not been able to escape censure; although, as to the things of which I am seriously accused, I acknowledge, God knows, no fault of my own, and if there were any I would not obstinately defend it. I may have written some things which ought not to have been written; but I call God to witness, as the Judge of my soul, that I have not presumed anything in malice or in pride. I have spoken much in many schools, and my doctrine has never been a sluggish stream or a hidden loaf. I have spoken openly for the establishing of the faith or of morals,, what seemed to me to be salutary, and whatever I have written I have opened unto all, rather as to judges than as to disciples. If I have ever exceeded by much speaking, as it is written 'by much speaking thou shalt not avoid sin,' obstinate resistance has never made me a heretic, for I have been ever ready to give satisfaction, either by correcting or by destroying all wrong utterances, and in that mind I shall persevere to the end. . . . Therefore let fraternal charity recognize me, whatsoever I may be, as a son of the Church; one who entirely receives all that she receives, and who rejects all that she rejects; one who has never broken the unity of faith, although unequal to others in virtue." And then Abélard expressly professes the Catholic doctrines which are contrary to all his own errors, or to those imputed to him.

(1) Loc. cit.(2) Life of St. Bernard, B. III., c. 3.

CHAPTER XVIII.

THE CRUSADES : THEIR JUSTICE AND EFFECTS.*

During the first years of Islamism the Christian nations felt little reason for concern as to their own future. Regarding the new religionists as a mere horde of children of the desert, they could not realize that their own peace, still less their independence in the political order, would ever be seriously threatened from that quarter. And even if they had foreseen the great spread of Mohammedanism, and all the baneful consequences thence, of necessity, to ensue, they were just then in no condition to forestall the enemy's attack. As yet Christendom was not united in the new Western Empire: and when, in time, that effort of Pontifical statesmanship opened a new era of strength and prosperity to Europe, the arrogance, and afterwards the schism, of the Greeks prevented any unanimous action against the enemies of the Christian name. But in the eleventh century, the invasion of the Seljuk Turks, who had abandoned the religion of Zoroaster for Islamism, infused a Northern ferocity into the comparatively soft nature of the Arabs, and during the Pontificate of St. Gregory VII. the Crescent was frequently seen from the towers of Constantinople. From time to time Europe was horrified by accounts of the fearful oppression endured by the Christians of Palestine ; of bishops and priests being dragged from the altar to prison ; of brutal outrages upon persons of both sexes and of every age ; of the circumcision of thousands of boys, some to be enrolled in the army, and others to be mutilated, and to be assigned as guards to the seraglio. The schismatic arrogance of the Greeks was compelled to yield, and the emperor, Michael Ducas (Parapinax) begged for aid from the detested Latins. St. Gregory VII. heeded the cry, and although he knew that the promise was extorted by dire temporal necessity, and not by regard for religious unity, he was disposed to believe that Ducas was sincere in the avowed intention to put an end to the schism. All Christendom was invited to raise an army for the service of God, and the Pontiff declared in a letter to king Henry IV. of Germany that he hoped, " having pacified the Normans, to proceed in person to Constantinople, in aid of the Christians." (1). Fifty thousand warriors promised to follow him, but other interests prevailed, and the great enterprise was postponed, until Pope Victor III. had the satisfaction, in 1088. of seeing the Genoese, Pisans, and other Italians, receive from his hands the standard of St. Peter, and set out to fight for the Cross and for civilization. This first expedition to check the inroads of Mohammedanism was comparatively successful. Landing in Africa, it destroyed or disabled more than a hundred thousand Saracens, burned a city, imposed tribute on a Moorish king, and returned to Italy with many rich spoils, which were used to decorate the churches of the victors. (2). But this inroad into the

* This Chapter appeared as an article in the "Ave Maria," vol. xxvi., no. 24.

(1) Epistles of St. Greg. VII., ii., 30.

(2) LEO OF OSTIA. This Leo (Marsicanus), a Benedictine of Montecassino, and cardinal-bishop of Ostia, author of a valuable history of Montecassino, and other works, should not be confounded with another Leo, also a Cassinese Benedictine, who was secretary to Pope Urban II., and was made a cardinal-deacon by Paschal II. This mistake was made by Baronio and by Possevin.

domains of Islam was merely a prelude to the great Crusades.

The impulse to the first Crusade (1096-1100) was given by an obscure individual, rude in feature and in manner, but who had been raised by solitude and prayer to such sanctity that he was popularly supposed to enjoy direct communication with Heaven. Known only as Peter the Hermit, he left his native Amiens in 1093, and made a pilgrimage to Jerusalem. Touched to the quick by the melancholy condition of the holy places, he seemed to hear, while prostrate before the Holy Sepulchre, the voice of Jesus commanding: "Arise, Peter; go and announce to My people the end of their oppression. Let My servants come, and the Holy Land shall be freed." He returned to Europe, and falling at the feet of Pope Urban II., he urged that Pontiff to carry out the design of his predecessors. The Pope blessed him, and commissioned him to preach a Crusade; he did so throughout Europe, travelling barefooted and bareheaded, clothed in sackcloth, crucifix in hand, and mounted on a mule. William of Tyre (ob. about 1180) tells us that Peter was "insignificant in person, but his eye was keen and pleasing, and he possessed an easy flow of eloquence." Everywhere he astonished people by his austerities, and moved their sympathies by his graphic picture of the woes of Palestine. He cried to sinners: "Soldiers of the demon, become warriors of Christ;" and all who had crimes to expiate, or injuries to repair, seized on this means of reconciling themselves with God. The feudataries, the younger sons of reigning families (all trained to war, and having scarcely any other means of occupying their time), joyfully volunteered.

While Peter was thus engaged, there came from Constantinople letters from the Greek emperor, Alexis Comnenus, begging aid from the Latins, as the "new Rome" was in imminent danger of falling into the hands of its enemies. In 1095 Urban II. convoked a Council at Piacenza to devise ways and means. Over 200 bishops, 4,000 priests, and 30,000 laymen listened to the Pontiff's discourse, which was delivered in the open air. Another assembly was ordered to convene at Clermont in Auvergne, and, on November 18 of the same year, 238 bishops obeyed the summons. Here the Pontiff made use of every argument, religious and political, to further the cause. From his discourse, not as embellished by Michaud, but as it was recorded in its simplicity by William of Malmesbury, (1) who was present at its delivery, we take the following passages :

“Go, my brothers, go with confidence to attack the enemies of God, who—O, shame to Christians!—are so long in possession of Syria and Armenia. Long ago they mastered all Asia Minor ; and now they have insulted us in Illyria and all the neighboring regions, even so far as the Straits of St. George. And they have done worse : they have robbed us of the tomb of Jesus Christ, that wonderful monument of our faith ; they sell to our pilgrims permission to enter a city which would be open to Christians alone, if we had only a small portion of our ancient valor. Ought not our faces to blush with shame ? Who, unless they envy the Christian glory, can suffer the indignity of not being able to share with the infidels at least half of the world ? Christians, put an end to your own misdeeds, and let concord reign among you while in these distant lands. Go, then, and in this most noble enterprise show the valor and prudence you now display in your intestine contests. Go, ye warriors. and your praises will everywhere be heard. Let the well-known bravery of the French be shown in the van ; followed by the allies, their very name will terrify the enemy If necessary, your bodies will redeem your souls. Do you, men of courage and of exemplary intrepidity, fear death ? Human wickedness can invent nothing to injure you which is to be weighed against celestial glory. Do you not know that life is a misery to man, and that happiness is in death ? The sermons of priests have caused us to receive this doctrine with our mothers’ milk ; and the martyrs, our ancestors, sustained this doctrine with their example The sanctuary of God repels the spoiler and the ribald, and welcomes the pious man. Let not the love of your relatives impede you : principally to God does man owe his love. Let not your progress be arrested by your affection for your native land ; for the entire world may be regarded as a place of exile for Christians, and their real country is, just now, the entire world. Let no one remain at home because of his riches ; for greater wealth is promised him—a wealth composed, not of those things which soften our misery only with vain expectation, but of those which perpetual and daily instances show us to be the only true riches These things I publish and command, and for their execution I appoint the end of the coming spring.” Throughout the assembly was then heard the cry which the Crusaders were to render famous, “God wills it !” A cardinal recited the formula of general confession ; all repeated it, and received absolution. Ademar de Monteil, bishop of Puy, received the Cross as Papal legate, and this emblem of the Crusade was then given to nearly all the barons and even to many bishops.

(1) Deeds of the English Kings, B. iv., year 1095.

In the First Crusade, two different classes rushed toward the Holy Land—an enthusiastic, fanatical mob of worse than useless men, women, and children, and an equally enthusiastic, but disciplined, army of warriors. Pope Urban II. had vainly tried to temper the ardor which prompted the old, the infirm, and even childhood, to remain unsatisfied with aiding the holy cause with prayer ; he had vainly ordered that women should not embark in the enterprise unless accompanied by husbands or brothers ; in vain he had commanded that no monks or other ecclesiastics should don the cross without permission of their bishops. The hermit was convinced that prayer and zeal were sufficient, and in disordered ranks, carrying a cross before them, thousands set out, feeding on charity, for the goal of their hopes. So long as these hordes were in Western Europe, their indigence was not remarkable ; but when they arrived at the Danube, they found the Hungarians and Bulgarians hostile, and they were obliged to use force in order to obtain food. Finally, 100, 000 starvelings reached Constantinople, where they committed such disorder, that Alexis was glad to transport them across the Bosphorus. Very soon they fought among themselves, and nearly all of the survivors were slaughtered by the Islamites. But the Crusading army was of far different material, and was guided by competent persons.

The first Crusade lasted from 1096 to 1100 ; the second, from 1147 to 1149 ; the third, from 1189 to 1193 ; the fourth, from 1202 to 1204 ; the fifth and sixth, from 1218 to 1239 ; the seventh and eight, from 1248 to 1270. Frequent attempts were afterwards made to renew these Holy Wars, and many isolated expeditions were undertaken ; but, as Pomponne, minister of Louis XIV., remarked to Leibnitz, "since the time of St. Louis, such things have been out of fashion." Bacon wrote a dialogue on the Holy War. Mazarin left 600, 000 livres to help a Crusade. The famous friar Joseph, the Franciscan counsellor of Richelieu, composed on this subject a Latin poem, which Pope Urban VIII. called the Christian Æneid. In 1670 Leibnitz tried to induce Louis XIV. to conquer Egypt, and in his design, reduced to writing, he said : "Then Europe will rest, will cease to tear her own bowels, and will fix her attention where she may find honor, victory, advantage, and wealth, with a good conscience, and in a manner pleasing to God. Then men will not rival one another in robbery, but in reducing the power of the hereditary foe ; each one will strive to extend, not his own kingdom, but that of Christ Let us suppose that the emperor, Poland, and Sweden, proceed together against the barbarians, and seek to widen the limits of Christendom, having no other designs, and fearing no enemies in their rear : how the blessing of God would show itself in favor of so just a cause ! On the other hand, England and Denmark would find themselves in front of North, and Spain before South America ; Holland, before the West Indies. France is destined by Providence to be the guide to Christian armies in the East, to give to Christendom her Godfreys, her Baldwins, and especially her SS. Louis, who will invade that Africa just opposite her shores, to destroy a nest of pirates and to conquer Egypt—she wants neither the soldiers nor the money necessary to become the mistress of that land Behold a way to acquire a lasting glory, a tranquil conscience, universal applause, certain victory, immense advantages. Then will be attained that hope of the philosopher, that men will make war only on wolves and other wild beasts, to which the barbarians and infidels may now be compared." (1)

Those who desire, in the matter of the Crusades, details of fact, causes, and effects, should consult the Deeds of God through the Franks, by William of Tyre, and the History written by the imperial Anna Comnena. Among moderns, he may read with profit the Spirit of the Crusades, by De Maillet, and the History of the Crusades, by Michaud, which, although full of prejudice, is the most complete of all works on this subject. Much information may also be gained from the Life of Innocent III., by Hurter; and from Prat's Peter the Hermit and the First Crusade. The French Academy of Inscriptions published, in 1841, a collection of all the Latin, Greek, and Oriental historians of the Crusades; the Greek portion being composed of fragments from the writings of Nicephorus Briennus, Anna Comnena, Nicetas Coniates, John Phocas, and Michael Attaliates. As for the modern English authors who have written on the Crusades, some are pretentious, few recommendable. Of all who, in any language, have treated this subject, Cantù is the most impartial, and by far the most appreciative of the spirit which prompted and sustained one of the most salient features of the Middle Ages; he will also fully satisfy the reader's curiosity as to chivalry, tournaments, "courts of love," the oaths customary at the time, the military religious orders, the trovatori,—an acquaintance with all of which matters will greatly facilitate a comprehension of the events of the Crusades.

Many causes have contributed to an unjust appreciation of

(1) Dissertation by Guhrauer, in Memoires of the Institute of France, Vol. I.—Cantù agrees with Leibnitz: "Suppose that the lion of St. Mark and the dragon of St. George had made a permanent home on the banks of the Bosphorus, the Jordan, and the Tigris. A civilized population would now enjoy that beauty which of old made them envied centres of culture; Seleucia, Antioch, Bagdad, would be the London and Paris of Asia; where now a pasha, with flail and scimitar, bends the peoples before the caprices of a despot, and where the Bedouins practise robbery and piracy with impunity, would now flourish governments founded in order and liberty; from the most beautiful city under the sun would flow streams of culture and of love over Asia and Europe, united in affection and in progress to improve the North, and spread the light of truth in the heart of Africa and in the farthest regions of the East. If a hermit had not raised that cry, if the Popes had not taken it up, the growing civilization of Europe would have succumbed to the Arabs; the religion of love and of liberty would have yielded up our countries to one of blood and of slavery, and over the beautiful lands of Italy and France would reign a brutal domestic and political tranny, a haughty immobility, a fatal indifference, a systematic ignorance."

the value of the Crusades, but they may all be referred to the difficulty experienced by the average modern mind in appreciating the spirit of the Middle Ages. Add to this the fact that these Holy Wars were pre-eminently the work of the Roman Pontiffs, and therefore a natural object of carping criticism to all the foes of Catholicism, and you will be surprised when you find, now and then, a Protestant or an infidel writer who can see in them aught else than cruel injustice to both Christian and Islamite : or at best, anything better than sublime folly. In defending the policy that prompted these Crusades, in upholding their justice, in contending that they were necessary, humanly speaking, to the very existence of Christianity, we do not apologize for each and every action of their leaders, or of the rank and file of their participants ; it is but too true that, as in other noble designs, many of the instruments were found to be full of flaws. We must distinguish the motives of the Crusaders. The Popes, most of the kings and princes, and nearly all the leaders who took part in these expeditions, were impelled by the desire of banishing the infidel from the places sanctified by the life and death of the God-Man,—by the desire of freeing a Christian people from a slavery that was cruel to the body and threatening to the soul. They felt the necessity of arresting the progress of an inexorable and barbarous enemy, who menaced that Christian civilization which the Catholic Church had developed in nearly the whole, and was then planting in the rest, of Europe ; they knew that the most efficacious means of doing this was by carrying war into Asia and Africa, by convincing Islam that Christendom could fight as well as pray. These motives were certainly noble. But among the masses, while the religious motive undoubtedly predominated with the immense majority, so that it may truly be said to have furnished the life and soul of the expeditions, other motives were sometimes mingled—some of them base, some indifferent. Many who groaned at home under the feudal system hoped to find another lot awaiting them in the East : some were impelled by a curiosity to see those lands about which pilgrims had told such wonderful stories; some, undoubtedly, were incited by mere love of adventure. If these latter classes were guilty of excesses—nay, if even some of the leaders acted more like condottieri than like soldiers of Christ,—the good name of the cause should not suffer.

Those who affect horror at the sacrifice of two millions of Christian lives during the two centuries of the Crusades, do not, as a general thing, descant upon the great loss of life that purely secular wars have entailed, and yet entail, upon mankind. And how great is the difference between these and the Holy Wars, both as to causes and effects! In the former, in nearly every case, men are taken from their firesides to kill and be killed, without knowing the reason for it; in the latter, they knew, thoroughly appreciated, and heartily applauded the reason. But, we are told, this knowledge, this appreciation, was that of superstition, and the hope of success was a folly. The Crusaders were certainly guilty of superstition, if a vivid and life-sacrificing devotion to one's faith, if a hearty reverence for everything connected with that faith, be superstition—we need not here pause to show that Christianity, felt and outwardly professed, is not superstition.

But what about the folly of these wars? Not that supernatural effervescence which is known as the folly of the Cross—for if that be understood, the Crusades were a folly—but a sheer absurdity is here intended. Well, now that the holy fever is at an end, and we can calmly criticise each and every one of its symptoms and consequences, many errors of management are discoverable; but at the time the attack on the strongholds of Islam was decreed, every reason, military and political, could be adduced for the success of the project. Common sense assured the Western nations that the Byzantine sovereign, bearing the first brunt of the Mussulman attack, would cordially and gratefully assist the enterprise; who could have foreseen the insane treachery of the entire schismatic tribe?

But what of the justice of the Crusades? The Islamites were pronounced religious and political enemies of the European nations. It was of the very essence of their religion—and too well did they practise it—to spread their faith by fire and sword, to enjoy the earth and its fulness. They had already subjugated the once flourishing Christian states of the East, and in many of them had almost destroyed every vestige of the Christian religion ; they had conquered a great part of the Iberian Peninsula ; they had devastated a large portion of Italy, and, for a time, had even threatened France ; in fine, to the Mussulman every war against a Christian state or community was holy. Where was the injustice of warring against such a race of men ? Consider also that war, and war to the knife, was the only means by which Europe could save herself from barbarism, her women from degradation, her children from slavery.

Our age affects to detest mere sentiment, and is pre-eminently utilitarian. For this very reason it should admire the Crusades. The first great advantage they brought to Europe was frequent internal peace where intestine war had been the order of the day ; the Christian swords, that had so often crossed one another in unworthy strife, were now turned against the common enemy of the Christian altar and of every Christian government. The Normans and other ferocious Northerners, who would have impeded the progress of civilization along the shores of the Baltic and the German Ocean, found an outlet for their warlike enthusiasm in distant Asia : and “ this expedition ” (the second Crusade), says Krantz, “ at least effected the freeing of Germany from a set of men who lived by robbing others.” (1). Many a district hitherto living in awe of some petty tyrant, who, like an eagle from his eyry, had been wont to pounce down upon it on an errand of rapine, thanked the campaigns of Asia and Africa for affording such men an opportunity of satisfying their tastes away from home. Thousands of serfs, by taking the Cross, threw off the yoke of what was little less than slavery ; for the Crusader became a servant of God and of the Church, and a freeman. Strangers who took up their abode in the domains of some petty lord used to become his serfs : now the pilgrim was sacred.

(1) Sax., c. 13.

Industry was advanced by means of the Crusades. The silks of Damascus were coveted by the Westerns, and Palermo, Lucca, Modena, and Milan became noted for the fabrics they wove for the lords and ladies who were no longer satisfied with the skins of beasts for clothing. The glassware of Tyre was introduced by the Venetians, and soon the ingenious sons of the Republic manufactured the beautiful and delicate crystals which have given its artisans celebrity to our own day. Windmills, till then not known in Europe, were copied from those in Asia Minor, where they were necessary, owing to the want of running waters. The goldsmith's art received an impetus from the numerous relics and gems brought from the Orient, and which had to be richly set and mounted.

Another advantage of the Crusades was the better administration of justice; when intestine war had become rare, order reappeared; the great ones of the earth commenced to consider their followers as their dependents, and not as their slaves; for these inferiors were now freed from local servitude, and began to unlearn the customs of hereditary selfdom. Government was better developed; communes and republics came into existence, and elevated public over private power. The common people, during the long absences of the lords, depended upon the superior power of the kings; and thus was prepared, for the ultimate good of the nation, the fall of feudalism.

Still another good effect of the Crusades is thus described by Cantú: In the fragmentary society of feudalism, each one's country was bounded by the hedge that enclosed his field; it was expensive and dangerous to cross the bridge that spanned the neighboring little torrent, in sight of the castle of the next proprietor. But suddenly the barriers fall, and whole nations enter on roads hitherto closed. Then the Northerners beheld in Italy the relics of ancient, and the commencement of a new, civilization; at Bologna they heard lectures on the Pandects; at Salerno and Montecassino they attended medical academies; at Thessalonica they visited schools of fine art; at Constantinople they inspected libraries and museums. James de Vitry expresses his wonder at finding the Italians 'secret in council, diligent, studious of public utility, careful for the future, detesting the yoke of another, ardent defenders of their liberties.' In Sicily and in Venice, whither they came to embark, they found more regular forms of government, and their astonishment on seeing all the citizens of Venice convoked to give assent to the decrees of the doge, inspired ideas of a liberty very different from that known in the North. When they were established on the new soil, they gave attention to a proper jurisprudence, which should not be imposed by force, but should be discussed by the reason of nations who deemed themselves equal, and who desired their own real advancement. The 'Assizes' that were then compiled became models for princes and communes; St. Louis profited by them for his Establishments, and perhaps the English found in them the idea of their boasted jury. From the method of gathering tithes, then imposed by the Church, kings learned a regular system of taxes, which, if they became perpetual, at least ceased to be arbitrary and multifold.'

With reference to the effects which the Crusades produced on the arts and letters of Europe, the same author says: "Since it is certain that the Crusades retarded the fall of Constantinople, I believe that literature profited by them; for Europe was not yet sufficiently mature to receive the classics there preserved, as she did in the fifteenth century. In fact, of two rich libraries which then perished, no chronicler makes any mention, of so little account were they deemed; masterpieces of art were brutally ruined, unless when the Italians, especially the Venetians, preserved them to decorate their own cities. Look at Pisa, Genoa, and the Norman edifices in Italy, and you will find them rich in columns and statues transferred from the East,—a fact which reveals a resurrection of the sentiment of the beautiful, and explains the sudden development of the arts among us. Literature came forth from the sanctuary, when all took part in universal enterprise; style was elevated, when history passed from municipal events to prodigies of valor: poetry found in reality that at which, by mere imagination, it would never have arrived." (1).

(1) Univ. Hist., B. xii., c. 18.

The Crusades were also of great benefit to commerce. The commercial cities of Italy made immense profits by transporting warriors and pilgrims ; and they obtained great privileges in the conquered lands, establishing banks in Syria and along the Ionian and the Black Seas. Then began the commercial prosperity of what are now Belgium and Holland, of the south of France, of Bremen and Lübeck. Citizens became wealthy, and were soon so powerful that they were able to exact rights and privileges. The sugarcane, used by the Crusaders at Lebanon to assuage their terrible thirst, was transplanted to Sicily, thence carried by the Saracens to Granada, and from there taken by the Spaniards to America. Europe became acquainted with alum, indigo, and many other valuable drugs and spices ; afterward, while engaged in a search for a quick passage to the land that produced them, an Italian navigator discovered a new world.

The Crusades failed of their main object—the freedom of the Holy Land,—but they checked the progress of Mohamédanism, and permitted the continuance of the work of civilization in Europe. They need no apology ; had they fully succeeded, Europe, Asia, and Africa would now, in all probability, be entirely Christian. Their main idea was both politic and just. It was certainly good policy to give rest to a state by transporting its disturbers beyond the seas, to turn this fury against the barbarians. It was certainly just to combat a ferocious people, an article of whose religion was to exterminate Christians, and who had already ravaged all Southern Europe.

CHAPTER XIX.

THE TRUCE OF GOD.*

Among the many institutions of the Middle Ages which may well claim the attention of the student, one of the most interesting is the “Truce of God.” During the first period of feudalism—unless we except the reigns of the Gothic

* This Chapter appeared as an article in the Arc Maria, vol. xxv., no. 22.

Theodoric, the Lombard Liutprand, and the Frank Charlemagne,—the want of an arranging hand, of a competent ordaining authority, is plainly felt. Only this absence, says the judicious Semichon, can explain the terrible, even though exceptional, barbarities of that time. Heruli, Goths, Vandals, Lombards, Franks, Visigoths, Huns, Danes, Saxons, and Normans, had overthrown the Western empire, and the miserable populations knew no human power but that of the sword; they rejoiced, in fact, when some one barbarian was sufficiently strong to crush his rivals, and to give society that kind of rest which comes from the rule of a single tyrant. When one reads the horrible descriptions of such a chronicler as Glaber Rudolphus (1040)—narratives not only of wholesale murder and universal rapine, but of cannibalism and ghoulism,—he does not wonder that duels and private wars became the means by which society, in the first period of the Middle Ages, tried to preserve the rights which civil government failed to secure it. In the feudal system of that day, remarks Cantù, “there being no confidence, recourse was more willingly had to such guarantees as were conformable to the condition of society; and duels and private wars became a necessity in such a state of affairs.”

However, society benefited little by the introduction of such remedies for its woes. Brute force remained its guiding influence; and no matter under what guise it may be exercised, brute force is conducive neither to civilization nor happiness. On every side were anarchy and chaos, and not unfrequently men imagined that the days of Antichrist were at hand. But if the abomination of desolation was nearly everywhere visible, the mercy of God was about to cut short its work of destruction. There remained on earth one power which men really revered,—one power, the influence of which was moral, and was therefore felt not merely by the lower nature of man, but by his mind and soul. Lombard and Italian; Frank and Roman; Gaul, Vandal, and African; Visigoth and Iberian; Saxon and Norman and Briton; all alike—barbarous and cultured—respected the Catholic Church. In that period, which, despite its failings, was pre-eminently an age of faith, the influence of religion was paramount over the most terrible warriors and the most unmitigated tyrants. This, then, was the power which was to bring order out of chaos; this Church of God, which had but lately converted the barbaric hordes, and had begun the work of forming a new society on the ruins of the old, was about to appeal to the Christian sentiments of her new children, and to give a new life to the world.

But how was the Church to insure obedience to her injunctions? In her mission of protecting society, of substituting government for anarchy, how could she hope to succeed where even the sword—that generally successful argument over the purely natural man—had shown itself to be of no avail? But the Church possessed a weapon more powerful than the sword—the power of excommunication,—an arm which, as Semichon rightly observes, has been the origin of all modern social progress; for it convinced the barbarian that force could not prevail over right. It must be admitted that individual prelates—generally those who were the products of that system of royal “investiture” which the mediæval Pontiffs combated—often launched ecclesiastical censure for their own unworthy purposes; but such were exceptional cases. Still, as a rule, whenever this weapon was adopted in causes not purely religious, it was used in the interest of humanity. The Church had determined to convince her converts from Paganism that men might be of various conditions in the social scale, but that they were all equally obliged to revere and defend the right, and to uphold the good of society. Starting on her mission to abolish the state of universal warfare around her, the Church of the tenth century continued to preach the Gospel of peace; but she also began to construct a social edifice, and she defended her work with her peculiar weapon.

The first step toward the introduction of the Truce of God was taken in 988. Gondebald, archbishop of Aquitaine, in a Council of his suffragans at Charroux, pronounced anathema against all who robbed farmers or the poor of their flocks, or destroyed implements of husbandry. Many other Councils prosecuted the same object, and soon the prelates began to inveigh against the arrogance and tyranny which the lords, both great and small, were wont to exercise toward the weak, especially toward monasteries, peddlers, and rustics. Excommunication, and even interdict—that most depressing of all punishments to those who were not lost to all sense of religion (1)—were often launched against the titled ruffians who formed the higher society of the day. The influence of these clerical assemblies was exerted, too, against other social evils than robbery and like forms of license. Their efforts were also directed to prevent the recurrence of war. Our modern philanthropists, who periodically hold a Congress of Peace, in the vain hope of inducing rival governments to reduce their monstrous standing armies, and thus diminish the burdens of the taxpayer, should cease to extol the nineteenth century as having originated the idea of arbitration. At the time of which we write, the cities of Narbonne, Limoges, Suiclanges d' Auvergne, Poitiers, and many others, had Synods which put that idea into practice. The nobles were conjured and commanded to swear, on the relics of the saints, that, when differences arose between them, they would not have recourse to arms until they had first tried to arrive at a pacific understanding in the presence of their respective bishops.

Such movements, however, were only the first attempts to satisfy the aspirations of a society satiated with bloodshed. According to Glaber Rudolphus (b. 5, c. 1), the year 1051 saw Aquitaine in the full enjoyment of "The Peace and the Truce of God," and in a short time the institution spread throughout France. The "Peace" exempted from all the evils of war all churches, clergymen, monasteries and convents, cemeteries; women, children, pilgrims, husbandmen; all implements of agriculture, and all farmers'

(1) And to those, also, whose religious sentiments were dead or dormant: for during an interdict, says Hurter, "music and festivity, assemblies of all kinds, all ornaments, and frequently even the ordinary cares of the body, disappeared. A universal fast was observed, all business ceased, and no communication was held with those who were deemed unworthy to belong to Christian society." In such a state of affairs, it is no wonder that "the revenues of the suzerain suffered a notable diminution, owing to the paralysis fallen on every industry." — Life of Innocent III., vol. i., B. 4.

cattle, fields, vineyards, etc. The "Truce" directly tended to habituate to a peaceful life men to whom war was as their life-breath; to give time, at any rate, for angry passions to subside; to allow sober second-thought entrance into minds which acted too readily on impulse.

Realizing the inopportuneness, nay the futility, of an entire prohibition of war (1), the Church contented herself with forbidding it during Advent, Lent, and on the greater festivals. Then, when men had formed the habit of checking their angry passions, and of suspending their satisfaction, the limits of the "Truce" were extended. Four days of the week were consecrated to peace; for the "Truce" went into effect every Wednesday evening, and terminated only with the Sunday. Nor was war entirely forbidden merely during Advent and Lent: the Christmas season was soon added to the former, and the whole Paschal time to the latter. The reader will perceive that this salutary "Truce" covered, if the feasts be also considered, more than two-thirds of the year. In carrying out this beautiful idea, the Church found a powerful auxiliary in the chivalry of Christendom—that association which, according to Semichon, has given us a synonym for much that is noble and grand in human relations. Christian warfare assumed a character of justice and humanity it had never before known, and then was recognized a right the existence of which Paganism ignored—the right of the weak to be respected by the strong.

Glaber Rudolphus, who had witnessed the development of the Truce of God, writes as follows: "At this period divine grace initiated a movement which was founded on the love and fear of God, first in Aquitaine, and by degrees in every part of Gaul. From the evening of Wednesday until the dawn of Monday, no man should presume to offer any violence to another, or to exact satisfaction from any enemy whomsoever, or even to demand forfeiture from a security. If any one did any of these things he was forced to compound for his life, or was banished from the land, and made an alien in Christian society. This system was commonly styled the Truce of God. It was upheld not only by human safeguards : very frequently it was sanctioned by the terrors of divine interference ; for quite often, when maddened audacity had transgressed the law, either God's indignation showed itself, or the sword of man punished the crime. It would be impossible for us to adduce all the instances of God's manifestations of His approval of this institution. And such manifestations might have been expected ; for as the Lord's Day is venerated because of His resurrection, so the fifth, sixth, and seventh days ought to be free from evil deeds, on account of reverence for the Lord's Supper and His Passion."

(1) Modern philanthropists, forgetting that God often commanded war to be waged, tell us that war is the greatest of evils. God ordered a war of extermination in the case of the Canaanites, a civil war against the Benjamites, and a religious war against Antiochus. According to St. Thomas, the great evil of man and of society is not physical suffering, but moral disorder. In accordance with the claims of moral order, the ruler of a state protects the honor of God from insult, watches over the public weal, and shields the weak and the poor from the oppression of the great and strong. (2a 2æ, q. 40, art. 1.)

Orderic (Vitalis) informs us that in the year 1080 (1) William the Conqueror sanctioned a law passed by the bishops and barons at a Synod of Isle Bonne, whereby the "Peace and Truce" were promulgated in Normandy and England. The decree reads: "Let the 'Peace,' commonly styled the Truce of God, be strictly observed, as Prince William ordered in the beginning ; and let it be renewed in every parish, under pain of excommunication. If any person contemns it, or violates it in any way, the bishop will do justice according to the laws now in force. If any one disobeys his bishop, that prelate will inform the lord of the territory, and that lord will subject the culprit to the episcopal justice. But if the lord should neglect this, his duty, the bishop will recur to the viscount of the king, who will ignore every excuse, and will attend to the affair." In 1060 count Raymond Berengarius, of Barcelona, published the "Truce" in his dominions. In 1095 Pope Urban II. and the Synod of Clermont, and in 1102 Pope Paschal II., confirmed these decrees of William and Raymond. In 1102 William, archbishop of Auchel and apostolic legate, promulgated the "Truce" in his province, in accordance with the statutes of Urban II. Finally, in 1139, the Tenth General Council (Second of the Lateran) gave in its Canon

(1) Hist. Eccl., B. v.

XI., the official approbation of the Universal Church to one of the most beneficial institutions of the Middle Ages.

But, the reader may ask, in thus promulgating the Truce of God, did not the Church arrogate to herself a power which belongs only to the civil authority? Well, we reply, with Semichon, where and what was the civil authority at that time? The Church has never been disposed to encroach upon the province of legitimate and competent civil government, and she has always restrained her clergy when intemperate zeal has led them to pass the limits of their own jurisdiction. But at the time of which we write, human law was almost entirely ignored, and it became not merely the right but the duty of the Church to remind men of their obligations, and to use her God-given powers to secure their observance. For more than half a century illustrious men have been endeavoring, by appealing to justice, compassion, and interest, (1), to put an end to war; but in spite of their zealous apostolate, the latter half of this "thinking" nineteenth century has seen standing armies doubled in number, public debts increased beyond measure. The self-constituted, impartial arbitrators speak to the deaf; public opinion demands peace, but cannot obtain it. The impotency of mere philanthropy to effect lasting good in society is here made evident. And how much more easy is this modern task, which philanthropy has assumed, than the one essayed and executed by the Church when she abolished private warfare! Philanthropy vainly struggles for universal peace among nations already civilized and cultured. On the contrary, the abolition of private war was undertaken by the Church, during an epoch of barbarism and confusion, among thousands of haughty and untamed barons, whose sole wealth was booty, whose sole hope of aggrandizement was conquest; and nevertheless, the Church succeeded in this, as in all of her endeavors to mollify the dispositions of the human wolves whom she was appointed to save. It was the Abbé Saint-Pierre, in the last century, who first inspired men with the conception of a "universal peace," and the famous cardinal Fleury styled his hope "a dream of a worthy man." Certainly, outside of the Catholic idea, independently of the idea of God—and the Congresses of Peace have hitherto ignored it—permanent peace among nations is a vain aspiration.

(1) When some of these apostles of peace waited on King Louis Philippe, he characteristically encouraged them, saying, "War is so expensive nowadays that the civilized world may hope to soon see the last of it." And since his time!

CHAPTER XX.

NINTH GENERAL COUNCIL : FIRST OF THE LATERAN.

When Pope Calixtus II. found that at length the emperor Henry V. was willing to relinquish his claim to investitures, he addressed him a congratulatory letter, and prayed him to send, as soon as possible, his "orators" to Rome, that they might represent him at the General Council then being prepared. "Come therefore, my dear son," he said; "mayest thou rejoice in us, and we in thee, in the Lord! May thy imperial excellency reflect upon the great harm that has been caused to the faithful of Europe by the discord between the Church and the empire, and upon the great increase of good that will accrue to them, with the help of the Lord, from our concord . . . In regard to those things that thou hast committed to thy faithful ambassadors, to be communicated to us by word of mouth, we shall inform thee, by the same means, of what seems proper to us and our brethren. Commending, then, to thy benevolence those our legates who are now with thee, we ask that thou wilt, the Lord granting, send them quickly to us, as the Council convoked by us is at hand. So instruct, however, thy own ambassadors, that, according to thy promise, they may fully restore her regalia to the Roman Church." Baronio assigns the year 1122 as the date of the Ninth General Council, but Cossart observes that the year 1123 must be the correct date, since Suger of St. Denis says that he attended the Council as abbot of St. Denis, "the year after his elevation," and we know that his predecessor, Adam, died in 1122. Again, Robert de Monte and Falco of Benevento give 1123 as the date.

All previous General Councils having been held in the East, the Roman Pontiffs had presided over them by means of their legates. In this Ninth Council, held in the Lateran basilica, and hence called "the First of the Lateran," Pope Calixtus II. presided in person. Over 300 bishops and nearly 700 abbots attended. (1). When the imperial orators had been heard, so great was the joy of the prelates on perceiving that the question of investitures was finally terminated, that many of them applied to Henry's ambassadors the scriptural words, "how beautiful the feet of those who announce good things." The Council then confirmed the compact of Worms, thus definitely restoring the concord between Church and empire.

The prelates then turned their attention to the formation and issuing of Canons for the restoration of ecclesiastical discipline, and for the encouragement of the Crusades in Palestine and in Spain. The business of the Council was transacted in two sessions, and twenty-two Canons were promulgated. The First Canon prohibits all simoniacal ordinations or promotions, under pain of loss of the grade or dignity obtained, and is taken, word for word, from a Canon of the Synod of Toulouse, celebrated under Calixtus II., in 1119. The Second Canon, also taken from those of Toulouse, orders that provosts, arch-priests, and deans be taken from the ranks of the priesthood; archdeacons to be selected from among the deacons. The Third, taken from the Canons of Nice, interdicts to priests, deacons, and subdeacons all concubinage or use of married life, or residence in the same household with any woman not one's mother, sister, aunt, or such as concerning whom "there can arise no just suspicion." The Fourth prohibits, as sacrilege, all princes or any laymen from giving away the possessions of the Church. The Fifth condemns as infamous certain marriages of persons related by blood. The Sixth degrades all those who were ordained or consecrated by the anti-Pope Bordinio (Gregory VIII.), or by persons consecrated by him. The Seventh prohibits, under pain of excommunication, any provost, archpriest, archdeacon, or dean, from conferring a

(1) Suger says there were more than 300 bishops, and Pandulph says there were 997, partly bishops and partly abbots.

benefice without the sanction of his bishop. The Eighth excommunicates all invaders of the Papal principality of Benevento; that district, owing to its isolation from the Roman States, being liable to suffer from the periodical wars of Southern Italy. The Ninth ordains that no bishop shall communicate with a person excommunicated by another prelate. The Tenth and Eleventh grant indulgences to Crusaders and to all who aid their enterprise; they receive their families and properties under the protection of St. Peter, excommunicating all who injure them; they order all who have assumed the cross, and have neglected to join the Crusaders in Palestine or Spain, to do so within a year, under pain of anathema, and interdict all sacred offices, excepting baptism and penance, at the hour of death, in the dominions of all princes and lords who are delinquent in this matter. The Twelfth abolishes the right, hitherto exercised, and probably usurped, by the Prefect of Rome, to seize the goods left, at his death, by an intestate Porticanus. For many centuries there had been established, for strangers, a number of porticoes, in the district reaching from St. Paul's to the city walls, and in that now known as the Borgo, extending from St. Peter's to the castle of St. Angelo (1). These strangers were called Porticani, and the Prefect of Rome, a vassal of the emperor down to the time of Innocent III., had usurped a special jurisdiction over them. By the twelfth Canon Pope Calixtus took a step toward the relegation of the Prefect to his proper place, and Pope Innocent III. (el. 1198), took the last step when he forced the Prefect to receive, instead of a sword from the emperor, a mantle from his own Pontifical hands, by way of investiture, thus doing away with the last shadow of the imperial pretence to suzerainty. The Thirteenth excommunicates the violators of the "Truce of God." The Fourteenth prohibits laymen from appropriating offerings made to the Church, and from regarding churches as part of their domains. The Fifteenth anathematizes coiners and circulators of false money, as oppressors of the poor and disturbers of the state. The Sixteenth excommunicates all who molest pilgrims to Rome or other holy places, or who exact tolls from them. The Seventeenth prohibits monks from administering the Sacraments to the sick, and from singing public masses: "Following in the footsteps of the holy fathers, we establish by this general decree, that monks shall be subject, in all humility, to their respective bishops; and that they shall show, in all things, due and devoted obedience to the bishops, as to the teachers and pastors of the Church of God. They shall never celebrate solemn public masses. Let them entirely abstain from public visitation of the sick, from anointing, and from penance; for these things are not at all in their province. In the churches where they are allowed to officiate, they will receive, from the hands of their bishop, priests who shall be answerable to him for their care of souls." The Eighth orders that the bishops appoint all pastors; that they who receive tithes, or take charge of churches, at the hands of laymen, without the consent of their bishop, be visited with canonical punishment. The Nineteenth confirms the custom, originated in the time of St. Gregory VII., of monasteries and their churches contributing to the support of Church and state. The Twentieth excommunicates all who molest ecclesiastical persons or goods, or peasants and laborers attached to the service of churches or monasteries. The Twenty-first is a repetition of the Third Canon. The Twenty-second declares null and void all alienations of property belonging to the church of Ravenna, and reiterates the sentence already passed against the simoniacally ordained or consecrated.

(1) PROCOPIUS; Gothic War, B. II.

CHAPTER XXI.

THE TENTH GENERAL COUNCIL: SECOND OF THE LATERAN.

This Council was convoked by Pope Innocent II. for three purposes: to remedy the evils caused by the schism of Peter Leonis, to condemn the heresies of Peter de Bruis and Arnold of Brescia, and to draw more tightly the reins of ecclesiastical discipline. The Council was opened on April 8th, 1139, and was attended by about a thousand bishops. (1). We give a summary of the teachings of the Petrobruinsians, as recorded by the venerable Peter of Cluny, in a letter to the archbishop of Arles and other prelates. Peter de Bruis first disseminated his errors in the province of Arles, about 1120. He denied that baptism was of any use, when administered to a person not yet arrived at the use of reason ; for, said he, "he who believes, and is baptized, shall be saved." He contended that no temples be built for divine worship ; that those existing should be razed to the ground or devoted to other purposes, because "God hears one pray in a tavern as well as in a church ; as well before a stable as before an altar." He taught that the crucifix should be broken to pieces and burnt, because "that instrument by which Christ was so cruelly tortured, on which He was so cruelly killed, is unworthy of any veneration ; rather should it be treated with every contumely, cut with knives, given to the flames, in revenge for Christ's suffering and death." He not only denied the Real Presence of our Lord in the Eucharist, but he asserted that it is nothing whatever, and should not be offered to God." He ridiculed all sacrifice, prayer, alms, etc., offered for the dead, and said that "not in the least can they help a soul departed." He rejected tradition and the authority of the Fathers. These errors, and those of Arnold, were condemned by the Tenth Council in its Twenty-third Canon, couched in these terms : "Those who, simulating the appearance of piety, reject the Sacrament of the Lord's Body and Blood, the baptism of infants, the priesthood and other Holy Orders, and legitimate marriage, we expel, as heretics, from the Church of God, and condemn them ; and we command that they be coerced by the civil power. We include their defenders in the same condemnation.

In its Thirtieth Canon, the Council decreed that all who had been ordained or consecrated by Peter Leonis (2) and

(1) OTTO OF FRISINGEN, Chronicle, B. vii., c. 23. Chronicle of Benevento.

(2) On the death of Honorius II., in 1130, a cardinal named Peter (styled Leonis after his grandfather Leo, a wealthy and influential Jew) compassed his own election by a faction, after the legitimate proclamation of the cardinal Gregory del Mattei as Innocent II. The his followers should be debarred from the exercise of their order. The disciplinary Canons are twenty-eight in number. The First deposes all simoniacs. The Second condemns every kind of traffic in Sacraments and all holy things, especially reprobating that in ecclesiastical dignities. Those who simoniacally acquire honor or position are deprived of the fruit of their iniquity, and, together with the traders, are branded as infamous : "All custom to the contrary notwithstanding, nothing can be exacted or given, either before or after." The Third prohibits a bishop from receiving a person excommunicated by his own ordinary. The Fourth deprives of his benefice any cleric who, after being admonished by his bishop, shows himself a fop, or is otherwise extravagant or peculiar in his dress, hair, etc. The Fifth orders the observance of that decree of the Council of Chalcedon whereby it was sanctioned "that the goods left by a prelate, at his death, be seized by no man whosoever, but remain, for the use of the diocese and the successor, in the free power of the treasurer and of the clergy. Let there be an end to that detestable and cruel rapacity. If, however, any one presumes hereafter to exercise it, let him be excommunicated." The same punishment is decreed against those who seize the goods of the inferior clergy. This Canon, the Twenty-second of Chalcedon, had been already enforced by the Synod of Rheims, of 1131, under the presidency of Innocent II. The Sixth deprives of benefice, and of the right of officiating, all subdeacons, deacons, and priests, who marry or have concubines. The Seventh renews the decrees of Gregory VII., Urban II., and Paschal II., prohibiting attendance at the mass of a married or concubinary priest. It declares null the marriages of those in Holy Orders, and of Canons Regular and professed monks. The Eighth nullifies the marriages of nuns. The Ninth forbids to all monks and Canons Regular the practice of medicine or of civil law, if exercised for the sake of gain. If any bishop or abbot intruder took the name of Anacletus II. ; Pope Innocent fled to the fortified palace of the Frangipani, and afterwards to France. After Innocent's restoration to Rome, the anti-Pope continued to hold the Leonine City until a miserable death overtook him, in 1138. Then his partisans gave him a successor, styled Victor IV., but St. Bernard, who was then in Rome, soon converted this anti-Pope and led him to the feet of Innocent II.

permits such practice, he is to be deposed and excommunicated. The Tenth anathematizes all who appropriate the tithes of a church. If the guilty do not make restitution, they commit sacrilege and "incur eternal damnation," even though they have been countenanced in their robbery "by bishops or by kings." This Canon also condemns the practice, which had become quite common, of conferring deaneries and archdiaconates on young persons, and commands that such offices be assigned only to persons of known prudence and merit. It also reprobates the custom of some bishops, who gave parishes to wandering priests. In reference to the first portion of this Canon, that relating to lay-appropriation of tithes, we may observe that many of the nobles of Normandy and England had been accustomed, for a long time, to take to themselves a third of all the church tithes collected in their domains. The Conqueror forced them all to make restitution, but after he had died the custom was resumed. Hence a Synod of Rouen, in 1096, had condemned the practice, and the decree was repeated by a Synod at Poitiers, over which the legates of Paschal II. presided. The Tenth Council confirmed these decisions, "because tithes were designed for the uses of piety;" and such has ever been the mind of the Church. When the state was in difficulty, the Church frequently offered it help in the shape of a concession of all or a part of her tithes, and sometimes the beneficiary neglected to resign a possession which was of so much profit. The Eleventh and Twelfth Canons regarded the celebrated "Truce of God," of which we have treated in a special chapter. The Thirteenth is very severe on usurers. It declares usury to be "prohibited by divine and human law, in the Old and New Testament," and deprives its votaries "of all ecclesiastical consolation." They are not to be absolved, "unless with great caution," but are rather "to be regarded as infamous, during their entire lives; and unless they repent, are to be deprived of Christian burial." The Fourteenth regards the custom to which soldiers were addicted, of frequenting fairs and such places and occasions, for an opportunity of exhibiting their skill and valor. These fairs, in fact, had become so many gladiatorial shows, and combats to the death were not uncommon. By this Canon, a gladiator mortally wounded on one of these occasions was denied Christian burial, even though he lived long enough to confess, and to receive the Holy Viaticum. The Fifteenth excommunicates those who lay violent hands on a cleric or a monk, and reserves their cases, unless they be in danger of death, to the Holy See. From the most ancient times, persons guilty of the most heinous crimes had gone to Rome for an absolution denied them at home, but this Canon seems to have reserved expressly, for the first time, any particular crime to the sole judgment of the Pontiff. The Sixteenth denies that the possession of an ecclesiastical benefice can be a matter of hereditary right, "for the honors of the Church are given, not to a certain blood, but to merit; and the Church has no heirs by hereditary right, or according to the flesh, but rather seeks for honest, wise, and religious persons to occupy her posts of government and to fill her offices." St. Bernard, commenting upon the passage of the Gospel "behold, we have left all things," gives a fearful picture of this abuse, as not uncommon in his days. The Seventeenth condemns as incestuous marriages within certain degrees of kindred, and says they are "detested by the Fathers and by the Holy Church of God." The civil law of that time regarded the fruit of such unions as infamous, and debarred it from the rights of heredity. The Eighteenth excommunicates and deprives of Christian burial all incendiaries, this evil having greatly increased, owing to the prevalence of private feuds and vendettas. Absolution for this crime could not be accorded unless the injury was repaired, and only then on condition of a year's service with the Crusaders in Palestine or Spain. The Nineteenth suspends for one year, and obliges to a reparation of the injury committed by the culprit, any bishop who absolves an incendiary without insisting on the conditions of the previous Canon. The Twentieth declares that the Council does not wish to interfere with the secular power, in its actions against the crime of incendiarism. The Twenty-first forbids to the sons of priests all ministration at the altar, unless they embrace the monastic life. The Twenty-second admonishes confessors against false or illusory repentance. "There is a false repentance when the penitent does not give up an office or a business which he cannot fill or conduct without sin, or when he bears hatred in his heart, or when he does not repair an injury or forgive one, or when he bears arms in an unjust cause." The Twenty-third, as we have seen, regards the Petrobruissians and the Arnoldists. The Twenty-fourth prohibits the exaction of money for the Holy Chrism and Oils or for Christian burial. The Twenty-fifth commands that no ecclesiastic receive a benefice from a lay hand, and deprives such a recipient from his position, since, according to the decrees of the holy Fathers, laymen, be they ever so religious, have no right to dispose of the goods of the Church." In the previous century, many Synods had condemned this abuse. By this decree, however, the Council did not interfere with the legitimate "right of presentation" enjoyed by certain lay patrons, and which was derived from their (or their ancestors) having founded and endowed the benefice in question. The Council merely denied the right of absolute collation, without any approval of ecclesiastical authority, which certain magnates had arrogated to themselves. The Twenty-sixth anathematizes those women who, living in private houses and wearing the habit of religious, although professing no recognized rule, receive men as guests. The Twenty-seventh prohibits nuns and monks from chanting the Office together, in the same choir. The Twenty-eighth provides that no episcopal see remain vacant for more than three months. The Twenty-ninth prohibits the use of cross-bows against Christians.

The decrees of the Tenth Council were eminently wise, and Pope Innocent II. was justified in expecting that great good would accrue to the Church by their means. But the evils of the time were so deeply seated, that most of the Council's designs were frustrated.

CHAPTER XXII.

POPE ALEXANDER III. AND THE LOMBARD LEAGUE.

Conrad III. having died in 1152, the German throne was mounted by his son Frederick, called, on account of his red beard, Barbarossa. At this time Pope Eugenius III. was experiencing great trouble with the Romans, who were powerfully agitated by the teachings of Arnold of Brescia, and were ambitious to restore the ancient glories of the S. P. Q. R. Eugenius in vain implored the assistance of the French in restoring order in his turbulent capital, and albeit unwillingly, now turned to Frederick I. The German king was but too glad to avail himself of the Pontiff's request as a pretext for his own aggrandizement, for the imperial claims in Italy were just then nearly entirely ignored. He eagerly promised to restore Eugenius to his temporal throne, and accordingly that Pontiff departed from France, where he had taken refuge, and advanced as far as Tivoli, where he hoped to be met by Frederick. Here he suddenly died, in July, 1153. The next Pope was Anastasius IV., but after a short reign he was succeeded, in December, 1154, by Adrian IV. Adrian renewed his predecessor's application to Frederick, and promised him, as a reward, the imperial crown. Having arranged his German affairs, the Red Beard now descended into Italy at the head of a formidable army, and before he gave any aid to the Pontiff, proceeded to restore the imperial power in the North. His first venture was made against Milan, but finding it impossible of reduction, he spent his fury upon the surrounding country, and having sacked and burnt Asti, Chieri, and Tortona, he entered Pavia, where he received the iron crown of Lombardy. Pope Adrian and Frederick met at Viterbo, and were there waited upon by a deputation from Rome, promising obedience to the Pontiff. A few days afterward, having peacefully entered the city, Adrian placed the imperial crown upon the head of Frederick. The peace of the city was soon disturbed, for the Romans, indignant at the contempt which Barbarossa showed for them, and disgusted with the brutality of the German soldiery, arose in arms, and after a long and bloody fight the emperor, accompanied by Adrian, withdrew his army to Tivoli. Sickness soon decimated his forces, and he ordered a retreat to Germany. Attacked on all sides by the infuriated Lombards, whom he had injured, he finally, almost alone, crossed the frontier. But in 1158, Frederick took his revenge. With more than a hundred thousand men he laid siege to Milan, hunger finally caused a capitulation, and the heroic bulwark of Lombard independence was compelled to swear fidelity to the German. With the acquisition of Milan and the consequent reduction of all Northern Italy, Barbarossa flattered himself that the imperial power was better consolidated than it had been since the days of Charlemagne. But dissensions now arose between Pope Adrian and the conqueror. The Pontiff had many grievances against Frederick, and to obtain redress of these, he commissioned as legates the cardinals Octavian, Henry, William, and Guido. Through them Adrian insisted, firstly, that the emperor should desist from all communication with the Romans, unless through the Pontiff, because the government of the Roman states belonged only to the latter. Secondly, he demanded a cessation of the contributions of hay and straw, levied on the Romans for the imperial cavalry, contending that such could be permitted only on the occasion of an imperial coronation. Thirdly, he required that Italian bishops should be asked to give no homage, but only an oath of fidelity, to the emperor. Fourthly, he protested against the custom of lodging and entertaining imperial messengers, which had been forced upon the bishops. Fifthly, he demanded the cession to the Roman See of the territories of the Countess Matilda, donated by her to that See, and of all the territory between Aquapendente and Rome, of the duchy of Spoleto, and of the islands of Sardinia and Corsica. Adrian also complained that Frederick had broken his promise not to cede any Italian territory to the Greeks, also his agreement to make no peace with the king of Sicily without the consent of the Pope. (1). To these demands and complaints the emperor gave no satisfaction. With regard to the inheritance of Matilda, he said he would leave that to the decision of wise and impartial men, and to this the legates replied that the dignity of the Pontiff permitted no recourse to an inferior's judgment. Foreseeing a struggle, and realizing that the imperial power was waxing too strong in Italy, Pope Adrian negotiated with Milan, Piacenza, Cremona, and other cities which were impatient of a foreign yoke. The enraged Frederick now rushed into Italy to crush this alliance, but he had scarcely arrived, when he heard of the death of Adrian.

At this time the Sacred College, then numbering thirty cardinals, was divided into two parties. The larger and more influential, led by the cardinal Roland Bandinella, chancellor of the Roman Church, was very averse to the German emperor, and had constantly urged the late Pontiff to make peace with William of Sicily, regarding him as likely to prove a faithful defender of the Holy See against the machinations of Frederick. The other party, under the guidance of the cardinal Octavian, was devoted to the emperor, and so pronounced had this devotion become, that Pope Adrian IV. had besought the cardinals not to elect any of that faction to the Papacy, since its servile regard for the imperial crown was a treachery to the Church. When the Conclave was held, twenty-three cardinals voted for Bandinella, and five for Octavian. The former was accordingly proclaimed as Alexander III. Octavian, however, relying upon the aid of the Roman senators, Ghibelines to the core, dragged the Pontifical vestments from Alexander, and presented himself to the people as Victor IV. Fearing for his life, Alexander fled to the castle of San Angelo, and for nine days was besieged by the schismatics. But the people soon learned the truth, and led by Hector Frangipane, they routed the insurgents and freed the Pontiff. Both parties having notified the emperor of their accession, Barbarossa presumed to convoke a Diet at Pavia to decide the question, and Alexander having refused to attend it, fifty bishops satisfied the emperor by recognizing Octavian as legitimate Pontiff. (1). In a Nazarene Synod held in 1160, the Eastern churches recognized Alexander, and in 1161, the English bishops did the same at Newmarket, and the French acquiesced at Beauvais and Toulouse. In the meantime, the cities of Milan, Crema, and Brescia, indignant at the Redbeard's violations of the terms of their capitulation, and driven to fury by his extortions, had commenced another war. The emperor resolved to make a terrible example of the rebellious cities. First came the siege of Crema, the faithful narration of which causes horrible repulsion to the reader. Exhausted at last by six months of fatigue and inexorable hunger, the Cremaschi were obliged to open their gates. All the inhabitants were expelled, and in a few hours Crema was a smoking ruin. When the news of the imperial action at Pavia reached Pope Alexander, he was residing at Anagni. He immediately excommunicated the anti-Pope, Frederick, and all their abettors. Then he proceeded to Terracina, from which place he tried to influence William of Sicily to draw the sword in defence of the Holy See. That prince, however, had forgotten his warlike youth, and was loth to forsake the lap of luxurious indolence, unless for his own immediate interests. Alexander therefore sailed to Genoa, where he was received with great respect and joy. He afterwards went to France. The Milanese, undeterred by the frightful fate of the Cremaschi, were now in full insurrection against the German power. The imperial army, and such Italian cities as favored Barbarossa, suffered immense losses, and in one battle the emperor was wounded. But by force of gold and fair promises, Frederick greatly augmented the number of his Italian allies, and the Milanese were finally compelled to withdraw within their own walls. Famine at length brought about their surrender, and the entire population was driven forth, literally beggars for a crust of bread to sustain life. Ten days afterwards, a heap of stones and bricks showed the traveller where had stood the proud and magnificent Milan. (2). The spectacle of so many thousands of people,

(1) RADEVIC, Epistle of Eberard Bamberg to the Archbishop of Salzburg in R. xl., c. 30.

(1) RADEVIC, Deeds of Frederick I., B. ii., c. 64.

(2) Of the innumerable monuments of the ancient Roman, and of their own more modern all the Milanese and a great number from Piacenza, Brescia, and Bologna, reduced to absolute mendicancy, did more than anything else to bring forth and nourish that celebrated Lombard League, which was destined to crush for a time, and to diminish forever, the imperial power in Italy. When Frederick learned that most of the Lombard cities were uniting to oppose him, he marched on Verona, but growing suspicious of the fidelity of the Italian allies yet following his banner, he suddenly raised the siege and returned to Germany for a new and larger army.

Pope Alexander III. had now returned to Rome, the anti-Pope having died, in 1164, and had been received with joy by the Romans, whose imperialistic tendencies had been greatly modified by the excesses of Barbarossa. He exerted all his influence to develop and confirm the Lombard League, and aided the scattered inhabitants of Milan and Crema to settle amid the ruins of their homes, and to commence the rebuilding of their cities. Enraged at the patriotic efforts of the Pontiff, Frederick recrossed the Alps and marched on Rome to enthrone his anti-Pope, Paschal III., whom he had caused to be chosen as successor to the defunct Victor. He took the Leonine City by assault, reduced the fortified basilica of St. Peter's by fire, and renewed the ceremony of his coronation. The new anti-Pope was then enthroned, and Frederick turned his attention to the Romans. Flatteries, fair promises, and above all, gold, were given in profusion to both nobles and people, and many of them were corrupted. Pope Alexander, on the approach of the emperor, had fled to the strongly fortified palace of the Frangipani, which was well calculated to withstand a siege, even from the imperial army. The princely head of the Frangipani was faithful and brave, but the Pope's counsellors, nevertheless, advised him to retire to the Papal principality of Benevento. Having disguised their persons, Alexander and his cardinals stole out of the city by night, rode to Terracina, where they embarked for Gaeta, and finally were safely housed in Benevento. But Barbarossa artistic and architectural grandeur, the Milanese could now rejoice in the possession of only one, and that endures to this day. It stands in front of the church of St. Lawrence, is a portion of a majestic marble portico, formed by a row of sixteen immense columns. How it escaped the otherwise universal destruction, is not recorded.

could not remain long in Rome. The climate was not favorable to the brutal intemperance of his soldiers, and immense numbers of them were buried. He therefore returned to Germany with the wreck of his army. The Lombard League, solemnly arranged on Dec. 1, 1167, was now firmly cemented, and, under the active patronage of Pope Alexander, was an object of fear to Frederick. It united together the cities and territories of Venice, Verona, Vicenza, Padua, Treviso, Ferrara, Brescia, Bergamo, Cremona, Milan, Lodi, Piacenza, Parma, Modena, and Bologna. Genoa and Pisa, however, were too embittered by their commercial rivalry to lay down their arms, and they continued their foolish struggle, involving also Florence and Sienna, on the side of Pisa, and Lucca and Pistoja, on the side of Genoa. Pavia also, and the powerful marquis of Monferrato, remained hostile to the League, and patiently awaited the next return of the Germans into the peninsula. This occurred in 1173. The Redbeard entered Piedmont by Mt. Cenis, stormed and burned Susa, and laid siege to the new city of Alessandria, founded, in 1168, in honor of the back-bone of the League, Pope Alexander III. A great number of houses had already been erected, but their roofs were as yet only thatched with straw. Rightly regarding the name of the city as having been given in token of defiance to the Germans, Frederick swore to so use fire and sword, that not a trace of Alessandria should perpetuate the memory of the Pontiff. His oath seemed easy of fulfilment, for the new city had no walls, and no other defence than a deep ditch. Nevertheless, his assaults were again and again repelled, and although he used all the military engines then known to offensive warfare, he found his army daily decreasing, and the city no nearer reduction. At length, taking advantage of a night of unusual darkness, the Alessandrini made a sortie, which resulted in an immense slaughter of the imperialists, and the destruction of nearly all their war machines and provisions. This blow, followed by the news that the Leaguers were advancing in force to the relief of the city, induced Barbarossa to retreat on Pavia. From this strong position, while dispatching to Germany orders after orders for reinforcements, he tried to gain time by making overtures to the League. They were heeded, and for a long time Frederick prolonged the negotiations, but taking care to put forth such exorbitant pretensions as would insure their rejection. By the time the Leaguers had discovered their enemy's trick, and had cut short the parleying, the emperor had received his fresh troops, provisions, munitions, etc. Therefore, in the spring of 1176, he started for Como, while the Leaguers, then composed of troops from Milan, Lodi, Novara, Piacenza, Brescia, and Vercelli, marched toward the Ticino, and encamped near Legnano. On May 26, reconnoitring parties crossed swords, both armies came up, and then ensued one of the bloodiest and most important battles of the age. The Italians were victorious, and, leaving on the field his own lance, shield, banner, and cross, his military chest, and an immense spoil in arms, horses, etc., abandoned by his panic stricken troops, who scattered in every direction, Frederick barely succeeded in throwing himself into the arms of his faithful Ghibellines of Pavia. He now realized that the time had arrived for submission to the Pontiff. (1).

At the suggestion of the emperor, representatives of the Holy See and of the Lombard cities met the imperial legates at Bologna, to consider the conditions of peace. The congress was soon transferred to Venice, and Pope Alexander, escorted by a Sicilian fleet, arrived to take part. The emperor and the Leaguers could here agree only upon a truce of six years, but shortly after, a conference was held at Constance, in which the independence of the Italian republics was acknowledged, on condition that their chief magistrates should receive their investiture from the emperor. As to his differences with the Holy See, Frederick now had too much at stake to allow him to give way to his native arrogance; above all things, it was necessary for him to break the union of the Guelphs, by separating from their cause that of the Pontiff. He therefore manifested much humility and docility in acceding to the demands of Alexander. He immediately procured the abdication of his last anti-Pope, Calixtus III. (1), whom he had caused to be substituted, in 1170, for the defunct Paschal; as to the territories donated to the Holy See by the countess Matilda, he promised to yield them. Certain imperialistic and many Protestant authors have shed a very theatrical light upon the audience in which Pope Alexander III. restored Frederick I. to the communion of the Church. They assert that, as the emperor prostrated himself at the feet of the Pontiff, Alexander placed his heel upon the monarch's head and cried out, in the words of the Psalmist, "Thou shalt walk upon the asp and the basilisk, and thou shalt trample under foot the lion and the dragon;" that the humiliated Frederick protested that those words were said of Peter alone, and that the elated Alexander replied, "of me, and of Peter." The absurdity of this story is evident; that it is unfounded in fact, is proved by the silence of all the contemporaries and quasi-contemporaries of Alexander who wrote about his Pontificate. Thus, Romuald, archbishop of Salerno, who was present at the absolution of Frederick, and who wrote a Life of Alexander, says nothing of this scene; neither does Matthew of Paris (2), nor William of Tyre (3), nor Roger of Hoveden. (4).

(1) The learned Benedictine historian, Tosti, in his History of the Lombard League, Montecassino, 1848, p. 346, thus comments on the battle of Legnano: "The battle of Legnano was one of those of which we often read, in both ancient and modern history, as having decided the destinies of an entire people. They are prepared beforehand by many circumstances of time and of men, as though by a special Providence of Heaven; and hence, when they are fought, men may expect to see some crown disappearing forever, or some people arising and writing, in the codex of justice, the date of its acquisition of freedom. As yet the Lombards had never contended, sword in hand and in pitched battle, against the emperor; a reverence for Cæsar was still written in their hearts—it was not yet wiped out by the tears of slavery. At Pontida they leagued together, and prepared to fight; but in their public documents of the day, there always appears a superstitious reverence for the emperor, in the words salva tamen imperatoris fidelitate. At Legnano they crossed swords with, and routed the imperialists; they despoiled Cæsar of everything, and carried off his standard; with all of his prestige, disappeared all the influence of the successor of Charlemagne and of Otho. That battle was not merely a victory of the Lombards over Frederick Barbarossa; it was a defeat of the empire by the Italian republics, and on that day was destroyed that which had made the people resigned to their servitude—a religious respect for the empire."

The peace concluded at Venice had for result, so far as the Italian republics were concerned, a confederation very similar, apparently, to that which was formed, two centuries afterward, in the mountains of Switzerland; in substance, however, there was a great difference between the

(1) This intruder humbly begged pardon of Alexander, in 1178, and we are told by Romuald of Salerno that the Pontiff that day seated him at his own table. So much for the arrogance of Alexander III., a favorite theme of certain writers.

(2) English History, year 1177.

(4) Annals of England, year 1177.

(3) Holy War.

two. The Lombard confederation acknowledged as head, either elective or hereditary, a foreigner, who, aided by foreign troops and by almost inevitable internal discord, might, at any moment, become a tyrant. But Frederick obtained many advantages by the same treaty. He filled his exhausted treasury, and being hailed as sovereign de jure of Lombardy, he could patiently await an opportunity of becoming such de facto. His reconciliation with the Italians enabled him to delay the cession of Tuscany to the Holy See, if, indeed, he ever sincerely intended to obey the will of the countess Matilda, and to fulfil his own oath. Another great advantage accruing to Frederick from peace with the Pontiff and the northern Italians, was an opportunity to carry out a long designed scheme to establish a branch of his family on a royal throne in Italy. William II, king of Naples and of Sicily, had no children, and Frederick proposed a marriage between his son Henry (afterward the Sixth of Germany) and the princess Constance, aunt and sole heiress of William. Pope Alexander III., and after him, Pope Lucius III., and Urban III., being displeased with Barbarossa because of his tortuous policy and his contempt for his obligations, and unwilling that a foreigner, already on the way to become ruler of Northern Italy, should become sovereign of the South, opposed all their power against this marriage, but in vain. We shall notice its results, when we come to treat of the Pontificate of Innocent III. During the next few years after the peace of Venice, Frederick remained comparatively quiet; with the exception of a short war with the duke of Saxony, Henry the Lion, tranquillity pervaded his dominions. But in 1189, the fall of Jerusalem having caused Pope Urban III. to proclaim a new Crusade, Frederick received the Cross from the hands of the cardinal Henry, bishop of Albano, and led a considerable army toward Palestine. By June of the following year he reached the banks of the Calycadnus, in Cilicia, and while trying to ford the stream in his heavy armor, was drowned.

We cannot close this chapter without a few words in defense of the conduct of Pope Alexander III., in making a separate peace with Frederick, without, it is said by some, more consideration for his allies. Many Italian historians have also blamed him for not taking advantage of the imperial misfortunes, thus assuring the independence of their country. But in his treaty with the emperor, Alexander III. entered into no arrangement which could reasonably displease the Lombards, and there was no likelihood that the confederates would have helped the Pontiff to the extent of annihilating the imperial power in Italy. It is certain that the Leaguers, even in their most prosperous moments, did not dream of absolute withdrawal from the empire; the ideas of those days were very different from those of the present time. The Italian enemies of Barbarossa merely contended for "home-rule," and they willingly acknowledged the supremacy or primacy of the suzerain created and anointed by the Holy See. This is well proved by the following passage of Romuald of Salerno, giving a Declaration made by the chiefs of the League to the Pope, in 1177: "Your Holiness and the imperial government must know that we will gratefully receive the peace of the emperor, if the honor of Italy be secured; and that we wish to recover his friendship, providing that he will guard our liberties. We desire to satisfy all the obligations of Italians toward him, according to the ancient usages; we do not reject any of the olden laws; but we will never consent to forego that liberty which we inherited from our forefathers, and we will lose it only with our lives, for the death of a freeman is sweeter to us than the life of a slave." Why then should Alexander have prolonged the war? Again, by an annihilation of the imperial power, the Pontiff would have undone the work of his predecessor, who had created that power, and had confided to it the temporal supremacy of Christendom. Even when an emperor became a rebel to the Pontiff, Rome never thought of abolishing his office, but only of substituting a more religious and more docile incumbent.

CHAPTER XXIII.

THE ELEVENTH GENERAL COUNCIL: THIRD OF THE LATERAN.

During the years 1177 and '78, Pope Alexander III. sent subdeacons to all the ecclesiastical provinces, summoning the bishops to a General Council at Rome in the following year. (1). Such was the manner, in those days, of convoking a Council. (2). The letter of convocation says: "As we see there are many things in the Church of God which need correction, many improvements to be made, and many things to be made known to the faithful which will help to their salvation; we have resolved to summon ecclesiastics from all parts, that, by their presence and counsel, what is healthful may be established, and what is good may be provided, according to the custom of the ancient Fathers, and be confirmed by many. If this were effected by each one individually, it would not easily attain its end. Therefore, by these Apostolic Letters, we command that you co-operate with this our arrangement, and, the Lord leading, that you come to the city of Rome on the first Sunday of the coming Lent, so that, with the aid of the grace of the Holy Ghost, we may decide, by our common care, what is to be done in the correction of abuses and in the establishment of what will be pleasing to God; that we may, with one shoulder, support the Ark of the Lord, and with one tongue, give honor to God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ." The reasons for holding the Council were, first, to remedy the evils caused by the anti-Popes whom Frederick Barbarossa had sustained, and, in two instances, created; second, to condemn the Waldensian heresy; third, to invigorate ecclesiastical discipline. Pope Alexander, in person, presided over the Council. Matthew of Paris says there were present 310 bishops, but William of Tyre, who was one of the synodals, puts the number at 300. The Council was opened in the Lateran basilica, on March 5th, 1179, and its business was completed in three sessions.

(1) The year 1179 is assigned as the date of the Eleventh General Council by Otho of Frisingen (Chronicle, B. vii.), Matthew of Paris, William of Tyre, Roger of Hoveden, Helmold, and Albert Stadensis. And nevertheless, and although Alexander III. died in 1181, the abbot of Ursperg, in his Chronicle, says: "In the year of the Lord 1182, Pope Alexander held a General Council in the Lateran basilica, about the Calends of April; although some say the Council was held in 1179. But it may be that at this latter date he celebrated a Synod with some of the bishops of Italy."

(2) ROBERT DE MONTE, year 1179.

In its First Canon, the Council decreed that hereafter a two-third's vote of the Sacred College would elect a Pontiff. It reads as follows: "Although our predecessors issued Constitutions which sufficiently guard against discord in the election of a Supreme Pontiff, the Church has frequently suffered grievous rupture on account of the audacity of wicked ambition; hence, to avoid this evil, we have decreed, by the advice of our brethren and with the approbation of the holy Council, to add something to those Constitutions. We therefore decree that if, by the enemy's sowing of nettles, there be not full concord among the cardinals in their choice of a Pontiff, and if two thirds agree, and the other third will not yield, but presumes to declare another Pontiff for itself, he shall be the Roman Pontiff who is elected and acknowledged by the two thirds. And if any one, not being able to attain his end, relies upon the nomination by one third, and usurps the name of 'Pontiff, he and all who recognize him are excommunicated, deprived of the exercise of their order, and even the Communion shall be denied to them, unless they are at the point of death. If they do not repent, let them have their lot with Dathan and Abiron, whom the earth swallowed alive. Again, if any one be chosen by less than two thirds, and no better agreement be reached, he will incur the above punishment, unless he humbly retreats. However, this decree imports no prejudice to the Canonical and other ecclesiastical Constitutions, in which the sentence of the larger and better part ought to prevail; because if any doubt arises in such cases, it can be settled by the decision of a superior. In the Roman Church there is a peculiar condition of things; in its regard, there can be no recourse to a superior." By a decree of Pope Nicholas II., in 1059, the election of a Pontiff had been confined to the cardinals, "the consent of the remaining clergy and of the people following; so that those most religious men are to be the leaders in the election, and the rest followers." From the reign of Alexander III., the two thirds system has constantly obtained. The Second Canon declares the nullification of all appointments made by the late anti-Popes, Octavian, Guido, and John, and prohibits the exercise of their order to all ordained by them or theirs. It also prescribes the following form of abjuration, to be sworn to before a schismatic can be received into the Church : " I anathematize and reject every heresy which asserts itself against the Holy, Roman, Catholic Church ; especially the schism of Octavian, Guido, and John ; and I regard the ordinations of these as null, and reject them. (1). And I swear that hereafter I shall obey and prove faithful to, the Holy Roman Church and my lord Alexander and his legitimate successors ; that I shall serve them, without any evil mind, and according to my order, against all men. The counsels he may give me, in person or by writing, I will reveal to no man, even though my limbs or life be in danger ; I will honor the legates of the Roman Church, guide them and dismiss them, and contribute to their expenses. So help me God, and these His holy Gospels." (2).

The second reason for the celebration of the Eleventh Council was the condemnation of the Waldenses. As we shall devote a special chapter to these heretics, we here detain the reader only a few moments. While Pope Alexander III. was in France, he had held, in 1163, a Synod at Toulouse, the fourth Canon of which prohibited any one from harboring the Waldenses or Albigenses, and from holding any commercial relations with them. By its 27th Canon, the Eleventh Council confirms the decree of Toulouse : " As blessed Leo says : Although ecclesiastical discipline is content with the sacerdotal decisions, and takes no bloody revenge, nevertheless it is assisted by the decrees of princes, in order that men may seek a salutary remedy, when they fear an imminent corporal punishment. Therefore, since in Gascony, in the territory of Albi, and in the district of Toulouse, the condemned wickedness of those heretics who are variously styled Catharians, Paterines, Publicans, etc., has so developed, that they no longer manifest their iniquities in secret, as others do, but even openly avow their errors, and thus seduce the weak and simple ; we pronounce anathema on them, their defenders, and their harborers ; and under pain of the same anathema, we prohibit all persons from harboring them in houses or territory, and from cherishing them, or transacting any business with them. If they die in their sin, let no offering be made for them, or burial among Christians be accorded them, notwithstanding any privilege conceded by us to any one whomsoever, and notwithstanding any other pretext." With regard to the severity of this and similar Canons, we shall take occasion to vindicate their justice and necessity when we come to treat of the Albigenses. In another part of the same 27th Canon, the Council condemns the predatory bands of Belgians, Arragonese, Navarrese, Basques, Cotterels (1), and Triaverdins, who had joined the Albigenses for the sake of pillage and lust, "who respected neither churches nor monasteries ; sparing not orphans, women, or old age ; but looting and desolating everywhere ;" and orders that "for the remission of their sins, all the faithful courageously oppose these ravages, and defend Christians against such wretches." The Canon then grants indulgences "at the discretion of the bishops," of greater or less extent, according to their term and kind of service, to those who don the Cross in the Holy Wars.

(1) Illicit, that is, not invalid.

(2) ALBERT STADENSIS, Chronicle. ALBERT KRANTZ, Metropolis, B. vii., c. 3.

The third object of the Eleventh Council was the invigoration of ecclesiastical discipline. Simony was rife in the churches and monasteries : the clergy were, to a great extent, stained with avarice, and addicted to pompous display : among the laity, usury had become a notorious evil. The Council therefore issued, besides the three Canons already noticed, twenty-four others. The Third prescribes "that no person be made a bishop, unless he is thirty years of age, born of legitimate matrimony, and is shown to be commendable in life and in learning." No one can be made a dean, an archdeacon, a parish-priest, or receive any care of souls, unless he has reached his twenty-fifth year, and is of approved knowledge and morals. In the twelfth century, the promotion of young persons, on account of court influence, to ecclesiastical dignity, had become a frightful abuse. St. Bernard (1) says: "Schoolboys, not yet arrived at the age of puberty, are promoted, because of their family dignity, to ecclesiastical offices; they are taken from under the master's rod, and assigned to govern priests." William of Newburg (2) reproves archbishop Roger of York because, "instead of the worthy persons who once shed light upon the church of York, he appointed beardless youths, better fitted to play at odd-and-even, or to straddle the hobby-horse." The Fourth protects the clergy and bishops from undue expenses, while their superiors are making a visitation. A cardinal may have twenty-five horses at such a time, if he is not also a bishop; an archbishop shall be content with forty or fifty; a bishop may be followed by thirty; an archdeacon will find five or seven a sufficiency; a dean must be satisfied with two. This programme, however, is only for the poorer places; if a very rich place be visited, the Council "toleratès" the visitor's exercise of discretion. The Fifth prohibits any ordination without a "title," whereby the ordained may live until he be provided with a benefice. In this Canon, occurs the first mention of the patrimonial title. A bishop who ordains a person without a title, whereby he may live, is obliged himself to support that person until he receives a benefice. In consequence of this Canon, Pope Innocent III. ordered the bishop of Zamora, whose predecessor had ordained a certain subdeacon, to support him until he assigned him a benefice, threatening to compel the bishop by ecclesiastical censure. The Sixth prohibits any suspension or excommunication before the issuance and reception of the formal canonical admonition. It orders a certain time to be assigned for the prosecution of an appeal, if the aggrieved party desires to make one; if the appeal is not made within that time, "the bishop may exercise his right." Monks and religious are prohibited to appeal "against the regular discipline of their superiors or Chapters." The Seventh condemns all charges for the administration of

(1) De Marca says these were so called because their favorite weapon was a long knife, called by the Toulousans a cotterel.

(1) Epistle 42 to Henry, archbishop of Sens.

(2) English Affairs, B. iii., c. 5.

Sacraments, for the granting of benefices, and for the Sacred Oils. This Canon is transcribed in the Decretals, B. V., tit. iii., on Simony. It also decrees that if any person, being in danger of death, leaves his property to a religious order, his parish church shall receive its canonical share; if, however, a man in good health does the same, the will stands. The Eighth prohibits the promising a particular benefice, when it shall become vacant, "lest one may seem to desire the death of the occupant." A prebend or benefice must be conferred within six months of the day it becomes vacant. If the collation belongs to the bishop, and he neglects to confer it, the right devolves on the Chapter, and vice versa; if both neglect, the metropolitan must provide. The Ninth rebukes the Knights Templars and the Knights Hospitalers of St. John, and some other orders, for exceeding the privileges conceded them by the Holy See, and decrees, first, that they receive no churches or tithes without the consent of the bishop; second, that they avoid all excommunicated or interdicted persons; third, that in all churches, not theirs by "full right," they present their priests for installation by the bishop; fourth, that, if they come to an interdicted church, they can only once in the year be admitted to the ecclesiastical Office, and not even then can they bury the dead in the said church; fifth, that those persons who live in religious houses, although not really belonging to the order, cannot partake of the immunities granted to the members. The Tenth forbids the reception of a monk or religious, "for money." It also decrees that a monk who keeps or possesses any money, "unless given him by the abbot for a definitely assigned purpose, be deprived of Communion, and if he be found, at his death, to have had money, he shall not be prayed for, and he shall not be buried with the brethren." The Eleventh regards the continency of the clergy, and is a repetition of previous enactments. The Twelfth prohibits clerics from conducting cases before secular tribunals, unless the case be of the Church, or their own, or for a miserably poor person. The Thirteenth condemns "spiritual polygamy," that is, the holding of more than one benefice by one person. The Fourteenth treats of the same subject, and then forbids the clergy, under pain of degradation, from receiving churches from lay hands, without the authorization of the bishop. It also excommunicates any layman who compels an ecclesiastic to appear before a lay tribunal. The Fifteenth prohibits a cleric from transmitting to his heirs what he has acquired by virtue of his ecclesiastical office. What he has received "by inheritance, through his own labor, or by his learning," he may dispose of as he pleases. This decree is inserted in the Decretals, B. III., tit. 21, Wills and Last Wishes. The Sixteenth regards Capitular dissensions, and decrees that "unless something reasonable be alleged by the minority, the decision of the majority shall stand, without appeal." The Seventeenth orders that, when a right of presentation to a benefice belongs to many, and they cannot agree upon a candidate, the majority's opinion be respected. If this would cause any scandal, the bishop must arrange the matter. He will also take the affair in his own hands, if a dispute arises as to who possesses the right of presentation, and it is not settled in four months from the date of vacancy. (Decretals, B. III., tit. 39, Right of Presentation.) The Eighteenth decrees that in all cathedral churches a fitting benefice be assigned for the support of the master of the cathedral school, whose principal duty it is to give gratuitous instruction to poor scholars. The Nineteenth excommunicates magistrates and consuls who impose burdens on churches and diminish ecclesiastical jurisdiction, unless "the bishop and the clergy see that there is such great necessity or utility, that the church ought to come to the aid of the community. (Decretals, B. III., tit. 49, Immunity of Churches.) The Twentieth repeats the decree of the Tenth Council against tournaments where life is endangered, gladiatorial shows at fairs, etc. The Twenty-first and Twenty-second regard the Truce of God, of which we have already spoken, and are inserted in the Decretals, B. I., tit. 33, Truce and Peace. The Twenty-third establishes a pastor, church, and cemetery, for every community of lepers, and exempts it from tithes. The Twenty-fourth excommunicates all who furnish munitions of war to the Mohammedans, or become navigators in their ships. The same penalty is launched against all pirates and wreckers. The Twenty-fifth is against usury. The Twenty-sixth excommunicates Christians who have become domestics, etc., in the service of Jews. The Twenty-seventh proclaims a Crusade against the Albigenses.

CHAPTER XXIV.

THE CAUSE OF ST. THOMAS A BECKET, ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY.

Henry II. mounted the throne of England in 1154. By the death of his father, he inherited Touraine and Anjou ; through his mother he was lord of Normandy and Maine ; in marrying Eleanor of Poitou, he received as dowry Poitou, Saintogne, Auvergne, Perigord, the Limousin, Angoumois, and Guienne. Thus, although a vassal of the king of France, he became, on his accession to the English crown, a more powerful prince than his suzerain (1). Six Popes, Adrian IV., Alexander III., Lucius III., Urban III., Gregory VIII., and Clement III. occupied the chair of St. Peter during the reign of Henry II., but we shall have occasion, in this chapter, to allude only to Alexander. The other principal sovereigns contemporary with Henry were the emperor Frederick I. ; in France, Louis VII. and Philip Augustus ; in Spain, Alphonsus VIII., Sancho III., and Alphonsus IX. When Henry II. commenced to reign, there was no one to whom he owed so much as to Theobald, archbishop of Canterbury, and he soon promoted that prelate to the first place at the council-board. Worn out by age and sickness, Theobald wished to retire from political life, but his great love for Henry prompted him to leave his place to some one capable of guiding the young king, and he chose his own arch-deacon, Thomas à Becket.

(1) We are told by Gerald of Cambrai, Peter of Blois, and William of Newburg, that Henry II. was comparatively well read, and that he was generally well-mannered ; but the cardinal Vivian, after a long interview with him, said : " I have never witnessed the equal of this man as a liar," and king Louis VII. told Henry's ambassadors that it was impossible to put faith in their master.

Henry became greatly attached to the arch-deacon, and appointed him chancellor, (1) made him preceptor of the heirs apparent, warden of the Tower, castellan of Berghamsted, and assigned to his service one hundred and forty knights. Becket was a warrior, at this time, as well as a counsellor. During the French campaign of 1159, he fought at the head of seven hundred knights and their retinues; at the close of the war, he was maintaining twelve hundred knights and four thousand cavalry. In 1161, the highest dignity in the English church became vacant by the death of archbishop Theobald. For thirteen months Henry allowed the vacancy to continue, as the revenues of Canterbury were welcome to his pocket. At the end of that time, the Chapter and the prelates met at Westminster; every vote was cast for Becket, and prince Henry, in his father's name, gave the royal assent (2). The ostentation of the chancellor henceforth gave place to the modesty of a Christian bishop; he immediately resigned his secular offices, and dismissed his large train of noblemen, keeping near his person only a few of his most virtuous and most learned priests. (3). It was on account of his care for the poor, as well as for the sake of the sacred principle involved, that he now insisted upon the restitution of those revenues of his diocese which had been appropriated by laymen. It is not easy to determine whether this action of Becket was the first cause of dissension between him and the monarch; but it is certain that, for more than a year before the open collision, Henry had cooled toward his former favorite, and that the envious noticed a change, and misrepresented his actions. An opportunity was offered to these gentry in 1163, by a dispute regarding the jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical courts. (4). The first attack on these tribunals was made on their

(1) The chancellorship was one of the few offices that could not be bought. It was a sure stepping-stone to a bishopric, and hence its occupier avoided incurring the impediment of simony. LINGARD, History of England, vol. ii., c. 3.

(2) When the king informed Becket of his intention to promote his election, the chancellor smilingly pointed to his armor, and said that such was not the dress of a bishop. He then declined the honor, saying that he could not do his duty as archbishop and, at the same time, retain Henry's favor; but, at the entreaty of the legate Henry of Pisa, he accepted the nomination.

(3) Protestants have called this change hypocrisy; but, remarks Lingard, had Becket been a hypocrite, he would have been both chancellor and archbishop, would have flattered the king, and would have been absolute in church and state.

(4) "When the Imperial government ceased in other countries," says Lingard, "the natives preserved many of its institutions, which the conquerors incorporated with their own laws; but our barbarian ancestors eradicated every prior establishment, and trans-criminal jurisdiction. Because of the presumed light sentence of one Philip de Brois, a canon of Bedford, convicted of manslaughter, and condemned to a money indemnity to the relations of his victim, and afterwards punished by whipping for insulting a judge, Henry summoned the bishops to Westminster, and demanded that hereafter, in all similar cases, the culprit should be punished by the secular tribunals, if convicted by the spiritual court. The prelates refused, and the king then asked if they would promise to observe the ancient customs of the realm. As these customs had not been defined, the archbishop replied affirmatively, "saving his order." Henry then put the question separately to each bishop; with the exception of the bishop of Chichester, all repeated the answer of Becket. The prelates soon realized that the word "customs" was meant to cover an attack on most of the clerical immunities. But the archbishop of York, Roger de Pont l'Eveque, who had always been jealous of Becket, proposed to temporize; Becket refused, and wrote to Pope Alexander about the state of affairs. The Pontiff, who was then at Sens, answered with a most encouraging letter, bidding the English prelate not to yield one iota of the Church's rights. But before the Pope's missive arrived, the zealous archbishop had found himself deserted by nearly all the clergy. He was pressed on all sides to yield, and finally, knowing that Henry had sworn never to attack the Church immunities, he promised to withdraw that obnoxious reservatory clause:

planted the manners of the wilds of Germany into the new solitude which they had made. After their conversion, they associated the heads of the clergy with their nobles, and both equally exercised the functions of civil magistrates. It is plain that the bishop was the sole judge of the clergy in criminal cases (Saxon Laws, 83); that he alone decided their differences (ibid., 51), and that to him appertained the cognizance of certain offences against the rights of the Church and the sanctions of religion; but as it was his duty to sit with the sheriff in the court of the county, his ecclesiastical became blended with his secular jurisdiction, and many causes, which in other countries had been reserved to the spiritual judge, were decided in England before a mixed tribunal. This disposition continued in force till the Norman conquest, when the two judicatures were completely separated, and in every diocese 'courts Christian,' that is, of the bishop and his archdeacons, were established, after the model and with the authority of similar courts in all other parts of the Western church . . . The proceedings of the former (ecclesiastical courts) were guided by fixed and invariable principles, the result of the wisdom of ages; the latter were compelled to follow a system of jurisprudence confused and uncertain, partly of Anglo-Saxon, partly of Norman origin, and depending on precedents, of which some were furnished by memory, others had been transmitted by tradition. The clerical judges were men of talents and education; the uniformity and equity of their decisions were preferred to the caprice and violence which seemed to sway the royal and baronial justiciaries; and by degrees every cause which legal ingenuity could connect with the provisions of the Canons, whether it regarded tithes, or advowsons, or public scandal, or marriage, or testaments, or perjury, or breach of contract, was drawn before the ecclesiastical tribunals. A spirit of rivalry arose between the two judicatures, which quickly ripened into open hostility. On the one side were ranged the bishops and chief dignitaries of the Church, on the other the king and barons." loc. cit.

"saving his order." Henry then declared that, as his honor had been publicly injured, the reparation should be made before the estates of the kingdom.

The bishops, barons, etc., met the king at Clarendon, on January 25th, 1164. Henry immediately demanded that the prelates should fulfil their promise, and Becket once more requested that the reservatory clause might be retained. The answer of Henry was a threat of exile or of death; a door was thrown open, revealing to the astonished bishops a party of knights with drawn swords. Two Templars then knelt before the primate, and begged him to yield; the bishops joined with their entreaties, and finally Becket promised to observe the "customs," but quite naively asked to be told what they were. A committee of inquiry presented sixteen Constitutions as the customs of England. "The care of all vacant dioceses, abbeys, and priories, was to be given to the sovereign, and all their revenues, during the vacancy, to be paid to him; the election of a new incumbent could be made only in pursuance of a royal writ, and should be held by the chief clergy in the royal chapel, with the royal consent, and by the advice of such prelates as the king might summon." The first portion of this Constitution refers to a custom introduced by William Rufus, but renounced by him and all his successors, including Henry II. himself. It was ordered, by the third Constitution, that, when a cleric was a party to a suit, the royal justices should decide in what court it should be tried; if it was decided to send the case to an ecclesiastical court, a civil officer would make report of the proceedings, and the defendant, if convicted, could claim no "benefit of clergy," that is, exemption from punishment by the secular authority. This, says Lingard, ought not to have been called an "ancient" custom, for it was an innovation, overturning the law as it had stood since the days of the Conqueror, and not restoring the judicial process of the Anglo-Saxons. The fourth, also derived from the Conquest, ordered that "no archbishop, bishop, or other person, should leave the kingdom, without the royal consent;" before going, they were to give security that they would work nothing against his majesty or his kingdom. The seventh Constitution prescribed that "no chief-tenant of the king, no officer of his household or demesne, could be excommunicated, or his lands interdicted, without the king's permission, or that of the grand-justiciary." The pretext of this custom, introduced by the Conqueror, was that, as all men were obliged to avoid an excommunicated person, the king would lose the services of an excommunicated vassal. By the eighth, appeals were ordered to proceed "from the archdeacon to the bishop, from the bishop to the archbishop;" if the metropolitan did not decide the cause, it was to be carried "to the king," that he might command it to be terminated "in the archiepiscopal court," and no other judge was to be had, "without the royal assent." King Henry I. had tried to prevent appeals to the Pope, but Henry II., some time after the Clarendon affair, denied that such was his intention. His creature, Gilbert Foliot, bishop of London, said that "the king claims that no one shall leave the kingdom, for a civil cause."

Of these Constitutions three copies were made, and they were signed by Henry, the bishops, and thirty-seven barons. On the king's demanding that the prelates should affix their seals to the documents, Becket said that he had fulfilled his promise, and would do no more. "His conduct on this trying occasion," says Lingard, "has been severely condemned for its duplicity. To me he appears more deserving of pity than of censure. His was not the tergiversation of one who seeks to effect his object by fraud and deception; it was rather the hesitation of a mind oscillating between the decision of his own judgment, and the opinions and apprehensions of others. His conviction seems to have remained unchanged; he yielded, to avoid the charge of having, by his obstinacy, drawn destruction on the heads of his fellow-bishops." Scarcely had the Clarendon convention been dissolved, when the primate became the prey of remorse. Immediately after his arrival at Canterbury he voluntarily ceased to officiate as bishop, and despatched a report to Pope Alexander, begging absolution from any censures he had incurred. In his reply the Pontiff encourages Becket, grants the absolution from censure, and orders him to resume his functions. In vain king Henry now tried to work on the fears of Alexander, causing it to be reported that he was about to recognize Barbarossa's anti-Pope. But being foiled, Becket was finally summoned before a council at Northampton, to answer a series of charges. When the archbishop appeared, Henry accused him of contempt for the royal authority, because he had answered a citation of the royal court, not in person, but by attorney. The court "amerced" the archbishop, that is, put him "at the king's mercy" to the extent of his entire property. After many iniquitous and absurd demands had been made by the king, the zealous archbishop thus protested against the decisions of the court: "Future ages will pass judgment upon your sentence; it is a new kind of decision, but perhaps in conformity with the new Canons of Clarendon. It has never been heard that an archbishop of Canterbury could be judged, for any cause whatsoever, in a court of the king of England; that is forbidden by the dignity of his church and by his personal authority, and because he is the spiritual father of all the rulers in the kingdom, and is to be always obeyed by all." The bishops now consulted together. Foliot of London urged Becket to resign his see, saying: "If you remember, father, whence the lord king lifted you up, and what he has conferred upon you; and if you consider the evil state of the times, and what ruin you are preparing for the Catholic Church and for us, in case you resist the king in these things, you will resign, not only the archbishopric of Canterbury, but ten of them, if you had them. Then, perhaps, if the king sees you so humble, he may give everything back to you." Henry of Winchester bravely sustained the primate: "Such advice, so pernicious to the Catholic Church, affects and confounds us all. If our archbishop, the primate of all England, sets us the example of yielding up, at the beck, and because of the threats of the king, the care of souls entrusted to him, what will be the condition of the Church? Nothing will be done according to law; everything will be in confusion." The bishop of Lincoln, whom the chronicler well styles "a simple man, and rather imprudent," gasped out: "It is evident that they seek the life of this man. He must yield up his diocese or his life. What good the archbishopric will do him without his life I cannot see." The other bishops followed, all urging Becket to yield.

On the morning of October 13th the primate celebrated mass, and then proceeded to the court. The bishop of Exeter soon entered, and kneeling, begged Becket to have pity on both himself and his brethren. The primate answered: "Fly, if you wish; you do not appreciate the things of God." The other prelates then came to the primate, and Hilary of Chichester, in their name, delivered himself of this speech: "Once you were our archbishop, and we were bound to obey you. But since you, having sworn fidelity to the king, that is, having promised to guard his life, members, and earthly dignity, and to observe the customs adduced by him, now try to destroy them; therefore we pronounce you a perjurer, and a perjured archbishop we will not obey. We place ourselves under the protection of the lord Pope, and call you to his presence to answer for these things." Becket simply answered, "I hear." The lay barons then entered the hall, and Leicester, reluctantly compelled to deliver the sentence of the court, told the primate to hearken to the decision. Becket arose, and said: "My sentence? Son and earl, first hearken to me. You know how faithfully I have served the king, and how hesitatingly I accepted this office in order to please him; you know how I was declared free from all secular claims. I ought not, and will not, answer for what occurred before my consecration. As the soul is more worthy than the body, so you are bound to obey me rather than an earthly monarch. Neither law nor reason permits children to condemn or to judge a father; hence I decline the tribunal of the king, yours, and any other, being amenable, under God, to the lord Pope alone, to whom, before you all, I now appeal, placing the church of Canterbury, my order, and my dignity, with all pertaining to them, under God's and his protection. As for you, my brothers and fellow-bishops, who obey man rather than God, I summon you all to the presence and judgment of the lord Pope; and, strong in the authority of the Catholic Church and of the Apostolic See, I depart hence." He immediately left the castle, and the people, who had heard that he had been murdered, accompanied him with shouts of joy to his quarters. Here, however, his knights and pages tearfully begged to be released from their fealty, and to be dismissed; and he cheerfully granted the prayer. At midnight, disguised as a monk, he left the monastery, with three companions, and after three weeks of perilous adventure, he reached Gravelines, in France, and hastened to pay his respects to king Louis VII., and to Pope Alexander, then at Sens.

When Henry found that Becket had fled, he wrote to Louis, begging him not to allow "the late primate" to remain in France. When Louis read the epistle, he remarked: "He is king of England, and I also am a king; but I would not depose the least one of the clerics of my kingdom. It has ever been a glory of the French crown to defend exiles, especially ecclesiastics, from persecution." Becket soon visited Pope Alexander at Sens. He found that a number of English bishops and barons had worked so well for Henry, that not a few among the cardinals were prejudiced against the primate. Having handed the Pontiff a copy of the Clarendon Constitutions, Becket delivered to him the episcopal ring, and declared he would long ago have resigned his diocese, had he not considered it unbecoming to do so at the whim of a king. Alexander returned the ring, and exhorted him to persevere in the good fight. Having read the Constitutions, the Pontiff said: "Among these abominable things, there is nothing good; but there are some which may, in some way, be tolerated by the Church. The greater number of them, however, have been already condemned by ancient Councils, as directly opposed to the sacred Canons." From the Vatican Codex in which, after the famous Quadripartite Life of St. Thomas, the Constitutions are recorded, we learn that ten of them were absolutely condemned. With regard to the eighth, which prohibited appeals to Rome, St. Anselm had already told William II. that "to swear to that is to abjure St. Peter; and he who abjures St. Peter, undoubtedly abjures Christ, who made him prince of His Church." Even Henry II. was glad to recognize the Pontiff's right to receive appeals when, a short time after the exile of Becket, he dreaded lest the primate would excommunicate him, "and was compelled," says Becket (Epistles, B. i., no. 135), "to have recourse to the See of Peter and to invoke the name of the lord Pope, which he had before commanded not to be invoked." When Pope Alexander dismissed the archbishop of Canterbury, he recommended him to the hospitality of the Cistercian abbot of Pontigny, and it was gladly accorded. During the year 1165, Henry was occupied in a disastrous campaign in Wales, and could pay no attention to Church matters. But when, covered with infamy (1), he re-entered London, he turned his mind to vengeance on Becket. All the primate's estates were confiscated; all the clergy who had countenanced his late actions were deprived of their revenues; all of his relatives and friends, without distinction of age or sex, were banished, and compelled by oath to visit the primate, and recount to him their sufferings. We may imagine the anguish of Becket when four hundred of these unfortunates, among them his own sister and her infants, upbraided him as the cause of their woes. (2). Henry also wreaked his vengeance on the hosts of the archbishop, by threatening to expel all the Cistercians from his dominions, both British and French, if they continued their hospitality. To save them, Becket left their monastery, and King Louis assigned him a residence in Sens. In June of 1166, he resolved to bring things to a crisis, and accordingly issued a decree, excommunicating the ministers of Henry who had communicated with the anti-Pope, and those who had framed the Clarendon Constitutions, or who had appropriated Church property. He also wrote a strong, though affectionate, letter to Henry, from which we take the following passages: "Christian princes have been accustomed to obey the Church, not to

(1) As a consolation for his failure in this war, Henry satiated his thirst for blood on his hostages, the children of the first families of Wales. The eyes of all the males were plucked out and the noses and ears of all the females amputated.

(2) Pope Alexander, King Louis VII., and the queen of Sicily amply relieved the necessities of all these people. The sister of Becket found an asylum at Clermont, for which the Pontiff thanked the abbot. Epistles of St. Thomas, ff., n. 112.

think first of their own power ; they have always bowed their heads to bishops, and never presumed to judge them. Two powers rule the world, namely, the sacred authority of the Pontiff, and the royal power ; and of these the priestly authority is of the greater weight, inasmuch as, at the divine judgment, priests have to render an account of the kings themselves. You should have known for certain that you depend upon the sacerdotal authority, and that it ought not be made to bend to your will. Many Pontiffs have excommunicated both emperors and kings I write these things only, for the present, my lord, passing certain others in silence, until I see what effect my words produce. If they excite in you a worthy repentance, I shall rejoice with those who will tell me that my son, the king, was dead, but now lives, that he was lost, but is now found. But if you do not hearken to me, who always pray for you, with abundant tears and deep moans, before the Majesty of the Body of Christ, I shall certainly there cry out against you, and shall call upon God to arise and to judge His cause, to be mindful of the injuries heaped daily by the king of England and his upon God and His Where are the emperors, kings, and princes, the archbishops and bishops, who have preceded us ? They have labored, and others have taken up their labors. Thus passes the world and its glory. Remember your last end, and you will never sin, or, if you do sin, you will repent, while yet alive." Pope Alexander now appointed the archbishop of Canterbury Apostolic legate for all England, excepting, however, the archbishop of York from the legatine jurisdiction, because, to please Henry, the Pontiff had, some time since, made that prelate legate to all, excepting the primate. When Becket had received this appointment, he at once commenced its functions. He condemned the Constitutions of Clarendon, especially certain six chapters which he recites in his condemnatory letters to the English bishops. He excommunicated all the observers and promoters of the Constitutions, and absolved the prelates from their oath to observe them. He also excommunicated by name those who had communicated with the German schismatics, and those who had invaded the property of the church of Canterbury. In these letters to the English prelates, Becket is especially severe on the following chapters of Clarendon. 1st, that no appeal should be taken to the Apostolic See, unless with permission of the king. 2d, that no prelate should visit the Supreme Pontiff without royal license. 3d, that no king's man could be excommunicated, and no royal domain or king's man's domain be interdicted, without the royal consent. 4th, that no bishop should prosecute any one for perjury or heresy. 5th, that clerics should appear before secular tribunals. 6th, that the king, or any layman, should treat of cases concerning tithes, etc. Pope Alexander confirmed the action of his legate and wrote a warning letter to Henry, in which occurs this passage: "We have not thought it proper to shut our eyes to your obstinacy any longer; nor shall we again close the mouth of the aforesaid bishop, but shall allow him to freely do his duty and to punish you, with the arms of ecclesiastical severity, for the injuries done to him and to his church." (1).

The mighty Henry affected indifference at the threats of the Pontiff and of the primate; but he gave orders for the searching of every person entering England, and for the seizure of all letters coming from Pope Alexander or Becket. (2). He also decreed the most terrible punishments for the bearers of such missives, and compelled all freemen to swear to obey no censure against king or realm. (3). He even threatened to recognize the new creature of Barbarossa, the anti-Pope Guido of Crema; but, bad as many of the English prelates were, they were not prepared for schism. Hence Henry disavowed the promise made to Barbarossa, and even prevailed upon his ambassadors to deny that they had given it. (4). The king now tried to purchase friends at Rome, and throughout Italy. The Pontiff spurned his gifts; a few of the cardinals, and some of the Roman barons, also some of the magistrates of the

(1) ROGER OF HOVEDEN. Annals.

(2) Epistles of St. Thomas, ii., 249.

(3) Gervase, 1400.

(4) John of Oxford, a favorite of Henry, and ever foremost in any dirty work for his master, was sent to Rome, and there swore to Pope Alexander that the king had done nothing contrary to the honor of the Pontiff. BOSEHAM, ii., 256.

republics, accepted them, but the money was thrown away. During the years 1167-70 Henry tried many expedients; he even gave audience to Becket on two occasions, during his own sojourn in France, but each time promised to respect the rights of the Church only "saving the royal dignity;" while the primate always professed himself willing to obey the king, "saving the rights of the Church." For several years the barons of Henry's continental dominions had been appealing, according to the feudal jurisprudence, to their own and Henry's suzerain, the king of France; and Louis, quite naturally, had not been slow to aid them; but in 1169, a peace was concluded, and in 1170, Henry promised king Louis that he would be reconciled with the archbishop of Canterbury. (1). Pope Alexander having at length resolved to excommunicate the obstinate monarch, Henry proposed that the primate should return to England. All his rights, lands, etc., were to be restored. The Pontiff consented, but sent to Henry the bishops of Rouen and Nevers, to inform him that if his promises were not fulfilled in forty days from date, their orders were to publish an interdict in all his continental dominions. In vain Henry threatened and fawned by turns; he finally consented to meet Becket at Fretivalle, on the Touraine frontier.

On July 22d, Henry and Louis were conversing in a meadow near Fretivalle, when Becket, accompanied by the bishops of Rouen and Nevers, was seen coming towards them. Putting spurs to his horse, Henry uncovered and advanced to meet his former friend. Immediately he commenced to chat familiarly, and when he said, "I shall treat as traitors those who have betrayed us both," Becket dis-

(1) In an interview betwixt Louis and Henry, at which the primate was present, Henry complained of Becket's constant use, in his profession of fidelity, of the clause, "saving the rights of the Church." He said to Louis, "Listen to this, my lord, if you please. Whatever displeases him is, he says, contrary to the honor of God. He claims all that is mine for himself. But, lest I may appear to go against God's honor, or to resist him too much, I make this offer: What the greatest and holiest of his predecessors accorded to the least of mine let him accord to me, and I am content." Becket still refused to yield the clause, "saving the rights of the Church," and for a time Louis was so displeased that it seemed he would withdraw his countenance from the primate. But he soon sent for Becket, and falling at his feet, exclaimed: "My lord and father, you alone see this thing rightly. We were blind when we counselled you, in your cause, or rather in that of God, to abandon God's honor to the whim of man. We are sorry, father; forgive us our sin. I offer to God and to you, myself and my kingdom, and from this hour, so long as God grants me life, I shall not be wanting in aid to you and yours." Quadrip. Life, B. II., c. 27 and 28. Gervase, 1406. Epistles of St. Thomas, B. III., no. 79.

mounted, and would have knelt, but the monarch made him remount, and continued, "My lord archbishop, let us renew our old affection, but do me honor before those who now watch us." It was then understood that the archbishop should remain for a few days in the court of Henry, that the world might be convinced of their reconciliation. But in spite of this parade of submission, Henry delayed the execution of his promises, and it was only on Nov. 12th, when the interdict was on the very point of being launched, that he restored the lands of Canterbury see; and then the rents had been collected, and the cattle and corn removed. Before Pope Alexander heard of the above reconciliation, he had issued letters of suspension against the English bishops who had lately officiated, in defiance of Becket's prohibition, at the coronation of young prince Henry. In the interests of peace, the primate resolved to make no use of the Pontiff's decree, trusting to Alexander's good sense for excuse. But it happened that the three prelates concerned were informed of its being in the hands of Becket, and they dispatched a body of soldiers, under Ranulph de Broc, to seize it when he should land. When the primate reached Whitsand, he heard of this proceeding, and sent the decree ahead of himself by a courier, who publicly handed it to the prelates involved, and they immediately departed for Normandy to excite the anger of Henry. On Dec. 3d, Becket was joyfully received by the clergy and people of his see of Canterbury; on Christmas he preached, and toward the end of his discourse he remarked that his enemies would soon be satiated with his blood. On the 28th, Reginald Fitzurse, William Tracy, Hugh de Moreville, and Richard Brito arrived from Normandy, and assembling their followers at the Broc manor of Saltwood, prepared to silence forever the zealous archbishop. They had heard Henry, enraged because of the representations of the three bishops condemned by Pope Alexander, cry out, "Of all the cowards whom I have benefited, is there not one who will free me from this troublesome priest?" On the afternoon of the 29th, the four knights presented themselves at the archiepiscopal palace, saying that they had a message from the king to the primate. When admitted to audience, they ordered the archbishop to absolve the prelates of York, London, and Salisbury. Becket answered that the king had consented to his publication of the Pontifical letters suspending these bishops; that the case of Roger of York was reserved to Rome; that he was ready to absolve the bishops of London and Salisbury when they swore to submit to the decisions of the Church. The knights then declared that he must leave England. Becket replied, "No. If I am allowed to perform my duty, well and good; if not, the will of God be done." Fitzurse then ordered all the household, in the name of the king, to watch lest their master should escape. The closing scenes of the tragedy are thus described by Lingard: "At the departure of the knights, the archbishop returned to his seat apparently cool and collected. Neither in tone nor in gesture did he betray the slightest apprehension, though consternation and despair were depicted in every countenance around him. It was the hour of the evening service, and at the sound of the psalmody in the choir, a voice exclaimed, 'To the church, it will afford protection.' But Becket had said that he would await them there, and refused to move from the place. Word was now brought that the knights had forced their way through the garden and made an entrance by the windows. A few moments later they were heard at no great distance, breaking down with axes a strong partition of oak which impeded their progress. In a paroxysm of terror the archbishop's attendants closed around him, and, notwithstanding his resistance, bore him with pious violence through the cloister into the church. The door was immediately closed and barred against the assassins, who were already in sight. Becket walked leisurely along the transept, and was ascending the steps which led to his favorite altar, when he heard the cries of the knights demanding admission at the door. Without hesitation he ordered it to be thrown open, saying that the house of God should not be made a military fortress. Immediately his attendants, monks and clergy, dispersed to conceal themselves, some behind the columns, others under the altars.

Had he followed their example; he might have saved his life; for it was growing dark, and both the crypts and a staircase before him, which led to the roof, offered places of concealment. But he turned to meet his enemies, and, stationing himself with his back against a column, between the altars of St. Mary and St. Bennet, waited their approach. The four knights and their twelve companions rushed into the church with drawn swords, and loud cries. 'To me, ye king's men,' shouted their leader. 'Where is the traitor?' exclaimed Hugh of Horsey, a military subdeacon, known by the characteristic surname of Maucclerc. (1). No answer was returned; but to the question, 'where is the archbishop?' Becket replied, 'Here I am, the archbishop, but no traitor. What is your will?' They turned to him, and insisted that he should immediately absolve all he had placed under ecclesiastical censures; to which he replied, that, until they had promised satisfaction, he could not. 'Then die,' exclaimed a voice. 'I am ready,' returned the prelate, 'to die for the cause of God and His Church. But I forbid you, in the name of Almighty God, to touch any one of my household, clerk or layman.' There seems to have been some hesitation on the part of the murderers. They would rather have shed his blood without the church than within its walls. An attempt was made by some of them to drag him away; but he resisted it with success, through the aid of a clergyman called Edward Grim (2), who threw his arms around the archbishop's waist. 'Reginald' said Becket to Fitzurse, 'how dare you do this? Remember that you have been my man.' (3). 'I am now the king's man,' replied the assassin, aiming a blow at the primate's head. Grim interposed his arm, which was broken and severed in two; still the sword passed through Becket's cap, and wounded him on the crown. As he felt the blood trickling down his cheek, he wiped it away with his sleeve, and having joined his hands, and bent his head in the attitude of prayer, said: 'Into Thy hands, O Lord, I commend my spirit.' In this posture, with his face to his murderers, and without shrinking or speaking, he awaited a second stroke, which threw him on his knees and elbows. The third stroke was given by Richard Brito, with such violence that he cut off the upper part of the archbishop's head, and broke his own sword on the pavement. The murderers were retiring, when Hugh of Horsey, turning back, set his foot on the neck of the corpse, and, drawing the brain out of the skull with the point of his sword, scattered it around. 'Fear not,' he said, 'the man will never rise again.' They returned to the palace, which they rifled, taking away with them spoil, as it was estimated, to the value of two thousand marks."

(1) That is, the wicked cleric.

(2) When John of Salisbury, Fitzstephen, and others, afterwards boasted that they had stood by their lord to the end, Grim declared that all but himself ran away.

(3) That is, he had been the primate's liege-man or vassal.

William of Newburg (1), an author contemporary with St. Thomas of Canterbury, thought that the primate acted imprudently in sending into England the letters of Pope Alexander suspending the bishops of York, London, and Salisbury: "He was fervent in his zeal for justice, but whether it was prudent, God knows. It is not permitted to our littleness to rashly judge of the acts of so great a man. However, I think that the most blessed Pope Gregory would have been more lenient when the relations with the king were so strained, and that, for the sake of peace, he would have borne with what might have been tolerated, without danger to the Christian faith." With regard to the saint's prudence, there was scarcely any room for its exercise in the premises. The suspensory decree was issued by his superior, the Roman Pontiff, and it was his duty to promulgate it. He did, indeed, at first, intend to suppress the letters, but the infamous brigandage of the three prelates showed that justice, not mercy, had to be exercised. As for the danger of rekindling the ire of the king, we know that Henry had approved of the execution of the Papal sentence. This is attested by the authors of the Quadripartite Life of St. Thomas, viz., Becket's clerk Herbert, John of Salisbury, William of Canterbury, and the monk Alan, all of whom were intimate with the primate, and better informed than was William of Newburg. Nor, says

(1) English Affairs, B. ii, c. 25.

Alexandre, would the great St. Gregory have acted as this chronicler would have had the archbishop act, if his probable course can be conjectured from the rule he lays down in his Morals, B. xxxi., c. 14: "Often we could rest quiet and unshaken, if we avoided the exercise of justice against the wicked. But if our souls are filled with the desire of eternal life, if they regard the light of truth, if the flame of holy fervor is kindled in them, we will offer ourselves for the defense of justice, to the extent that the cause demands, and even though they do not seek us, we will oppose the wicked who work injustice."

The reader will not be displeased or uninterested, if we conclude this chapter with the beautiful apostrophe by Alexandre, which is placed at the end of his lengthy and exhaustive dissertation on St. Thomas of Canterbury: "To thee, most holy bishop and martyr, I now direct my words, and suppliantly beseech thee, that with the God whom thou enjoyest thou wilt intercede, that the Church, the Spouse of Christ, whom thou lovedst as He did, and for whom thou didst give thy life, may have perpetual peace; that the Roman Pontiffs and bishops may be endowed with sanctity, and with zeal for the liberty and discipline of the Church; that the secular and regular clergy may despise the world, and be pious and fervent; that the most serene king of Great Britain and the whole kingdom may return to the true faith and the communion of the Roman Church, which it enjoyed in thy times; that an overflowing abundance of heavenly gifts, a long life, and lasting happiness, may be granted to the most Christian king, the great Louis, rightly styled by the holy Pope Innocent XI. 'the extirpator of heresy;' that tranquillity and prosperity may ever be the portion of the French church and of the French kingdom, from which, while thou wast an exile in these parts, thou didst receive consolation, support, and protection." (1).

(1) St. Thomas of Canterbury was, said the late Frederick Faber, "the apostle of high principle, the saint whose every word and work was a condemnation of cowardice, of time-serving, of timidity, of pusillanimity, of all unworthy concession, of all trembling in the face of power, of all bartering of principle for peace or gain, of all circuitous roads to a rightful and a godly end; in a word, of every profane weakness that ever afflicted the Church from within or without, from her children or her foes. . . . While the men of St. Thomas's day found fault with his want of discretion, and blamed him because he allowed his rude, uncouth, grotesque austerities to appear amid the splendors of Henry's court,

CHAPTER XXV.

THE WALDENSES.

About the year 1160, a certain citizen of Lyons having suddenly fallen dead, one of the spectators, Peter Waldo by name, was so affected with terror, that he immediately gave most of his goods to the poor, and began to exhort his neighbors to lead a more perfect life. He soon formed quite a large association, the members of which practised voluntary poverty. At first, there seems to have been nothing reprehensible in the doctrine or conduct of the Waldenses, or "Poor Men of Lyons," as they were sometimes called; they seem to have regarded themselves as a kind of religious order in the Church, and were by no means hostile to her hierarchy or any of her institutions; in 1212 they even applied, but in vain, to Pope Innocent III. for an approbation of their rule, an imitation of that of the Friars Minor of St. Francis of Assisi, then commencing their apostolic career. In fact, even when they had fallen into doctrinal error, the pure Waldenses were noted for apparent integrity of morals, and an external manifestation, at least, of evangelical simplicity, which greatly added to their numbers. One of the first innovations of the Waldenses was the free and promiscuous interpretation of the Scriptures. According to Reinerius Saccho (1), who had been a bishop among them, they were thoroughly logical and consistent in their application of the new principle: "I knew a rustic who could recite the Book of Job, word for word, and I met yet all the while they were allured and attracted by them . . . What was it, in the manner of his strife, whether with the crowned king upon his throne, or the rude barons, or even, which was harder still, with his courtly brother-bishops, what was it that so offended men? It was the seeming hypocrisy, it was the apparent double facedness of all that he did, it was that holy double spirit which the Church has in her, and which all the saints of God possessed; that he was humble, with what the world called an affectedly servile humility, to the poor, and lonely, and fallen, and little ones of Jesus; but in the face of the rude king, and in the face of human power and intellect, he seemed proud and arrogant and presumptuous, drawing himself up within himself, and not stooping to make the slightest concession . . . The ashes of St. Thomas, scattered to the winds far and wide, (by the Reformers, in 1538), brought down God's curse upon the land. They have brought down the curse of littleness, of pusillanimity,—a curse the very characteristic of which is lowering and degrading, even as the curse that came down on the Egyptians' land." Notes on Doctrinal Subjects, p. 3, sect. 2, c. 8.

(1) Reinerius Saccho abjured the Waldensian heresy about the year 1254, and entered the Order of Preaching Friars just founded by St. Dominic. He wrote a treatise On Heretics, in which an account is given of the Waldenses and of their numerous progeny of sects.

many who knew perfectly the entire New Testament ; but as they are ignorant laymen, they interpret the Scriptures falsely and corruptedly. Thus, that passage of John i., 'and His own received Him not,' they explain, saying, 'that is, the swine;' and that of the Psalmist (lxvii. 31), 'Rebuke the wild beasts of the reeds,' they read as 'Rebuke the wild beasts of the swallow.'" (1). When the Waldenses, or Poor Men of Lyons, were reproved for taking upon themselves the right of explaining the Bible without authority, they replied that they were sent by God. Pope Innocent III. in an epistle to the faithful of Metz (2), therefore wrote: "The office of teacher ought not to be indifferently assumed by any one; for, according to the Apostle, 'how shall they preach, if they be not sent?' And the very Truth commanded the Apostles, 'pray the Lord of the harvest to send laborers into His harvest.' . . . Since this interior mission is hidden, it is not enough that any one assert that he is sent by God; any heretic may assert this of himself." With regard to the French version of the Bible used by the Waldenses, Pope Innocent III. says that he has written to the bishop and chapter of Metz (3), ordering them to inquire: "Who is the author of said translation? What was his intention? What is the faith of those who use it?" But the Waldenses would not abandon their practice of independent teaching; and their leaders began to assert that the clergy, many of whom were leading far from blameless lives, were jealous of the Poor Men, and felt the purity of these to be a reproach to themselves. Reinerius Saccho says of the original Waldenses (4): "They present an appearance of piety; for they lead good lives before men, believe rightly about God, and hold all the articles of the Creed; but they blaspheme against the Roman Church and the clergy, and the multitude lend them ready ears. . . . In their habits they are composed and modest, with no vanity of dress, for they use no precious clothes, nor very abject materials. They do not trade, for fear of falling into lies, oaths, and fraud; they live, like artisans, by labor. Even their teachers are weavers. They do not accumulate

(1) That is, they read harundinis as hirundinis.

(3) Epistle to the Cistercian and Morimond Abbots.

(2) B. II., epist. 131.

(4) Loc. cit. c. 4 and 7.

riches, but are content with necessities, they are chaste, especially the Leonists, and are temperate in food and drink, going not to taverns, or dances, or other vanities. They refrain from anger. They are always working, learning, or teaching; hence they pray very little. They go to church, offer, confess, communicate, and hear sermons, but in order that they may trap the preacher in his discourse. They are known by the precision and modesty of their words; they abstain from scurrility, detraction, levity, lies, and oaths; nor will they say 'truly' or 'certainly,' for they deem such words to be oaths. Rarely will they answer questions; if they are asked if they know the gospel or the epistle, they will reply: 'Who would teach us them?' Or they may say: 'These things are for men of profound intellect.'"

But the Waldenses did not long confine themselves to malignant criticisms of the clergy, and a pretence of superior sanctity: very soon gross errors of doctrine began to circulate among them, denying, as they did, the exclusive magistracy of the teaching Church. We learn their errors from Saccho, their ex-bishop; from Claude Seyssel, archbishop of Turin in 1517 (1); from Bernard of Font-Cauld (2); and from Eberhard of Bethune. (3). They taught that the Roman Church was not the Church of Christ, but "a church of the malignant, which had been introduced by Pope Sylvester I., when he allowed the Spouse of Christ to be poisoned by the possession of temporal goods." The Waldenses alone were the children of Christ. The Roman church, was a sink of foulness, and the whore of the Apocalypse; the Pope was the head and front of all error, and the bishops were Scribes, while monks were Pharisees. God, not prelates, was to be obeyed. All in the Church are equal, for does not Matthew say (xxiii. 8), "All of you are brethren?" Tithes ought not to be paid, for the primitive Church had none. The clergy should have no possessions, for do we not read in Deuteronomy XVIII. 1, "The priests shall have no part or inheritance with the rest of Israel?"

(1) Against the Waldensian Sect and its Errors.

(2) Against the Waldenses, c. 1 and 2.

(3) Anti-Heresy.

It is a sin to endow a church or a monastery. All the clergy should labor with their hands. The Waldenses admitted only two Sacraments, Baptism and the Eucharist. They did not regard the former as necessary for salvation. They denied the real presence, unless at the moment of Communion. Matrimony was not a Sacrament. The use of matrimony was prohibited, as a mortal sin, to a couple whom experience had taught that the wife was barren. Orders they admitted in no sense; any good layman, any good woman, could be a minister. They rejected the doctrine of Purgatory. There was no such thing as venial sin.

In a short time the pure Waldenses had nearly disappeared. Following the inevitable law of heresy, they gave rise to numerous sects, the chief of which were the Runcarii, Sciscidenses, Ortlibenses, Ordibarii, Cathari, Patarini, and Passagini. 1. The Runcarii had for a distinguishing error the doctrine that no sin could be committed by means of the body from the waist down, for, do we not read in the Bible, "From the heart proceed fornications?" 2. The Sciscidenses differed from the other Waldenses, in that they received the Eucharistic doctrine. 3. The Ortlibenses avowed a belief in all the articles of Faith, but gave them a mystic interpretation. They admitted a Trinity, but only as existing after the conception of Christ. From the seed of Joseph, Mary had a son, Jesus, whom she brought up in the sect of the Waldenses, and thus he became the Son of God. A third person afterward came into existence, namely, St. Peter, who, co-operating with Jesus, became the Holy Ghost. The world is eternal. There will be no resurrection of our bodies. The last judgment will be held when the Pope and emperor become Waldenses. They denied the passion and death of Christ; the cross which He carried was merely a life of penance, that is, a life spent as an Ortlibensian Waldensis, which life cannot admit of sin. Matrimony is good, if the parties lead continent lives; but the conjugal act is an evil thing. 4. The Ordibarii held that Christ was the son of Joseph and Mary, and he was saved only because he restored the Waldenses. 5.

